BALLAD, WRITTEN AND COMPOSED FOR THE PIANO-FORTE,

BY J. STARR HOLLOWAY.

Syn. loco.

Op. 84.

Moderato.

The first system of the musical score, consisting of a piano introduction and the first system of the ballad. The piano introduction is in 4/4 time, marked 'Moderato', and features a melody in the right hand and a bass line in the left hand. The ballad begins with a treble clef and a key signature of one flat (B-flat). The melody is in 4/4 time and is accompanied by a piano accompaniment. The first system of the ballad ends with a double bar line.

The second system of the musical score, featuring the vocal melody and piano accompaniment. The vocal melody is in 4/4 time and is accompanied by a piano accompaniment. The lyrics are written below the vocal line. The piano accompaniment is in 4/4 time and features a melody in the right hand and a bass line in the left hand. The second system of the ballad ends with a double bar line.

WALKING-DRESS FOR A YOUNG LADY.

MADE of steel-colored poplin; trimmed with Magenta-colored velvet and buttons. The velvet is crossed at intervals by squares of the poplin, having a button in the centre, which makes a very stylish trimming.

EMBROIDERY.

THE EVELYN.

MADE of plain colored merino, and trimmed with very bright silk or poplin.

THE VALENCIAN.

[From the establishment of G. BRODIE, 51 Canal Street, New York. Drawn by L. T. VOIGT, from actual articles of costume.]

This graceful and truly classic sortie de bal, or opera cloak, is made of white merino, and bordered with a gold passamenterie and tassels. The combined effect is admirable, while the rich chaste sweep of the material produces an effect which is peculiarly statuesque and dignified. Made in suitable material, the same fashion is greatly in favor for the promenade.

EMBROIDERY.

OPERA HOOD.

NEW STYLES OF APRONS.

THE JENNY.

THE Jenny is made of black moire antique, and trimmed with cords and tassels caught at intervals by rosette buttons.

THE ZEPHANIA.

THE Zephania is suitable for silk or wash goods. It can be made of colored cambric, scalloped with white, and braided with white Marseilles braid.

THE ROSAMOND.

THE Rosamond is so simple it needs no description.

THE URSULA.

THE Ursula is decidedly a dress apron, being made of very rich silk, and trimmed with two rows of very heavy fringe. The ends of the first row of fringe and the pockets are finished with gorges.

BRUSSELS EMBROIDERY ON NET.

We present to our subscribers a new style of ornamental embroidery, which is especially pretty for many purposes. It is worked on a clear Brussels net, not too fine. The diamonds, which appear crossed, are darned with a fine soft cotton. These can be worked with the greatest regularity by counting the threads of the net, and keeping them exactly the same size. Leaving one hole of the net between each short length of the darning, as will be seen in our illustration, gives it a much lighter appearance. The alternate diamonds are filled in with a sprig, embroidered in satin stitch, which shows to great advantage on the light net ground.

COLLAR AND CUFF IN IMITATION OF HONINGTON LACE.

A design which can be worked so as to produce a very close imitation of the Honington lace work. The sprigs as they are made upon the pillow are all separate, being afterwards arranged and sewn together according to the individual taste. In our design the parts touch each other with very few exceptions. It is to be worked on either a clear thin French cambric or a Swiss muslin. The design must be traced in perfection cotton, and sewn over with a very fine one. The centres of every flower are filled up with lace stitches of various kinds, adding greatly to the beauty of the effect. The veins of all the leaves must be carefully and distinctly indicated; in every case a clear and sharp outline is essential. When the whole of the needle-work has been completed, the superfluous parts must be cut out, and the result will be an elegant collar, closely resembling those formed of the Honington sprigs.

SUNSHINE AND SHADE; OR, THE GOVERNESS.

BY FANNIE WARNER.

[Entered, according to act of Congress, in the year 1860, by LOUIS A. GODEY, in the clerk's office of the District Court of the United States, in and for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.]

CHAPTER I.

THE EVE OF DEPARTURE.

"AND to-morrow you leave us for the 'Sunny South?'"

"Yes; and I hope it may prove as sunny as it is represented. De Bow says that 'a more lovely heaven does not smile on the classic land of Italy than upon the favored inhabitants of Georgia;' and I fervently hope that those whom Destiny throws me among will smile as graciously upon me as heaven does upon them."

"Well, I hope your lines will be cast in pleasant places, and that you will not have reason to regret your determination to adopt the vocation of a governess. I must bid you good-by this evening, as a business engagement will prevent my seeing you at the cars in the morning; but accept my warmest wishes for your happiness, and in your sympathy for those abroad do not forget those at home who have been your willing slaves, and remember one in particular who would gladly have remained your slave for life. Farewell."

The door closed hurriedly. A quick step echoed along the gravelled walk as the young girl whom the speaker had addressed turned to the window, and, hastily snatching the curtain aside, strove to catch a last glimpse of that manly form. "Farewell, farewell is a lonely sound," was murmured in a low voice, and then, as if to confirm the truth of the second line of the verse, she heaved a deep sigh. Turning to the piano, she commenced slowly to gather up some pieces of music which were scattered over the instrument, when the door opened, and an elderly lady entered the apartment.

"Who was that in here a few moments ago, my dear?" said she.

"It was Mr. Howard, mother," replied the young lady.

"Mr. Howard!" repeated the mother, in surprise. "He did not remain long. Will he meet you at the cars in the morning?"

"He said that a business engagement would prevent him from seeing me again, and even compelled him to take a hasty leave this evening; and," she continued, in a tone of sadness, "I think I feel rather glad than otherwise, for I wish to devote every moment to you, and I don't care to be obliged to talk to strangers."

"You certainly do not consider Mr. Howard a stranger, Edith?"

"Not in the sense you mean, dear mother; but he is not one of the family, and"—she hesitated.

"And what, my child?"

Edith colored, and turned away as if to avoid her mother's searching look; then replied, in a tone of impatience, as if the subject was unpleasant to her—"Well, I do not wish any one to accompany me to the cars but those I love best—yourself, and George, and Grace."

There was a pause. Edith continued to arrange her pieces of music and place them carefully in the music portfolio at her side. Her mother crossed the room, and seated herself on a sofa near an open window. It was a lovely September evening, and the garden was silvered over with the pale moonlight. She looked out upon the quiet scene, but not with the same calm, happy light in her eye with which she usually viewed it; tears dimmed her vision, and sadness weighed heavily in her heart as she thought of the separation on the morrow. The last piece of music was in its place; and, taking the portfolio in her hand, Edith turned to leave the room, when her steps were arrested by her mother's voice desiring her to remain.

"I wish to have some conversation with you this evening, my daughter, as this will be the last opportunity I shall have of seeing you alone; to-morrow you leave your home to be absent two long years; before you go, will you not make a confidante of your mother? Tell me why you cannot accept Charles Howard's offer of marriage. Did he renew his proposals this evening?"

"He certainly did not, mother; he merely alluded to the subject, and was gone before I could reply."

"And, had he given you an opportunity, what would your reply have been?"

"The same as heretofore; I can never be Charles Howard's wife."

"It is very strange, Edith. I know of no objection to him; he seems in every way worthy of you, and I am convinced that you take more than an ordinary degree of interest in him; then why is it that you seem so decided in your rejection of his suit?"

Tears filled Edith's eyes; but she replied, in a calm voice: "I will not try to conceal from you, dear mother, that I love him; but I have not confidence in him. I believe that he loves me now, but I know his fickle nature too well to believe that it would stand the test of a two years' absence."

"But why put him to that test, my child?"

"I know that necessity does not oblige me to leave home; but 'there's a Divinity shapes our ends,' and you know I have always believed that I was cut out for a governess; and, aside from that, if I were engaged to Charles, I should certainly postpone our marriage, doubting as I do the genuineness of his love. Moreover, I cannot forget poor May Webb; and when my heart beats fast and faster at his approach, her pale, sad face rises up in judgment against him, and I almost loathe myself for loving the one who entered that widow's dwelling to woo her brightest jewel, and when won to cast it aside as a worthless bauble. No! I'd rather be poor Edith Stanford, the governess, than the neglected wife of the rich Charles Howard."

"But that was long ago, my child, and Charles was young, scarcely twenty. I know he has repented that youthful folly, for he seems so different now; he appears perfectly upright and honorable, and so manly and considerate."

"It is useless to plead his cause, my dear mother; what you style a 'folly' I consider a crime. It was seven years ago, but it seems to me but yesterday that I culled the fairest flowers in my garden to lay beside the sick girl's pillow. I was but twelve years old, and she was seventeen. Each day, as I passed from school, I stopped at the cottage, for I loved sweet May, but it made my heart ache to see her fading so rapidly from earth; and when the autumn winds came, and I was told that they would hasten her death, I wept bitterly; but when I gazed upon her face a few weeks after, as she lay in that calm sleep which knows no waking, I shed not a tear; I knew that she had been a Christian, and I felt that I was gazing upon the face of an angel. She had told me, in a conversation we had together a few weeks previous to her death, that she freely forgave all who had in any way wronged her. I did not know then how fearfully she had been wronged, and not until I had known Charles Howard nearly two years did I learn from Mrs. Webb that he visited her house as her son's friend when May was sixteen. He and May were thrown much together, and from the first he seemed to take a deep interest in everything concerning his friend's little sister, as he called her then. After a vacation of six weeks, May's brother returned to the University of M—— to resume his studies, but Charles continued to visit the cottage, and made May frequent presents of books and flowers, and in a short time showed by every word and action that he loved her. He was rich, and you who plead his cause so well know how handsome his face, how fascinating his manner—just the person to captivate a young girl. And when his manly form bent over her to point out a particular passage in some favorite book, her telltale face revealed to him too plainly what was no longer a secret to those who had observed them together—that she returned his love and trusted him."

"But, my dear," interrupted Mrs. Stanford, "he never committed himself in words."

"Committed himself in words, mother! Do not actions speak louder than words? When," she continued, "he found that he possessed that 'pearl of great price'—the first love of a pure-minded girl—he became cold and distant in his manner, and his visits became less frequent, and at length ceased altogether. One day, after an absence of several weeks, he called at Mrs. Webb's for the purpose, he said, of bidding them good-by, previous to travelling abroad. May asked him, in as calm a tone of voice as she could command, how long he would be absent. 'Not longer,' he replied, 'than two years.' He left; and, after travelling through Europe the specified two years, he returned, to find May dead. He called on Mrs. Webb, but she received him coldly, and he did not repeat his visit. May's brother had finished his course at the University, and was established in business with a friend in St. Louis.

"All that I have told you I learned from Mrs. Webb. Seeing the growing intimacy between Mr. Howard and myself, she called upon me one day about a year ago, and, during the conversation, the subject of which was her darling May, she gave me these facts, as I have related them to you. Her motive was a disinterested one. She was not actuated by malice, for I do not believe there is a spark of that in her composition. She loved me, and could not bear to see my happiness wrecked as May's had been.

"And now, dearest mother, I hope your mind is relieved. You know the reason why I will not marry Charles Howard, and I had intended to tell you had you not asked me, for I saw that you were completely in the dark; but I am sorry that you thought I allowed my prejudices to run away with my judgment."

"I had heard something of this before, but was quite ignorant of many of the circumstances you have related," replied her mother. "I remember, at the time of May's death, many persons censured Charles Howard's conduct, but I always thought they were too severe upon him, and doubted not that there were palliating circumstances, which, if known, would at least clear him in part; and I must still think, dear Edith, that you wrong him. As I have said before, I think him to be a worthy person, and did you but possess the same confidence in him that I have, I would at this moment give my consent to your union, believing that he would be to you a devoted husband; but if you have not the most perfect faith in the durability of his love, and do not intend eventually to bestow your hand upon him, I charge you to cast him from your thoughts altogether, and, as you have rejected his hand, do not leave home cherishing his image in your heart."

"Never fear, mother; the thought of Charles Howard is always followed too closely by the sad face of May Webb, and though I cannot forget him, you may rest assured that I shall not treat his image with any more tenderness or affection than it deserves. But it is late, and I must go to my room and see how Grace progresses with the packing; so good-night, dearest mother, and pleasant dreams."

Edith left the room, and after loitering a moment in the hall to speak with her brother George, she ran lightly up the stairs. She found Grace seated on the floor in her room, beside a huge trunk, deliberating, with a grave face, whether she should put Edith's writing portfolio and dressing-case in the top, or at the bottom of the trunk, which question her sister settled immediately by saying she should wish to use both articles on her journey, and therefore they must go in the top where she could get easy access to them. She then commenced to assist Grace in packing, and while the sisters are thus engaged, we will take a look at them.

Edith is tall and graceful, and though slight, her figure is well rounded and exquisitely proportioned. Her dark hair, of which she has a profusion, is dressed in plain bands covering her ears, and taken back is wound in heavy plaits around her small, finely formed head. No ornament, either of ribbon or tinsel, mars the effect of that "crowning glory of woman." Her eyes are large, dark, and soft, but in animated conversation they light up with a brilliancy that is perfectly bewildering. The form of her face is oval; her complexion dark, but clear, and the blood mantles to her cheeks, giving them a color but a trifle less ruddy than that of her delicately formed lips. Her teeth are white and regular, but by the envious are said to look "very false." The expression of her lips baffles description. It is one of blended firmness and sweetness, and when she smiles, renders her perfectly irresistible. Edith is certainly beautiful; but aside from the beauty of face and form, there is a nameless charm about her—a something in her manner and bearing that captivates one at once. Her entire unconsciousness of her own loveliness, and forgetfulness of self; her affectionate attention to those she loves, and regardful care not to wound the feelings of any, have made her the darling of her home, and the favorite of her young companions.

Grace is just sixteen, and in personal appearance is exactly the opposite of her sister. Her light hair, blue eyes, and fair round face give her the appearance of being much younger than she really is. She is one of those innocent, winsome beings whom one cannot look upon without loving. The same peculiar smile which we have described in Edith belongs to Grace also, and is the only point of resemblance between the sisters.

But the last article has been placed in the trunk, and the packing is finished. Grace, who always occupies her mother's room, has given the good-night kiss, and Edith is left alone. It is a warm night, and throwing herself in a large easy chair beside the low windows, she fastens back the curtain which drapes it, and looks out upon the night. She thinks of the Past, and her eyes turn toward a slab of white marble, beneath which rest the remains of that good old man, her grandfather. It is a little to the north, just above the spring-house, and is quite perceptible in the moonlight. Beside it are two other graves, and above all three waves a drooping willow. How well she remembers her grandfather's voice and manner as he used to bid her "keep on the sunny side, my dear; the sunny side, for it is always damp in the shade;" and then she thinks of the Present, and wonders if she is keeping on the "sunny side" by leaving home and friends to go among strangers; or if she will be cast in the shade at her southern home. Rising to prepare for her couch, she murmurs, "I will, as Longfellow bids, go forth to meet the shadowy Future without fear, and with a brave heart!"

CHAPTER II.

RETROSPECTION.

EDITH and Grace Stanford are the daughters of a widow; their father died when Grace was an infant; he had been wealthy but extravagant and improvident, and when his affairs were settled after his death, it was found that but a mere pittance was left for the support of the widow and orphans. Edith was three years of age, and George, the only son, but nine, when they were bereaved of a father's care. Mrs. Stanford had been raised quite plainly, but during her married life had resided in the beautiful village of B—, in one of our most northern States, and had been surrounded by every luxury. She was a woman of good sense and strong religious principles, and when she learned that everything must be sold, and there was no alternative but for her to return to her father's house, she did not murmur, but calmly agreed to the proposal, saying that she should not feel like an interloper, as, being the only child, there were no fidgety aunts or bachelor uncles to be annoyed by her little ones.

Mr. Allen, the father of Mrs. Stanford, was a plain farmer, residing in the country on a small farm about four miles from B—. His wife, Mrs. Stanford's stepmother, had been dead a year, and he gladly welcomed to his lonely hearth his daughter, and gazed with pleasure on the bright faces of his grandchildren. Five years passed, during which time Mrs. Stanford taught Edith and George at home; at the end of that time she was persuaded to send them to a school in the village. They boarded at the house of a friend during the week, returning home every Friday evening, and remaining until Monday morning. From that time, Edith, although but eight years old, cherished the idea of becoming a teacher, and when asked often in sport by her companions when she intended to begin to teach, she would invariably reply "as soon as ever I am eighteen." Her mother encouraged the idea, thinking it would stimulate her in her studies, and, knowing the farm yielded but a small income, she thought it but right that her children should turn their talents to account. She did not dream, however, that Edith's hobby, to which she clung so pertinaciously, would carry her so far from home, and throw her, a pensioner, upon the kindness of strangers.

At the age of thirteen Edith entered the seminary, and in four years finished the course, graduating with honor, the youngest in her class.

The principal had been made aware of her intention to support herself by teaching, and offered her a vacancy in the school, saying that, if she preferred it at the end of the year, he would procure her a situation as governess in a family. She acquiesced, and entered upon her duties, discharging them faithfully. Grace, who was then fifteen, and a pupil in the institution, was her constant companion out of school hours. Her grandfather had died during her last scholastic year at the seminary, leaving the farm to her brother George, and a life-annuity to her mother.

Edith was not obliged to maintain herself by teaching, but it had been her favorite object so long that she could not abandon it, and when her brother would tell her long stories about shabbily treated governesses, and ask her why she wished to run the risk of being disagreeably situated, instead of being content to remain at the seminary, or of taking up with other offers at home, she would answer him laughingly, "Well, I am tired of the Yankees, and wish to find out if governesses are really such a maltreated class."

One afternoon, near the close of the summer term, Edith received a message from Mr. Richards, the principal, requesting an interview with her in the parlor. He met her at the door, and inviting her in, desired her to be seated. "I have this morning received a letter from a gentleman in Georgia, applying to me for a governess," said he, "and I know of no person so well qualified to fill the situation as yourself. The gentleman states that he has two daughters, and he wishes a person competent to teach music, both vocal and instrumental, French, and the English branches usually taught in our schools. He offers a reasonable salary, and will defray the travelling expenses of the young lady. I will submit this to your consideration, desiring you to return me an answer in the course of a week. I will merely add that, in the event of your refusing the situation, I shall be but too happy to retain your services in this institution."

The answer was returned that week as desired, and was an acceptance, and the evening on which Edith is introduced to the reader is that prior to her departure.

CHAPTER III.

THE DEPARTURE.

THE sun was shining full on Edith's pillow the next morning, when she was awakened by her sister exclaiming, with forced gayety, "Come, open your eyes, Edith, or has that sun shining right in your face made you blind?" and then giving her sister an affectionate kiss, she added, "While you are dressing, I will run down and give Vagabond his seed."

Edith sprang out of bed, and kneeling down, repeated her morning prayer, adding from the Litany, "We beseech thee to succor, help, and comfort all who are in danger, necessity, and tribulation; and to preserve all who travel by land or water. We beseech thee to hear us, good Lord." She then dressed herself for her journey, and descended to the breakfast-room, where she found her mother and George already seated at the table, and Grace standing before a bird-cage scolding "Vag," her pet canary, for not bathing himself properly.

The breakfast passed over quite cheerfully. Grace kept up a running conversation with her brother, asking questions, and answering herself when not replied to, while Mrs. Stanford and Edith conversed on general subjects; all, however, seeming to avoid the one subject uppermost in their minds, Edith's departure.

But now the carriage is at the door, and the trunk securely strapped to the back of it. Edith has bidden the servant good-by, and patted old Nero's head for the last time; and giving a last look at her grandfather's grave, as she seats herself in the carriage beside her mother, she observes that it is not in the shade of the old willow at all, and thinks, "That is quite right; no sorrow ever drooped so low over his spirits as to make them gloomy, and that marble, so bright and sunny, is but typical of his life."

As they roll away from the gate, Grace, who occupies the front seat with her brother George, turns to Edith, and, with a tear in her eye, remarks: "How lonely I shall be when I resume my studies next term, and have to travel this road alone every Monday morning!"

"You'll not go alone, I am sure," said George, "unless, contrary to your usual custom, you leave me at home, and drive the horse yourself."

"Oh, you'll go, of course; but you know, brother, that you are not Edith."

"I am fully sensible of that fact," he replied, adding, with a spice of indignation in his tone, "If I were Edith, I don't think I should leave a happy home and kind friends who are always willing and happy to take care of her, for the pleasure of going among strangers to teach a few stupid ideas how to shoot."

"If you were constituted like me, George, you would do exactly as I do," said Edith, calmly.

"Now, George," interrupted Grace, "you need not say anything disagreeable to sister Edith. I, for my part, am viewing the matter in a cheerful light"—here the tears streamed down her cheeks, and a sob contradicted the assertion; but she continued: "I will have finished school when she returns, and we will be at home with you and mother, and I think it will be perfectly delightful to have her tell us all about Southern life; and then the letters! You will write every week, won't you, sister? Your absence would be quite unendurable if it were not for those long letters you are to write. But I intend to make you regret as much as possible that you ever left home, for I am going deliberately at work to steal the hearts of all your beaux, and I intend to make Charles Howard my first victim. It is such a pity," she continued, "that my hair has retained its 'pristine whiteness,' for I once heard him say that he could never fall in love with a 'light-haired baby-face.'"

"Oh, that does not matter," said Edith, laughing; "you can use 'Black Pomatum,' like that you saw in Tant's room"—meaning the French teacher at the seminary.

"Better buy a wig at once," suggested George, looking affectionately on Grace's bright face, which was now all smiles, and doubting in his own mind if ever Charles Howard could wish to change her vision-like style of beauty.

"Yes," returned Grace, "and appear in it at the next soiree at the seminary. That will be an amusing item in my first letter to you, Edith, and very interesting, no doubt; particularly if the bait takes—of which I entertain some doubts, however."

The conversation was kept up until they reached B——, Mrs. Stanford, however, taking no part in it, for she was very sad, and was not disposed to assume a gayety which she did not feel. As soon as they came in sight of the depot Grace's smiles all vanished, and it was evident that she no longer viewed the matter in a cheerful light.

"Oh, Edith, dear, I wish you were going home with us instead of in those ugly cars. There! I hear the whistle, and it goes straight through my head like a knife."

"You are nervous, Gracie," said her sister to her, aside, after they had entered the depot. "You must not give way to your feelings, but be cheerful, and not make mother more gloomy by your sad spirits. And when you are at home you must take my place and read to her, so that she will not miss me so much. I left the last volume of Austin's 'Goethe' on the work-table, and you will find the mark in it where I left off. Read on just as if I were there, and always have some interesting book on hand that you can take up at any moment, for you know that there is nothing dear mother likes so much as listening to us read aloud. But, come! dry up your tears, and be introduced to Mrs. Richards' brother. You know that he is going to Florida, and is to take charge of me as far as Augusta."

The introduction took place; and, leaving her sister and Mr. Acton together, Edith joined her mother and George, who stood in conversation with Mr. Richards. Just then some of Edith's young friends came running in with flushed faces, exclaiming: "Oh, Edith! we were so afraid we would be too late, but are just in time to say good-by."

And so it proved, for at that moment a voice sounded through the depot, "All aboard for Troy!" Hasty good-byes were exchanged, and a fervent "God bless you, my daughter!" from Mrs. Stanford, as she embraced her child, and bade her "write soon." Grace wept hysterically, and elung to her sister's neck, while Edith, though very pale, maintained her calmness, and told Grace she must be "more of a woman." George manifested considerable emotion at thus parting for the first time with his sister, whom he dearly loved, but strove to hide it in unnecessary anxiety about her baggage. How well Edith remembered in after years her mother's voice and manner at that last parting! and she never forgot the strange, uncomfortable feeling which crept over her as, looking from the car window, she noticed that George and Grace stood full in the sunlight, while her mother, with her face veiled, was completely in the shade.

And now our young traveller is fairly started; and, bidding her "God speed," we will leave her to pursue her journey, in the expectation of meeting her in the next chapter in different scenes, and surrounded by other faces.

CHAPTER IV.

BEECH BLUFF.

BEAUTIFULLY situated on a high bluff overlooking the Savannah River, about twelve miles from Augusta, is a plantation known as "Beech Bluff," which takes its name from ten large beech trees standing in a parallel line in front of the owner's residence. This property belongs to Mr. Jacob Ellis, and is considered one of the finest in that section of the country.

After viewing those broad acres which every year yield an abundant harvest; those groves of chestnut and magnolia skirting the smooth green lawn which fronts the mansion and stretches far down the bluff, the eye of the beholder rests awhile on the spacious garden in the rear, which exhibits luxuriant foliage, shaded arbors, inviting one to linger in their cool retreat, and serpentine walks, bordered with those gorgeous southern flowers which, in the splendor of their vesture, Nature has made to outrival even the glory of Solomon.

The breeze from the river parts the foliage, revealing in the distance beyond the garden a number of low, white-washed cabins, which indicate the locality of the negro quarter; and still further on can be seen the cotton gin which is so indispensable on a Southern plantation, and for which planters are so much indebted to the mechanical genius of Eli Whitney. Beside it stands the cotton press, which receives the soft, downy substance, and sends it forth in bales, ready for transportation.

"The house of Jacob hath indeed goodly possessions." So thinks Edith Stanford, as, standing at an upper window which commands an extensive view of the Bluff, she listens to Mr. Ellis as he gives her a history of the place from the time of his grandfather. She gazes out and admires the arrangement of the lawn and garden, and Mr. Ellis remarks, with a gratified smile, that all else he leaves to the care of his overseer, but the pleasure-grounds are his own particular charge.

"Papa, can't Uncle Anthony gear up, and take us to ride this morning?" asked Martha, the elder daughter, who, with her sister Mary, was standing beside her father.

"Not this morning, my dear; it is too warm, and besides I think Miss Edith would like to rest after her long journey. You can go down and show her the school-room and library. I dare say that Mary is anxious to introduce her to the books by this time: are you not, Mary?" said he, addressing a frail, delicate-looking girl, with large hazel eyes and short, thick brown curls. She smiled, and, blushing, drew closer to him, but made no reply.

At that moment a black woolly head made its appearance above the staircase, and a voice in the negro dialect asked for "Massa Jacob."

"Here, Josh," said his master. "What's wanting?"

"Uncle Sigh am in de garden, and wants to know about dem garden chairs."

"Tell him I'll be there directly."

The head disappeared in a trice, and Mr. Ellis prepared to follow, first telling Edith that he hoped she would make herself at home and become domesticated as soon as possible. "You will find Mary quite companionable when she throws off her mantle of shyness and reserve in which she usually wraps herself in the presence of strangers," said he; "but Matty is a sad fly-away; too restless to be anything but a nuisance." And, shaking his head as he said nuisance, with a smile, he, too, disappeared, and a moment after was seen in the garden engaged in conversation with an old colored man.

Left alone with the two girls, Edith soon set the ball of conversation in motion, and Martha's volubility kept it moving. Mary's shyness gradually wore off, though she did not become in the least degree familiar, for she was naturally of a reserved disposition. They went down to the library, and thence to the school-room, a small room adjoining, both apartments opening out upon a piazza overlooking the garden. Edith looked around the little room of which she was to be monarch for two years, and then glanced at her two subjects, one of whom, judging from appearances, she feared might prove rebellious, and offer open resistance to her authority if confined within bounds, or restrained of pleasure or liberty against her will. It did not require much discriminating wisdom to discover this, for "Wilful" was written in legible characters on the broad brow and in the quick glance of the restless blue eye of the elder daughter, while "I will" spoke as plainly from the erect, defiant position of the head as if the lips had uttered it.

"I hope we will get along amicably," thought Edith. And then, addressing the girls, she asked how they liked the idea of commencing their studies the following Monday.

"Let me see," said Mary. "That will be four days." And then, after a pause, she added: "Why, I am very glad, for we are obliged to stay in the house during the warmest part of the day, and I would just as soon study as do nothing at all."

"Doing nothing at all is not your style, Mary," said Martha, mimicking her sister's rather drawing tone, "for you are always poring over some stupid book or other, instead of amusing yourself in a sensible manner, as I do. Why don't you say that you shall like it very much? I am sure I shall"—here Mary gave her sister such a look of astonishment that she colored slightly, and, after hesitating a moment, added—"with Miss Edith for our teacher; you know I never could endure Miss Hannah." And then, turning to Edith, with a comical look of disgust at the remembrance, she continued: "She had the dyspepsia, and was always rushing up and down the room complaining of the 'change of diet,' and the acid in her stomach. if she had said the acid in her temper, I'd have liked it better, and believed her."

"You know, sister, that you used to torment Miss Hannah by sneezing just in the midst of your recitation," interrupted Mary.

"Yes; but how could I help it," replied Martha, "when she took snuff, and would persist in looking over my book instead of her own, and then shake her handkerchief right in my face?"

"She never annoyed me in that way," mildly replied her sister.

"O no; because you were a little saint; you know you were; but I am sure she looked fierce enough at you one day for laughing when I sneezed so loud, that it made her jump, and she upset the inkstand over that snuff colored silk."

"Yes, Miss Edith," exclaimed Mary, with more animation than she had before exhibited, "and her best dress, too, poor thing! It was completely ruined. I was very sorry, but indeed I could not help laughing, for Matty looked so frightened, and Miss Hannah kept the position she had jumped into as if she were turned into stone; looking over her spectacles first at Matty, then at me, and then at the ink which was dripping off the table on to her dress. She did not often put that dress on, but that day papa had some friends from Augusta, and she had dressed in the morning for dinner."

"Which she had no business to do," interrupted Martha; "I am sure mamma offered to replace the dress, but Miss Hannah 'scorned the idea,' though she did not scorn the fifty dollars which papa gave her in addition to her salary when she went away."

"How long since she left here?" Edith ventured to ask.

"Six months," replied Martha. "She stayed four months after mamma died, and then suddenly discovered that it was not proper (she was always talking about propriety) to live here, because papa was a widower. As if any widower in the known world would look at her!"

"Hush, Matty!" said Mary; "papa would not like to hear you talk in that way."

"It's a fact, nevertheless," said Martha, elevating her eyebrows, and nodding her head significantly, "and you know Miss Hannah used to say that 'facts were stubborn things;' looking at me all the time as if she were staring a stubborn fact in the face."

"Well, you are stubborn sometimes, Matty; and Miss Hannah told papa——"

"Never you mind what that old dame told papa," interrupted Martha, evidently not wishing Edith to know; "she went away because she did not want to be my stepmother, and be sneezed at. The idea of my handsome papa going to church with her! ha, ha! Well," she continued, looking serious, "poor papa is a widower, and he misses dear mamma very much, but he'll not put any one else in her shoes very quick, I know." Shrugging her shoulders, she looked at Edith as if to see what effect her words had upon her.

Edith colored and turned towards the window. For the first time, the thought of there being any impropriety in her position in the house, simply because the master of it was a widower, was suggested to her mind, but she immediately repelled it, as indignantly, probably, as Miss Hannah had scorned the offer to replace her dress. "Perfectly absurd!" she said to herself; "nobody would think of such a thing but an old maid; to be sure I have been here but little more than twenty-four hours; but, judging from what I have seen of Mr. Ellis, I think I am justified in believing that he would never draw any woman into any situation whatever that would compromise her in the least. He told me yesterday morning in the carriage, coming from Augusta, that he regretted that there was no one to receive me and dispense the hospitalities of his house but himself and the children; but it never occurred to me, when he added that his wife had been dead ten months, that there was any impropriety in a young lady taking up her residence here as governess. My only feeling was that of compassion for the poor motherless girls. I am sorry that Miss Martha has received this notion into her head, for I can plainly see that she will use it to advantage in case of provocation. However, I will not make myself uncomfortable in mind about it, for here I am, and here I must remain." With this wise conclusion, and her composure perfectly restored, she turned with the intention of going into the library, and just in time, as it proved, to catch the last act of the pantomime which had been going on at her back while she was lost in thought. Mary, with an indignant expression of countenance, was holding up her finger threateningly, and nodding her head in a significant manner towards the garden, where Mr. Ellis's voice could be heard in conversation with Uncle Sigh; while Martha, with an empty inkstand in her hand, was motioning as if in the act of throwing something on Edith's dress, her whole countenance lighted up with suppressed mirth, and her face contorted like a person's in the act of sneezing. Edith, quite as much amused probably as Mary had been, at a somewhat similar scene in the same room, between Martha and Miss Hannah, moved toward the library, saying, with an ill-concealed smile, "Come, girls, let us look at the books."

They passed into the adjoining room, and taking down a volume, Edith asked Mary what were her favorites.

"Scott is my favorite author, and I like Mrs. Hemans, too," she replied.

"And what books do you read?" she inquired, turning to Martha.

"Why, I think I like Robinson Crusoe as well as any book there; it is the only one I ever read, any way," said she, flourishing a dust-brush, which Nelly the housemaid had carelessly left on the sofa.

"A contrast in taste, certainly!" thought Edith. "Here is Mary, twelve years old, reading Scott and Hemans, while Miss Martha, two years her senior, is giving her undivided attention to Robinson Crusoe;" and, looking at the sisters, she thought the contrast in their appearance quite as great. Mary was reclining against the window-sill, the very embodiment of girlish grace and beauty, her small white hand half buried in her clustering curls, and her large expressive eyes following her sister's movements, while an amused smile hovered around her lips, parting them and displaying a set of small pearly teeth. The fairness of her complexion was enhanced by her black dress, cut low, exposing neck and shoulders of dazzling whiteness. She blushed, as, looking up, she caught Edith's eye fastened upon her, and, changing her position, took a book from the table and slowly turned over the leaves.

Martha was standing in the centre of the room, looking threateningly at a huge fly on the ceiling, as if she meditated an application of the dust-brush, and Edith, as she looked at her, asked involuntarily, "How much do you weigh?"

"One hundred and forty-seven; I was weighed yesterday at the cotton-gin," was the reply in an emphatic tone, as if the owner of so much flesh gloried in its possession.

"You weighed one hundred and fifty once," said Mary.

"Yes, when Miss Hannah first came here; but she shook three pounds off me."

"Why, sister!" exclaimed Mary in surprise, "Miss Hannah never shook you in her life."

"Shook her handkerchief in my face, and made me sneeze it off, which is all the same thing," said Martha, laconically. The sisters still wore mourning for their mother, and Martha had on a black dress which was far too short for a girl of her size, and put on so carelessly that her figure looked still more bulky. Her hair, of a reddish-brown color, was twisted up in a knot at the back of her head, and had evidently not been combed that day; her blue eyes were full of mischief, and her lips, always working restlessly, were large, though not badly shaped; her complexion was of that peculiar fairness which usually accompanies red or auburn hair, but which freckles so easily, and her face and neck were covered with these unsightly blemishes. Full of life and overflowing spirits, she had a keen relish for fun, which often induced her to play pranks on the negroes; but she was a favorite on the plantation notwithstanding, and any one of them would incur his master's displeasure rather than bring "young missus" into disgrace with her papa, by telling him the author of the mischief. She was naturally affectionate in disposition, and those whom she loved were never annoyed by her propensity to tease, when she found that it was really disagreeable; but she was ingenious in contrivances to torment those whom she did not particularly fancy, to which fact poor Miss Hannah could testify, and also Aunt Cilla the housekeeper. Possessing great penetration, she could discover at once the most tender spot in another's feelings, and proceed to apply her caustic touches where they would burn most deeply. After her mother's death, Miss Hannah's unguarded remarks about living in the house with a widower, and openly expressed fears as to what the world would say, revealed to Martha her teacher's most vulnerable point, and afforded a brilliant opportunity for the exercise of her talent. With a great assumption of indignation at Uncle Anthony's, Uncle Sigh's, or some other colored uncle's impudence, she would rush in upon Miss Hannah when that good spinster was in one of her most quiet moods, and startle her with,

"Did you ever hear the like, Miss Hannah? Uncle Sigh says that you need not set your last new black cap for papa, for it would not catch a crab, let alone a fine trout; and I just think I'll tell his master, for he oughtn't to be allowed to speak his mind so freely about the white folks."

At Miss Hannah's earnest supplication not to mention it to her papa, she would yield, with apparent unwillingness, however, saying that "the blacks had better be picking at their cotton instead of at Miss Hannah's yellow ribbons;" generally adding, by way of parenthesis, "Papa would settle them if he knew it," and then disappear as suddenly as she came, delighted at her success in "ruffling the old lady."

These daily repeated provocations at length had, to Martha, the desired effect; Miss Hannah could stand it no longer. In her credulity, believing that she was looked upon with suspicion by the negroes, whose opinion she had a great respect for, that of the house servants particularly, and more than half suspecting that Mr. Ellis himself imputed to her a less disinterested motive for remaining after his wife's death than solicitude for his children's welfare, she one day, in a fit of desperation after listening to a fresh bulletin from the negro quarter, burst into the library in a great state of excitement, and, much to Mr. Ellis's astonishment, commenced to vindicate herself, demanding at the same time "an explanation of the foul aspersions on her character."

Mr. Ellis rose, and, offering her a chair, requested her to be seated. Overcome by his kind manner, she sank into the seat and burst into a flood of tears. Mr. Ellis paced up and down the room at a loss to know what the unusual scene meant; his visitor becoming more calm, he seated himself on the sofa, and attentively listened to the whole story, which was related with considerable stammering and blushing on Miss Hannah's part, whose suspicions as to Mr. Ellis's opinion of her had given place to a womanly feeling of delicacy and considerable embarrassment on having to tell him that she was suspected by his servants of having designs upon him.

Mr. Ellis could with difficulty refrain from laughing; but, assuming the most respectful and deferential manner, he assured her that it was nothing more than Martha's nonsense, which, though certainly very reprehensible, he hoped she would overlook and forget. Calling Martha, who looked the least bit in the world abashed by her father's stern look, he asked what she meant by disturbing Miss Hannah so often.

"It was all meant in fun, papa. Uncle Anthony told me one day when I was teasing him that he would put you up to marry Miss Hannah, and then I'd have a mother that would make me step around, and I just told Miss Hannah for fun, because she was always wondering what people would say to her staying here after mamma died, and I thought I'd just let her know what the black people said, any way."

Reprimanding Martha severely for her disrespect to her teacher, and for exaggerating, which she acknowledged that she did in repeating what had been said, her father sent her to her room in tears, for she loved him devotedly, and when she saw that he was really offended her sorrow was deep, and prolific of a great many resolutions to amend, which, if they had been kept, would have effected a marvellous change in the wild, wilful girl. Miss Hannah soon after passed to her own room, and the subject was not again alluded to. Mr. Ellis showed neither by word nor look that he remembered the occurrence, but appeared not the least surprised when, the following week, Miss

Hannah announced at the dinner-table her intended departure. A few days after, the carriage was at the door, and she was conveyed to Augusta, much to Martha's satisfaction, who complimented herself on her able generalship in getting rid of her enemy. She looked upon teachers in general, and governesses in particular, as avowed enemies to youth, and, as "all is fair in war," she felt that she had fairly gotten rid of her adversary.

The surprise of both the girls was very great when told by their father that another lady would soon arrive to take Miss Hannah's place. The information was received with pleasure by Mary, and Martha received it with a better grace than her father expected, and also his admonitions in regard to her conduct towards her future teacher. On Edith's arrival, Martha gazed in astonishment at her beauty, for she had expected to see a person after the order of Miss Hannah, and if Edith had come in any other capacity than that of school-ma'am, Martha, who had a taste for the beautiful, though she did not exercise it much in the arrangement of her toilet, would, without doubt, have fallen in love with her; as it was, she felt more friendly towards her, concluding that no one so pretty as Miss Edith could ever scold; of which fact she was convinced when Edith smiled so pleasantly at the pantomime scene instead of resenting the implied injury to her dress, as Miss Hannah would have done.

DO YOU REMEMBER!

BY G. T. C.

Do you remember—I remember—

Well the day we, lingering, parted?

'Twas the shivering bleak December;

I was nearly broken-hearted.

Do you still cherish—I still cherish—

Sweet memories of the vows then given?

Tho' earth and time-born, ne'er can perish

Such foretastes of the bliss of heaven.

Are you regretting—I regret not—

Our plighted faith in each forever?

Are you forgetting—I forget not—

That love's strong ties time cannot sever?

Are you now dreaming—I am dreaming—

Of brighter hopes that send their greeting

From coming scenes, till almost seeming

To give us many a welcome meeting?

Is your heart gladden'd—mine is gladden'd—

While yearning for that fond reunion

When life in life, now absence-sadden'd,

We'll know forever love's communion?

A WHISPER TO A NEWLY-MARRIED PAIR.

A WHISPER TO THE WIFE.

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

GENTLE lady, my whisper to your husband is ended. From you a moment's attention is now claimed by a widowed wife, whose bridal morning rose as bright as yours; whose youthful heart loved "with all a woman's love;" and who anxiously wishes to secure for her interesting sisters that first and most important of all a wife's pursuits—the confidence and affection of her husband.

You are now become a wife; and sacred and important are the duties you have to fulfil. Your husband has bestowed on you the most flattering distinction: he has selected you from the world; and the chain he has put on can be broken only by death! Be it your care never to let him feel this chain, and by your kindness and gentleness make him even forget he wears it.

A bride, wherever she appears, is ever considered an object of importance and a subject for remark. "Have you seen the bride?" is the eager and general question; and what she does, what she says, what she wears, and how she looks, swell the insignificant chat of every gossip's visit. Let the notice which you thus excite make you particularly observant of your manner and conduct; and give the busy whisperer no food for a new sarcasm in the next importation of tittle-tattle.

A bride is generally (indeed, I think always) proud of the new character she has entered on; and, unless she is a woman of sense, fond of exhibiting the love she has inspired. Pursue a different course; let your manner to your husband be kind and good-humored; but sacred to the hours of retirement be those expressions and that display of endearment, which, used in public, argue, in loud terms, a want of true delicacy, and are ever particularly disagreeable to the spectator.

The first inquiry of a woman after marriage should be, "How shall I continue the love I have inspired? how shall I preserve the heart I have won?" Gentle lady, at the present moment your husband thinks you the loveliest, the gentlest of beings. Destroy not the illusion: be lovely still; be gentle still. The long and dreary road that lies through the wilderness of life is stretched before you; and by a chain, the links of which no human power can break, you are bound to a companion with whom, hand in hand, you must walk through this long, long road. For the sake then of peace, for the sake of happiness, for the sake of self (that most powerful feeling), brighten the way by endeavoring to make yourself amiable and pleasing to him.

The great Dr. Johnson, with his usual strength of expression, laments, in the following words, the contrasted manner which frequently occurs before and after marriage: "One would think the whole endeavor of both parties during the time of courtship is to hinder themselves from being known—to disguise their natural temper and real desires in hypocritical imitation, studied compliance, and continued affectation. From the time that their love is avowed, neither sees the other but in a mask; and the cheat is often managed on both sides with so much art, and discovered afterwards with so much abruptness, that each has reason to suspect that some transformation has happened on the wedding-night, and that by a strange imposture, as in the case of Jacob, one has been courted and another married.

"However discreet your choice has been, time and circumstances alone can sufficiently develop your husband's character: by degrees the discovery will be made that you have married a mortal, and that the object of your affections is not entirely free from the infirmities of human nature. Then it is that, by an impartial survey of your own character, your disappointment may be moderated; and your love, so far from declining, may acquire additional tenderness, from the consciousness that there is room for mutual forbearance."

ON CONJUGIAL HAPPINESS.

AFTER marriage, a man generally takes his wife to his home, where every object is endeared to him by local attachment and interesting remembrances. With pride and pleasure does he walk out with his fair bride, to exhibit to her the beauties of his domain and the scenes of his youth. "Look," says he, "at that noble view down the river; see that boat, how softly it glides, and that little temple on the hill, where on a fine evening I used to sit with my excellent mother, and say my tasks by her side: she was, in truth, my Emily, an excellent mother; several years have elapsed since I lost her, and yet I cannot think of her but with the strongest feelings of affection and regret." Endeavor, gentle lady, to enter into his feelings, and to admire, and to feel pleased with everything with which he is pleased. In those bridal moments, your smiles and approbation are delightful to him: and although alterations and improvements may occur to you, let him see it is for the sake of those improvements, not for the sake of finding fault, you point out the defect.

Study your husband's temper and character; and be it your pride and pleasure to conform to his wishes. Check at once the first advances to contradiction, even of the most trivial nature. I repeat the word trivial, for it is really inconceivable the power which the veriest trifles have, at times, over the mind, either in irritating or pleasing. And the woman who, after a few years are gone by, can say, "My husband and I have never yet had a loud or angry debate," is, in my opinion, better entitled to a chaplet of laurels, than the hero who has fought on the plains of Waterloo.

"There is one simple direction, which, if carefully regarded, might long preserve the tranquillity of the married life, and insure no inconsiderable portion of connubial happiness to the observers of it: it is, to beware of the first dispute."

An admired writer says, "Let it never be forgotten, that, during the whole of life, beauty must suffer no diminution from inelegance, but every charm must contribute to keep the heart which it has won. Whatever would have been concealed as a defect from the lover, must, with greater diligence, be concealed from the husband. The most intimate and tender familiarity cannot surely be supposed to exclude decorum; and there is naturally a delicacy in every mind, which is disgusted at the breach of it, though every mind is not sufficiently attentive to avoid at all times that mode of conduct which it has often itself found offensive. That unwearied solicitude to please, which was once the effect of choice, is now become a duty, and should be considered as a pleasure.

'E'en in the happiest choice, where favoring Heaven
Has equal love and easy fortune given,
Think not, the husband gain'd, that all is done;
The prize of happiness must still be won.'

When once you enter the matrimonial state, gentle lady, prepare for the various trials of temper which each day will produce. Your husband perhaps does, or says, something provoking; your servants do, or say, something provoking; or some valuable article is injured by their negligence; a handsome piece of China or glass is broken; a tiresome visitor comes in at a most mal-apropos moment, and breaks in on some matter of consequence, &c. &c. But remember the great Solomon's words: "He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city." (Prov. xvi. 32.) By the expression ruleth his spirit, the inspired writer's views on the subject are evidently wide and extensive. He alludes to those infirmities of temper and disposition which so often corrode our peace, and make us unamiable and uncomfortable to ourselves and those around us. When the risings of discontent, peevishness, envy, anger, resentment, or any evil passion, disturb or threaten to take possession of our hearts, then is the man that ruleth his spirit superior, in the eyes of the eastern monarch, to the hero returning from the battle or the siege, crowned with laurels, and covered with glory! I cannot dismiss this subject without remarking the very sweet and engaging point of view in which persons appear to me when I see them pliantly yielding their own will to the will of another. A late writer makes the following excellent remark: "Great actions are so often performed from little motives of vanity, self-complacency, and the like, that I am apt to think more highly of the person whom I observe checking a reply to a petulant speech, or even submitting to the judgment of another in stirring the fire, than of one who gives away thousands!"

LINES FOR AN ALBUM.

BY S. A. BLAKELEY.

DEAR FRIEND, what shall I ask for thee,
Health, wealth, and all prosperity?
Or shall I wish thee—rarest gift below—
The happiness the good alone may know?
Methinks the last best suited to thy mind,
With thy pure tastes and gentle air refined;
With heart by honor, love, and truth encrowded—
Oh may true happiness by thee be found!
Not the false glitter wealth calls happiness,
That has no single power to charm or bless;
Not the vain show where beauty takes delight,
Whose fairest morning ends in darkest night,
But the true happiness the good enjoy,
That earthly cares and ills cannot alloy;
That lifts the soul from "Nature up to Nature's God,
And gives, when chastened, strength to kiss the rod.
That this sweet peace may to thy life be given,
And shed o'er darkest hours some gleams of Heaven;
May make the present bright, the future fair,
And give thee endless joy shall be my prayer.

MY WARD.

BY MARIA DUKE.

I WAS only twenty-three years of age when I became that important personage, a guardian of the person and fortune of Miss Fannie Lee, and this was how it happened:—

George Lee and I were classmates in college, and were not only class but room mates and friends. We were called the inseparables, Damon and Pythias, and numerous jokes went round the college about our friendship; yet it stood the test of four years' companionship and the ridicule of our fellow-collegians, and we left Alma Mater firm, true friends. He was a splendid fellow, a man to love and be proud to call friend. We settled in the same city, he as a physician, I as a lawyer, and our intercourse was always pleasant. He was an orphan, and the sole guardian of one little sister fifteen years younger than himself. There was no other relations to wean the love these two felt one for the other away from them. Their father, an Englishman, had brought his wife from the "old country," and when these two died the children stood alone. Mr. Lee was not wealthy, but he left a small sum, the interest of which was enough for the children to live upon with economy. As soon as George was fairly started in the practice of medicine, he settled this sum upon his sister.

When I was but twenty-three, George two years older, my friend became a victim to our country's chiefest scourge, consumption. In his last illness he implored me to accept the office of guardian to his little sister. She was then at boarding-school, and, George argued, would probably remain there until I was married and settled, or, if I desired it, until she was of age and able to take care of herself and her property. Glad to relieve my friend of any sad anxiety, I undertook the charge, and was legally intrusted with full power to guard Miss Fanny and her money for the next eleven years.

George died. It was a sore blow to me, yet the certainty that his noble, self-sacrificing spirit was happy after many trials in this rough world was a consolation, and, in time, other interests and affections came to comfort me.

Seven years passed away. I was still a bachelor, but keeping house, with Mrs. Dodd for the presiding genius of my establishment. Mrs. Dodd was a melancholy woman, constantly wiping tears from very pale blue eyes with the corner of her apron, referring with a sniffle to Dodd defunct, or, as she termed him, "my dear Henery." My days were passed in business, my evenings in practising on the violin or reading. I had tried the piano, and a grand piano in the parlor stood a silent witness of my failure, so I contented myself with buying a magnificent cover for it, and returned to the violin, which Mrs. Dodd enthusiastically declared I "played in the most beautifullest manner."

In all these seven years my ward was at school. Regularly every year I paid her bills and forwarded the remainder of her income to her teacher for Miss Fannie's wardrobe and current expenses; and, this duty over, I thought no more about her. I had several precious documents from the principal of the seminary, reporting the progress made by Miss Lee in the various branches taught at that institute, and then another 'twelvemonth would roll by before the intercourse was renewed. I had come, under this state of things, to look upon my ward as a very well behaved young lady, thoroughly conversant with the "English branches, music, and the modern languages," who would in the course of time leave school, claim the capital of her property, and probably marry some respectable man, and live in peace, leaving me in the same enviable state. Fancy, then, the effect produced upon my mind by the following epistle, which lay upon my desk one morning in January:—

BROOKDALE, Jan. 19, 18—.

DEAR GUARDIAN: The half yearly session of our school closes on Saturday next, and I finish my course. I am, between ourselves, horribly tired of school, and so I am coming to live with you. That's what all young ladies do who have guardians, ain't it? I know your address, because Miss Screwem has it, and I will be with you on Monday evening or Tuesday, I can't say exactly which, because my new bonnet may not come home Saturday, in which case I must wait until the afternoon boat on Monday. I am quite well, and hope to find you in a flourishing state of health. I have no doubt you are a dear, clever old soul, who will not snub me as they do here, and if you are real good to me I am sure I shall love you like a house a fire. You need not answer this, because I shall leave here before your answer can reach me. Come or send to the boat to meet me, won't you?

Yours, respectfully,

FANNIE LEE.

I was perfectly thunderstruck. Coming to my house! A dear old soul! I looked over at the glass. I saw a tall, erect figure, a face upon which thirty summers had left a brown hue, not entirely worn away by the winters' cold; a heavy black moustache, and thick, wavy black hair; features so-so; eyes black and large. Then I glanced round my room, my office. All was neat there, for I had kept bachelor's hall too long to have it disorderly. My mind wandered over the house. The two third story rooms were vacant, and fitted up, one as a parlor, one as a bedroom, for I often entertained my friends for several days together; these rooms must be aired and arranged for Miss Lee. My imagination pictured a raw school-girl thumping exercises on my grand piano, dragging school-books into my parlors, and practising dancing on my carpets, or, still worse, a young lady, finished, filling my parlors with her admirers, keeping me up till morning to go out in the cold and bring her home from parties (I savagely resolved I would not take her to them). Then another idea flashed across me—somebody must be there to play propriety; I was too young to have a lady of seventeen visiting me alone. Mrs. Dodd was not in her element out of the kitchen and pantry, I had no mother, no sister, but I had an aunt. My blood seemed to run in little cold rills all through me as I thought of Aunt Jane; but I could see no other way to accommodate Mrs. Grundy, so I took down my hat, and went to Aunt Jane's.

Tall, stiff, frigid was Aunt Jane, as usual. Chilling was my greeting, withering was the glance cast at my muddy boots, but my errand was successful. Aunt Jane had always considered me foolish in living alone, and she agreed to make my house her home whilst my ward was with me. Leaving her with carte blanche for the arrangements, I went to court. My ward danced over my briefs, and I addressed the presiding judge once as Miss Lee, once as Miss Fannie. I was released at last, and went home.

What a sight awaited me! Taking advantage of my order to "do as she thought proper," Aunt Jane had instituted a regular house cleaning in the middle of January. As she had only one day to do it in, she had taken it all at once. From the garret to the cellar there was not a fire; the furnace fire had gone out, and there was no one to make it up; everybody was too busy. There were women on step-ladders, women under tables, women on the stairs, women in the closets, women from the front door to the roof. Buckets of water, large cakes of soap, rags, brushes, towels, brooms, bottles empty and full, books, everything in the most direful confusion. I was standing ruefully contemplating the scene, when I heard a well-known snuffle at my elbow.

"I am so sorry, Mr. Holmes," said Mrs. Dodd, "that we couldn't do the office; but it was locked, and we could not find the key." And at the same instant I felt a key slipped into my hand.

Mentally promising Mrs. Dodd an extra V with her month's wages, I said: "Oh, I've got the key. Aunt Jane, I expect Miss Lee at midnight; it is now five o'clock. May I ask how I am to receive her in this mess?"

"Oh, it will all be done by that time. We did not take up the carpets; only covered them, and we will soon get through."

I went to the office. Dodd! Dodd! incomparable Dodd! A fire burned brightly in the open grate, a cold collation was spread upon one of the tables, and not a book was out of place. I was scarcely seated when my melancholy housekeeper entered with hot coffee and—

"You see, sir, Miss Jane said there was no time to get your dinner, so I did the best I could with the cold tongue and chicken, and I did manage some oysters if you will have them." And she left, to return with one of her most delicious stews.

"If Miss Lee wants a maid, sir, my cousin has a handy girl about twenty who would be glad to come."

"Have her here to-night," I said. And, with a grateful courtesy and snuffle, Mrs. Dodd left me.

Aunt Jane was as good as her word. When I left the house to go to the boat it was in its usual order, though a racking headache reminded me of the noise and confusion that had prevailed until after ten o'clock.

The boat came up to the wharf the moment after I arrived there, and I went on board to find my ward. I looked at all the young ladies, and instinctively I expected to see the blue eyes and fair hair of my old friend George. One after another, all those I singled out were carried off by fathers or brothers, or had an escort with them. Concluding that Miss Lee had had to wait for her new bonnet, I was leaving the boat when a tall elderly gentleman near me said:—

"Well, Miss Fannie, we must try to find Mr. Holmes's house."

I said, quickly, "Miss Lee?"

"The same, sir," said the gentleman. "Miss Serewem asked me to take charge of her. Are you a friend of Mr. Holmes? Miss Fannie, here is the gentleman your guardian has sent to meet you."

Could that tiny little figure beside him be my ward? She was muffled up in furs, woollens, shawls, till she was nearly as broad as she was long, and wore a heavy brown veil. She did manage, however, to get a tiny, neatly gloved hand out from her wrappings, and extend to me.

"Mr. Jones has my checks," she said, in one of the clearest, sweetest voices I ever heard.

The gentleman handed me three checks, and then I offered my arm to Miss Lee. She first thanked her escort for the care he had taken of her, bade him good-by, and then turned to me. The carriage taken and trunks secured, we left the wharf.

"Why didn't Mr. Holmes come?" said Miss Fannie, as we drove through the streets; "was he afraid of the rheumatism this cold night? Oh, wasn't it cold on the water?"

"Were you sea-sick?" I inquired.

"Sea-sick! No, indeed! I never was sick, any kind of sick in my life! Is this the house?"

I opened the carriage door. Mrs. Dodd opened my front door, and Miss Lee ran in. I left her to Dodd, and turned my attention to the baggage. When I went into the parlor, she was standing near the furnace register, talking to Mrs. Dodd, and did not notice me. She had thrown aside the wrappings, and stood there in a brown merino dress, which fitted a small, graceful figure, perfectly. Unlike her brother, she was a decided brunette. Her hair fell in short jetty curls on her shoulders, and her dark, clear complexion glowed crimson at the cheeks, with the recent exposure to the cold. Her eyes, raised to Dodd's face, were large and very dark.

"Oh, never mind, Miss Jane," she was saying, as I came in, "I don't care if she has gone to bed. But where's Mr. Holmes?"

"He'll be here in a minute, I suppose!"

"Tell me, is he awful old, and will he be cross and fussy?"

"Old! cross! fussy!" said Dodd; "why, you rode home with him!"

"What! is that my guardian? That young, handsome man! Mr. Holmes! Well, I never was so astonished—"

"And delighted, I hope!" I said, crossing the room to her side. She did not blush or look confused at my address, but looked at me a moment with her large brown eyes, and then burst into a hearty fit of girlish laughter.

"Do you know," she said, after she recovered her gravity, "I thought you were as old as the hills? I don't know why, except that all the girls at school who have guardians, have old ones. Ain't it jolly? We can have a great deal nicer times now, as it is, can't we?"

"I sincerely hope you will find your new home pleasant," I said, and I meant it. The large parlors seemed to have a new radiance cast over them by the presence of this tiny, merry girl.

Mrs. Dodd went to find Lizzie, her cousin, to be inaugurated in her duties as Miss Lee's maid, and we were alone.

"I am sure it will be pleasant," said my ward, "if you won't snub me. I am so tired of being lectured and scolded, and it ain't of any use either to be always at me. I can't be quiet and ladylike, and all that sort of thing. I think—I think I ain't one of the good kind."

I could not help smiling at this naive confession. She came a little closer to me.

"You will be kind to me, won't you? You know I have nobody else!"

I held out both hands to her.

"Do you know," I said, gently, "how much I loved your brother?"

"Yes!" in a whisper.

"I promised him to be kind to you. I have neglected the charge he left me, but I will make the future atone for it."

Dodd and Lizzie came in, and bidding my ward a cordial good-night, I saw her go up stairs, followed by Lizzie carrying the cloaks, shawls, and furs.

Such a life as I led for the next six weeks! I don't think that any uncaged monkey was ever more filled with mischief and fun than Miss Fannie Lee. She nearly tormented the life out of Aunt Jane and me. She hid aunt's spectacles in my briefs, so that they fell out in court; and she put the old lady's snuff-box in my waistcoat pocket, to be produced in the same place. She chose the moments when I was absorbed in a knotty case to fly to the piano, and play the liveliest jigs, and sing, in a clear soprano voice, the most absurd caricatures of opera music, rolling up her eyes, opening her mouth to its fullest extent, and scattering the neat comical trills and crescendos upon the air, till there was no alternative for me, and the papers were laid aside, to be studied out after Miss Fannie retired. No sooner did she see me disengaged than she was at my side. She pulled my moustache to make it grow, she said; she pretended to find white hairs amongst my black ones, and made this pretence for jerking out a dozen at a time of the jetty ones. She took my newspaper when I was most interested in it, to make me a cocked hat, and burned the tip of my nose trying to light my cigar.

She had a most splendid musical talent, and played upon the piano with wonderful execution and expression. One of her favorite plans for tormenting me was to propose duets. I would get my violin, and the little witch would take her place at the piano with the gravity of a deacon. She would throw her whole soul into the music until she saw that I was interested and absorbed in it, and then she would slyly dash off the most absurd variations on some negro melody, or dancing tune. As soon as I stopped, she would look up with an affectation of grave surprise, and go on with her part of the music until I was again interested, when the jig or polka came in again, and so on till I threw aside my violin, when she would gravely lecture me upon the bad example I was setting my ward, by losing my temper.

Yet I could not sincerely say that I wished her back at school. With all her wild freaks, she was affectionate and kind, and I often saw that her most daring pieces of mischief followed Aunt Jane's severe lectures upon propriety. They could not live in peace. It was like fire and ice, and Aunt Jane's severe, cold manner would have broken the child's heart or spirit, had not I been there to shield, protect, and indulge her.

I had never asked myself if I loved this wayward sunbeam; I knew she made my home a home, not a mere dwelling-house, and I listened for her voice, as for music; but she seemed to me such a child in her free, frank joyousness, that I never thought of love.

One morning I was taken with a severe attack of nervous headache. I had been subject for years to such spells, and I threw myself upon the sofa in the parlor, certain that for hours there was nothing for me but quiet endurance. Dodd came in to darken the windows, get me a pillow, and put the camphor bottle near me, and then I was alone. Soon I heard a merry laugh, and then a clear voice began to sing a verse of a gay song. It ceased suddenly, and Fannie said—

"Sick! a headache! Of course, I will be quiet, Miss Jane. I am so sorry!"

Light footsteps came over the stairs, the parlor door opened and shut softly, and presently two soft cool hands fell gently upon my forehead.

"Can't I do anything for you?" she whispered.

"Nothing, thank you. Don't let me keep you here in the dark!"

"Oh, please let me stay. I like to be where you are, better than anywhere."

The pain was too bad for me to talk, so she sat down and softly bathed my head with Cologne water, parting the hair with her light fingers, and mesmerizing me with those soft cool hands till I fell asleep, pondering over her last words.

I awoke, free from pain, but languid, and I heard Aunt Jane's voice in the parlor, at some distance from my sofa.

"You will find that he really disapproves of your conduct. It is not proper, and any young lady who allows herself to take such liberties with a gentleman, loses his respect."

Was it my ward who spoke next? The voice was clear and cold as Aunt Jane's!

"I think you are mistaken! I see that I was wrong to love the only person who has been really kind to me since my brother died, but I do not think my guardian misunderstood me. Still, I will take your advice, and go back to school till I am of age. Now mark me, not because you advise me, but because I cannot live here on cold, formal terms with my guardian, and I will not give him reason to despise me, by showing that I am grateful for his love."

The voice trembled a little, but Aunt Jane merely said—

"You have decided wisely," and left the room.

I kept perfectly quiet. I heard one choking sob, and then light steps approaching my sofa. A tear fell upon my forehead, and then soft, warm lips gently pressed the spot, and Fannie went towards the door.

In an instant I was on my feet beside her. Never mind what I said; I did not offend her, and when I sat down upon the sofa again, the tiny form nestled close in my arms. Only one question about our future life did my promised wife ask me—

"Aunt Jane?"

"Will return home the day we are married!"

And she did; a handsome present quite reconciling her to the match, and repaying her for the three months she spent with me to play propriety when I received a visit from my "ward."

A NICE NEIGHBORHOOD.

BY ALICE B. HAVEN.

"ONLY a hundred dollars a year more, Fred, and such a nice neighborhood!"

Mrs. Ballard gazed up into her husband's face in such an earnest, animated way, her own looked so pretty in the full light, between the Liverpool coal and the shaded gas-burner, that "Fred" could not resist stooping down to kiss her. If he could have foreseen how much that kiss was going to cost him! They had been three years married, and, living thus far without the joys and plagues of a nursery to divide them, they were still fond enough of each other to make the caress a happiness to both. Mr. Ballard drew the bright, sparkling face down to his shoulder, and took the hand that had been upraised in a pretty appealing gesture.

"Is it any more comfortable than this home?"

"O yes, indeed; the hall and vestibule are finished in black walnut, and then there's a third room, you know I told you, on the first floor, and two more chambers, of course, above."

As they already had four, and occupied but one, it did not seem essential to increase the number of sleeping apartments; but Mr. Ballard agreed to meet his wife the next afternoon on his way up town, and go to see the new house.

Now they were living beyond the Eighth Avenue in Nineteenth Street, and, though the block of four houses, of which their own was a part, was unexceptionable, one had to pass certain tenement houses to reach them, and the entire square presented an incongruous mixture of comfort and squalor which one often sees in respectable localities in New York city.

The desirable residence Mrs. Ballard had discovered brought her nearly two avenues nearer the Fifth; but it was very high up town, to be sure—above the Thirties. The situation was a little bleak, and the front of the house narrower by two feet than the one they now occupied; but when one aspires to gentility they must put up with coldness and narrowness, as all the world knows; and in every other respect there was nothing to ask. The black walnut vestibule and staircase, the handsome mantels, and neatly finished cornices, gave the interior quite an air; and, standing on the doorstep, both up and down the street, only houses of equal merit were to be seen; indeed, they rose to the grandeur of four stories and twenty-five feet fronts as they neared the end of the square.

"I shall never be able to walk to the Swamp," said Mr. Ballard, who was in the leather trade, almost under the shadow of the Cliff Street Temple of Knowledge.

"But the cars bring you to the corner, you know, and the Fifth Avenue stages are only a block and a half away; and it won't make much difference to me, I go down town so seldom."

Not that Mr. Ballard needed to be urged into the exchange, for the noisy children swearing on the sidewalk near their pleasant home annoyed him as much as the rag man's cart with its melancholy bell did his wife. This chiffonier must have belonged to one of those objectionable tenement houses in the rear, and he had a fancy for stabling the two wretched dogs that dragged under it on the curb-stone before Mrs. Ballard's parlor windows.

However, all that was at an end; the new house was taken, and the moving accomplished without any greater incidents than are usual to such transitions. The new parlor carpet would have been needed all the same in Nineteenth Street, and the furniture being almost new was sufficiently good for its present improved quarters. Mrs. Ballard superintended the last tack, and saw the door close on the upholsterer with great satisfaction. She took unusual pains with her toilet that night; put on her husband's favorite dress, and some well-preserved crimson immortelles in her brown hair. "And now," she said, as she had shown him through the house, "we are all ready for calls, if it is at all a sociable neighborhood."

It was unusually so for New York; several of the ladies remarked that when they paid their compliments and gratified their own curiosity as to the inmates and appointments of No. 27. Of the five who had done so Mrs. Ballard had elected two as favorites.

"I hope we shall see a great deal of you," Mrs. Rhodes remarked, in taking leave of Mrs. Ballard. "Mrs. Hamilton, who was before you, was extremely unsociable. I don't believe she ever set foot into my house more than twice, all the time she lived here. It doesn't look well to be above living pleasantly with one's neighbors."

Now, as Mrs. Rhodes' house was four stories, and very brown stone as to front, such a remark was gratifying; so was the freedom of Mrs. Sloan's manner, who said "My dear" on her very first call, twice in a breath, and urged its speedy return.

"Don't let it be a hundred years before we see you at 32, my dear Mrs. Ballard. I am delighted with the acquisition of such neighbors; such an improvement on poor Mrs. Hamilton! Don't come any farther, my dear, pray don't!" And Mrs. Sloan tilted gracefully on her high boot heels, and swung round on the pavement with the most captivating air; a wave of the hand and a parting smile intended to confirm the favorable impression she considered herself to have made.

"Mrs. Hamilton does not seem to have been much of anybody," Mrs. Ballard said to her husband, after giving a glowing description of Mrs. Sloan's toilet and general appearance. "That's the second time I've heard how unsociable she was. Do you know anything about them?"

"Why, yes; Cameron said to me only yesterday, 'So you've taken George Hamilton's old house?' George is a nice fellow, very; much better off than I am."

"It's a pity he should have such a wife! so dull, you know, not going out any," Mrs. Ballard explained.

"They didn't have room enough here, I believe, for their five children," pursued Mr. Ballard.

A very good reason, five children, for poor Mrs. Hamilton's lack of sociability; Mrs. Ballard did not stop to think of that. She felt greatly elated by the favorable comparison that had been made between them, and entertained her old friend and neighbor, Mrs. Thane, of Nineteenth Street, with a description of the style and friendliness of those who had stepped forward to console her for Mrs. Thane's loss.

That good little wife and mother went home with the seeds of envy and jealousy sown in her kindly heart. She missed Mrs. Ballard every day of her life, for there was no one else she could be very friendly with when they had resided near each other. She went up to see her the first moment that she could take from her nursery duties for such a jaunt, expecting to hear in turn that Mrs. Ballard was as inconsolable as herself. She might have said, with the lover of Wordsworth's Lucy, "But oh, the difference is to me!"

Mrs. Ballard had been so occupied with her new house and her new neighbors that she had scarcely glanced back to Mrs. Thane's, and when the familiar black beaver bonnet and gray Siberian fur tippet made their appearance in her parlors she even wondered how she could ever have thought Mrs. Thane pretty and lady-like. She had "not a particle of style," particularly after Mrs. Sloan's fashionable toilet and dashing manner.

"Oh, it's a lovely neighborhood, Harry!" Mrs. Thane said to her husband; "the houses are all new and elegantly finished, and there are no less than three private carriages kept in the square. Ours looked so mean as I came back, the grocery store more forlorn than ever, and the house so plain and old-fashioned. Elinor had on her best silk, and sat sewing in the parlor, and here must I stitch away in all the noise and confusion of the nursery, shut up with the children from one week's end to the other!"

Mr. Thane felt hurt, and yet his wife could not help it. The best balanced feminine mind goes through such experiences, and must struggle back to cheerful serenity again, as it may.

Mrs. Ballard sat sewing again the next morning; her dress a printed mousseline de laine; her feet shod in gaiters that had seen some service, and neatly darned on the side, answered very well for the house. She wore a plain linen set, and in fact would unhesitatingly have gone out with Mrs. Thane, any morning, just as she was. There was a ring at the door-bell.

"Mrs. Sloan sends her compliments, and would Mrs. Ballard like to go down town with her this morning?"

Mrs. Ballard started up with quite a flush of pleasure. It was a beautiful day, and to be out on Broadway with so well-dressed a companion was a delightful prospect; so an affirmative message was dispatched; and the dozen new pillow-cases for the servants' rooms replaced in her work-basket, while she made a speedy toilet.

Her best dress, a Marie Louise blue silk, her best hat, her new velvet cloak, new gaiters, and, of course, her best set of muslins, were laid out. Mrs. Sloan must not be kept waiting, and she hurried the things on, and left her room, for the first time in her married life, in that indescribable state of confusion known as "all sixes and sevens." The waiter, who was also chambermaid and co-laundress, was busy with her ironing. "It was not worth while to disturb her," Mrs. Ballard thought, as she glanced back at the half open drawers, wide open closets, and the various garments scattered about the room. She should be back in time to arrange everything before Mr. Ballard came. She felt uncomfortable with the remembrance of it, though, and a little nervous, as she neared Mrs. Sloan's, and saw her seated in full promenade dress at the window of the reception-room; it caused an unfortunate tug at her new glove, which would not go on, and an irreparable rent was the consequence.

Mrs. Sloan was in high good-humor; she was going down to look for a new dress for New Year's day; it was only November, to be sure, but it was well to take those things in time; the season was so early, it reminded one of mid-winter; the mud and slop from the late rain had frozen in the street, and there was ice upon the sidewalk, although the sky was so blue, and the sunshine so clear.

The Sixth Avenue cars were at the corner, but "one met all sorts of people in them," Mrs. Sloan said; "none of the ladies in this neighborhood used them, the Fifth Avenue stage was so much more genteel than even the Broadway vehicles, that came up so high." So the blue and gold stage received them, and Mrs. Ballard had an opportunity of growing familiar with the palatial residences she had seldom seen before, and congratulating herself as belonging in some faint degree to the same locality. Mrs. Sloan pointed out the different houses, and named their owners in the most familiar way, so that the ride to Broadway was very short, indeed.

They alighted opposite the Metropolitan Hotel; Mrs. Sloan said it was as well to look all along, and so they did most faithfully, cruising into every shop, whose windows were at all attractive, turning over more elegant silks than Mrs. Ballard had ever seen in all her life before, on their way to Stewart's. And here Mrs. Sloan sauntered about as if she had the freedom of the establishment; speaking to half the shopmen, and going from mantillas to mourning, and from merinos to blankets, the length and breadth of each department.

Mrs. Ballard had her modest list of necessary articles to be purchased; it was her methodical habit to set down everything as it made itself known, so that, when she took an afternoon for shopping, she usually accomplished a great deal. But she did not think it polite to move away from Mrs. Sloan, or ask her to leave the elegancies she was absorbed in inspecting, for the plain glass towels and vulgar crash which she happened to need. All at once Mrs. Sloan discovered that it was two o'clock, and they must certainly have a lunch, she felt "perfectly exhausted." So an omnibus was signalled by the gallant policeman always stationed at this thronged crossing, and Mrs. Ballard was introduced to the luxuries of "Thompson's," a café then in all the glory of its white and gilt panels, its crowds, and its Roman punches.

Mr. Ballard now and then indulged his wife in a concert, or an evening at the theatre, and an ice-cream at some tidy saloon afterwards, as is much the fashion with quiet cockney husbands; but to go at mid-day, and by herself, into a crowded Broadway restaurant, Mrs. Ballard never dreamed of doing. The utmost limit of her shopping lunches had been a modest purchase at some cake-shop, eating a jumble or a square of sponge-cake over the counter, as she waited to have her parcel tied up.

The hum and crowd, and curious stares they met with, in their search for an unoccupied table, disconcerted her. But Mrs. Sloan "breasted the current" gallantly, and presently rushed up to some acquaintances with delighted recognition.

Mrs. Ballard thought "how fortunate that she happened to be in her best," for Mrs. Sloan, not feeling in the least ashamed of her new friend, made an instant introduction, and she was at once at home among them.

Mrs. Sloan entirely forgot to order anything at first, she was so occupied in talking, and then it was nearly a quarter of an hour before a waiter condescended to answer her signal; so that it was half past two when Roman punch and calves' feet jelly for two, with a plate of fancy cakes, were set before them.

Time was of no consequence; they sipped their ices in the smallest possible quantities, and trifled with their cakes; they discussed the different silks and evening dresses they had examined, and Mrs. Sloan made the most amusing comments on the people who passed in and out. Mrs. Ballard had no idea she was so witty and clever; the weak point in every one's appearance, and manner, and toilet seemed to strike her at once; and, entertained in this delightful way, three had sounded from the City Hall before they reached the pavement again.

"It's hardly worth while to take an omnibus," Mrs. Sloan said, "to go so little way. I must stop at my dressmaker's, and see if there is the slightest prospect of her being able to set to work upon my dress when I do get it."

The establishment was only at Howard Street;

yet the walk proved very disagreeable. The bright noon sunshine had melted the ice, the pavements were a slop, and all the awnings and cornices dripped uncomfortably. Mrs. Ballard "dodged" great plashing drops, and held up her dress, and flattered herself that her toilet had received no injury, when at last they reached Madame Genet's, and were left to wait in the showily furnished anteroom.

"Madame is always hurried," Mrs. Sloan remarked, putting the tips of her gaiters up to the fire to dry, and shading her face with a morning paper. "I have sometimes waited here two hours to speak to her. And her charges are frightful. I had my last bill six weeks before I dared to show it to Mr. Sloan. Seventy dollars for three dresses; but 'garniture' was the difficulty; they always find the trimmings, and they can charge you anything they like on those without being able to say one word. I thought you might like to be introduced; she never undertakes a customer without introduction."

The restless, voluble little Frenchwoman gave them audience at last. "She was charm to know the friend of Madame Sloan; she was charm to wait on madame herself; but, ah, the ladies were all so pressing, and it was the season of business. She would consider; she would tell Madame Sloan, the next time she call in, when she would have the happiness of undertaking for her."

There was the damp chilliness and gloom out of doors that always follow the brightest winter day in New York when twilight appears. Already the gas jets in the shop windows were lighted, and the current of the crowd set steadily up Broadway. The omnibuses were all crowded with gentlemen returning from business, and ladies from their shopping. One and another passed with an ominous nod of denial from the driver, till at last they were fain to crowd into one, where a single seat presented itself, which seat Mrs. Sloan instantly possessed herself of, inviting her friend to a place on her lap. Mrs. Ballard had the mortification of hearing several unpleasant remarks from the gentlemen with regard to people who never knew when a stage was full, and of being obliged to accept the seat of a very young gentleman, who proceeded to hang on by the strap in a jolting, comfortless way that made her miserable.

Still, she said to Mrs. Sloan at parting that she was indebted to her for a most delightful day, and agreed to her proposal to accompany her again when the dress was really to be decided upon—quicken her steps a little as the thought of her husband's punctuality and the disordered room she had left flashed into her mind.

The hat rack was still unencumbered—what a relief!—and she flew up stairs to set things to rights. It was a narrow escape; but she had escaped, and it made her all the more talkative and demonstrative when "Fred" did make his appearance.

Sewing was not very attractive the next morning. Mrs. Ballard felt tired and jaded; besides, she had discovered several spots on her velvet cloak, some miserable mud stains on the hem of her dress, and that her new gaiters were warped out of their first freshness. It took her all the morning to get to rights, and then it was so late that it did not seem worth while to get her work about, particularly as she was liable to calls.

Mrs. Rhodes was ushered in in the most friendly way the day following, just as the work-basket had made its appearance. She had started to go down town on a little shopping, only to match some things, which would not take long, and in passing the door it had occurred to her that Mrs. Ballard might have some errand in the same direction—"it was so much pleasanter to have company."

Mrs. Ballard fluttered at this token of intimacy with the wife of the cashier of the "Corn and Barley Bank." It would not do to decline, when it might come to her ears that Mrs. Sloan's invitation had been accepted; besides, cook had asked her for the towels only that morning. She really must have them.

"If Mrs. Rhodes could wait ten minutes while she changed her dress?"

"Oh, twenty if she liked; when one was out for the day, a quarter of an hour more or less was of no consequence!"

Mrs. Rhodes took up a magazine, and settled herself comfortably in Mrs. Ballard's easy-chair; and her hostess, apologizing again for leaving her, hurried up stairs.

She was tempted to put on her brown merino, her usual walking-dress, but then velvet and merino did not look well together, and her cloth cloak was so shabby, and Mrs. Rhodes wore a rich robe dress in three flounces, so the blue silk went on again, "just for this once," with all its accompaniments, and the disorder of two days ago prevailed in the apartment when she closed the door behind her.

"Only to match some trimmings!"

If it be the device of an evil spirit "to tempt to loss through loss of time," it was a crowning point when trimmings were invented and trimming stores were opened. Mrs. Rhodes wished a particular shade of sea-green; there were yellow-greens and green-greens in abundance, but no sea-greens for at least nine squares; and then the sea-green, when it was hunted out, was a fringe, when it ought to have been a ribbon; and when at last Peyser reported the ribbon as found, there were no buttons within a dozen shades of it, and the clock at the end of the store stood at half past one.

Mrs. Rhodes declared herself unable to go another step without something to eat, and, by a remarkable and singularly happy coincidence, Mrs. Sloan was discovered bearing up upon Thompson's as they reached the door. It made quite a jolly party, and Mrs. Rhodes soon discovered her weakness for the good things of this life by ordering broiled oysters and woodcock for three, finishing off with a Charlotte russe. Her husband had no more for his dinner at Delmonico's, and the three ladies managed to make a tolerable lunch.

Mrs. Sloan enjoyed hers remarkably, and invited both the other ladies to a sociable tea at her own house, the evening following. It was there that Mrs. Ballard first saw the husbands of her new acquaintances.

Mr. Rhodes was a dull, heavy man, only to be roused out of his stolidity by a reference to the money market. Mr. Sloan, on the contrary, was quite as agreeable as his wife, and advanced in Mrs. Ballard's good graces by paying her several apparently unstudied and frankly sincere compliments.

She felt a little uncomfortable at the tone of bantering between the husband and wife; it was so unlike anything she had ever been accustomed to.

"Look out for yourself, Mrs. Ballard," Mrs. Sloan called out from behind the tea-tray; "Joe is making a dead set at you; he's the greatest flirt in town."

Whereupon Mr. Sloan charged his wife with jealousy, and gave her permission to make a conquest of Mr. Ballard in return. Mrs. Ballard wondered to see her husband join in the laugh, and take it so pleasantly. However, it reassured her for the time, and she did not have another of those disagreeable misgivings until Mr. Sloan assisted her in putting on her shawl at leaving; she imagined that he pressed her hand. If he did, it was very light, scarcely more than a touch, and it might be a foolish mistake of her own, and so it was not worth while to tell Fred of it and annoy him. So Mrs. Ballard went to sleep, for the first time in her married life, feeling that there was something concealed from her husband; and this very fact kept the remembrance of that faint pressure, and the admiring look which accompanied it, fresh in her mind longer than she would have liked to confess.

To the towels and the crash, which had not been purchased yet, sewing-silk and various other little items were now added. It was necessary to make an expedition to that fated region of delays—"down town;" this time alone, and, being alone, there was no excuse for finery; but it had become a matter of habit, and, though her second-best silk, a well preserved plaid, replaced the blue one, which had been torn in the door of an omnibus on the last trip, it allowed velvet and the best bonnet, both of which were put on.

Making straight for the housekeeping department at Stewart's, after leaving the thread and needle store, all the necessary purchases were speedily accomplished; but, on crossing the rotunda, whom should she spy, seated comfortably at the silk counter, but Mrs. Rhodes, who nodded and beckoned.

"How very fortunate!—to help me to select a silk. I have five now, you know; but Mr. Rhodes makes such a point of seeing his wife and family well dressed, he says it's as much a part of a man's respectability as the house he lives in. I have a black, and green, and Bayadere stripe, that's three; and a plum, and deep blue. I'm quite at a loss!"

So Mrs. Ballard could do no less than come to the rescue, and the inevitable trip to Thompson's was proposed as a sequence. Proposed by Mrs. Rhodes, who made a faint show of resisting the arrangement when Mrs. Ballard said it was her turn to order the lunch; but finally gave in, being short of funds, as she acknowledged, having paid two shillings more a yard for her dress than she had intended.

"I never take any more money with me than I think I am going to need, there is so much danger of pickpockets now-a-days," Mrs. Rhodes said, as she studied the carté in its papier maché cover. She spent at least ten minutes in a careful review, but finally arrived at the conclusion that "there was nothing nicer than broiled oysters and woodcock, after all."

Entirely unconscious of the charge for this selected delicacy, Mrs. Ballard gave her order to the waiter with an ease and confidence that surprised herself. She was still more surprised when she came to turn over the counter, which, with unexampled delicacy, a well-trained waiter ever reverses as he lays it before you. It was well that she had taken an extra three dollar bill from the house money that morning. How much change she received from it at the desk, or rather how little, she did not care to examine into.

There was a plain dish of mutton chops for dinner at home that night, with turnips and potatoes, a bread pudding for dessert. Mr. Ballard always advocated a plain table. It was a part of his general principle in life; moderation in all expenses; no pinching in one place to spare in another. He had started without capital, and it was his ambition to accumulate one; not for the mere pride which many men take in a good bank account, but because opportunities were constantly occurring for advancement in his business dependent upon his ability to control ready money. Thus far, Mrs. Ballard had entered into the understanding very heartily, and endeavored not to overstep the income he had allowed himself, any more than if it had been a salary, with no possibility of enlarging it.

"After all, a mutton chop at home tastes better than turtle soup at Delmonico's," said Mr. Ballard, applying himself cheerfully to the delicacy he mentioned. "You don't get potatoes boiled like this at a restaurant, either—mealy as a miller!" And he surveyed the pomme de terre on the end of his fork. "Lem Gilbert wanted me to stop into Delmonico's as I came up town—his treat, of course; but then I should have been obliged to return it some day, and when I have any money to spend I like to spend it on my little wife, and enjoy it with her."

He looked across the table with such sincere and honest affection that her consciousness of the day's adventure flamed into her face, and nearly betrayed her. She had no appetite, and that, with her flushed face, passed for a headache, and she was obliged to take her husband's condolence and petting, feeling more deeply guilty every moment.

"I'm afraid you don't go out enough; you ought to walk every day," pursued Mr. Ballard, when he had established her on the sofa, and carefully shaded the light; "you ought to walk out every day."

"But, Fred," began Mrs. Ballard, with a confession trembling on her lips.

"Yes, yes, I know all about the sewing and housekeeping, and that I have the most industrious and economical wife in the world; but, for all that, you must take time to keep well. Now not another word." And he kissed her mouth, quivering with the remembrance that she was acting a falsehood for the first time in her life, and accepting praise where censure was her just due.

Mr. Ballard noticed, after this, how frequent his wife's headaches became. Their evenings, once so cheerful, were half the time clouded by dullness on her part, and of course that she was not well was sufficient reason why she should not come and perch herself on his knee, and talk over the little incidents of the day. She no longer brought her account-books to be added up, and boasted playfully of her good management in money matters. She was irritable, but that was natural enough when she was not well. More than once he found her dressing or putting her room to rights instead of being at the hall door to meet him. "Lying down till the last minute," he said to himself. "Poor child! she must be suffering more than she admitted."

The little household, that had always run like clockwork, began to show symptoms of disarrangement. Dinner was late; there was very little variety; beefsteak three times a week as often as not, and no more little made dishes, which Mrs. Ballard used to be so famous for concocting, and cold meat, which he hated, took their place two nights in succession. Mr. Ballard naturally remonstrated, and was told, sharply, that it must be used up in some way, and she had not time to waste in the kitchen. He overheard his usually gentle wife berating the cook for using the best linen pillow-cases on her bed, and the cook retorting that "the cotton ones was all giv' out, and she wasn't going to sleep on the tick for nobody." Surely he remembered giving his wife money for the purchase of new bedding for the servants' room when they moved into the house, and helping her measure off a set of pillow-cases. His memory was correct; he would have found the whole set in her work-basket if he had looked there, with only the over and over seams finished.

However, he had his own annoyances and carelessnesses to occupy him. Several times lately he had lost money from his pocket-book in paying bills, and once had handed up a half eagle to the omnibus driver instead of a nickel penny; he must have done so, for he remembered seeing it in a handful of change just before he left his office one night, and the next morning he could not find it. But it served him right for not conquering the careless habit of carrying coin loosely in his pocket. His wife had often cautioned him about it, so he concluded not to mention it to her, but be more careful for the future.

Her spirits did not improve; not that there were any decided symptoms of disease, only loss of appetite, languor, and irritability. He came to the conclusion that she ought to have medical advice; he was afraid of "intermittent," it so often lurked about the made lands in the upper part of the town. It was a nice neighborhood, but he was afraid it was unhealthy.

He had come to this resolution as he walked briskly up Broadway one afternoon. He had an engagement to meet a gentleman on business at the Metropolitan. It was a successful interview, but it carried him out of the line of the cars which he usually availed himself of, and he was obliged to take an omnibus. It was all full save the seat by the door, and so dark as he stumbled into it—for it was the trip before lamplighting—that he could not distinguish one fellow-passenger from another; but, after a while, looking about him, as a cheerful man will on a long, crowded ride, and thinking of his wife again now that business was over with, he was struck by the air of a lady in the corner farthest from him. It was too dark to distinguish faces, and of course Elinor was safe at home this time in the afternoon looking out for him; but the lady was wonderfully like her, and the gentleman friend sitting next to her evidently admired the stranger as much as he had admired his wife in the days of their courtship. His arm was stretched out, holding on to the end of the omnibus, so as to bring it back of the lady without seeming absolutely impertinent—how well he remembered the old trick!—and he was bending down to talk into her bonnet!

He was unconsciously attracted to watch the pair after this, and noticed that the lady was very quiet, and the gentleman apparently very complimentary. They belonged in or near his own neighborhood, too; for, as they ascended Murray Hill, and he had made out Thirty-Seventh Street after some study of this unaccustomed locality, the gentleman pulled the check-string, and prepared to get out of the stage. The lady's veil was down as she passed him; but the resemblance to his wife lost nothing on closer view, and the gentleman was his neighbor, Mr. Sloan.

Wonder and astonishment confused him for the moment. He allowed the stage to roll on two or three houses from the corner without getting out himself, and when he turned it they were too far ahead of him to overtake them. So it was Elinor after all; he saw her go up the door-step, and Mr. Sloan pass on. What had detained her out so late? What had taken her out at all, when he had left her with symptoms of an incipient headache? As for that puppy, Sloan, it was just like him! always imagining that every woman liked and courted admiration as much as his own wife! However, he should soon hear the whole story.

He could not have been three minutes behind them, and strode directly up stairs into his own room; but there stood his wife, smoothing her hair quietly before the glass, it is true, but with not a trace of her walking-dress lying about, or anything unusual in her reception of him. Could his eyes have deceived him? But he would not be impatient, or offer the insult of a seeming distrust, to the woman he had given his whole heart to; she should speak of it herself—no doubt she would presently—and he dashed the cool, fresh water over his face, as he prepared for dinner, as if it could cool the fever of his mind.

Dinner came, and went; the evening passed, and still no mention of the afternoon's engagements. But Mr. Ballard had found a solution for the silence. It wanted but two days to the New Year, and no doubt her errand had conceived some little surprise for himself, such as they were in the habit of planning for each other. He had his own in contemplation, and had already haunted more than one furrier's shop, after business hours, that week. In fact, he had a pretty set of mink fur already laid aside, all but decided on; one that he could not tell from sables at five times its cost. "He would wait patiently for the New Year."

But though he tried to be satisfied, and called himself all manner of names, mentally, for his momentary doubts, "trifles light as air" would intrude on his recollection, and array themselves before him. Not only that evening, but the next day, in his office, at his desk; and the next, the day for the conclusion of his purchase. He felt half tempted to decline it; but no! how would he feel when Elinor came and offered him some gift, in which she had studied his tastes, and said, "There, I was down town selecting it, and was belated, and that odious Mr. Sloan met me in the omnibus, and annoyed me so with his attentions; I could not tell you then, for fear you would suspect what I had been after!" How would he feel, meeting such an emergency empty-handed? So he made the purchase, and concluded to take the furs home himself, to prevent mistakes; he was not the only man who carried a large package on New Year's Eve.

Trudging along from the cars, thinking of the radiant and astonished face with which the long wished for furs would be received, Mr. Ballard quite lost sight of the annoyances of the last few days. The whole street looked so cheerful, with the light streaming through handsome curtains, so different from the poverty and squalor that used to damp him in nearing the old house, on just such nights as this. "I am so glad that I indulged Elinor in her choice," he said to himself, forgetful that the houses of Sloan and Rhodes lay beyond his own doorstep; "there is such a comfort in a nice neighborhood." And yet he reflected that they had not really been any happier there; no, if it came to that, home itself was by no means so pleasant.

The parlor was lighted, and Mrs. Ballard, handsomely dressed, sat before the fire. She did not rise to meet him as usual, and yet she was not ill; she had never looked better in her life. Her eyes were brilliant, and a superb color lighted her cheeks; almost too bright for health, or a quiet heart. Mr. Ballard came in, holding his precious freight before him, as if to bespeak a welcome.

"There, Ellie!" and he threw the cape over her shoulders; "and here are the rest of the fixings in this box;" and as he stooped down over her, "now for my pay."

"Oh, no, no!" and Mrs. Ballard threw off the cape to the floor, and averted her lips with a quick gesture. "I do not want it, I don't deserve it;" and then taking the two hands that had met to turn her face upward, she held them tightly over it, and said with a sob, "Oh, Fred, if you only knew how wretched I am!"

Some demoniac impulse, that set his very heart on fire, and made his brain whirl, moved Mr. Ballard to tear his hands away, and spurn her from him; but he crushed it down. "Wilt thou love her, comfort her, honor her?" rang through his mind, and the solemn vow heavenward, recorded in his firm "I will," at the altar. So he only repeated "Wretched, Elinor, on New Year's Eve?" and lifting her from the chair, seated her in the old place of confidence, upon his knee; but she slipped to the floor, and laid her head upon it, instead.

"Oh, Fred, I do not know where to begin. I have deceived you; you think I am good, and I am not; and I must have made others think me worse than I am. You must not kiss me! Do let me tell you all about it, or my heart will break!"

It cost him more than she could ever know to sit there so quietly, smoothing down her hair, as in the old time, and to say in an unshaken voice, "Yes, tell me all about it."

It was sad enough; the step by step of little extravagances, little concealments, and practised deceits, which led to taking the money he had missed to replace the wardrobe ruined in the frequent idle shopping excursions, and wasted on delicacies which her husband so strictly denied himself; or in the purchase of expensive items of dress she had been drawn into purchasing from the example of her new acquaintances, or because they had been pronounced becoming, and Mrs. Sloan had poured compliments and flattery into her ear until she had grown weary of quiet domestic life, and eager for admiration, restless without it, and ready to accept it, however offered. "But oh, Fred," and here the head sank lower and lower till it almost touched the carpet, "I never meant to do wrong; I never felt how wrong it was—except deceiving you, and taking your money; I felt that all the time, but I did not know how to get out of it until to-night. Just before you came, the bell rang, and Mr. Sloan came in, just to wish me a happy New Year, he said, and he would not sit down and wait till you came; and then, when he was going, dear Fred, he stooped down, and kissed me full on my mouth before I knew what he was going to do; and it made me so angry and miserable, I cannot tell you, and made me see that he thought I would not resent it. I thought right away of his disagreeable manner when I met him in a stage two days ago, when I had been having that dreadful dress Mrs. Sloan persuaded me to get for to-morrow tried on at Madame Genet's. I don't ask you to forgive me. I know you will never kiss me again; but I am glad you know it all."

"All, Elinor?"

"Yes, all; believe me this once. I am telling you the truth."

He did not kiss her then, he would have been more than human in his forgiveness; but he took her hands, and made her lift up her face, while he told her how greatly she had erred; and pointed out the first wrong step—undue intimacy and confidence with idle, vain, extravagant, and heartless women whom she knew only as neighbors; the little rents and breaches in principle; the folly that had crept after the idleness, and the vanity after the folly. Yet Mrs. Sloan was not a bad woman in the eyes of the world, or her husband a bad man. Probably both had displayed the worst points about them, and the frivolity of the one, and the idle gallantry of the other, have their counterparts in every street and every square in town. Nay, society owes its gayety and brilliancy to just such as they, and one would be scouted as oversaintly to reprove it. Yet they had marred the perfect union of a true domestic life, such as is growing more and more rare with the inroads of custom and extravagance, and which they could never have attained to—a life of perfect confidence, perfect trust, of mutual concession, and healthful repose.

Mrs. Ballard came to know herself forgiven and restored in time ; but it was not until the new gift of an infant life brightened their home that she could believe the old painful remembrances resolutely and wholly banished, as an offering to the innocent child who lay nestling, like the dove of peace, in her arms.

"You did not stay long in Thirty-Seventh Street?" Mr. Cameron said to his friend when congratulating him on the happy occurrence. "I was surprised when I heard you had moved, it was such a nice neighborhood."

"Yes, very nice;" and Mr. Ballard hesitated a moment—perhaps Mr. Cameron thought of taking his new wife there; how should he convey a sort of warning?—"a very nice neighborhood, but I don't think it altogether a healthy one."

BOREAS, THE MANIAC KING.

BY MYRTLE.

I HEAR it, and love the stentorian voice
Of the maniac king;
Within my spirit its echoes are waking
Madness that pleaseth while heart-strings are breaking;
Too tame are the zephyrs—oh, give me my choice
Of the maniac king.
Cold is the altar where hope and love burn'd;
All the dirges I sing
O'er the ashes of idols I made of earth's clay,
More precious than all of gold's brightest array;
All, with the wail of despair, I have learned
From the maniac king.
Listen! that wild, piercing scream is the laugh
Of the maniac king;
Though it maketh me tremble like the aspen the while,
My spirit it fascinates more than the smile
Of any of earth; my pleasure I quaff
From the maniac king.
I cannot tell why my quivering heart,
That dreadeth his wing,
By his caprice was held till invisibly fell
A strong threaded cable, a magnetic spell,
O'er my will, till I cannot depart
From the maniac king.
And pale, strange maidens are coming to me;
All hasten to bring
White robes and flowers; I am to be a queen-bride,
And go with my rover o'er mountain and tide;
For at the feet of his captive bowed the proud knee
Of the maniac king.

High our throne shall be on the iceberg's crest,
The wondering sun shall fling
Around us the diamonds which hundreds of years
Have robbed from old ocean, and millions of spears,
Set thickly with gems, will there guard my rest
With the maniac king.
No splendor of earth can equal the home
Of the maniac king.
You may bear from all countries to India's land,
Each crown and tiara, all earth's golden sand,
And pile with her jewels—they're less than the dome
Of the maniac king.
And when of our stay we wearied grow,
Round our palace we'll fling
Icy walls and high towers our absence to guard;
Nor fear that its beauty by time will be marred;
O'er earth I'll wander in clouds of white snow
With the maniac king.
Ye dare not approach the northern retreat
Of the maniac king!
Not even woman's pure tears will move the hard fiend;
The husband she weeps, the friend much esteemed,
Like brave, noble Franklin, are slain at the feet
Of the maniac king.
Loud trumpets shall herald our coming, and then
The echoing caves will ring
With hoarse, hollow tones, as though ghosts of the dead
Were there quaking with fear and screaming from dread, Beseeching, once more, protection with men
Against the maniac king.
And far above billowy waves I'll ride
With the maniac king;
Or waltz on their crests, when red lightnings play near
To the sailor boy's couch, and sprinkle his tier
With seaweed and foam from the angry tide,
'Woke by the maniac king.
'Mid hail and wild thunder the demon-like glee
Of the maniac king
Will shriek o'er the tempest, exulting, that he Is lord over Neptune and I queen of the sea;
Nay, mariner, ask no pity of me
Or of the maniac king.
Once in the dead past my heart was all tears,
But the maniac king
With human fiends stole all the traces away
Of love, hope, or pity. I curse the sad day,
With those who've given my future's dark years
To the maniac king.
Dire vengeance I'll bring with my new acquired power,
Like the asp's deadly sting;
For the base hands that wrested my treasures I'll find,
And tightly with cords of life's bitterness bind,
Or mercy will grant them, and shorten death's hour
By the maniac king.
There is naught that can save my madd'ning brain
From the maniac king
But to clasp to my heart lost idolized forms
That I loved more than life. Hark! hear ye the storms
That sweep from the North with the dirge-like strain
Of the maniac king?
Come, maidens, your wreath haste bind on my brow,
For the maniac king
Is waiting his bride. Oh, your icy hands chill
My pulse's rapid motion; your robes send a thrill
Of death's freezing sense to my heart. I'm now
Free from the maniac king!

MR. AND MRS. RASHER.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MISS SLIMMENS."

CHAPTER I.

THE NEW HOUSE.

SAY, Mr. Rasher, are you going to buy a new house, or are you not? "You don't know?" Well, I do! You owned up yesterday that the clear profits of your business this year was over twenty thousand dollars, and if we're ever going to live in a brown-stone front, now's the time. You don't make twenty thousand dollars every year cutting up pork, or, if you expect to after this, it's high time we was taking our proper position before the world. I, for one, intend to go out a little more than I have. I've got things to go with, and I intend to go.

You're afraid people will make light of us as well as our lard oil? Fiddlesticks, Rasher! I wish you would quit them everlasting puns. It's vulgar to pun; a very low species of wit, indeed; I heard Mrs. De Longue say so, the night I was to her reception. You can't help it; you must interlard your conversation with 'em? Good Lord, Rasher! whatever else you do, leave your business behind you when you come home. I declare, the very silk curtains in the parlor have an odor of it! Don't bristle up so? There it comes again; it's enough to drive a woman mad! You can't help "cutting up;" you're so used to it? Now, look a-here, husband, we're going to settle this matter about the house this morning, or we're not going to settle it. If you'll quit that nonsense and listen to reason, I'll tell you what my ideas are; but if you don't, I won't say another word. Then you guess you'll keep on? and if you do you won't get me to keep still. That's just what you want; you'd be glad if I never opened my lips, though which of us is capable of speaking with the most propriety I'll leave other people to judge.

I picked out a house yesterday afternoon that suits me; and, as a woman is supposed to be the best judge of such matters as the house she lives in and has to stay in from one year's end to another, why, if you can pay for it, that's enough. It's a brown-stone front, four story and basement, stoops and balustrades of brown-stone, massive and handsome; style of architecture modern Italic, and not surpassed by any of similar size in the city. I remember just what the advertisement said, which was the reason of my going to see it. It'll be finished next week. It's twenty feet front, and commands a beautiful view of the neighboring houses, which are all just as nice and aristocratical as our own. It's because I liked the neighborhood so well that I wanted that house in particular. "What's the price?" Sixteen thousand dollars, and considered cheap, considering the Avenue and the Park. Eight thousand dollars will furnish it from garret to cellar; library, pictures, and everything, and we can get a man to do it all without taking any trouble ourselves. You've got thirty thousand in the bank, I know, and, with your business, you need not be afraid but that you can— "Save your bacon!" Odear, Mr. Rasher! if you're going to continue so vulgar, I don't know as there'll be any use in our trying to get where we ought to be.

The girls will be home from boardin'-school to their winter vacation in the latter part of December, and I'd like to get all moved, and settled, and furnished, and fixed before they come home, just to give 'em a pleasant surprise. There, Rasher! I knew you had some fatherly feeling about you, if you had no pride. You're in no hurry this morning, I know. Just wait a minute till I get my bonnet and shawl, and let's go round and look at it.

Ain't it a beauty? Them balusters are superb! Step in and look at the parlors; two and an extension; and behind the staircase there's a sweet little room, which I shall fix up as a boudoir. I'll be as much at home in it as a pig in a flower-garden? Humph! You're extremely complimentary to your wife, my dear; but I sha'n't resent it here, before all these workmen. You can say what you please. I suppose it was my misfortune to marry a man in the pork-packing business whose mind is always running—on all fours?—will you quit interrupting me, or not?—whose mind is always running on his business. If you'd only drop it at home and in company, I wouldn't care, seeing it's made us so much money; but, as it is, I am almost driven—into a pig-pen?—almost driven to distraction. You're uncommon provoking this morning, Mr. Rasher.

This is a splendid house to give a party in ; and I've made up my mind to give the biggest one of the season, if we get moved and settled in time. You hate parties ? Of course you do ; you hate everything that I like. You'd be contented to sit down, and smoke your pipe, and drink your sherry forever in the back sitting-room of that little, mean, three-story brick. You've no ambition, and you've no feeling for your wife. Oh, you needn't be putting your arm around my waist and hugging me, with that fellow there a painting them friskoes looking right at us. I wish you'd remember what I've told you so often—that it's dreadfully out of taste to be showing your family feelings in public. When we go out together you shouldn't speak to me, no more'n if I wasn't there ; 'stead of that, you invariably keep hanging around me, and every once and while burst out with : "Say, Marier, did you hear that?" or, "Come here, Marier, and set side of your husband a while;" or, "Marier, I wonder if the children are doing well to home?" And that night we played forfeits to Mrs. Fitz-Simmons's, and you was judged to kiss one of the ladies for a punishment, what did you do but kiss me right before the hull crowd! Wasn't that punishment enough? You needn't try to turn it off with a joke. You know it was a breach of etiquette, if not actually immodest, to choose out your own wife in all that company. You was too bashful to choose anybody else ; and, besides, you hadn't yet got tired of kissing your own partner? Pshaw! that's all well enough to home. I could see the Widow Granger looked disappointed. Oh, now, don't color up, dear! Come up stairs and look at the next story. There! This is the apartment I've settled on for ourselves ; it's eighteen by twenty, and you always like an airy sleeping-room ; and, what makes it pleasant for me, is that it looks right over at Dr. Yellow Dock's house ; and, as I shall set here a great deal, I can see their company going in and out, and when they take a ride in their carriage, and how they dress their servants, and everything. They're very fashionable people, and they've made their money, every cent of it, within five years.

Speaking of carriages, Rasher, we can't get along any longer with our one horse and our single chaise. We must, after we go into this house, have a pair of black horses, and a carriage with our arms upon it, and a place for the footman to hold on behind. Sit down in the window here, and take it easy ; I want to settle it about the livery, etc. You don't see as there will be any necessity for us going to the livery, if we have an establishment of our own ; and as for arms, we'd better keep our arms in it instead of on it? Dear, dear! husband, I wouldn't have had Mrs. Fitz-Simmons heard you say that, for the world ; she'd have had her whole set giggling about it the next time we came where she was. Of course our servants must dress in livery ; at least have capes to their coats and buttons on their caps. Don't you know whether any of the Raschers, in the old country, ever had a coat-of-arms? You might consult the book of heraldry, and find out. If there was, you must have it painted on the carriage door, and engraved on all the plate ; if there never was, why, we'll just invent one, that's all. What are you doing on that scrap of paper, Rasher? A coat-of-arms? Dear me! I didn't know as you knew enough. Let me see it, won't you?

"Ain't it sweet, Mrs. Rasher? My father used to think a great deal of that motto ; and that's the way I came to be rich. It means, literally (I've got it in Latin there), that Discretion is the better part of valor."

If you can't do anything but cast ridicule on yourself and your wife from morning till night, we might as well stay in our obscurity. You aren't casting ridicule on me ; the wild boar forms part of the coat-of-arms of some of the noblest families of Scotland and England? Oh, that alters the case! If you really think, Rasher, it would be aristocratic and just the right thing, and if you think our friends will see it in the same light you do, why, I like it well enough. When will you get it engraved? I wish you'd stop to Ball & Black's, and order a set of solid silver to be made, to be done in time for the party, and our arms on it.

Come, let's look at the wine-cellar ; you must learn to talk about your wine-cellar, Rasher, if you want to make an impression on the men. Everything down here is mighty nice and convenient—but, la! that's the servant's business. I'm going to pretend, when I get a new set, that I don't know a coal-bin from a wash-tub. That'll be a pretty way to have myself imposed upon? Well! you're able to stand a little imposition, and you don't suppose I'm going to let 'em see I ever stepped in a kitchen. My hands show it? No, they don't; and I'm going to keep 'em done up nights in old gloves, and oil 'em every night with—lard oil?—stuff! with rose cream.

Let's go! tell me first whether you've concluded to take the house. You s'pose I must have my own way about it? That's a dear, good Rasher, as you are. And to pay you for consenting, without a fuss, I'll trouble you as little as possible about the change, moving, and all that. I'll give the upholsterers orders about the furniture, and get a bookstore man to fill the library; and when everything is ready for us to step in and take our dinner, we'll ride over and take possession. I'll get an auctioneer to sell off our old stuff, every article of it, for what it'll bring. I expect, perhaps, it will come to enough to pay for the new set of silver, centre-piece and all, for the piano, you know, is 'most new, and the carpets are only six months old.

You hope I'll reserve your old secretary and arm-chair, and that sofa? O dear! I suppose I can have 'em set in the fourth story, where you can go and look at 'em once and a while. I don't see why you need to set such great store by that sofa, because you and I used to set on it together, in our little parlor, the first winter we was married. It's stiff and old-fashioned now, and has been covered twice. I allowed it to set in my room up stairs, seeing you thought so much of it; but it might as well go to the auction-room as up into the fourth story, where it will have to stay, if it's kept in the new house.

What are you thinking of, to walk right over that curbstone without seeing it? You was thinking of old times? No doubt you'd like to go back to the days when I did my own work, and set and sewed for the children, evenings, but I wouldn't. It's a great burden off my mind to have the girls to Madame Flummery's school; she's very genteel, and will give 'em an air, which I know I couldn't, though I'm naturally more genteel than their father. What's that? we're setting them up above us, so as to make them ashamed of us? Well, Arabella was a little sniffy the last time she came home, but when we move on to the Avenue in the new house, she'll have more respect for us. Ah, here we are at the corner! Come home early to-night, Rasher; I want to talk over the plans.

Ain't it splendid? and I hav'n't had a bit of trouble, only to give my orders. I think Mr. Brilliant, the upholsterer, is a very tasty man. I told him about what we could afford to expend on the rooms, and he fixed them up himself. His only exceeded the sum I set about two thousand dollars. He asked my idea of colors for the first floor, and I told him I liked crimson and gold. I think I never seen handsomer cornices. The mirrors, and the chandeliers, and the cornices, and the picture-frames, give an air of gorgeousness—don't you think so? I bought the pictures myself, all to one store, as the man gave me a bargain, if I'd take the lot; and I got Mr. Brilliant to put new frames to them, to correspond with the mirrors. The paintings themselves didn't come to quite so much as the frames. I'd an idea them sort of things was more expensive, as Mrs. De Witt told me she'd given four hundred dollars for a little dull thing not much bigger than my hand. She must have been awfully imposed on, for I got one four feet long for forty dollars, and far more brilliant colors, at that!

Come in here, Rasher, and look at the library. You see he's put this in darker colors; but that's the fashion, I believe. Them ain't wooden books, like some of Mrs. Smyth's; they're the genuine article. I paid Mr. Octavo twelve hundred dollars for filling the shelves. But I had more trouble with him than with all the rest put together. I didn't like the bindings of the books he put in first, and I had him take 'em all back, and put in these. These have got such pretty red covers and gilt letters. Besides, I got mad at him about another thing. I thought he meant a fling at your business. Right along in the very first row there was three or four books with no titles at all, but just "Bacon," printed on the back. My! but wasn't I mad! I suppose they were recipes for curing bacon, perhaps—I didn't look to see, but I made him take 'em right out. Up a little higher, what did I see but "Hogg's Tales" printed on the back of another book? I asked him what he meant by it; if he meant to insult us because we'd made our money in the pork business? and he didn't know what to say; but he took 'em away, and finally I told him I guess he'd better change the whole lot, and put in them with red bindings I'd seen at his store. He was very good-natured about it. I suppose he didn't want to lose our custom. That's one advantage of being as rich as we are—people don't like to offend us. I don't suppose any one will ever read the books, but it is necessary to have them, for the same reason that we have almost everything else; because other people do. Pictures and books are considered stylish; I've heard Mrs. Fitz Simmons talking about an author's style. What's that? In what respect do you resemble an author? I am sure I can't guess, my dear. I've never detected any resemblance, though, as for that matter, I know very little about authors. Because you both make a living by the pen? and both of you sell your tender-lines? Now, Rasher, for mercy's sake, we're in the new house, and do, do, for my sake, quit that miserable habit of punning! or, if you must make puns or die, choose some other subject than the one you're always harping on.

Here's my boudoir; I told him to put that all in yellow, with blue facings and trimmings. I cautioned him about the sofa and chairs; not to get 'em too small; for you know I'm pretty solid, and I shall want to recline on 'em when I think I'm likely to be surprised by company; so he's made 'em as large as the room will allow. That painting up there by the door, with that little lapis-lazuli table under it, is copied from the original of Rachel's Madonna in the Roman Vacuum, the man said who sold it to me. He advised me to have it hung in my boudoir in such a position that I could gaze upon it in my reflective moments; it's a religious picture, you know. I usually gaze in the looking-glass in my reflective moments? Ain't you ashamed to trifle upon so serious a subject, Mr. Rasher? I shouldn't wonder if your habit of punning led you into the still worse one of using profane language, if you continue to cultivate such irreverence. You don't see any connection between punning and swearing? Well, I do; only last week, when I was telling you about the rocks up to the park, you said "blast 'em," and then went on pretending you meant blow 'em to pieces with powder.

I'm going to have a yellow satin dressing-gown, faced with blue, and a blue cord and tassel, made to correspond with the sofa and curtains; and then I shall expect to spend a good many of my mornings here, and have a mark hanging out of that handsome book there, as if I'd been reading, and I can pass away my time hemming ruffles or handkerchiefs, and when Mrs. Fitz Simmons or any of my friends call, I can slip my work under this satin cushion, and beg to be excused for receiving 'em in my boudoir, but I was a little unwell this morning; which will probably be the truth, Rasher, for since I've taken to drinking wine for dinner, and having dinner so late, and then sometimes taking birds, or oysters, or something for my supper after that, I've had the headache a great deal, and I ain't near so stout as I used to be, really, though I look so much fatter. You think I'll weigh as much as your prize porker now? Oh, Rasher, how can you? but it's bloat, it's mostly bloat. I know I am, I must be delicate, or why should I have such headaches, and such strange sensations in my diagram? Eat too much? My appetite never was poorer. Last night, I ordered the cook to fry me a sausage, privately, and bring it up at nine o'clock, for my supper. I hadn't had any for a long time, and I couldn't think of anything else that would relish. If my appetite wasn't poor, why should I crave sausage?

However, I don't mind my health so much; for I think I can stand it this winter, and next summer I shall expect you to take me off somewhere on a tour. Where are we going to live? Why, all over the house, I suppose. These things are too fine for use? Of course I don't expect you to pull off your boots in the parlors, nor lounge there after you're home from business, unless there's company. As you're so prejudiced against furnaces, there's a grate in the basement dining-room, and you can take your paper and go down there after the silver and China's cleared away. If you want to go to bed before the company's gone, you can go up the back stairs and get to our room. And where will I be? I'm sure you don't need me, when you're mostly reading the newspapers of evenings, anyhow; and, as you can't bear half the people that visit me, why, when you don't feel like seeing company, you can have a nice time all by yourself. You think parties, and operas, and late hours don't agree with you; but I'm sure they do with me; and of course you don't expect me to give 'em up on your account. No; but you wish the house wasn't so big, or had some little corner you could call home? Fie, Rasher, isn't the whole of it ours, and of course our home? I think you're real ungrateful not to be satisfied, after I've taken so much pains to make you comfortable. Our bedroom is just as splendid as any room in the house; there's lace on the bottom of the pillow-cases, and lace curtains lined with the sweetest pink silk, and a Severed China wash-basin, and all kinds of fixings; more'n you can use, or I either, for that matter; in fact, I don't know the names of half the things, nor what they're meant for; and I'm sure you ought to be contented with so much, and everything so nice; and now, my dear, while I think of it, let me caution you not to throw your coat on that counterpane when you take it off, and not to wear your dusty boots inside the chamber, for the carpet's a white ground, and will show the least bit of dirt; and to turn down the spread when you get into bed, so's your breath won't stain the edge of it; and I guess you might as well not meddle with the toilet-table and glass at all, but have a little mirror put up in the closet; for, you see, your great fingers would make sad work with them things on the table; and if you should knock that Cupid over and break it, you'd spoil the whole effect. "The fact is, Mrs. Rasher, the pen's too fine for the pig." Please don't make such unpleasant remarks, and make me feel unhappy the first night in the new house. I suppose it makes little difference how fast things get spoiled, as we'll have to have new furniture about once a year, if we wish to keep up appearances; so, if you want to sleep in your boots, sleep in 'em, for all I care. Come, let's go down to our first dinner. I've had the new plate put on, and the new porcelain. I took our coat-of-arms to the factory, and had porcelain manufactured with it on every piece. I told Thomas to put it all on to-night, same's if we had company. I want to get used to it, you see.

Bless me, Rasher! you liked to have poked your arm right through that lace drapery, getting into bed. Did you notice how surreptitious Thomas looked when he waited on us to-night? He made me feel uncomfortable. He thinks because he's been with the Greens and the Parkers he can turn up his nose at us. I wouldn't keep the fellow at all, polite as he seems to be, if it wasn't that I want to learn of him how to have things de Rigor, as they say about the ceremonies with the Prince of Wales. If I'd have thought it would have done any good to have asked him, I'd have hurried up my party when he was here. Do you know, Mrs. De Witt actually went to the ball. If we'd a made our fortune five years ago, we'd a been one of the old families by this time, and we might have been asked. What's that? You can't make a whistle out of a pig's tail? Well, who wants to? I'd be just as good as Mrs. De Witt, if I'd have begun a little earlier in life. But, as I was saying, I want to keep Thomas until after the party;

he'll be a perfect jewel of a help, and if there's any matters I'm in doubt about I can ask him. I ain't obliged to see his impertinence as long as it's policy to keep him, and I intend to get used enough to keeping a man-waiter against I let him go to know how to keep the next one in his proper place. For the land's sake, Rasher, you'll snore. all the lace off that pillow-case if you snore in that style. Ain't you even going to be allowed to snore in peace in your splendid residence? La, yes! as loud as a steam-engine if you want to; but do try and keep awake a little while, while I'm actually talking. The tailor's got the liveries all ready for Thomas and John; and to-morrow the new carriage is coming home. Have you seen it? Yes? And is the coat-of-arms sufficiently conspicuous? Day after to-morrow, if the weather's fine, will be an event in my life. I'll be handed into my own carriage, and have a footman standing on that little what-do-you-call-it there behind, and John a driving in a coat with six capes, and our family device upon the door. I shall make all the calls I can think of. Ha! but won't Mrs. De Witt be mad! They've been obliged to give up their carriage lately, and to see me in mine will make her frightfully envious; but she'll keep as pleasant as a basket of chips, and never let on. The next day I'll drive down to Stewart's to buy myself a dress for the party. I've often, in old times, when I went away from there in the sixpenny 'busses, envied the ladies, and the clerks carrying out their parcels, and putting them on the seats so killingly polite! I never expected, in those days, to ever be there myself with two servants in capes and bands around their hats, and a coat-of-arms on the door. What did you say? "Honor to whom honor is due." I may thank the rise in pork for my rise in life? I declare, Rasher, if you don't quit poking pork under my nose, you shall never have any more fried tender-line nor roast spare-rib so long as I have a table set in my house. Now don't get the nightmare to-night, and tear down my pink silk curtains about our ears. "That would—be getting—the wrong—pig—by the ear!" There he goes snoring off again with that hateful word hardly over his lips! Well, well, well! I may as well compose myself.

STRENGTH OF CHARACTER.—A few ideas of our own will save us from being too sensible to external impressions, as a light in our room makes lightning less blinding.

THE BLACK SHEEP.

BY MARION HARLAND.

CHAPTER I.

MRS. TYNDALE sat in her nursery, intently engaged in the embroidery of a child's dress. It was an elaborate piece of work, such as few mothers, with the cares of housekeeping and four children on their hands, can find time to wish for, much less attempt. But this was designed as a christening-dress for the babe in the cradle, upon whose rockers Mrs. Tyndale's ready foot was resting, and this very plump and pink specimen of juvenile humanity was the first girl that had ever been born to the Tyndale household. It was clearly an extraordinary case, demanding, in the proud mother's opinion, extraordinary effort on her part, and expense on that of the scarcely less fond and pleased papa.

The wee lady, wrapped in soft folds of linen and flannel, dreamed vague baby-visions, with her eyelids fast shut upon—we had almost said into—her fat cheeks, and Mrs. Tyndale, as she hummed a lullaby, and her fingers deftly threaded the mazes of her pattern, had her dreams also. Very bright they were—drawn by hope, and painted by love. "Her boys had never quite filled her heart;" she had discovered this long before this latest advent. "They are far more troublesome to train than girls, and so soon as they are safely through the diseases of infancy, and able to take care of themselves, amidst the dangers that beset incautious and adventurous lads, they must go out into the world; perhaps remove to distant States and countries; leaving the homestead desolate, and the parents as lonely as if they had never borne and brought up children—as they vainly hoped and prayed—to comfort and stay their declining years. Then, the anxieties that continually hang upon the mother's heart, knowing, as she does, into what scenes and temptations her boys must be thrown; doubting, as she cannot help doing, whether they all have strength to resist the allurements to ruin!" Mrs. Tyndale sighed, as she again turned to the sunny side of her picture; "the sweet companionship and confidence she was to hold with her daughter; the second youth which she was to enjoy in watching over the expanding heart and mind; the solace she would prove in the father's weary hours, and the mother's despondency and illness." Here she was constrained by her own imaginations to stoop over the cradle, and pull aside one corner of the worked lawn, that to the uninitiated would have seemed to threaten suffocation, to convince herself of the reality of her bliss, as she whispered with a smile and a tear, "It's mother's best blessing!"

A clatter of small boots on the stairs, and the door flew as wide open as the hinges would carry it.

"Mother, Allen's got my whip and won't give it back to me!" shouted the eldest hope, red with rage.

"And I say, mother, he has torn my new book terribly!" said Egbert, a delicate-looking boy of eight, with whom books were the only playthings of any value, "right through Jack the Giant-Killer, and the Story of the Lilliputians; the last half, too, mother, and I had not read it, either! It is too bad!" A gush of hot tears finished the sentence.

"Hush! do be quiet, boys!" begged Mrs. Tyndale, shaking the cradle, as the little mound of cambric and silk began to heave. "You will wake your sister! Where is Allen?"

"Down stairs; won't you make him give me my whip?" said Master Sterling, eagerly. And without waiting for an answer, he ran to the head of the steps: "Allen! Mother says, come up here—right away!"

"I said no such thing, Sterling!" called the mother, still endeavoring to hush the infant. But the uproar had wrought its effect. Sterling waited in the hall to laugh provokingly in his brother's face, as he unwillingly obeyed the summons, reported so authoritatively, and when the two entered the nursery, Mrs. Tyndale was in the act of raising the crying babe in her arms.

"You boys are the plague of my life!" she said, fretfully. "I would not have had her disturbed for all your whips and tops put together. (Sh-sh-sh!) This is just the way (bye-bye, that's mother's baby!) that you are going on the livelong day! It's all your fault, (hum-m-m!) Allen! I know it is. You are a constant worry!"

The baby's screams were hushed, and the pre-convicted Allen put upon his trial. He was a sorry picture, as he stood before his judge, confronted by his accusers. The elder sons were handsomer than the average of boys of their age, while Nature had made this one plain, as if to furnish a contrast to Sterling's bold, dark beauty, and Egbert's large hazel eyes and golden curls. Allen had sandy straight hair, a pug nose, small gray eyes, and a wide mouth—now distorted by the uneasy attempt at a smile, in homely, but apt phrase, denominated "the bad grin." His brother's address and manner had advised him that he was in disgrace, but he had pride enough to wish to conceal his apprehensions of punishment in the presence of those who, he knew, from past lessons, would exult in his discomfiture. So he fumbled at his buttons with his dirty fingers, and kicked the heel of one muddy boot against the toe of the other, all the while stealing furtive glances at his parent's lowering brow. No! he certainly was not a lovely object; but there was something forlorn in his aspect, something so pitiable in this unchildlike pretence of indifference, that the mother's heart should have grown compassionate at the sight. Mrs. Tyndale was not an unkind woman, but she was impatient—hasty in judgment and action.

"You naughty boy!" she began, angrily. "What is this I hear of you?"

An expansion of the "bad grin," more significant of fright than tears would have been, was the reply.

"Can't you speak?" shaking him by the arm. "What have you been doing to your brother's property?"

"Nothing; I haven't seen it!"

"Don't tell me a falsehood! Where is Sterling's whip?"

No answer.

"Do you mean to speak?"

This time, a cuff administered upon the right ear extorted a howl, in the midst of which, the words "On the bench" were distinguishable.

"Hush your noise! On what bench?"

"In the yard."

"Go get it, Sterling!" ordered the mother.

"Now, how dare you tear poor Egbert's book?" she pursued.

A sulky pout from the delinquent.

"His beautiful new book! before he had a chance to read it! What do you think I ought to do to you for such behavior?"

Allen had opened his mouth in denial or explanation, when the inquisition was interrupted by Sterling's return. With a sort of triumphant disappointment, he proclaimed that the whip was not on the bench, nor could he find it anywhere in the yard.

"You wicked boy!" ejaculated Mrs. Tyndale, boxing him energetically from side to side. "You naughty story-teller! Go down instantly and find it, or that is not a beginning to what you will get!"

Blinded by tears, and choking with sobs, the child groped his way down to the yard. The whip had fallen behind the seat, when he honestly believed that he had left it upon it, and in his bruised heart the instant suspicion arose that Sterling had purposely concealed it there. Egbert's complaint, too, he considered unfair in the extreme, since he must have understood that his brother had snatched at the book, rudely indeed, but more in fun than earnest. With all the strength of his soul, the boy hated them both as he returned to the chamber of injustice, bearing the unlucky toy.

"Now, are you not ashamed of having told such a vile falsehood?" demanded the mother.

"Where do you learn so much wickedness? Not of your brothers, for I never knew either of them to lie and steal. If it were not that I have your sister on my lap, I would feel it my duty to give you the most severe whipping you ever had. You are growing worse and worse every day. I expect nothing better of you than that you will come to the gallows before you are twenty-one. Ask your brother's pardon, and Egbert's too, for treating them as you have done!"

A look of sullen malignity spoke in the gray eyes, and every feature swelled with the stubborn resolve not to obey the unreasonable command. A short but hot contest resulted in the housemaid and cook being summoned to bear the kicking, screaming boy to the garret, where he was locked up. His yells and thumpings against the door, although imperfectly heard in the remote nursery, were yet distinct enough to keep up his mother's irritation. The baby being almost asleep again, she could not, of course, resign her for a minute even to the nurse; so the latter functionary was dispatched to convey the prisoner's sentence to him. The noise within ceased, as the girl struck smartly on the door.

"Master Allen, your ma says you are to stay in here, and have nothin' but dry bread and water to eat, till you axes your brothers' parding; and if you don't stop your racket, she's comin' up here with your pa's horsewhip, and know the reason why, sure's your name is Allen."

"I don't care if she does!" vociferated the boy; "and you are a cross, ugly old thing!"

Which message being duly repeated, with emphasis, to Mrs. Tyndale, she concluded that "he was best off where he was, and would probably come to his senses when he grew hungry." So she resumed her needle and her castle-building.

"Where is Allen?" inquired Mr. Tyndale, at dinner-time.

A cloud of vexation passed over his wife's sunny face.

"Oh, there has been no end to the worry I have had with that boy this morning! He stole Sterling's whip, and tore Egbert's book; waked up Evelyn; told me half a dozen falsehoods; and when I punished him, became so outrageous that I had him shut up in the garret, where he must remain until he is conquered."

"A troublesome child!" groaned the father. "I do not know what is to be done with him, if he goes on in this way. He has already caused us more anxiety than all the rest of our children. I am glad that you were so firm with him. I fear sometimes that you are wearied out before he is subdued, or allow your feelings to overcome your reason before the proper degree of submission is gained; he is so obstinate. Nothing is more injurious to a child than to come off victorious in a battle with his parent. If you raise an issue, you must carry your point, at all hazards."

A wise saw, Mr. Tyndale! most impressively delivered over your roast beef! a good seed dropped into the fertile minds of Masters Sterling and Egbert, who digest your counsels with the dinner so acceptable to appetites sharpened by hard play in the open air! Let us look in upon the doughty prisoner, the seditious member at whom the family artillery is to-day aimed. He has cried himself to sleep—the boon Nature mercifully accords to children when exhausted by emotions too powerful for their weak frames; he lies on the floor directly beneath the sky-light—the only window in the room. It is a cool day, or the atmosphere would be stifling. As it is, there is a close, tomb-like feeling about the place; a chill which must strike painfully upon the relaxed limbs and weary lungs. True, there is abundant store of blankets piled in yonder corner; but what boy six years old would have the prudence to bethink himself of such protection during the reaction succeeding intense excitement?

Allen's entrance into the world was made in circumstances most unpropitious to his future happiness. "I am tired of boys!" was the half bitter exclamation with which Mrs. Tyndale received the intelligence that she had a third son, and her husband sympathized in her disappointment. Sterling was his favorite, as the fragile, beautiful Egbert was his mother's pet and pride. Only a daughter was now needed to set, as it were, a keystone in the family arch. For the new-comer there was no place prepared, no welcome ready. His lack of personal charms, added to a disposition which was, or seemed to his parents to be, particularly difficult of control; the alternate spells of shyness and violence that taxed their patience and temper as he grew older, all these combined to wean his natural protectors from him far more than they would have confessed, even to themselves. Sterling's frank grace and openness of speech, and Egbert's gentle, affectionate demeanor were naturally more to be admired and loved than the uncouth ways of "the little bear," the name by which he passed in the family. And, indeed, to one who had seen him sitting on his cricket in the corner of the nursery on a winter evening, sucking his thumb and peering through the bristly hair overhanging his forehead at the merry group of children at play around the fire, this epithet would have been most readily adopted towards the neglected boy.

"Master Allen! Master Allen!" called a shrill voice at the opening door.

It was the maid, with a slice of bread and a cup of water. Partially aroused by her clamor, Allen raised himself to his elbow, and looked at her with his red eyes; a gaze she was excusable for construing into a ferocious glare, when it was, in truth, but the bewildered stare of a half-asleep child.

"Here's your dinner!" giggled the girl, whose consideration for the disgraced could not be expected to exceed that of her mistress. "And your ma says is you 'pentant yet?"

"What?" queried the wondering boy.

"Is you ready to ax your pretty brothers' parding?"—with a nettling stress upon the adjective never applied to himself but in derision.

"You go about your business!" retorted he, savagely, sinking back to the floor.

To do Mrs. Tyndale justice, it was her intention to visit the guard-room in person when dinner was over. She was actually on her way thither, with the prisoner's rations in her hand. When she passed the nursery, the baby set up an imploring cry, and she recollected, with keen self-reproach, that the darling must be very hungry. The convenient nurse was again appointed her deputy, without a misgiving that the food and message would not be properly delivered.

"I will go myself, by and by," she said, mentally, when the report of the interview was rendered. "I am not anxious for another scene like that of the morning. I will give him time."

Fortune favored procrastination she thought compassionate, when it was purely selfish. A succession of visitors occupied time and thoughts until her husband came home to hurry tea, that he might keep an appointment for the evening. She absolutely forgot the child until the meal was concluded; nor did the preoccupied father ask a single question touching the case which had opened within him such a fountain of profound thought and sage sayings a few hours before.

Most of the afternoon had worn away very heavily to poor little Allen. He was as stout of courage as of body, therefore the loneliness and silence of the attic did not frighten him. He had been there often before; but this fact, while it took from the gloomy room the terror of strangeness, had also made him acquainted with its contents, worn out its amusements. Excepting some always locked chests, he had explored every corner, examined every article of rubbish there heaped away. There were old books; but, after he had looked at their pictures, he needed them no longer, for our hero was (we are aware that we ought to blush in confessing it) "a dunce!"—we state it upon the authority of his mother and his teacher. Did they not bring incontestable evidence of this shameful truth when they represented that, although six years and two months old, he could just read in words of two syllables; that Primers and Readers were still dog-eared, and spelled over, and halted at by him, whereas "dear Egbert" at the same age was studying Grammar, Arithmetic, Geography, and Natural Philosophy? Was there the least hope that a boy so stupid, so lost to ambition would ever be President? or a probability that he might, some day, even be a member of Congress? Smile, if you will, incredulous reader, at this early despair of attaining honors so easily procurable; but six years thrown away, in our fast country, is a tremendous loss!

"No! he never will be fit for anything higher than a business man, a mercantile drudge!" mourned Mrs. Tyndale. And her husband, albeit a business man himself, and highly esteemed by his fellow-citizens for his talent and energy, echoed instead of resenting his wife's sigh, and pondered the discouraging decision for some moments in silence before stating, as a comforting offset, that "the other boys had brains enough, at any rate."

But to return to the dismal upper chamber. The incarcerated, although put there for the express convenience of thinking over and repenting of his misdeeds, soon cast such thoughts behind him; and, after his wrath had expended itself in devising impracticable means of revenging himself upon the brothers he was learning to regard as natural enemies, looked about him for some means of killing time. After long search, this came to light in the shape of a bit of charcoal, conveyed thither by some happy accident. The walls were white and smooth; and, without a suspicion of unpleasant consequences, or that he was committing a trespass, he dragged a box to the side of the room, mounted upon it, that he might have a more extensive field for his labors by beginning higher up, and set about his work. For a while, he sketched aimlessly; animals with very stiff legs and bulky bodies, and houses all doors and windows, approached by men as tall as the buildings they made feint of entering; yet he handled the pencil less awkwardly than he did most other things, and quite as well as either Sterling or Egbert would have done. At length, a bright thought twinkled in his eyes. Selecting a new spot, a broad, unsullied surface, he drew more slowly and carefully. First appeared a tolerably graphic outline of a frantic female, her skirts flying back and her cap half off. One hand brandished a rod of terrific dimensions, the other clutched something which presently grew into the similitude of a kicking boy, poised in air by the hand aforesaid. When this was completed, the artist withdrew to the centre of the apartment, and sat down upon the floor to admire his performance. A smile of intense satisfaction, a grin of supreme complacency lighted his heavy face. He clapped his hands and struck his heels together in ecstasy. "I tell you, he's a-getting it, sure and strong!" he chuckled. And he rolled over and over in the height of his merriment.

Poor fellow! experience had fitted him to judge of the accuracy of such representations. But something was yet wanting. Although no book-worm, as we have said, he remembered that to every picture was generally appended a description of the same. Writing was not easy work; but, with equal determination, if with less pleasure than he had evinced in the former part of his task, he remounted the box, and went at it again. Cool though it was, he was obliged to wipe his face with his sleeve several times before the inscription was finished. Thus it stood when, with a sigh of relief, he finally retired to his post of observation :—

“MISSES TYNDALE WHIPEN OF HUR NORTY SUN ALLEN.”

His delight and the glow of composition had time to cool before the tantalizing tea-bell brought to his mind the recollection of his meagre dinner, and the consciousness that his present appetite was very clamorous.

“I wonder if they have biscuits for tea!” he said to himself. “I’ll be bound that greedy Sterling will eat my share and his, too; and it will be just like mamma to give Egbert the piece of cake that I ought to have!” The reflection was too harrowing. He dashed himself down upon the floor, and cried bitterly: “I wish I was drowned! I wish I could kill myself! Everybody loves them, and everybody hates me!”

This childish burst of grief was of short duration; but his heart ached and heaved all the same as he lay there looking up at the darkening skylight, and wondering if the God he had been told was so good made all beautiful people to be loved and petted, and all ugly ones to be despised and abused. Such was his train of thought when the door was unlocked, and his mother came in, bearing a light.

“Well, Allen,” she began, in a tone cold, but not unkind, “I hope—what is all this?”—as the new edition of “Charcoal Sketches” met her sight.

One moment’s reflection would have convinced her that the child was guiltless of intentional disrespect to herself or injury to her walls, or his offence would not have been blazoned where its instant discovery was sure; a second thought would have led her to note the talent manifested in the rude drawing, and to smile at the hieroglyphics underneath; but her wrath stayed not for first or second thought. To the terrified boy it was as if a whirlwind swept over him. He neither breathed nor thought until he found himself sobbing in the dark, in his little bed, his body smarting, a tempest of outraged feeling in his soul.

CHAPTER II.

“FIVE boys, those of yours, Mr. Tyndale!” remarked a gentleman, two years after the scene above described. “What are their ages?”

“The eldest is eleven, the other nearly ten,” was the reply, uttered in a gratified tone. “Boys, come and speak to Mr. Hamilton.”

Egbert, being near the fire, by which the gentlemen were sitting, spoke first, while Sterling advanced from the further corner of the counting-room.

“How hot your skin is, my little fellow!” said Mr. Hamilton, retaining the hand of the latter. “I should say that you have a fever, or are much heated by exercise.”

“Have you been running, or over-exerting yourself in any way?” asked the father.

“No, sir; Egbert and I walked down town together.”

“His pulse is quick,” pursued Mr. Tyndale to his friend; “but it may be nothing. You feel quite well, do you not, my son?”

“Yes, sir; that is to say, pretty well. I have a slight headache, and have taken a little cold. It is not worth speaking of,” rejoined the boy, who prided himself upon his manliness of speech and behavior; and thought sickness a mark of weakness he should be ashamed to avow.

His head continued to ache, and the sore throat he had alluded to as “a little cold” grew worse as evening came on. He could eat no supper, and pleaded fatigue as an excuse for retiring early. By morning, the power of concealment was gone, and the rapid progress of the disease revealed its true nature; scarlet fever in its most alarming form. The other children were immediately excluded from the sick chamber. The little Evelyn was guarded most carefully; being removed to a distant part of the house, an apartment the mother never visited without previous ablutions and a thorough change of clothing. Allen’s sleeping-place was a large closet, adjoining his parents’ room, but Egbert was in the habit of sharing the bed of his elder brother. Ere noon of the following day, the dread malady attacked him also; and in two days, Allen was added to the sick list. Sterling’s case was, at the first, regarded as most dangerous, but his constitution battled nobly with the assailant. The disease ran its course with fearful rapidity, and left the boy weaker than an infant—just alive, and that was all. The utmost assiduity of nursing would be required to preserve even this feeble spark of existence. The trembling hope of his recovery was insufficient to cheer the hearts on which additional burdens were laid every hour. Egbert’s illness assumed a more unfavorable type, as his brother improved. To the parents, the amendment of the latter was but a transfer of anxiety.

Allen's attack was mildest of all. Indeed, at no period of his sickness was his condition considered critical, and on this account, perhaps, he was consigned to the care of the professional nurse, who had been hired to assist Mrs. Tyndale. She was skilful in her business, and a humane woman, treating the sick boy as kindly as if he had been of her own kindred; but she was a stranger, and his natural shyness had increased with his years. Made timid and babyish by suffering, he longed for the mother, who had showed so little of maternal fondness for him. His heart—for he had one, deep and tender, although no one suspected it—yearned to have her near him, were it but for one hour in the twenty-four; to lay his aching head upon her bosom, and have her call him by but one of the pet names he could overhear her lavish upon his brothers. He knew, too, that he was very sick, and that people often die after severe illness; and in the dark night his flesh crept with fear, his heart seemed turning to ice, at the thought that he might not live, but be carried from his bed to the grave; never, never again to look upon the bright world, or the faces of his parents. Then came the awful question of what was to follow death; the natural shiver of the human soul on the confines of eternity. But he spoke of none of these things. Reserve had been the lesson of his life, and there was nothing now to win him to a different course.

"A patienter child I never saw, ma'am," said the nurse, as Mrs. Tyndale stepped in for a moment on her way to her daughter's room.

"I am glad to hear such a good account of you, my son;" and she laid her hand—hot and tremulous, he felt it was—upon his brow. "I hope you will be well, soon. Good-night, my dear."

As she stooped to kiss him—an act she often forgot to perform—a tear fell upon his face. He did not brush it away after she had gone out. He was too happy to feel it lying there, and to think that she shed it through love and pity for him. How pale and thin she looked! yet, in his eyes, how beautiful! In spite of her injustice and non-appreciation of himself, he had always cherished a sort of admiring worship for his mother. She was in the habit of saying that he was "not a sentimental child," and really believed him deficient in natural affection. So well had she read the secrets of the young spirit committed to her care!

"If I get well, and I hope I shall," he mused, "I will try hard, oh, so much harder than I have ever done before, to be a good boy! Who knows but she would love me almost as well as she does Egbert, if I were not so wicked? She always says that she would; that she scolds at me, and punishes me, not because I am not smart and pretty, but because I am bad. I will be good!"

Voices in the outer room directed his attention to the open door, connecting his chamber with his mother's. The nurse had gone down for her supper, and he was free to observe all that passed. His father and the doctor had just entered from the apartment occupied by the older boys. Neither seemed to give a thought to Allen's vicinity.

"You can call in a consulting physician, if you desire it," said the doctor. "I wish, however, that I could encourage you to hope for a different decision from any one familiar with such cases. There is—you should know it, my dear sir—as little doubt as to the symptoms, as hope of the result."

"I have confidence in your judgment and skill, doctor," answered Mr. Tyndale, in a voice husky with emotion. "My poor wife will feel this most keenly. God help her!" and he bowed his head upon the tall back of a chair near by.

There was a silence of some minutes, during which, Allen, alarmed at he knew not what—for the conversation he had heard conveyed a very vague idea of danger and sorrow—lay quaking, and wondering what fearful thing was about to happen.

"You will break it to her; I cannot!" said Mr. Tyndale, hoarsely, as a hand was laid upon the lock of the entry door. So saying, he changed his position to one in the shadowed part of the room.

Mrs. Tyndale was dressed for her usual vigil with her sons, and her countenance wore a more cheerful look than it had done an hour before.

The doctor interpreted the cause of the change. "Your babe is quite well, I trust, my dear madam?" he said.

"Very well," was the response, accompanied by the ghost of a smile. "I am thankful that this is so."

"You have every reason to believe that she will escape entirely," continued the physician. "This consideration should, of itself, console you in the midst of present trials, and"—pausing to prepare her for the solemn change of theme—"for the greater sorrows that may yet be in reserve for you."

"Doctor," ejaculated Mrs. Tyndale, turning quickly upon him, "are my boys worse? are they—" She could not pronounce the fatal word.

"Be calm, dear madam! By the Divine blessing, Sterling will recover, I hope."

"Do you mean?"—her voice strangely strained—"do you mean to intimate that Egbert will not?"

"I will not conceal from you, Mrs. Tyndale, that there is no probability, scarcely a chance that he will ever rally."

The wretched mother started forward in the direction of her boy's chamber, but fell fainting in her husband's arms. In the confusion that ensued, the gentlemen did not observe the figure, dimly visible in the closet beyond—the child who sat up in bed, his lips white, eyes fixed with terror, and hands clenched convulsively upon the sheet. Mrs. Tyndale's swoon was short. With returning consciousness, came the full sense of her misery. Her first effort was to throw herself upon her knees at the physician's feet, and supplicate him to save her child.

"The Almighty alone can preserve the life He has given," he said, mournfully and impressively, as he raised her.

"But, doctor, surely you can do something for my darling, my best-beloved boy! I cannot see him die! he must not! he is so beautiful! so good! He is my pride, doctor—the noblest boy mother ever had, and I will not give him up! I say, I will not!"

"My love!" Her husband drew her to his arms, and spoke firmly: "No human help will avail for him now. Compose yourself, for my sake, and for the sake of the dear children you will still have left to you."

"Left to me!" raved the frenzied woman. "Why should he be the one taken? *If it were Allen, I could bear it! I would not murmur at the blow; but not this! not this!"

"Hush!" said the physician, with involuntary sternness, and a startled glance at the door.

Allen saw him shut him in, and knew and saw nothing more for days together.

It was a bright winter morning when he awoke. He could see that the sun was shining, although the one window of his room was darkened. His head was clear, his body free from pain, and he remained quiet, recalling incident and remark, until the whole of the dreadful scene, which had nearly cost him his life, came back to him. Strangely enough, it did not trouble him very much. A callousness seemed to be upon his heart: perfect indifference to pervade his being. His prominent emotion was an idle curiosity to learn what had happened during his slumber.

"Why, he is sensible!" said the nurse, as she came to the bedside with the doctor.

"Of course he is!" he rejoined. "What else did you expect?" But he, too, appeared to be as surprised as pleased. "Well, my man!"—taking the thin hand in his—"you are getting on bravely."

"Is Egbert dead yet, doctor?" interrupted Allen. His voice was unsteady, but only with weakness.

"Did you ever?" exclaimed the nurse.

The doctor was perplexed. The fixed look of the boy, and his apparent want of feeling were so unusual in the circumstances, that he was ready to think his intellect disordered by the malady through which he had passed.

"Egbert is better, my poor fellow," he said. "You must not think or talk about him or anybody else just now. When you are stronger, I will answer all your questions."

A step was heard in the other room.

"There is mamma!" said Allen, in the same languid tone. "Call her in, please!"

But, at the sound of their voices, she entered, unsummoned, and before either physician or nurse could move to caution or prepare her for a repetition of the unfortunate question. The doctor indeed met her at the foot of the bed, and informed her of the favorable signs manifest in the patient, adding his injunction of silence and repose. Allen gazed earnestly at the face bent above his pillow. It was very white and sorrowful—had such a ghastly look that it reminded him of his dead aunt's, as she lay in the coffin, the only corpse he had ever seen. He felt sincere pity for her, and, to his childish perceptions, there was no reason why he should not tell her so.

"I am sorry for you, mamma!" he said, simply.

Her quick look of inquiry at the attendants was answered by a negative shake of the head.

"There, there, honey!" interposed the old woman; "you must not talk now!"

"I don't want to talk!" he said, wearily, turning his cheek to the pillow. "I just wanted mamma to know that I was sorry for her, because Egbert is dead."

With a stifled cry of anguish—a recoil from the bedside as if stabbed to the heart—a stare of horror and amazement at himself, which Allen mistook for angry aversion, the mother hurried from the room. The nurse followed her to offer what aid and comfort she could supply.

"Poor mamma!" sighed the boy, calmly as he had before spoken. "Doctor, will you tell her, some time when she can listen, that I am very sorry it was not me that died!"

The doctor was a prudent and tender-hearted man, and in obedience to the dictates of both these qualities, he never repeated to the sorely smitten parent an observation that might aggravate her sufferings. But her heart, too, was soft just then. It may have been that this single sentence, so eloquent in its humility and love, would have touched the blind mother with remorse; awakened the latent affection for one who, up to this time, had been to her a child in little else than name. More thickly yet was the dust of years to gather upon the stone that rested above that fountain—a seal which, in most mothers' hearts, the first stroke of baby-fingers suffices to break, never again to bar the rush of the living waters.

MRS. WARD'S VISIT TO THE PRINCE.

BY MARY W. JANVRIN, AUTHOR OF "THE FOREIGN COUNT," "AUNT SABRINA'S DREAM," "TATTLEBERRIES OF TATTLETOWN," "PEACE," ETC. ETC.

WALL, now, Miss Pettengill, I s'pose you've come over to hear about my seein' the Prince! I'm proper glad to see you! How d'ye do? and how 's the folks to your house? I'm kinder tuckered out myself with my visit down to Bostin; sech a jaunt's consid'able at my time of life. But do set down in this rockin'-cheer, and draw out your knittin'; while I'll be at leasure in a minnit. I jest want to mould out these apple-dumplin's for dinner. Arty, he's dreadful fond of dumplin's, and there's a powerful sight of apples this year.

There! Now I'll jest set the heel of this sock, and tell you about my visit. You see, Miss Pettengill, I'd been readin' all about the great doin's in the Statesman, and last week, a Tuesday mornin', I was over to son 'Bijah's, and found he was a-goin' down to Bostin Wednesday to buy up his winter goods, and to see the Prince, too—goin' to kill two birds with one stone, you know; so, sez I, "Now, 'Bijah, I've been wantin' to go down to see niece Ruthy Ann"—she's settled there, married to Mr. Wetherell, a rale fust-rate man, too—"and I've a great mind to jest start off with you, and see the great sight for once myself." Wall, upon that, Martha, she j'ined in, and 'Bijah said p'raps I'd better improve the chance. So I jest made up my mind on the spot, and purty soon started off for home to tell Arty how to look after things while I was gone. I don't go abroad very often, you know, Miss Pettengill, and sech an undertakin's consid'able.

Wall, Arty, he was as glad as the rest to hev me go; so I jest laid out my alpaca dress and cape to wear, and packed my new black silk and my best caps into a bandbox; and Wednesday morning, bright and early, Arty kerried us over to the Concord depot to ketch the fast train for Bostin. P'raps you'll think it's kinder foolish for an old woman like me to be runnin' arter shows and sech; but, somehow, from the fust of it, readin' about the millintary and the great doin's, I was as curis as enny young gal. Besides, arter all, it's something to see a real live young man that's goin' to be King of England arter his mother Victory's done wearing the crown; and you can tell on it to your children and your children's children all the rest of your life. So, sez I to Arty and 'Bijah, as we driv along to the depot, "'All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy,' and a little vacancy does a body good once in a while." And the boys agreed with me. So we sot out; and by noontime, when we got down to Larrence, I was purty tired with the long ride from Bosc'wine, and while we sot there waitin' for the train from the eastward I eat the cookies and cold tongue Martha had put up for me, and 'twas half arter two afore we got into Bostin. I declare, Miss Pettengill, I hadn't the faintest idee that them railroad keers went along at sech a tearin' rate, and I asked 'Bijah if it wa'n't suthin' oncommon for 'em to travel so fast, and if we wa'n't on the express; but he said we was a little late, that's all, and orter get in on time. Thinks I to myself, "I shouldn't wonder if we all were in etarnity, instead of time, if we go on at this rate;" but I didn't say ennything, though I sot and trembled—for 'Bijah, he thinks I'm narvous like. Wall, we rattled along, and without enny accidence, only every once in awhile, when they come near a town, the man that stood on the platform would keep screwin' round the iron wheel that holds the cars together, and it allers gin me a start, for the first time they done it arter we left Bosc'-wine I thought suthin' had broke, and asked 'Bijah. "But," sez he, "they're only breakin' up, mother. Don't be onaisy!" And that scairt me dreadfully; for thinks I, "If we are goin' to break up, 'Bijah and the rest take it pretty cool, ennyhow." But Bijah, he explained what it meant, and so I felt easier afterwards, though I couldn't seem to get wholly over the startled like feelin'. Jest afore we got into Bostin, 'Bijah, he pulled my sleeve, and, pintin' out of the keer winder, on the left hand side, sez he, "There, mother, there's Bunker Hill Monument!" "La, suz!" sez I, "du tell if that great tall stone chimbley marks the spot where the Revolutioners fit, and licked the red coats? I hope they'll take this young man, the Prince, out there to see it!" But 'Bijah, he kinder thought 'twouldn't be jest perlite to rake up old scores when the young man come over on a social visit; and said he didn't think they'd do it. Ennyhow, though he couldn't a-helped seein' the moniment, taller than three or four meetin'-us steeples, one top of another, when he rid over the Eastern Railroad, on his way to Portland, when he went home.

Wall, it was half arter two, I should say, when we got into the great Bostin depot, all under kiver; and when 'Bijah and I got out onto the platform, you'd a-thought for sartin, it was the Tower of Babel or Bedlam broke loose; sech a crowd of men standin' behind a railin', and beckonin' to you all ter once! It 'pears that every one on 'em wanted us to ride in his kerridge; but 'Bijah, he passed 'em all by as if they'd been so many blackbirds, and when we got to the edge of the depot, he just beckoned to one on 'em who'd been the civil-est, and told him he wanted him to kerry me up to Chester Park, and gin him the number of the house where I was to go to. "It's to Mister Cyrus Wetherell's," sez I; "mebbe you know him? He's a great dealer in furnitur, and married my niece Ruthy Ann!" But he jest looked kinder pleased like, cos I was goin' to ride with him, I expect; and 'Bijah, he helped me in, and put in my handbox—I'd kept a purty sharp lookout for that, I tell ye, Miss Pettengill—and sed he'd got to make the most of the rest of the day in buyin' goods, for the stores wouldn't be open next day; and he would be up to Ruthy Ann's to tea; so I was driv off. I do declare, Miss Pettengill, if I didn't feel kinder scairy, a-sittin there all alone in that splendifer kerridge, and ridin' through the streets, all lined with great stores and crowded with people; but the driver, he knowed the way; for bymeby, arter turnin' ever so many corners, and bein' nearly run into by the horse keers (they hev railroads that go by horses right in the middle of the roads, in Bostin), we come to Ruthy Ann's house—a great, tall, brick one, four stories high—and the driver got down and run up a high pair of steps, and pulled a little silver handle to the door bell, and then he come back and helped me out, and I went in. A great, tall, Irish feller come to the door, and sez I, "Here! you jest take my handbox, and then tell Miss Wetherell her Aunt Sophrony has come from Bosc'-wine!" Jest that minnit, Ruthy Ann, she come runnin' down as spry and peart as a gal of sixteen; and sez she, a-shakin' my hand, "Why, aunt, how do you do? Come right up stairs! I'm very glad to see you; but you're the last parson I should a-thought of seein'!" "I knowed so," sez I, "but I come down with 'Bijah to see the Prince. Your old Aunt Sophrony is gettin' curis as a young gal, Ruthy!" Wall, Ruthy, she smiled, and sed she was proper glad I'd come; the city was full of strangers; and arter she'd rung a bell, and told the sarvant to bring me up a lunch; for they'd jest got up from dinner, sez she, "Aunt, if you wa'n't so tired, I should ask you to go down to Tremont Street, and see the Prince on his 'rival—for he's comin' into town this arternoon—but mebbe you'd prefer to take a nap?" "The Lor!" sez I, "I ain't a bit tuckered out, Ruthy, though it's a right good long ride down from Bosc'-wine—and I never had the habit of napping day-times; it seems to me terrible shiftless like to sleep time away, when the sun is shinin' clear in the canopy—so I'll jest smart up a bit, and go out with you." Ruthy didn't say ennything about me changin' my gown, but seein' she had on a nice black watered silk, I jest put on mine, and then we sot out; and, arter ridin' a mild or two in one of them street railroad keers, we got out into a street Ruthy called Tremont, where she said we should hev to wait an hour or more, before the Prince came past with the millintary; for you see they'd been and got up a percession to meet him at the depot, and wait upon him down to the tavern where he stopped. The land sakes! Miss Pettengill, if ever I see sech a lot of people together in all my born days; and Ruthy Ann sed 'twa'n't the day of the celebration neither, but the next day would beat anything I ever see.

Wall, bymeby, when the folks were thicker in the streets and on the sidewalks, and crowded to every winder, and jammed on every step thicker 'n huckleberries in a puddin', and we 'd waited till little arter five o'clock, what should we hear but some marshall music, and then, by the way everybody crowded up and looked airnest, we knew he was a-comin'. So I jest sot my glasses true on the bridge of my nose, and looked with the best of 'em; and, sure enough, a great lot of soldiers a-horseback come prancin' along; and then, close a-follerin', there was two or three kerridges, for all the world like great double shays turned down afore and behind, and in the fust one, along with three men, sot a young lad about as old as my Arty, a-bowin', and smilin', and a-touchin' his hat with one hand while he held a little jiminy cane, about as big round as a stick of peppermint candy, up to his mouth with t'other. He had on a black suit and kinder yaller kid gloves; and was a proper lookin' youth enough, not handsome, but from fair to middlin', and rale amiable lookin'.

While I was a-lookin', and the folks were crowdin' and pushin' like a flock of sheep, a rafe tall, perlite, handsome feller in the crowd kinder took holt of my arm, and sez, "If you 'd stand up here, madam, mebbe you 'd see better!" So I sez, "I'm shure I'm much obleeged to you, mister; but I hope I ain't puttin' you out?" And sez he, a bowing, "O no, indeed! stan' rite up here in my place, ma'am!" and then he slipped away, and give me his place on the meetin'-us steps. So I had a good sight of the Prince; and, arter the percession had passed by, I turned to thank the young feller agin, but he wa'n't nowhare to be seen; and I told Ruthy Ann I was sorry he was so modest like; but just then I went to put my hand into my pocket to get my handkercher—it was a bran new hemstitched one, Martha, 'Bijah's wife, had gin me; and lo! and behold that was gone, and my puss too! "The land sakes!" sez I, "Ruthy, I've lost my puss and handkercher as sure as you're born! If I could see that perlite feller that helped me onto the steps, mebbe he'd help me sarch for it; for I can't hev dropped it fur off!" Then Ruthy spoke up, and sez she, "Aunty, I'm sorry for you, but I'm afraid your perlite feller was a rogue; a pickpocket! How much money did you have, Aunty?" "Wall," sez I, "I only had about ten and six, for I was lucky enough to take out all my bills, and put 'em inter my bandbox, to your house, and I only took enough to buy a nice new neckerchief for Arty. I wanted to get it at some store when we went back. But you don't think that feller could a-been such a deceiver?" sez I, for I felt real kinder hurt like. "I hav'n't the least doubt of it," sez Ruthy. "But don't worry about it! I'll make you a present of another kerchief. It was fortinit your pocket-book was 'n't well filled. He probably took it when he helped you up the steps of Park Street Church." "Wall," says I, "if I could set my eyes on him for about two minnits, I'd larn him how to break the commandments rite under the very droppin's of the sanctuary! My son 'Bijah shall complain of him to the perlice!" But Ruthy said it was too late to do ennything about it; and, as she insisted on my goin' with her to a great store, where I picked out a rale handsome neckerchief, and she paid for it, I didn't say enny more about it; and then we went home.

They had tea quite late; and Ruthy's husband, Mister Wetherell, come home, and was proper glad to see me; and 'Bijah, he 'd finished his buyin', and he come in; and then we all went down into the dinin'-room. 'Twould do your eyes good, Miss Pettengill, to see the chany, and cut glass, and silver forks, and teapot, and water-pot, and creamer, that stood on Ruthy Ann Wetherell's table! I declare! the President could'n't set at a handsomer spread table, nor live in a house filled with handsomer furnitur' and things. I told Ruthy that her lines was cast in pleasant places; and she don't seem a bit proud, nor lifted up, as some do when they've made out well in the world. Ruthy allers was an amible gal, and desaves everything in the shape of good fortin that's happened to her.

I see Georgyanny for the fust time at supper; she's Ruthy's only darter, you know, and I hadn't looked on her pretty face sence she used to come up here to spend her summer vacations on the farm, a leetle thing. But la, suz! she's a young lady, now, and as purty spoken and well-mannered as she is handsome; for she's a picter to look at. While we all sot a-eatin' supper, Georgyanny's father, he spoke up, and sez he, "Wall, aunt, the great question with the ladies seems to be, 'Who will the Prince dance with at the ball to-morrow night?' It would be quite a proud event in my Georgy's life if she should be one of the honored pardners; don't you think so?" "Wall, no, Mister Wetherell," sez I, "I can't say as, if 'twas me, I should think so much of the honor as I should of the scarcity of the thing. If princes were as common as other folks, 'twouldn't be ennything to dance with 'em; but they're only born once in a great while, and that's what makes people run arter 'em so. Though, as you say, it is something, and 'll do to tell on to your children; and I hope you will have it to tell to your'n, Georgyanny," sed I to her. And, upon that, you never see ennybody blush up so as the gal did. You'd a thought I'd a-sed something out of the way.

Arter breakfast the next mornin', Ruthy Ann took me one side, and told me that Georgy was jest promised to a nice young man who'd been head clark with her father, and was goin' to be pardner one of these days; and that she was a-goin' to the Prince's ball that night with him; and she asked me if I didn't want to see her gown she was going to wear. So we went up to Georgy's room, and there, spread out on the lounge, was the handsomest dress I ever laid eyes on! The land! I can't purtend to tell you how 'twas made, only that 'twas of sattin and white lace, and all trimmed off with puffs and ruffles, and spotted with little gold flowers; and the waist was made low in the neck, with short sleeves; and there was a lace cape all trimmed off with little gold fligree. You see, everything of wimmen's clothes now is trimmed off with this gold stuff; and they all look like troopers in full regimentals. But if you could a-seen Georgyanny when she 'was dressed that evenin', you'd a-sed she looked good enough to eat. "Wall, Georgyanny," sed I, arter I'd seen her gown, "I expect, for sartain, you'll dance with the Prince arter this! You orter, arter goin' to all this expense! I should say 'twas extravagant to spend so much money on a single gown, if 'twa'n't that sech a thing only happens once in a life-time!" "La, aunty!" sez she, "you're as much of an admirer of royalty as myself, else you wouldn't hev come 'way down from New Hampshire to see him." "O no, child!" I answered back, "my Bible sez, 'Put not your trust in princes;' so you see I never should git in danger of thinkin' too much of 'em; though, the truth is, I do believe Queen Victory, this young man's mother, is a rale good woman; and I kinder wanted to see her oldest son, and make up my mind if he's goin' to rule the kingdom equal to her." "I tell you what, Ruthy Ann," sez I, as soon as we were alone together, "I should jest like, of all things, to go to see this young Albert Ed'ard at the tavern where he's stoppin' and have a little private talk with him, and ask him about his mother, and the way she's brought up her family to hum. He don't look a bit proud like, and I guess he'd be rale sociable." "It never would do in the world, Aunty!" sez she. "He'll be so busy all the time, that there'll be no chance to find him; but I'll tell you who we can call on, and it'll be better: the old Revolutioner that's in the city, at the Adams House. He's a hundred and four years old, and as smart as ennybody; and it'll be rale interestin' to hear him tell about the Battle of Bunker Hill, for he fit in it aginst this very Prince's people. Mister Wetherill sez he'd rather shake the old veteran's hand, than dine with the hull party at the Revere House." "Wall, Ruthy, your husband has got the right sperrit," answered I, "and I should be proper glad to see the old gentleman." But yet, all the time, Miss Pettengill, I'd kinder got my mind sot on seein' the Prince and hevin' a leetle talk with him, if 'twas a possible thing; though I thought I wouldn't say enny more about it then. "Then, arter we've seen the millintary parade, and the percession, we'll call on the old veteran!" sed Ruthy. "Mister Wetherell thinks we'd better not git inter the crowd on the Common (that's where the parade was), for fear we shall git crushed." "La," sez I, "I ain't a mite afeard but I ken hold my own, and 'Bijah, he can keep off the pickpockets. Howsomever, I sha'n't take ennything in my pocket to-day but an old red silk handkercher that's seen some sarvice; and if any young feller takes that, he must be dredfully in want of suthin' to wipe his nose on!"

So that forenoon we started out—Mister Wetherell and his wife, and 'Bijah and me. Georgyanny, she'd gone off airly with her young man: a proper gentleman, too, he was! Well, arter ridin' down town in one of them street railroads, Mister Wetherell, he sed we'd all better go to one of the houses on Bacon Street that fronted the Common, where one of his friends lived; and Ruthy and I could set at the winder, and see the whole, while he and 'Bijah could wait for us outside. So, arter a good deal of pushin' and crowdin' we got into the house, and were fortinit enough to be airly and be dre'dful welcome. And there we had a grand sight, and sot for four mortal hours; though it didn't seem so long. Fust, the percession come out of the State-House, where the Governor had treated the Prince and his folks rale nice; and then they marched onto the Common, the millintary and all, the perlice clearin' the track and drivin' folks this way and t'other. The Prince he rid on the splendided black hoss, that stepped off as grand as if he was king of all the Boston hosses—and he had on a red coat and hat, and sojer fixin's—the Prince, I mean, not the hoss. And then the Common was crowded; and the millintary had the greatest show you ever did see. I thought the great muster up to Nashua beat all, and wouldn't a-believed that any troopers could a-gone ahead of the Governor's Horse Guards; but, my stars! the muster wa'n't a sarcumstance to this! Such a host of trainers, all on horseback, in red regimentals—dragooners and lancets they called 'em; and then the malicious companies, all a-walkin' afoot in solemn phalanx—why, 'twas enough to make you think the Revolution was comin' rite overagin! And then the bands a-playin', and the cannons a-frin'; la, suz, Miss Pettengill, if I'd a been a young man I'd a got rite up and sung Yankee Doodle in the midst of it all, though I s'pose it would a-kind of grated on the ears of this young sprig of a king, 'coz, you know, that was a tune his ancestors couldn't seem to bear enny how.

Wall, bymeby, arter all the prancin' and frin', and paradin' on the Common was through, they formed into a percession ag'in; and the Prince he got into a baroosh with the Governor, and the Mare, and some of his English folks who'd come over with him; and the sojers j'ined in afore and behind, and the bands a-playin'; and they toted him all over the city ag'in, up one street and down another, till I should a-thought they'd all got clean tuckered out together. 'Twas dre'dful tejus like! Where they kerried him to, arter that, I disremember, to hear the school children sing, I believe; but Ruthy and our folks we come away then, to go and see the old Revolutioner. As we come along the streets, and I see the red and white flags and strips of cloth festered from one house to another, sez I to Mister Wetherell, "I should think all Bostin was puttin' her winter flannels on!" and that tickled him amazin'ly; seems as if he never'd git done laffin' about it. I hain't got leesure now to tell you about our visit to the old gentleman, shall have to let that go till some other time; but Mister Wetherell and 'Bijah, they talked with him, and we all shook hands with him, and got his picter on a piece of white paper—potygraph, they called it—to bring home with us; you'll find it in the family Bible on that light stand, Miss Pettengill! Arter that, it began to grow dark, and we all went home. Georgyanny, she went up stairs to dress for the ball rite arter supper; and, sakes alive! Miss Pettengill, I wish you could a-seen that gal when she come down all dressed! She looked jest like picters of Cinderilly in the old story books; and I told Ruthy she orter to have glass slippers on. Her young man—Mister Hunt's his name—he looked proper proud of her when he wrapped her shawl! round her when the kerridge driv up.

The next mornin', bright and airy, we had breakfast—Mr. and Miss Wetherell, and 'Bijah, and I, for Ruthy's husband is a rale bizness hand, and allers goes to his store airy; and 'Bijah, he'd concluded he must go home in the fust train. Ruthy, she'd hung on for me to stay the week out and over Sunday, so I told 'Bijah I'd walk a piece with him on his way down to the depot. Ruthy said she'd bet I should git lost. "But," sez I, "I guess not! I've larned the way purty well onto Washington Street, and I'll jest keep my eye on the Old South steeple and hev that for a kind of landmark." So we sot out. Arter we'd got quite a piece down, 'Bijah, he sez: "Now, mother, you'd better go back. Walk straight up this street, and then turn off to the right into another street." I've forgot it now, but he giv' me the directions. So I bid him good-by, and telled him I should be to hum by Tuesday, and he must go over and look arter Arty and the hired man, and then I set out back alone. You see, it was about half arter eight then, and I jest thought I'd do what I meant to all along—go and hev my little visit to see the Prince. I hadn't sed ennything about it to 'Bijah and the rest, but I hadn't gin it up. I tell you, Miss Pettengill, I'd gone all the way to Bostin a purpose to see Queen Victory's son, and I didn't mean to come back to Bosc'wine without hevin' a talk with him. So I jest inquired of the folks I met the way to the Revere House—I'd heard Ruthy tell the name of the tavern where he stopped—and went straight ahead, through thick and thin—and there was a master crowd—and at last I got to the door. 'Twas a powerful handsome great stone house, much as six or seven stories high—a good deal bigger 'n the State House over to Concord ever begun to be.

Wall, mebbe the folks on the steps thought I belonged there—was a boarder, or the landlord's wife, or something—for they jest made way for me, and nobody sed a word till I got inside the great front entry, and went up stairs. As I was goin' along the long gallery, a-lookin' at the beautiful flowers they'd been and put there to make it look like a great flower garden, there stepped up a man dressed in a handsome dark blue suit with bright buttons, and a star on the left lappel of his coat, and white gloves on, and sez he: "Madam, this is the way to the Prince's rooms, and probably you've mistook it." Sez I back: "It's an accident a purpose, mister. Be you the landlord?" "No, ma'am," answered he; "I'm the perlice ossifer on duty."

here. Would you like to see Mr. Stevens?" "La, I thought most likely you was him yourself," sez I—for he was a proper handsome, large man, with great black whiskers and a rale pleasant look to his eye. "Wall, yes, you may speak to him if you're a mind ter. for I come a purpose to ask him to show me the way to the Prince's room." "Hev you any message, arrant, ma'am?" asked he. "Nothin', Mister Perlice, only I come to hev a little spell of talk with him. If he hain't got up, I ken wait, for I s'pose the young man is kinder gin out, up a-dancin' all night. Our folks that went to the ball wa'n't up neither when I come out. P'r'aps I'm too airy?" Upon that, the perliceman, he looked kinder sorry, as if he didn't want to disapp'int me, and he sed, rale perlite, sez he: "I'm raily sorry, ma'am, but I'm afear'd it'll be impossible for you to hev audience with the Prince. He's now at breakfast, and—" "I ken wait," sez I, breakin' in upon him; "and if you'll jest tell me which is his settin'-room, I'll go in and set a spell till he's done eatin'." "The best way would be to go into the ladies' parlor, and send up your keard," sez he, arter thinkin' a minnit and lookin' kinder puzzled. "Ring the bell, and when the servant comes give him your keard, and he'll kerry it to his highness. That's ipecac!" La suz, Miss Pettengill, that seemed queer enough to me, and I up and told him, sez I: "Du tell, Mister Perlice, if they use keards down here to Bostin? I hadn't the faintest idee on't or I'd gone up into the garret, and hunted mine up, and brought 'em along. I hain't used 'em this fifteen year or more, sence they got the factories to spinnin' and weavin' so fast over to Manchester. It seems sort of slow work, keardin' by hand now." Upon that the handsome perliceman kinder smiled wider, and sez he: "Oh, ma'am, you mistook me. I meant a little piece of white pasteboard with your name writ or printed on it. But I'm really afear'd, ma'am, that waitin' here will do no good. Hadn't you better step inter the ladies' parlor, ma'am?" I don't know, Miss Pettengill, but I should a gone, but jest then a long file of folks come along the gallery, and rite in the middle of 'em I see the Prince; so I jest stood my ground, and stepped a leetle forrard to be ready to speak to him when he come by. There was a big man with red whiskers a-walkin' alongside of him, and a dozen or more English folks, but I didn't mind 'em no more 'n nothin' at all; and when the young man was rite off against me I curchied, and sez I: "Mister Wales, I didn't want to go back to Bosc'wine, up in New Ham'shire, without herin' it to tell of that I'd spoke to Queen Victory's boy, for I've great respect for the mother that's brought up sech a family of children so well as your'n has. I hope I don't intrude, Mr. Wales?"

I kinder thought the young man was touched by my speakin' so about his marn; for though the big man with red whiskers sort of stared and pussed up his lips, Albert Ed'ard, he jest smiled, and sed he, "Oh, no intrusion, ma'am! Won't you walk in?" So in I follered him inter his room, and it was rale splendid, Miss Pettengill—jest as you used to read about in the Arabian Nights—and then he bowed, and asked me to set down, the big red-whiskered man a-lookin' on all the time, and the others a-starin'. I didn't like his looking at me so, enny too well; and I guess the Prince knowed it, for sez he, kinder low, "Oh, never mind him! I never do! He's only the Juke, and let's me do purty much as I'm a mind ter. I told our folks to hum, that I wouldn't come on this long visit at all if I couldn't have a good time of it, and purty much my own way!" "Well, you hev had a good time, I s'pose, Albert Ed'ard?" sez I. "Tain't every young man of your age as has sech a to-do made over him. Now, if my Arty—he's my youngest son, and kerries on the old place to hum—(my name's Ward, Miss Sophrony Ward; I forgot to mention it!) if my son Arty should go to England, I shouldn't expect ennything of the kind. And all the odds between you two is, you happened to be born Victory's son, and Arty didn't. Otherways, you look a deal alike; the shape of your nose and his'n is just about the same, only his is kinder hooked at the end. 'Bout the same age, too, I guess. Lemme see; Albert Ed'ard, how old be you?" "Nineteen, ma'am," sed he, and he sort of smiled rale purty, and showed his teeth, and then he asked, "May I inquire, ma'am, if it was your son, Artemas Ward, I had the honor of a talk with in Canady when I was there? He was a showman, Mister Ward was." "No, I guess it must a-been some other of the name," sed I. "My son never was in Canady; besides, his name ain't 'Artemas,' it's Artaxerxes; his father liked the name better'n I, though it allers seemed kinder nateral like. It's in the Catechism you know;

'Xerxes the Great did die;

And so must you and I.'

And so I s'pose that's where husband took it from, Arter 'Xerxes,' you see! But, as I was a-sayin', it couldn't a-been my son, you see, though Arty allers sez, 'Sho, now!' when he's kinder surprised, and he'd be jest as likely's not to say it to you as to ennybody. But Arty, he's to work on the old place; and it's to tell him about it that I wanted to hev a little talk with you, and ask about your folks to hum. Your marn, she's well, I s'pose, and all the rest?"

Albert Ed'ard, he kept lookin' more'n more pleased every time I mentioned Victory; and he answered, "Yes'm, they were all in purty good health and sperrits last time I heard from 'em. Mother'n father, they've gone on a visit to Prushy, to see my sister Victory Adelaide; she's settled there, p'r'aps you know." "Du tell!" sez I. "I'm glad to hear it. I remember readin' in the papers all about your sister's gettin' married and settin' up housekeepin'. Your ma'll git her children merried off purty fast, I reckon. She's begun right; the oldest fust. Let down the bars for one, and the rest'll all foller! S'pose 'twon't be long afore you'll begin to be sparkin' arter the gals?" and upon this Albert Ed'ard kinder smiled. "Wall, your ma's brought up a large family; and she must a-had a hard time on 't, bringin' 'em all through the measles, and hoopin'-cough, and sech; and she orter take some comfort with 'em when they git older and settled down in homes of their own. But I'm makin' a dredful long call; and, besides, I'm master 'feard that the Juke and them other folks of your'n don't like my sittin' here and talkin' with you; they keep a-lookin' kind of hald. Did all them come over with you?" "Yes," said Albert Ed'ard, "they're my sweet." "Hum, I should say some on 'em looked sour!" sez I, kinder short and piecrusty, for if there's ennything under the canopy I do hate, Miss Pettengill, it is to be stared at. Jest then, there come a tap at the door, and in come a great black servant, black as the ace of spades, all dressed off in a kind of uniform; a rale nigger, and with white kid gloves on; and he handed some letters to the Prince on a little silver waiter, saying, "Your Royal 'Ighness, 'ere's some Henglish letters jest harried by the steamship Harabia!" The Prince, he took up the letters and looked proper pleased. "They're from your ma and folks, I s'pose?" sez I, "and I'm rale glad you've got 'em. That's one of your sweet, too, I s'pose?" and I kinder sniffled when the nigger went past me, out the door. La, Miss Pettengill, I wish you could a-heard Albert Ed'ard laff then! he jest went at it rale hearty and boy-like, 'sif he injoyed it; and the Juke, he couldn't help a smilin' too.

'Twas a-going' then, but I jest thought I'd stop a minnit more, and ask the Prince about the ball. "So," sez I, "I s'pose you had a proper good time last night to the ball; and, before I go, I should jest like to inquire if you danced with my niece's darter Georgyanny Wetherell. I told her mother that Georgy looked as handsome as Cinderilly, when her godmother come and took her to the Prince's ball, in the chariot made out of a punkin, and the mice for hosses; and I'd bet ennything she'd dance with the Prince, too!" "I danced with several very handsome young ladies," sez Albert Ed'ard, "and should a-been glad to a-danced with more; but, to please the Governor and the Mare, and some other public dignytaries, I had to dance once in a while with the merried ones. I seem to disremember about your grandniece, ma'am." "Oh," sez I, "you'll be shore to remember her by the gown she had on! It was of rale satin, and the skirt was all ruffled and furbelowed off with gold fixin's, and she wore a lace juniper over it; her mother called it so, but I should say 'twas a petticoat." "Wall," sez the Prince, "I dare say I did dance with the young lady, fur there were several with junipers on; but I've kinder got 'em confused. I danced seventeen times in all, ma'am, and didn't git home till five o'clock this mornin'—that accounts for my bein' so late to breakfast." Oh, don't say a word," sez I. "Georgyanny, she wa'n't up when I come out; young folks will be young folks, and you'll hev to do up a lot of sleepin' hymeby, to pay for bein' kep up so late of nights. I stole off airy, to ketch ye before they begun to tote ye round to-day. You must get orful tired, Albert Ed'ard?" "Oh, la, I don't mind it," sez he, "young hearts, light heels." Enny time, I could 'Dance all night till broad daylight,

And go home with the Juke in the mornin'!

He gits kind of tuckered out, but I feel fust rale next day."

"Wall," sez I, a-gettin up for good then, "I must be a-goin' now, and giv you a chance ter read your letters! I'm proper glad I come down to see you, and much obleeged for your politenance, I'm shore; and if you only had time to stop, and come up to our place in Bosc'wine—close by to Concord, the capital of the State—I'd try to show you that New Ham'shire farmin' folks know how to treat people that's been perlite to 'em. I ain't a mite sorry I come down to Bostin, for I've seen the old pensioner and the young Prince. La! who'd a-thought when our merlishy was a-fittin' the British reg'lars over to Bunker Hill, eighty year ago and up'ards, that the posterity of old King George and the last end of the Revolutioners should a-had a good social set down together, as I hear you'n he did yisterday? We read in the Scriptur, how the time shall come when the lion and the lamb shall lay down together; but Mister Wetherell, Ruthy Ann's husband, sez this is the lion, and the unicorn, and the 'Merican eagle all bein' in the same cage ter once. Ennyhow, I'm proper thankful you come over tosee us, Albert Ed'ard; and I hope you 'll come ag'in an' stay longer, and yer marm 'll come too! Here 's a rale nice Bald'in apple I happen to hev in my pocket—it come from the old place up ter Bosc'wine, growed in the corner orchard, and mebbe you 'll kerry it home to yer ma'am with my respects, Miss Sophrony Ward, Bosc'wine, New Ham'-shire?" and I gin it rite inter his hand: "I'm much obleeged to you, I'm shore, ma'am!" sez Albert Ed'ard, and he made a proper perlitte bow and laid the Bald'in on the silver waiter 'long of the letters; "and if you 'll wear this ring, p'r'aps it 'll sarve as a remembrancer of the Prince of Wales when he is in his own country ag'in!" An' if you 'll believe it, Miss Pettengill, he up and took a beautiful ring rite off of his own finger and gin to me. I'll git it and show it to you; I keep it in a little box, on cotton wool, in my upper drawer. There! ain't it a rale beauty? La, you 'd orter seen how surprised they ware to Ruthy Ann's when I showed it to 'em arter I got hum! They sed they wouldn't a-believed I'd had a talk with the Prince if 'twa'n't fur that evvydence; and it turned out, arter all, that Georgyanny hadn't danced with Albert Ed'ard, only touched his hand in the same set; and her father he sed her old Aunt Sophrony 'd got ahead of her time, complete.

Wall, I thanked the Prince as well as I knowed how, and made a low curchy, and told him I was shore I wished the Bald'in apple was a berrill on 'em inste'd of one, to kerry home to Victory, and then I bid him good-by and come away. The Juke and the rest, they all bowed rale perlitte when I was a-comin' out, for they 'd seen what a good talk Albert Ed'ard and I'd had together. You never see a man so clever as that perlice ossifer was when I passed by him in the entry. He was rale likely lookin', I ken tell you, Miss Pettengill, and handsome enough to be a Juke or a Lord hisself. 'Tain't all the good looks that is gi'n to "Lords, Dukes, and Earls, and folks of high renown," as the old song used to say; and black whiskers are 'nuff site handsomer 'n red ones, enny day, to my mind.

But I 'm gettin' kinder out of breath myself, a-tellin' about my visit to see the Prince of Wales, and you must be sorter tired settin' there so long and harkenin', Miss Pettengill. If I could stop now, I'd tell you about the rest of my visit to Ruthy Ann's—how she and I went out a-shoppin' together, and then we went to Mount Orburn, the most butiful graveyard you eversee, with the handsonest moniments for tombstones, and a meetin'-'us in the middle of the yard, with three or four marble figgers—"statoots," she called 'em—cut out to remember some great men by; and then, Monday, we went over to Charleston, to the Bunker Hill Moniment; and Tuesday, though they all kept urg'in' me to stop longer, I had to come home, for I felt kinder anxious about Arty and things up here on the old place, and sez I to Ruthy: "I should admire to; but my fall work 's comin' on, apples to string, and presarves to make, and every-thing to see ter." So I started off. As I was sayin', I should like to tell you all, but there ain't time this mornin'; but ef you 'll stop ter dinner, Miss Pettengill—do, now! I guess them apple dumplin's 'll be done to a charm!—and arter dinner I'll set down and tell you the rest; though I must say, Miss Pettengill, amongst all the great sights I see down in Bostin, the best and greatest was my visit to see the Prince!

BURY ME IN THE VALLEY.

BY MRS. CORDELIA H. TURNER.

Bury me in the valley

Beside some rippling stream,
Where blooms the modest lily
Amidst the emerald green;
And where the feathered songster
Will build its downy nest
Amid the fragrant rose-tree
That blooms above my breast.

Bury me in the valley,

Where early comes the spring,
And where the towering holly
Willasting beauty fling;
And let the distant sunset
Its gold and crimson shed
Upon the murmuring water
That glides beside my bed.

Bury me in the valley,

Where tender breezes blow,
And let them murmur gently
My requiem soft and low;
And let the glistening dewdrop
Be pearls upon my breast,
With quaintly carved though humble slab
To mark my place of rest.

EMBROIDERY.

CARRIAGE SHOE.

This shoe is made of black or any dark-colored velvet, richly embroidered, and bound with satin ribbon. The sole is of stout wash leather, wadded and lined with satin. It is a warm and handsome carriage shoe.

TURKISH LOUNGING-CAP.

Materials.—Rich crimson cloth, black velvet, Albert braid of both colors, gold thread, gold braid, and a tassel made in passementerie to combine all these colors.

THE ground of the cap is in cloth, the lower part only (which is appliqué) being in black velvet. The centre of the crown is in the same material. In the engraving those parts that are in velvet are represented black.

The broad white lines indicate gold braid, which is used to cover the edge of the velvet where it joins the cloth, as well as to form certain scrolls. The double lines on the cloth are in black Albert and gold thread. On the velvet they are crimson Albert and gold thread, sewed down in the usual manner.

This sort of work especially commends itself from being so easily and rapidly executed; and in the opinion of many, it is far richer and more effective for this purpose than either crochet or anything else. It is extremely warm and light, and, if small pieces are added for ears, it forms a delightful travelling-cap.

To make it up, procure some black silk and common bed-ticking, also a little black silk cord.

Cut out the silk lining the full size; but that of ticking about an inch narrower in the head-piece, so that it may not reach the edge where the velvet and cloth give already sufficient thickness. Gather the silk head-piece into the round for the crown, so as to make the lining separately from the cap; but work the ticking and cloth together. Tack the lining in round the crown, and down the joining at the side; turn in the edges round the head, and sew round the black silk cord, and the tassel in the centre of the crown.

CROCHET FLOWERS.

SPIDER WORT.

THIS flower is formed of three small petals, and requires two shades of violet Berlin wool: one rather deep, the other lighter, though it must not be too pale.

Take the lightest color, not split, and make a chain of three stitches; fasten off. Take the second shade, and work in the first loop of the chain one plain stitch, in the second loop one stitch of double crochet, and one plain stitch; then make a chain stitch, and begin the second round in double crochet, putting a wire in the edge. In this second round, you must increase one stitch in the first, third, and fifth long stitches of the preceding row. This round being completed, break off the wool, twist the ends of the wire together, and cut off one of them.

The stamens of this little flower are very beautiful—they are of violet color with a top of the richest golden hue—and spring from a little tuft of silky violet threads. It would be better to buy them ready made, if possible; but, if preferred, they can be made thus: Take a bit of floss-silk, of a bright golden color, make a knot at the end of a piece of violet silk, or wool, insert the bit of gold-colored silk in the knot, and tie it as tightly as possible; cut the end of the gold silk quite short. Make another knot about half an inch from the first, insert a bit of gold silk, tie it like the first. Cut short the violet and gold silk, and make another knot at the end of the latter; tip it with gold in the same manner; place your silk across the half-inch, tipped at both ends, and tie it in the middle, so as to make three stamens of equal length; place them in the middle of a little tuft of violet silk, or wool, and fix the whole in the middle of the flower. Cover the stem with green wool, split.

The Spider Wort grows on a long stem, without leaves, and generally with two or three flowers on one stalk. The leaves are always close to the bottom of the stalk; they have the appearance of a blade of grass, and are about a foot long, and an inch broad, and are of a very bright green color; but the little bunch of flowers will form a pretty ornament for mats, &c., without leaves or buds.

FANCY FLOWERS FOR CAPS.

TAKE two shades of floss silk, of any color you please; they must both be of the same size, neither too fine nor too coarse.

With the darkest shade make a chain of seven stitches; cut off the silk, make a loop on your needle with the lighter shade, and work round the chain; the first two stitches, and the last two, in double crochet—the remainder in long stitches (putting three stitches in the top loop)—some leto must be worked in the edge; this completes one petal. Three similar ones must be made, and the four petals twisted, or tied together securely, after having placed a little white stamen in the centre. Cut off all the wires but two, which forms the stem; cover this with a bit of green floss silk, split.

LEAVES.—Make a chain of nine stitches, with a pretty shade of green floss silk—it should be rather dark; then, with a lighter shade, work a row of long stitches round it, the first and last two stitches being in double crochet; a wire must be worked in the edge, leaving a little bit as a stem.

These little flowers have a pretty effect, and are very quickly done. They can be mounted according to taste—three or four flowers and three leaves will form a nice little spray.

BOURSE IMPERATRICE.

Materials.—Broad gold braid, gold thread No. 0, two dozen rings nearly three-quarters of an inch in diameter, a skein of purse silk of any color that may be desired, and passementerie tassels, bars, and cord, composed of the same color, with gold.

THE star in the centre of this purse is the part first done. Bend the end of the gold braid down an inch, draw an end of the silk through the doubled braid an eighth of an inch from the fold, and wind it round the braid for rather more than half an inch; fasten off the silk. There will be an end of braid uncovered with silk. Leave it in both thicknesses of braid, and again fold down an inch. Treat this the same. Do this ten times, which will take up twenty inches of the braid. Arrange the piece in the form of a star, as seen in the engraving, and sew the centre firmly, to keep all the points in their true position.

Do another star, exactly like this, for the opposite side. Now cover all the rings with crochet, sew them together, as in the engraving, and work a gold rosette in the centre of each. Tack them down on a piece of toile ciré, with the star in the centre, and unite them by button-hole bars, carrying a line also round the star, just above where the silk is wound round, to form a wheel; all the points of the wheel must also be connected with the bars and rings.

Both sides, being done precisely alike, may be united at the sides. A flat ornament in passementerie (termed a Macaroon) is sewed in the centre of each star, and the trimmings, tassels, and bars are added.

THE CHINTZ WORK BASKET.

This basket is made of bright colored furniture chintz. As will be seen by the picture, its construction is very simple, being merely pieces of pasteboard, cut any size the maker may fancy, and the shape of those in the engraving. These are covered neatly with chintz, and sewed together. The little box to the left is for buttons; it is made of pasteboard, cut to fit accurately into the basket, with a cover of tin, covered with chintz. The advantage of tin is, that it will not curl as a pasteboard one would. There is a little stuffed cushion, fitted into the button box, for pins. The little bag is of chintz, and intended for a thimble. The two little bags to the right of the button box, are for spools of cotton; a needle-book comes next, having a cover of pasteboard sewed over the flannel. The bag to the right is made of chintz, very full, gathered in at the bottom, and confined at the top by a ribbon; this is for tape, and the many little trimmings to be found in a lady's work basket. At the side opposite the needle book, there is a bag of chintz for the scissors, and a strip sewed down tightly, and fastened at proper distances, for papers of needles, and bodkins. The handle is a strip of tin covered with chintz, fastened at the sides by bows of ribbon.

TOILET SACHET.

This sachet is made in the form of an envelope, and is intended to contain a lady's night-dress, etc., either on a short excursion, or to lay on the pillow during the day, forming an elegant ornament to the bed. It is to be worked in square crochet from the engraving, beginning with three squares, and so increasing to the proper width. The back is plain square crochet, with the border running round; the edging is worked separately, and sewn on after the sachet is made up. The lining should be of a color to match the hangings of the bed, and of a material to wash with the work.

JESSAMINE PATTERN EMBROIDERY ON TAPE-WORK.

Materials.—Cotton, No. 6; embroidery cotton No. 12; a piece of cambric muslin of the requisite size; and tape, three-eighths of an inch wide, of that kind, which, at some shops, is called "twilled tape," "India tape," "Chinese tape;" but it is of the kind that will not curl or get hard in the washing, and is rather coarse-looking than otherwise.

This is useful for sofa pillows, anti-macassars, for insertion for petticoats, for a deep border for a child's dress, or a deep border round eider-down quilts.

First measure with an inch measure, along the top and bottom of the cambric, spaces an inch and a half wide; mark these with a hard pencil. These must exactly correspond on each side; now crease it across in diagonal lines, and run a white cotton through the creases. Now crease the cambric across the reverse way, and also run in a cotton. (If the cambric is a long piece, only a small portion need be done at a time.) Now, on these lines of cotton loosely but firmly run the tape—loosely, because these threads, as well as those of the dividing lines, have to be ultimately taken out; and firmly, that the tape might not slip. Now turn the work on the side where the tape does not appear, trace off the leaf from the engraving, gum it on to some stiff card; when dry, cut out the shape, lay it on the work at the point where the lines cross each other, and run a hard pencil round. Make four of these leaves in the same way; then, with No. 30 cotton lightly sew the No. 6 cotton round, but not so as to flatten it. Make several of these stars in the same way; then overcast them very thickly with embroidery cotton.

Make the cross-bars, one bar going quite across, with two threads of embroidery cotton, then overcast with button-hole stitch; the second bar make also entirely across, but in overcasting, when at the centre, catch the first bar with one firm stitch, then finish. The cambric under the bars and on the tape has now to be cut out with sharp scissors.

LOUNGER'S CUSHION OR PILLOW.

Materials.—One and a half ounce bright scarlet eight-thread Berlin wool, a little more than half an ounce each of black and white ditto.

This cushion or sofa pillow is made in the new crochet stitch. The crochet hook, we must observe, may be made by any one with a penknife, from a cedar-wood knitting-needle, No. 3, by simply cutting a hook at the end. No crochet hook that is sold will perfectly answer the purpose, as the stem must be long, and of the same dimensions throughout, with a knob at the end. Make a chain of any length required, and work back on it, bringing the wool in a loop through each stitch, which you then slip on the hook, thus taking up all the stitches. Second row (in which, having all the stitches on the needle, you proceed to take them off). Bring the thread through the first stitch; and afterwards through two stitches together, namely, the one just made and the one beyond, until only one is left on the needle. This forms the first stitch of the next row, which is similar to the first, except that, instead of a chain-stitch, you take up an upright bar of wool, which seems to be, not on the top, but at the side of the work. Work backwards and forwards until you have done enough, observing always to fasten on the new color so as to do the last stitch of the taking off row with it.

For this cushion, with the black wool, make a chain of sixty stitches * and do two rows. Join on white, and do two rows; join on scarlet, and do ten rows, white two rows, black two rows *; repeat four times within the stars. Make a cushion or small bolster the same size, allowing a little for stretching; fill it with horsehair; cover it with black sarsenet or calico. Join up the crochet, and cover the cushion; draw up the ends.

FOR THE CORD.—With the scarlet wool and a coarse bone hook, make five chain, close into a round, and work round and round in single crochet until sufficient is done. Leave a bit of wool at each end to sew the cord on with.

FOR THE TASSELS.—Get a friend to hold her hands apart so that a thread wound round them will be twenty-one inches long. Wind round this thirty strands of scarlet, twelve of black, and the same of white wool. Tie these strands tightly twice, leaving three-quarters of an inch between. Then divide the space equally, and tie in the middle. Divide each space, and tie again in the middle, and subdivide in the same way, allowing a little larger space on each side of the two first ties, and making thirty-four spaces altogether, two of which are larger than the rest. Cut in the centre of each space, and there will be beautiful mossy balls, which only want a little trimming. Take a rug-needle threaded with scarlet wool, making a knot in the end. Thread on eight of the small balls; allow eight inches of wool for them; make a knot, and cut it off. Do the same with the remainder of the thirty-two. Sew on the cord at each end of the cushion. Then take a bit of scarlet wool and the rug-needle, fasten on, slip the needle through one of the two large balls and under the centre of two strands of wool with balls on them, then back through the ball, and fasten off, leaving a handsome tassel of sixteen balls in lengths of four, with a large ball connecting the whole. Do the others in the same way.

BRAIDING FOR AN INFANT'S CLOAK.

A NEEDLE-BOOK AND PINCUSHION COMBINED.

Materials.—Two nails of violet-colored silk, some white chalk beads, some crystal, also some gold, a little larger than seed beads, a small piece of fine flannel for the needles and pins, and some ribbon for tying.

FIRST cut the exact shape in tissue paper, then cut four pieces the same in card-board, also four pieces of flannel somewhat less in size, and four pieces of silk, two larger and two a little smaller, for the lining.

For the Pincushion.—Cut four thicknesses of flannel, cover two pieces of card-board, tack the flannel on to one piece of the former, and to the second piece sew on a small piece of the silk, about half an inch in width, but tapering towards the end represented as the heel, now sew this on the first covered piece, sew the two pieces of card-board up at the back of the heel, round the ankle and instep.

For the Needle-book.—Cover two pieces of card-board and line them with some silk, then snip the edges of the flannel and sew them to the instep part of the pattern. Now sew the two portions of the design together at the part which represents the instep. Sew on the beads, as shown in the engraving, only observe that underneath the flowers and leaves is a piece of white calico to throw up the white of the beads.

A small pair of scissors may be inserted between the needle-book and cushion.

SAMPLER PATTERN FOR OUR YOUNG READERS.

KNITTED BABY'S SHOE AND SOCK.

THESE are knitted on steel needles, in Berlin wool of two colors. The shoe in one color, and the sock in white, form the prettiest contrast; pink and white, maize and white, or blue and white, are all suitable. The shoe is in plain knitting, and ought to be worked tight and even; the sock is in the cable and hem-stitch pattern, the top being completed by two rows of netting, the first row being on a larger mesh than the second, one stitch of the netting in every stitch of the knitting. A narrow ribbon, the color of the shoe, is interlaced round the ankle, which ties in the front with a bow, and keeps it from slipping off the foot. The row of netting on the fine mesh ought to be in the colored wool.

HOW TO COOK POULTRY.

BOILED FOWLS.—White-legged poultry should always be selected for boiling, as they are of better color when dressed than any others. Truss them firmly and neatly, with the legs drawn into the bodies, and the wings twisted over the backs; let them be well covered with water, which should be hot, but not boiling when they are put in. A full-sized fowl will require about three-quarters of an hour from the time of its beginning to simmer, but young chickens not more than from twenty to twenty-five minutes; they should be very gently boiled, and the scum should be removed with great care as it gathers on the surface of the water. Either of the following sauces may be sent to table with them: parsley and butter, béchamel, English white sauce, oyster, celery, or white mushroom sauce. The fowls are often dressed with small tufts of delicately boiled cauliflower placed round them; or with young vegetable marrow, scarcely larger than an egg, merely pared and halved after it is dressed; white sauce must be served with both of these. The livers and gizzards are not, at the present day, usually served in the wings of boiled fowls. When they are not so, the livers may be simmered for four or five minutes, then pressed to a smooth paste with a wooden spoon, and mixed very gradually with the sauce, which should not boil after they are added.

BOILED FOWLS WITH OYSTERS.—Take a young fowl, fill the inside with oysters, put it into a jar, and plunge the jar in a kettle or saucepan of water. Boil it for one hour and a half. There will be a quantity of gravy from the juices of the fowl and oysters in the jar; make it into a white sauce, with the addition of egg, cream, or a little flour and butter; add oysters to it, or serve up plain with the fowl. The gravy that comes from a fowl dressed in this manner will be a stiff jelly the next day; the fowl will be very white and tender, and of an exceedingly fine flavor, advantages not attainable in ordinary boiling, while the dish loses nothing of its delicacy and simplicity.

TO ROAST FOWLS OR CAPONS.—Fowls, capons, and chickens are roasted and served as turkeys, with the addition of egg sauce; but they require proportionally less time at the fire, and are seldom stuffed. A full grown fowl will require three-quarters of an hour, a capon an hour and a quarter, and a chicken from thirty to forty minutes. A large fowl may be stuffed as a turkey.

TO BROIL A FOWL.—Split the fowl down the back; season it very well with pepper, and put it on the gridiron with the inner part near the fire, which must be very clear. Hold the gridiron at a considerable distance from the fire, and allow the fowl to remain until it is nearly half done; then turn it, taking great care that it does not burn. Broil it of a fine brown, and serve it up with stewed mushrooms, or a sauce with pickled mushrooms. A duck may be broiled in the same way. If the fowl is very large, half roast it, then cut it into four quarters, and finish it on the gridiron. It will take from half an hour to three-quarters of an hour to cook.

SAUCE FOR A FOWL.—Stew the neck and gizzard, with a small piece of lemon-peel, in about a cupful of water; then bruise the liver of the fowl with some of the liquor; melt a little good butter, and mix the liver with the gravy from the neck and gizzard with it; let it boil a minute or two, and pour it into the sauce tureen.

TO FRY CHICKENS.—Cut up the chickens, and season them with salt and Cayenne pepper; roll them in flour, and fry them in hot lard; when the whole are fried, pour off the lard, and put in a quarter of a pound of butter, one teacupful of cream, a little flour, and some scalded parsley chopped fine for the sauce.

TO STEW A FOWL WITH ONIONS.—Wash it clean, dry, and truss it as for boiling, put a little pepper and salt into it, rub it with a bit of butter, as also the saucepan; put in with the fowl a pint of veal stock or water, a little pepper and salt, turn it now and then, and when it becomes quite tender add twelve or sixteen small onions, and let them stew for half an hour; a young fowl will take one hour, and an old one three hours to stew.

CHICKEN BAKED IN RICE.—Cut a chicken into joints as for a fricassee, season it well with pepper and salt, lay it into a pudding-dish lined with slices of ham or bacon, add a pint of veal gravy and an onion finely minced; fill up the dish with boiled rice well pressed and piled as high as the dish will hold; cover it with a paste of flour and water, and bake one hour in a slow oven. If you have no veal gravy, use water instead, adding a little more ham and seasoning.

A BROWN FRICASSEE.—Cut the chicken in small pieces and parboil it. Take onions, parsley, butter, pepper, and salt, put them into a pot well floured, and stew them. Add the chicken, and stew until quite brown, having put in some of the water in which the chicken was boiled. Fifteen or twenty minutes will be sufficient to cook it.

A WHITE FRICASSEE.—Cut in pieces two chickens, and lay them in warm water to drain out the blood; then lay them in a clean cloth to dry, put them in a stewpan with milk and water; stew them till they are tender; take them out and strain the liquor; put them over the fire again with half a pint of the liquor, half a pint of cream or milk, the yolks of two eggs, half a nutmeg, a glass of white wine, and a piece of butter rolled in flour; stir all together in one way for fifteen or twenty minutes till they are thoroughly cooked.

TURKEY OR FOWL IN JELLY.—Bone the bird, and fill it with forcemeat in which are mushrooms; lard it with fat bacon, and tie it up; stew it in strong gravy, till a skewer may be passed through it easily; when cold, take off the fat, and serve with a savory jelly round it.

PLAIN PUDDINGS.

OATMEAL PUDDING.—Pour a quart of boiling milk over a pint of the best fine oatmeal; let it soak all night; next day beat two eggs, and mix a little salt; butter a basin that will just hold it; cover it tight with a floured cloth, and boil it an hour and a half. Eat it with cold butter and salt. When cold, slice and toast it, and eat it as oatcake buttered.

PREPARED BARLEY PUDDING.—Mix four tablespoonfuls of barley with sufficient cold milk to form a paste, pour on it one quart of scalding milk, then add a small slice of butter and four eggs well beaten, flavor with nutmeg, lemon-peel, bitter almonds and sugar. Be careful to stir the barley well while pouring on it the boiling milk, and not to put in the eggs till the mixture is cold. The eggs must also be well mixed in. Bake one and a half hour in a slow oven.

GOOD BUTTER PUDDING.—To one pint of new milk add four eggs, four spoonfuls of flour, and some slices of candied peel with the sugar on it; serve with wine sauce, and bake in cups, or boil.

HASTY PUDDING.—Boil a pint of milk; then, whilst boiling, stir into it as much flour as will thicken it, generally about a tablespoonful. Serve hot with cold butter and sugar, or, if preferred, the best treacle.

HASTY PUDDING BAKED.—Stir half a pound of flour into a pint of cold milk, and boil it; then take five eggs and three-quarters of an ounce of bitter almonds blanched and pounded, and add them to the hasty pudding when cold. Sweeten with sugar. Bake in cups, and serve with wine sauce.

PLAIN RICE PUDDING.—Wash and pick some Carolina rice; throw among it some pimento finely pounded, but not much; tie the rice in a cloth, and leave plenty of room for it to swell. Boil in it a quantity of water for an hour or two. When done, eat it with butter and sugar, or milk. Put lemon-peel, if approved. Many people prefer it without spice, and eat it with salt and butter alone.

COMMON BAKED RICE PUDDING.—Put half a teaspoonful of rice in a dish with a pint of skim or new milk, a little sugar, and nutmeg or lemon-peel to be added, with, if preferred, a small slice of butter or dripping, or a few pieces of suet put on the top. Bake slowly, and stir it occasionally at first to prevent the rice from burning to the bottom. If required to turn out, the dish must be buttered. An egg is a great improvement to this pudding; and if it is liked in a milky condition, less rice must be used.

Another Baked Rice Pudding (richer).—Boil about two tablespoonfuls of rice in water till just soft; then pour away the water and add a pint of new milk, a little nutmeg, lemon-peel and sugar; then boil again, and when just off the boil add the yolks and whites of nearly three eggs; bake, and serve with sugar sifted over it.

A GROUND RICE PUDDING.—Add to one pint of milk four eggs well beaten and one and a half tablespoonful of ground rice; boil these together, stirring them. Pour the mixture while hot over two ounces of butter, sugar to the taste, and add the grated rind with the juice of a middle-sized lemon. Line the dish with puff paste before putting in the mixture, and bake.

A Plain Ground Rice Pudding may be made with a fourth part of the eggs and butter given above, or any other proportion of them, and without paste or lemon.

GENERAL DIRECTIONS FOR SOUPS AND STOCK.

The perfection of soup is, that it should have no particular flavor; this can only be secured by careful proportion of the several ingredients.

The kettles in which the soups are made should be well tinned, and kept particularly clean, by being washed in hot water and rubbed dry before they are put away; otherwise they will have a musty smell, which will give a disagreeable taste to all things afterwards cooked in them. If they are not kept well tinned also, the taste as well as the color of the soup will be liable to be affected by the iron; and if the soup-kettle be made of copper, and the tinning not quite perfect, everything cooked in it will be in a greater or less degree poisonous, as everything which is sweet, salt, or sour, extracts verdigris from copper.

Soup must never be suffered to stand in any vessel of tin, or copper, or iron, to get cold; but always must be poured off, while hot, into a shallow, well-glazed earthenware pan, and be stirred about, every five minutes, till it is nearly cold, otherwise the liquor will become sour.

Lean, juicy, fresh-killed meat is best for soup; stale meat will make it ill-flavored, and fat meat is very wasteful. An economical cook will save, as ingredients for soup, the liquor in which meat has been boiled; for example, leg of pork liquor may be easily made into pea soup; and calf's head liquor and knuckle be made the base or stock of white soup. The trimmings of undressed meat and game will be useful to enrich soups; and the bones of dressed or undressed meat assist to make a good stock. Ham gives fine flavor, as well as the bone of a dressed ham, taking care to allow for its saltiness.

Soft water should always be used for making soup, unless it be of green peas, in which case hard water better preserves its color; and it is a good general rule to apportion a quart of water to a pound of meat, that is to say, flesh without bone; but rich soups may have a smaller quantity of water.

Meat for soup should never be drowned at first in water, but put into the kettle with a very small quantity and a piece of butter, merely to keep the meat from burning until the juices are extracted; by which means of stewing the gravy will be drawn from it before the remainder of the water is added. A single pound will thus afford better and richer soup than treble the quantity saturated with cold water.

The water in the soup-kettle, when first put on, should not be allowed to boil for at least half an hour; else the water will not penetrate, but harden the meat, and keep in the impurities which, in slow heating, will rise as scum. Long and slow boiling, for at least four or six hours, is necessary to extract the strength from meat; but the pot should never be off the boil from the time it commences. The fat should be taken off as it rises. If, however, as is generally thought desirable, the soup should be prepared the day before it is wanted, the fat can be removed when cold, in a cake; and the soup attains more consistence without losing the flavor; but it need not be seasoned till wanted, and then slowly heated till boiling.

When put away to cool, the soup should be poured into a freshly scalded, and thoroughly dried earthen pan; and, when to be kept for some days, occasionally simmered for a few minutes over the fire, to prevent its becoming mouldy; in rewarming soup be careful not to pour in the sediment.

All vegetables, bread-raspings, or barley, for plain common soups, when merely intended to thicken and flavor the soup, should be put in as soon as the pot is skimmed; but if the vegetables are to be served in the soup, none, with the exception of onions, should be put down to stew at the same time as the meat, and the different sorts should be put down at different times. Onions, whether whole, or sliced and fried, at once; pot-herbs, carrots, and celery, three hours afterwards; and turnips and others of a delicate kind, only about an hour before the soup is ready.

Spices should be put whole into soups; allspice is one of the best, though it is not so highly esteemed as it deserves.

Seville orange-juice has a finer and milder acid than lemon-juice; but both should be used with caution.

Sweet herbs, for soups or broths, consist of knotted marjoram, thyme, and parsley, a sprig of each tied together. Tarragon is also used in soups.

The older and drier onions are, the stronger their flavor; in dry seasons, also, they are very strong; the quantity should be proportioned accordingly.

COMPANY DINNERS FOR WINTER.

MULLIGATAWNY soup, fresh cod-fish fried, boiled ham, roast turkey with cranberry sauce, fowls stewed whole, oyster pie; potato snow, turnips, parsnips, winter-squash. Cocoa-nut pudding, lemon pudding, mince-pie, calf's-foot jelly.

Clear gravy soup, stewed rock-fish, roasted ham, venison pie, boiled turkey with oyster sauce, brown fricassees; sweet potatoes, turnips, parsnips, beets. Orange pudding, almond pudding, meringued apples, chocolate cream.

Venison soup, fresh cod-fish boiled; smoked tongue, roast goose with apple sauce, oyster pie, French stew of rabbits; turnips, potato snow, parsnips, onion custard, beets. Transparent pudding, orange tarts, mince-pie, floating island.

Mock turtle soup, boiled rock-fish, ham pie, smoked tongue, roast turkey with cranberry sauce, boiled fowls with celery sauce, oyster loaves, sweetbread croquettes; turnips, parsnips, beets, macaroni. Charlotte russe, mince-pie, calf's-foot jelly, blanc-mange.

Rich brown soup, fresh cod-fish stewed, boiled ham, venison roasted, red-head ducks with currant jelly, oyster patties, veal rissoles; turnips, parsnips, winter-squash, beets, cole-slaw. Mince pudding, omelet soufflé, orange flummery, vanilla ice-cream.

Rich white soup, fresh cod-fish fried, roasted ham, venison pie, boiled turkey with oyster sauce, partridges, chicken rice pudding, potato snow, beets, turnips, winter-squash, stewed red cabbage. Plum pudding, chocolate blanc-mange, cocoa-nut cream, apple-jelly.

THE TOILET.

MANAGEMENT OF THE HAIR.

Loss of hair, according to M. Cazenave, resulting from general disease, or from profound constitutional disturbance, will disappear in most cases with the removal of the cause which produced it. There are cases in which the scalp may be advantageously shaved, and the secretion of the hair stimulated by dry friction, tonic lotions, as rum, for example, the patient being at the same time submitted to a judicious and well-devised system of regimen. The shedding of the hair may be occasioned, or at least greatly facilitated, by the very means adopted for dressing and adorning it. The too frequent use of hard brushes, fine-tooth combs, &c., is highly injurious.

For effectually cleaning the hair, M. Cazenave recommends that a fine-tooth comb should be passed at regular intervals, every twenty-four hours, through the hair, in order to keep it from matting and tangling; separating the hairs carefully and repeatedly, so as to allow the air to pass through them for several minutes, and using a brush that will serve the double purpose of cleansing the scalp and gently stimulating the hair-bulbs.

Before going to bed, it will be desirable to part the hair evenly, so as to avoid false folds, or what is commonly called turning against the grain, which might even cause the hairs to break.

There is a class of persons who carry to excess the dressing of the hair, and who, during the ordinary operations of the toilet, drag and twist the hair, not only until the hairs are broken and the scalp fatigued, but the bulb itself is altered.

When the hair is very long, and twisted up into a hard knot on the top of the head, as it is frequently the fashion to wear it, the current of the fluid along the tubes must be obstructed, and the obvious remedy for this is frequently combing it and brushing it out in its full length.

Generally speaking, when the hair is naturally moist and oily, it is wrong to oil it habitually, and of course doubly so when it shows a tendency to dryness. The habit of immersing the head in cold water every morning M. Cazenave considers injurious to the hair. The same may be said, though in a more modified sense, of the habit which women have of incessantly moistening the bandeaux for the purpose of making the hair appear for a moment smooth and dark. Cold baths, especially salt-water baths, also exert an injurious influence upon the condition of the hair, hence it should always be carefully covered with an oil-skin cap while in the bath. Too heavy and too warm coverings for the head should be avoided; females should invariably adopt a head-dress of the lightest texture, and such as is permeable by the air.

Abstain altogether from cutting, wetting, and twisting, or binding tightly the hair. It should be slowly and carefully disentangled, and so arranged and covered at night as to give it the proper direction. Where the hair is naturally dry, it is, perhaps, the only case in which it will be in accordance with rational treatment to employ greasy substances; and in such instances, M. Cazenave recommends exclusively a pomade composed of prepared beef marrow and oil of bitter almonds; care should be taken to anoint the hairs, not only in their entire length, but also at the roots where the hair should be divided to admit of the direct application of the ointment, and special care should be taken that the preparation does not become rancid. Where the hair is too greasy, no such application should be used; but the hair may be powdered occasionally in the evening with starch, and the head should be brushed carefully in the morning to remove the powder. It will also be useful to occasionally cleanse the scarf with a very weak alcoholic solution; the following will answer the purpose: sub-borate of soda, distilled water, and essence of vanilla. All greasy hair requires the most minute attention to cleanliness. Hair-dyes should be altogether condemned; M. Cazenave observing, justly, we should console ourselves for the loss of the temporary advantage to be derived from their use, by the reflection that every natural alteration that takes place in the external appearance, brings with it a certain alteration of character, which is not devoid of value, nor displeasing.

MISCELLANEOUS.

If you are troubled to get soft water for washing, fill a tub or barrel half full of wood ashes, and fill it up with water, so that you may have lye whenever you want it. A gallon of strong lye, put into a great kettle of hard water, will make it as soft as rain water. Some people use pearlash, or potash; but this costs something, and is very apt to injure the texture of the cloth.

Do not let knives be dropped into hot dish-water. It is a good plan to have a large tin pot to wash them in, just high enough to wash the blades, without wetting the handles.

A CURE FOR SCURVY.—Plenty of open-air exercise, and tepid bathing, fresh animal and vegetable food, and the free use of ripe fruits, and lemon-juice. Lemon-juice appears to be almost a specific, few cases resisting its influence. About half a pint should be taken daily, pure, or diluted with water. Cold, damp, and impure air should be avoided.

TO DYE SILK BLACK.—Impregnate the material with a solution of acetate of iron, and then boil in a decoction of madder and logwood.

THE BEST MEANS OF CLEARING COFFEE.—Pour into the coffee the white and the crushed shell of an egg. Let it stand ten minutes, and it will be found bright and clear as water.

TO MAKE SHERBET.—Take nine Seville oranges and three lemons; grate off the yellow from the rinds, and put the raspings into a gallon of water, with three pounds of double refined sugar, and boil it to a candy height; then take it off the fire, and add the pulp of the oranges and lemons; keep stirring it until it is almost cold, then put it into a vessel for use.

A REMEDY FOR SLEEPLESSNESS.—How to get sleep is to many persons a matter of great importance. Nervous persons, who are troubled with wakefulness and excitability, usually have a strong tendency of blood on the brain, with cold extremities. The pressure of the blood on the brain keeps it in a stimulated or wakeful state, and the pulsations in the head are often painful. Let such rise and chafe the body and extremities with a brush or towel, or rub smartly with the hands, to promote circulation, and withdraw the excessive amount of blood from the brain, and they will fall asleep in a few moments. A cold bath, or a sponge bath and rubbing, or a good run, or a rapid walk in the open air, or going up or down stairs a few times just before retiring, will aid in equalizing circulation and promoting sleep. These rules are simple, and easy of application in castle or cabin, mansion or cottage, and may minister to the comfort of thousands, who would freely expend money for an anodyne to promote "Nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep."

TO REMOVE THE SMELL OF PAINT FROM A ROOM.—Place a vessel full of lighted charcoal in the middle of the room, and throw on it two or three handfuls of juniper berries; shut the windows, the chimney, and the door close. Twenty-four hours afterwards the room may be opened, when it will be found that the sickly, unwholesome smell will be entirely gone. The smoke of the juniper berry possesses this advantage, that should anything be left in the room, such as tapestry, &c., none of it will be injured. Having seen this tried, I can guarantee its efficacy.

DRS. BREHEND AND SIEBER recommend the medicinal use of sugar as of great value in diarrhoea—one in a child aged three years, and another to a child aged four years—in which half an ounce of powdered white sugar given every hour, soon gave a favorable turn to symptoms of extreme gravity which had long resisted all the ordinary means of cure.

BITE OF A RATTLESNAKE CURED IN TWO HOURS.—The Petersburg Express publishes the following from a reliable correspondent: A carpenter, while engaged, a few days ago, in pulling down an old house, and in removing some of the rotten timbers near the ground, was bitten by a rattlesnake. In a few moments his finger was swollen to four times its natural size, and a red streak commenced running up his hand and wrist. A deadly languor came upon him, and his vision grew dim, clearly indicating that the subtle poison that was coursing through his veins was rapidly approaching the citadel of life. But a remedy was tried, merely by way of experiment, which, to the surprise of all present, acted like a charm, the component parts of which were onion, tobacco, and salt, of equal parts, made into a poultice and applied to the wound, and at the same time a cord was bound tightly about the wrist. In two hours afterwards he had so far recovered as to be able to resume his work. I knew an old negro who cared a boy that had been bitten by a mad dog, by the same application.

TO TAKE MILK FROM CREAM.—Use a siphon, and draw off the milk from beneath the surface of the cream, and thus completely separate the two liquids by the simplest means and with the least possible trouble.

TO REMOVE INK STAINS.

Drop some spirits of salts—with great caution—

Wherever an ink-spot is seen;

Having previously moistened that portion

With water: and rinse it quite clean

As soon as the object's effected,

And then you'll be able to say:—

"What a change—who'd have ever expected

To find it dislodged in this way?"

RATS AND MICE.—The asphodel is useful in driving away rats and mice, which have such an antipathy to this plant, that if their holes be stopped up with it, they will rather die than pass where it has been placed.

CONTRIBUTED RECEIPTS.

REMEDY FOR BURNS, &c.—Take any quantity of red clover heads, boil them until the strength is out, then strain off the liquor and boil it down to the thickness of molasses, and when cold bottle for use.

INDIAN MEAL PUDDING.—Boil two quarts of sweet skimmed milk, then stir in eight tablespoonfuls of Indian meal; add two teaspoonfuls of salt, two eggs well beaten, one cup of molasses or sugar (molasses is better), one pint of cold milk, one teaspoonful of cinnamon or any other spice; pour into a deep dish, and bake four hours.

LEMON PIE.—Three eggs, six tablespoonfuls of sugar, one lemon. Take the yolks of the eggs and mix with white sugar; beat the yolks and sugar together. Beat the white of eggs to a froth; grate in the lemon-peel; mix the whites and yolks of eggs together; pour in the juice of the lemon. Rich paste—bake as custard. Bake quickly.

APPLE DUMPLINGS should be made of one large apple, quartered and cored, then put together, covered with a thin paste, and boiled till the fruit shall be done enough.

Or: The apple is best not cut, but the core scooped out, and the centre filled up with a piece of butter and sugar, according to the tartness of the apple. The paste should not be rolled out, but a lump of the proper quantity taken, the apple placed upon it, and the paste carefully pressed round it, bringing it to a point which is easily closed, so as to keep in the juice and butter. They have a pretty effect if boiled in nets instead of cloths.

SUGAR ICING FOR CAKE.—Beat two pounds of double-refined sugar with two ounces of fine starch, sift the whole through a gauze sieve: then beat the whites of five eggs with a knife upon a pewter dish for half an hour; beat in your sugar a little at a time, or it will make the eggs fall, and injure the color: when all the sugar is put in, beat it half an hour longer, and then lay on your almond icing, spreading it even with a knife. If put on as soon as the cake comes from the oven, it will harden by the time the cake is cold.

Editors' Table.

OUR PLATES AND THEIR LESSONS.

Men's due deserts each reader may recite.
 For men of men do make a goodly show;
 But woman's works can rarely come to light,
 No mortal man their famous acts may know;
 No writer will a little time bestow.
 The worthy acts of women to repeat.
 Though their renown and the deserts be great.

MIRROR FOR MAGISTRATES.

Oh, grant me honest fame, or grant me none!—POPE.

This is, essentially, a woman's aspiration. Men often push their way into "the court, the camp, the senate and the mart," eager for distinction, and not particular about the path, provided it lead them to eminence, glory, wealth, and power. It is not so with women. When ambition stirs the heart of a woman, as it sometimes does, she persuades herself that utility is her object. She may err in judgment, in writing, or action, she may do mischief rather than the purposed or pretended good; but we believe the rarest thing in the world is a woman aiming at renown that has not some real or imaginary basis of doing good.

Our FRONTPISCE is a MEMORIAL of benevolence and worth, of fame justly won by women, without being sought as the aim of their endeavors. No admixture of pecuniary, personal, or vain motives sullies the brightness of such feminine examples. The deeds and the influence of these heroic women have produced consequences that will benefit mankind through succeeding generations, without doing injury to any good pursuit or purpose of the human race. We believe they have done more to suppress evil and encourage good in the world, during their earnest but unpretending course of life, than all the conquerors who have won the crown of everlasting fame from "Macedonia's madman" to the Duke of Wellington.

MRS. ELIZABETH FRY*—the centre figure of the group—was born in Norwich, England, 1750. She was a sister of the celebrated John J. Gurney. In youth, rich, beautiful, and well cultivated, she never allowed these worldly advantages to inspire her with vanity or love of selfish and trivial amusements. Before she was married she had, with her father's consent, established in his house a school for eight poor children, whom she taught.

An accidental visit, soon after her marriage, to a prison in London, where women were the prisoners, turned her thoughts to the possibility of improving the condition, morally and physically most wretched, of these evil or unfortunate women. The reforms produced through the personal labors and judicious exertions of Mrs. Fry, so changed the state of public opinion concerning these poor culprits, as well as the manner of managing those penal institutions, that we can now hardly imagine their doleful condition or the desperate character of the inmates, when she first visited them. Mrs.

Fry travelled from place to place solely to ameliorate the condition of female convicts; taking the light of the blessed Gospel into the dark cells of ignorance, crime, and misery, of sin, sorrow, and penitence, she so moved the hearts of those poor degraded outcasts by her tender teachings and generous succor, that many were brought to repentance and a lasting reformation; some rescued from the depths of guilt were, we may humbly trust, forgiven by Him who has power to pardon sin and save sinners.

Mrs. Fry ended her useful life in 1845, mourned by all England, where it was felt that a bright particular star had disappeared.

MISS DOROTHEA DIX—represented by the figure on the left, at the top of the page—is a native of New England. She passed her early life in Boston, where, for several years, she was occupied in educational and literary pursuits. In 1834 she visited Europe for the first time, and, while there, carefully sought information that would aid the philanthropic plans she was devising, which were matured some years later. On her return to Boston she made many efforts to do good to prisoners, lunatics, and in short to improve public asylums and the institutions that provided homes for the sick and destitute. But her favorite plan was an amelioration of the condition of insane persons. Since 1841 she has devoted herself to this idea, visiting every State, we believe, this side the Rocky Mountains, travelling more miles than would three times circle the globe, and examining all the insane asylums in our land. It would require double the space we can spare to give even a synopsis of her labor; we cannot undertake to describe the ardor and impetuosity, yet gentleness and perseverance, she has shown in behalf of her unconscious clients; she has written, talked, reasoned, visited persons of influence, argued, urged, has been daunted by nothing—has never flagged. In short, volumes might be filled with the story of her exertions. There is no doubt that she has exercised a great and enduring influence on the economy of insane asylums; she has also had the satisfaction of causing the erection and endowment of quite a number of these places of comfort for such unfortunate invalids. Her name will always be remembered as an earnest philanthropist.

GRACE DAKING—is presented by the figure on the left at the bottom of the engraving—is the heroine of feelings that appeal to the heart like the sympathies of youth. She was never in a position to act upon an unlimited series of her fellow beings, like the other heroines of our record; but in her short life and obscure position she showed an astonishing ardor, an angel-like pity in the cause of suffering humanity, that ranks her with the noble benefactors of our race.

Grace was a native of Northumberland, England, daughter of the keeper of Longstone Lighthouse on one of the Farne Islands of that dangerous coast. A young girl, just entered on her twenties, gentle and retiring by nature, and always living in the solitary home her father's office rendered necessary, was so moved by compassion at the sight of shipwrecked men, clinging to the rocks and struggling ship, from which the next returning tide must sweep them, that she determined to risk her own life to save them. Her brother was absent, her father tried to dissuade her from the trial which he considered would be fatal to her and do no good to the perishing people; but she declared she would go alone if her father refused to aid her, that live or die she would attempt to save the sufferers. So her parents helped to launch the boat, the father and daughter took each an oar, and she thus was the ministering angel that saved nine perishing men. Grace was a girl of delicate constitution, and died of consumption a few years after her deed of heroism.

Mrs. CORNELIUS DU BOIS—represented by the figure at top, on the right—is a resident of New York City, where she has been mainly instrumental in originating and establishing one of the best charitable institutions in Christendom, the first of the kind known in our country, and, we believe, there is none exactly like it in the world—this is THE NURSERY AND CHILD'S HOSPITAL.

In 1834 the first effort was made to save the sick, perishing "lambs" of Christ's flock, the nurslings and little children of the poor, degraded, outcast population of New York. We have no space now to go into the details of misery that, coming to the knowledge of Mrs. Du Bois, moved her warm heart to attempt this great and blessed work.* Suffice to say that she succeeded in obtaining helpers among the best and first ladies of the city—that the State gave $10,000 towards establishing the institution, and the city government contributed six valuable lots on which the hospital buildings were erected; that Mrs. Du Bois, assisted by Rev. Dr. Anthon, laid the corner stone in 1837, and in 1838 (after four years in hired rooms), this noble institution was permanently located and established.

Rev. Dr. Anthon, in his beautiful eulogy on that occasion, said: "In rougher hands, and with sterner spirits than those whose vocation by birth is the vocation of charity," the enterprise, I hesitate not to express the belief, could not have been brought to this most gratifying conclusion. But it was an undertaking which accorded with the distinctive mission of your sex. It was adapted to the peculiar influence and endowments conferred on you from above, to subserve the highest interests of our race; and when entered upon, as this work was, with tender and unwearied devotion, generous self-sacrifice, and humble faith, how could it fail of success?"

Another of the eloquent speakers, George T. Elliot, M. D., observed: "Nor can the name of one—our first directress, Mrs. Cornelius Du Bois—be omitted: alike the foundress and the mother of this hospital; whose devotion, sleepless energy, and unswerving love for these little children, have triumphed over all obstacles and are crystallized in these halls."

It is needless to praise an institution which the least observant must see is, of all charities, the safest, most unalloyed with evil and most productive of increasing good to the world. To train up good citizens and good Christians from infancy, to snatch fellow creatures from the perdition of unholy homes, to restore bloom to the pale cheek of sick, suffering, neglected childhood, is a work deserving the warmest praise. The foundress of an institution like this, does she not merit honor and love?

figure at the bottom of the page, on the right: who has not heard of Florence Nightingale? who does not know her story in all its details? Without expatiating upon her angelic charity to the wounded and the dying, for every American woman is familiar with the picture of the noble English heroine, and her tender sympathy as she went from bed to bed in those horrible hospitals where lay the wounded and suffering soldiers of the bloody Crimean war—we would observe that these labors of pity and patriotism were, and are, but a small part of Miss Nightingale's claims to the love and honor she has won throughout the world.

War is not forever, but the poor will always be with us; sorrow, sickness, destitution and death are the perpetual attendants on fallen humanity. Therefore the mind that has devised means to soften these ever-recurring miseries of mankind, and shown the way by which to prevent or palliate the sorest ills of life, those sufferings that spring from ignorance or neglect on the part of persons who minister to the sick and have the charge of the public health—such a mind is indeed of the highest order. This intelligence has been shown by Florence Nightingale in her writings* and exertions to organize a new system of hospital treatment, of which experience has already proved the efficiency. For these beneficent services which she has done for her country, nay, for all mankind, services of true wisdom, that must go on benefiting the sick and suffering through all future generations, Miss Nightingale truly deserves what the world tenders her—honor, esteem, love.

SECOND PLATE—A HOME SCENE.

We have, in our first plate, set before our readers those bright examples of benevolent action that awaken generous enthusiasm in our sex, and uplift the soul to the contemplation of heroic deeds. But we are constrained to say that these distinguished women are the exception, not the rule of life. In our second picture is embodied the real worth, the true sublimity of woman's destiny and duty.

"Few can serve or save the public," but all can be useful at home. Home is woman's true empire; it is there that she is to be thoughtful and energetic, pleasant and kind, wise and happy. The "state of life in which it has pleased God to call her" is to be the scene of her virtues and enjoyments, her trials and triumphs. Here she must do her greatest work, and win her crown of glory by being the crown and blessing of her family. The heart that is softened and expanded by the constant exercise of domestic affections, and consequent efforts to make home the place of happiness, will never confine itself to the limits of the household; friends, neighbors, the poor, the suffering will all participate in the kindness which, ever exercised, never tires, which weeps with those that weep and rejoices with those who rejoice.

MISSIONARY WOMEN: MRS. ELLEN B. MASON.

This lady, many years ago, accompanied her husband as missionaries, sent by the Baptist Churches of America to the heathen of Burmah. Their field of labor was among the Karens, a nation or tribe more industrious and capable of being Christianized than any other people of India. Mrs. Mason has, for several years, been earnestly engaged in teaching the women and girls, and has succeeded in founding a school to educate native teachers. We have before us a picture, "drawn by Mrs. Ellen B.

* Our readers who have the Lady's Book of 1837 will find the story on pages 276 and 277 of the September number.

* "Notes on Nursing," etc.

Mason," representing the "Karen Female Institute at Tounghoo; with the native board of managers in their hunting dresses, from a photograph." We wish all our readers could look on this engraving, then they would feel more deeply what a great as well as good work has been accomplished. We give the summary in Mrs. Mason's own honest, earnest language:—

"When the mission was first established in Tounghoo, six years ago, not a Karen female could read a syllable. Now many hundreds can read, and fifty young women are fitting themselves for teachers, twelve of whom have already branch schools upon the mountains.

"When the work was begun, the people ridiculed the proposition of instructing girls in books. Now the chiefs themselves select the girls, bring them down, feed them, clothe them, supply their books, and find them places for teaching.

"When this work was begun, the chiefs scoffed at the idea of girls becoming teachers. Now there is the loudest call for them all over the mountains, robber chiefs even promising their support.

"When this work was begun, the Karens had not a foot of land to rest them on, when they came down from the mountains. Now they have a beautiful place of thirty acres, with a large handsome institution, and a pretty settlement, all their own, close to the town.

"When this work was begun, I had to support the men while clearing the ground for the school-house. Now these same chiefs have brought in more than 3000 rupees for the girls' school, and a young men's school on the same land.

"When the work was begun, I had to measure out our own rice, meal by meal, to persuade them to remain over Sunday. The same chiefs have supported themselves week after week, to enjoy the privilege of coming in at night to study the word of God.

"When this work was begun, the women presented the strongest barrier, opposing bitterly their girls leaving the paddy field to learn books.

"Now these same women work day and night to prepare dresses for them, and come trooping down from the mountains loaded with thatch for their cook-house and dormitories.

"It is just such a work and just such labors that are needed for the Burmese and Shan women of Tounghoo."

In our December number we said that Mrs. Mason had returned home, hoping to obtain helpers and material aid for her mission, so that she may establish for the women and girls of Tounghoo a school, and teach them as she has done the Karens. Two American ladies, returned missionaries from India, who understood the language, are willing to go back with Mrs. Mason and help her, if means can be provided. Who will aid this good work? Will not our friends, those who have enjoyed the blessed privileges of education that American young ladies so universally have access to, take an interest in this subject? Subscriptions of one dollar are solicited from all who approve. Subscriptions and donations sent the Editors of the Lady's Book for Mrs. Mason's school, will be recorded with the names of the donors.*

be, at least, one first rate Sewing Machine. Those manufactured by Wheeler & Wilson are first rate.

THE PIANO IN THE FAMILY.—A good Piano is an inexhaustible source of domestic pleasure. It is the only instrument that can supply, in itself, an orchestra. It is the only instrument that can perform a real solo. All the others require an accompaniment of some sort. The vast range of the Piano which the ten fingers permit it to take in the fullest harmonies, supply the place of numerous combinations.

A good Piano, with three well trained voices, can give a very true idea of any opera, to those who are from any cause hindered from attending public performances. For the intellectual part of music, the science of composition—the Piano is essential. No matter what may be the stringed or wind instrument in question, the Piano, uniting the various chords and harmonies, which no other instrument can do, must be used by the compositor.

Our American manufacturers have improved the mechanism of Pianos so greatly within the last ten or twelve years, that it is now as rare to find a really bad piano, as it used to be to find a really good one. The compass of the peg-board is greatly increased; and, moreover, skill, ingenuity, and competition have so facilitated the manufacture of these really wonderful instruments, that Pianos may now be obtained for one half the price they formerly cost. We commend those of Messrs. Boardman & Gray, Albany, New York, both for excellence and moderate price.

MISS S. J. HALE'S BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES, 126 Rittenhouse Square, Philadelphia.

This school is designed to give a thorough and liberal English education, to furnish the best facilities for acquiring the French language, and the best instruction in music and the other accomplishments. An accomplished French teacher resides in the family, and also an excellent teacher of music, who gives her personal attention to pupils while practising. The moral training and the health and physical development of the scholars are carefully attended to.

These articles are not needed, though some of the number are worth insertion, if we had room: "We all deface," etc.—"Evening"—"Aline Hooper"—"The Old Year" (the writer has the poetic vein, and will succeed if she perseveres)—"Living with the Old Folks"—"Lines"—"A good Example"—"Stanzas" (not the best the writer can send us)—"When Sleep hovers o'er me"—"Life is Merry," etc.—"The Serenade"—"And where is your Sweetheart?"—"Song"—"Come home, my own love"—"A Night with the Indians" (we never, or very rarely, find Indian legends worth publishing)—"My Lost Pet"—"Nevermore"—"The History of a Love-match"—and "Where has Peace gone?"

We have other articles on hand that will be reported next month.

Will the author of "From May to November" send us her direction—town, county, State? We wrote her some weeks ago, and receiving no reply, conclude the letter was misdirected.

Health Department.

BY JNO. STAINBACK WILSON, M. D.

DOCTORS FOR CHILDREN.—Every candid physician will readily admit that the diagnosis and treatment of the diseases of children are attended with peculiar difficulties. Diagnosis means to decide as to the nature and seat of disease. Now it is hardly necessary to go into any argument to show that no rational and successful plan of treatment can be instituted for the removal of a disease without a correct diagnosis.

But what are the difficulties that present themselves in investigating the diseases of children?

In the first place, an infant cannot talk, and has no language except that of signs; and again, it is restless and peevish from disease, or agitated and alarmed at the presence of the physician. If he attempts to auscultate its chest, or listen to the sounds of its breathing, the signs so useful in disorders of the chest are often rendered unavailable by a violent fit of crying; if he would try to gather information from the expression of countenance, the child will not bear to be looked at; if he should endeavor to feel the pulse, it is inordinately excited from mental emotion, should the little patient be old enough to notice the strange and unusual circumstances by which it is surrounded. In view of these and other difficulties which no honest and conscientious physician will attempt to deny or conceal, the idea has become quite prevalent that physicians know little or nothing about the diseases of children, and that a sick child is as safe, or safer, in the hands of the mother or nurse, than it would be when committed to the care of the most skilful and best educated physician.

Another common error is that our medicines are "too strong" for children. And whence these errors?

The first has arisen from the natural difficulties that encompass the investigation and treatment of the diseases of children, and which must be obvious to all mothers, while they cannot and should not be concealed by physicians.

But when a man who professes to be skilled in his profession admits, as is sometimes done, that "any one can manage baby diseases" as well as he can, he makes a concession not only not required by truth, but positively false to his science, derogatory to the just claims of Medicine on the confidence of the people, and fatal in its consequences. The truth is, that however great the obstacles to the study of the disorders of children, they can be overcome by diligence and perseverance; and he who does not bring these qualities into requisition, brings unmerited reproach on the healing art, and is unworthy of the confidence of the people.

The greater the difficulties that naturally beset a subject, the greater the necessity for science and skill in its investigation; and this science and skill in distinguishing and treating the diseases of children, can be attained only by an educated, pains-taking physician, who makes the study of disease a life-time business.

Some such, nay, many such are to be found in the ranks of the medical profession; and such as these, are competent to manage the disorders of children safely and successfully.

To such as these, mothers may unhesitatingly commit their precious little ones, for the medicines of such physicians as these will be adapted to the case in hand, and will never be "too strong."

We are no advocate for dealing out the potencies of the Materia Medica to children; but we must say that the danger consists not so much in the inherent strength or activity of any drug or remedial appliance, as in its use under improper circumstances, and in unsuitable or excessive doses.

All the attendant circumstances, and the proper dose being duly regarded, active medicines may be as safe for children as for older persons.

But mothers should aid the physician in his difficult and responsible duties. They should do this not by departing from his directions, at the suggestion of every busy-body that may come in to see the "little darling," but they should do it by observing all the symptoms and changes closely in his absence, and by reporting them faithfully at each visit. The mother who hangs over the couch of her sick child by day and by night, and who watches over it as only a mother can do, sees things that no one else can; for her natural acuteness of perception is rendered doubly strong by her maternal solicitude.

These advantages the physician is denied in his hurried visits, and therefore the mother should be prepared to lay the whole case before him, with all its changing symptoms. When this is properly done, he will understand everything as well as if he had been present all the time, and then he can do what the mother could not—give a right interpretation of the symptoms, and make a judicious and scientific application of the necessary remedies.

We may have occasion to write specifically of nursing hereafter, but we take this occasion to say that this close observance, and this correct reporting of symptoms as they occur in the absence of the physician, are the most essential and indispensable requisites of a good nurse, in all kinds of sickness; while they are all important for those who nurse sick children.

WATER AS A REMEDY.—Of the hygienic uses of water and its action on the system we have already spoken. So various are the effects of water of different temperatures that no single remedial agent is at all equal to it in extent of applicability; and we venture to say, moreover, that no drug equals it in safety and efficacy. We would guard against the error that water can do no harm; for all remedies of sufficient power to do great good are equally potent for evil when unskilfully used. But, while this is true, we feel satisfied that there is no drug of equal power that is half as safe as water in the hands of the people, because the principles on which the latter acts are more easily understood and the effects are more manifest than those of drug medicines, and therefore persons of ordinary intelligence can learn to apply water judiciously and safely. In making these declarations some carping people may say that we have deserted the old paths, and turned "water cure;" but this is not so, and never will be, for we oppose and ever shall oppose all exclusive, one-idea systems, but we will not reject a good remedy because it has been abused by a set of run-mad exclusives. In many cases and in the hands of a skilful physician, other remedies are better than water; but in the hands of the people, in home practice, there is nothing, we repeat, that will equal it in safety and in efficacy. And if any are disposed to make a parade about the dangers of water, they have but to make a comparison between the effects of water and those of calomel and other strong drugs. We do not oppose the use of calomel and other drugs in the hands of a skilful and prudent physician, and we have no disposition to take a hobby-horsical ride on the much-abused quack-sudden calomel, yet we venture to assert that the most extravagant and injudicious use of water could not possibly do more injury to the human family than has ensued from the abuse of this remedy and others that are constantly found in the hands of the people.

COUNSIN HARRY. By Mrs. Gray, author of "The Gambler's Wife," "Little Beauty," "Baconet's Daughter," etc. etc. Mrs. Gray has been so long and so well known as one of the most charming novelists, that the little we might add in her praise would be deemed only superfluous. The Messrs. Peterson offer their edition of the above named work in their customary pleasing style, which renders the volume in its appearance, even if it had no other recommendation, an ornament to the library shelf. Complete in one volume. Price, bound in cloth, $1 25.

CATALOGUE of the works published by Messrs. Peterson & Bros. While mentioning the books received from this firm, we would call attention to their latest catalogue, containing a list of their publications, among which will be found the latest and best publications, by the most popular and celebrated writers in the world. This firm has issued complete sets of the works of many well known authors, sometimes in various editions, and by reference to this Catalogue, any one desirous of enlarging his library, will find all the works, comprising these sets mentioned, and the various editions described, with prices added. As an illustration of this fact, we mention that this Catalogue gives description of forty-four different editions of the works of Walter Scott, and twenty-nine of those of Charles Dickens. The Catalogue will be sent gratis on the application of any one desirous of examining it.

From D. APPLETON & Co., New York:—

THE GALLERY OF BYRON BEAUTIES: Ideal Pictures of the Principal Female Characters in Lord Byron's Poems. From original paintings by eminent artists.

THE POET'S GALLERY: A Series of Portrait Illustrations of British Poets. From paintings, designed expressly for this work, by the most eminent British artists.

We have received direct from the publishers, Messrs. Appleton & Co., New York, the above named valuable works, the three first of which are splendidly bound holiday books, and all elegantly illustrated with the choicest engravings. The two "Galleries" and the edition of Shakspeare's works are profusely ornamented with steel engravings of female figures. The first volume mentioned in our list contains some of Byron's finest short poems, and choice extracts from his lengthier ones, and the illustrations seem to have caught and embodied, if we might thus speak of a picture, the very spirit and description of the verse. The Poets' Gallery is filled with poems bearing the signatures of Barry Cornwall, Walter Scott, Wordsworth, Tennyson, Montgomery, Miss Landon, Mrs. Welby, Mrs. Brownrigg, and others of equal celebrity on both sides of the ocean. The subjects of these poems are either some feminine name or some quality or sentiment, each of which is illustrated by an appropriate ideal portrait. "Moral Emblems" is the most attractive of all these works, and though the engravings are only wood, yet they are executed in such a finished style, that, taken apart from the printing, they might deceive the casual observer. There is a quaintness about the volume, both in its illustrations and its literary contents, that is its greatest attraction. Every one has heard, time and time again, the adages "Who cuts off his nose spites his own face," "Greater cry and little wool," and others like them; but we doubt whether all have seen these sayings illustrated both pictorially and poetically, and in a manner to combine beauty and delicacy with comicality.

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

THE LAKE REGIONS OF CENTRAL AFRICA: A Picture of Exploration. By Richard F. Burton, Capt. H. M. I. Army; Fellow and Gold Medalist of the Royal Geographical Society. This is a highly entertaining narrative of personal adventure, during the years 1858, '7, '8 and '9, in that portion of Central Africa which lies to the northward of the Zanzibar coast, and embraces that till recently unexplored region in which are found those great lakes so prominently figuring in our modern books of African discovery. Though the narrative is at times somewhat tedious, it is, nevertheless, one that few readers of works of its class will fail to be interested in. The ethnographical, topographical, and geographical notes are full and copious, adding greatly to our knowledge of the peoples and tribes of Central Africa, and the country they inhabit. Numerous well-executed engravings pleasingly illustrate and elucidate the text. Price $3 00.

A COURSE OF SIX LECTURES ON THE VARIOUS FORCES OF MATTER, and their Relations to Each other. By Michael Faraday, D. C. L., F. R. S., Fullerian Professor of Chemistry, Royal Institution, Delivered before a Juvenile Auditory at the Royal Institution of Great Britain during the Christmas Holidays of 1859-60. Edited by William Crookes, F. C. S. With numerous illustrations. These lectures, reported verbatim, and with explanations by the reporter, though intended for the young, will be found not unworthy the attention of those who have years of experience in the sciences. There is a clearness about them that is almost charming to students. Price 50 cents.

From D. APPLETON & Co., New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

NOTES ON THE PARABLES OF OUR LORD. By Richard Chenevix French. Condensed. This book contains the substance of a larger work whose excellence has been widely acknowledged, but whose size and cost have kept it beyond the reach of many. The author's own words have been preserved as nearly as possible, and the omissions have been of matters not absolutely necessary or important to the work, being mainly detailed accounts of erroneous views and their refutation, and notes in other languages which were useless to the English reader; however, when these latter have been found necessary, they have, in many instances translated, been interwoven with the text. Price $1 00.

CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA. A Dictionary of Universal Knowledge for the People. On the Basis of the Latest Edition of the German Conversations Lexicon. Illustrated by wood engravings and maps. This Encyclopædia embraces among its subjects the arts and sciences, geography, metaphysics, jurisprudence, biography, natural history, topography, theology, and medicine. Parts 19, 20, and 21 have been received. Price 15 cents per part.

From DERBY & JACKSON, New York, through G. G. EVANS, Philadelphia:—

THE HOUSEHOLD OF BOUVERIE; or, The Elixir of Gold. A Romance. By a Southern Lady. In two volumes. A new romance by this title has just appeared, whose destiny is, if we mistake not, to create a sensation; and the question, "Who is its author?" will presently be heard from all sides. The title-page informs us that it is by a Southern lady; but this is too indefinite to stifle or satisfy curiosity. Who she is, or whether this is, or is not, her first appearance before the public, we do not know; but we are ready to aver that it is no undisciplined mind nor inexperienced pen which has conceived and produced this romance. Price $2 00.

From REDD & CARLETON, New York, through SAMUEL HAZARD, JR., and PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

CURIOSITIES OF NATURAL HISTORY. Second series. By Francis T. Buckland, M. A., Student of Christ Church, Oxford; Assistant Surgeon Second Life Guards; author of "Curiosities of Natural History, First series," etc. This book is divided into four heads or chapters called in order, "A Geological Auction," "The Game-keeper's Museum," "In Memoriam," "A Hunt on the Sea-shore." The first is a description of the private collection of minerals, fossils, and curiosities of the author's father, the late Rev. Dr. Buckland, D. D., Dean of Westminster, which, upon their owner's death, were disposed of by auction. The author's style is lively and agreeable, and his book contains much information which will be received with avidity by those interested in natural history and geology. Price $1 25.

POEMS. By Sarah Gould. The publishers have issued in a neat and attractive form this little volume of poems, which will commend itself to the taste of the reading public. Although possessing some faults, these poems are not lacking in beauty and merit. Price 75 cents.

THE MORAL HISTORY OF WOMEN. From the French of Ernest Legouvé, of the Académie Française, Lecturer in the College of France, Author of "Edith de Falsen," "Les Morts Bizarres," etc. etc. Translated from the fifth Paris edition by J. W. Palmer, M. D., author of "The New and the Old," "Up and Down the Irri-waddi," etc. Though the greater part of the most forcible arguments and theories advanced in this really powerful volume are rather applicable to the moral history of French women, than to that of woman in the universal sense of the word, it nevertheless contains many important truths, a knowledge of which cannot be without value to the civilized world. We may often disagree with the author, but we will never ascribe to him any but the best motives. The chapter on education, in which M. Legouvé insists upon the fullest instruction of women in all the branches of learning which are of value to men, is one that can scarcely be too deeply pondered. But, as we have intimated above, a very large share of the author's philosophy and sentiment is applicable only to French women, French men, and French laws, manners, and customs. Price $1 00.

THE PRINCE'S BALL. A Brochure. From "Vanity Fair." By Edmund C. Stedman, author of "The Diamond Wedding," "Lyrics and Idyls," etc. With illustrations by Stephens. This is a humorous and satirical poem, taking for its subject the grand ball given the Prince at New York, and holding up to ridicule the great ado made upon his visit to that city. People love to laugh, and we cannot blame the wits if they embrace every good opportunity offered them for making fun. Price 50 cents.

From M. W. DODD, New York, for sale at the PRESBYTERIAN BOOK STORE, 1324 Chestnut Street, Philada.:—

FRED LAWRENCE; or, The World-College. By Margaret E. Teller. This is a story-book for youth, the aim and tendency of which we cannot explain better than by quoting the closing words of the book: "If we are but disposed to profit by all our opportunities, we shall find that, not only the truths of the material creation, but all the events and orderings of our social lives, every friendship, every duty, every trial and disappointment will minister to our growth toward the perfection for which God has destined us. The whole world is a school, in which not only minds but hearts and souls are to be developed; our lives are the term of instruction, and we graduate when our earthly education is complete, and we are fitted for a higher state of being, a wider sphere, and a larger activity."

From ROBERT CARTER & BROTHERS, New York:—

BLIND LILLIAS; or, Fellowship with God. A Tale for the Young. By a Lady. One of the best among the excellent works which the Carters are scattering abroad by hundreds of thousands. This interesting story should be in the hands of children, and of all who love children.

TRUST IN GOD; or, Three Days in the Life of Gellert. The Hymns of Gellert are familiar to those who enjoy the perfection of sacred lyrical poetry. This little book will add to the interest of these remarkable hymns, because it shows us the author was not only a true poet, but a true Christian.

From CHARLES SCRIBNER, New York, through J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

MISS GILBERT'S CAREER: An American Story. By J. G. Holland, author of "The Bay Path," "Bitter-Sweet," "The Titcomb Letters," "Gold Foil," etc. We have had the pleasure of perusing this latest work of a sterling American writer, who has already made himself famous by the authorship of "Bitter-Sweet," that unique and characteristic poem, the most sensible "Titcomb Letters," etc. It is an unsurpassed picture of American life, fresh and glowing with earnest and original thought, and striking out into a path seldom trodden by the novelist. The aim of his book is a protest against the "forcing system" in the education of children, and in the early development of genius; and with what a masterly hand he has directed his strokes against this evil we leave his readers to learn for themselves.

Price $1 25.

From TICKNOR, FIELDS, & Co., Boston, through SAMUEL HAZARD, JR., Philadelphia:—

THE ODES OF HORACE. Translated into English Verse, with a Life and Notes. By Theodore Martin. No one who has not read Horace in the original can fully appreciate the difficulty of rendering into English the volatile strength and delicacy of him who was undoubtedly the master of Roman lyric poetry. We have carefully read the translation under notice, and feel constrained to say that, though the translator has failed in some instances to render Horace just as we understand him, he has, at least, made one of the best translations, taken as a whole, that has ever appeared. With their usual taste, Messrs. Ticknor & Fields have issued this volume in blue and gold style, by which so many of their poetical publications have been characterized. Price 75 cents.

BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES. By Samuel Smiles, author of "Self-Help," and "Life of George Stephenson." With steel engravings. The author of this volume, under date of London, July 24, 1869, offers it to the "American public, through the medium of the Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, at whose request the collection has been made." It comprises thirty-five brief biographies of distinguished persons, both English and American. One of the articles in the volume is from the pen of an American friend of the author. Price $1 25.

From J. E. TILTON & Co., Boston:—

HOME PASTIMES; or, Tableaux Vivants. By J. H. Head. For the social circle, this volume will be found an almost indispensable one, as affording an extensive variety of striking subjects for living pictures, with clear, full, and explicit directions for their most effective representation. Price $1 00.

MAY COVERLY. The Young Dressmaker. This volume is designed for the perusal of young girls, and is intended to impress upon their minds sound moral teachings.

WINNIE AND WALTER; or, Story Telling at Thanksgiving.

WINNIE AND WALTER'S CHRISTMAS STORIES.

WINNIE AND WALTER'S EVENING TALKS with their Father about old Times.

Three very pretty holiday books for young children, containing stories which they will delight to read or listen to, and pictures which they will admire.

From CROSBY, NICHOLS, LEE, & Co., Boston:—

THE KANGAROO HUNTERS; or, Adventures in the Bush. By Anne Bowman, author of "Esperanza," "The Castaways," "The Young Exiles," etc. Children are inclined to turn with inattention from mere geographical and natural histories, even when they have been prepared expressly to please and instruct them; and the most entertaining book of travels they sometimes find tedious and unattractive. Knowledge they are too apt to regard as a bitter pill; and to make it palatable to them, it must have a sugar coating in the form of some simple romance which will gain and fix their interest. The book whose title we have named above, we are pleased to say possesses this characteristic; being filled with all the useful information found in duller works, while this information is connected and put in the form of a story. The scene of this story is laid in Australia, and it contains descriptions of adventures sufficiently wonderful and exciting to satisfy the most active imagination. Price 75 cents.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

In presenting the first number of the sixty-second volume, or thirty-first year of the Lady's Book, to the Ladies of America, we confess that our heart is oppressed with a weight of gratitude, and our mind crowded with so many reflections, that neither the tongue nor the pen can adequately express what we experience. When we look back upon the uninterrupted period of prosperity which has attended all our labors, we cannot but feel intensely thankful for the boundless confidence which has been reposed in us by those who have known us from their childhood. Very many of those who made our acquaintance at "sweet sixteen," are now prudent housewives and mothers, and even grandmothers, and who, as we are happy to know, still take a deep interest, together with their off-spring of the second and third generation, not only in the innocent amusements, but particularly in the more important lessons of morality, usefulness and taste, which it has been the aim of the publisher to furnish to his readers.

And now, while congratulating his readers on the opening of a new year, which he truly hopes will prove for them all a year of health, peace, happiness, and prosperity, the publisher of the Lady's Book will, no doubt, be indulged in a few reminiscences of the past, or at least of some few of the historical events which have transpired since the first appearance of the Book in the literary world. In that time there have been nine Presidents of the United States, and nine States have been added to the Union. Many new territories have been organized, and are now waiting to be admitted. In that time steam has been successfully applied to the navigation of the ocean, and railroads, to the purposes of inland travel and commerce in our country, and in the various nations of Europe. The mysteries of the electric telegraph have been manifested to the inhabitants of the four continents, Europe, Asia, Africa, and America, our own country having the honor of its first introduction. Besides these things, we have recently seen in our midst the representatives of a nation, the Japanese, who have concluded a commercial treaty with the United States, which a few years since was deemed to be an international impossibility. In that time, also, our cities have been lighted with gas, and the population and wealth of Philadelphia, and of many others, extended almost beyond credibility, and their streets lined with railroads for the accommodation of the inhabitants. War and conquest have also been busy in adding to the fame and the resources of the country, in the rich lands, and gold and silver mines of California.

But this must suffice our readers. We have only furnished them with a few of the themes which have arisen within the experience of the Lady's Book, worthy of their reflection. And, thankful for the past, let us hope that the future advancement of our country, and the future prosperity of our patrons, and of the Lady's Book, will be commensurate with their merits and deservings.

OUR ENGRAVINGS.—“Just like Mamma,” is the opening plate for this number. We can speak of its design and engraving. In another portion of our Book it is commented on more fully, as is also our magnificent title-page, “Noble Attributes of Woman,” containing six distinct plates and five statuettes. This will be the style of our engravings for this year, as it has been for preceding years.

Our Fashion-plate, still more splendid than the one in December, containing six full length figures. So we might term them when compared with the figures of other magazines. No other work on the continent of Europe, or in this country, can match these celebrated colored fashions. We need hardly say that the expense of them is enormous; but as such a fashion could be produced, Godey was bound to give it. No finer coloring can be found on the finest plates that are colored for framing. In September last, we commenced improving the coloring of fashions, which the press pronounced a wonderful improvement. Specimens of which may be seen in the September, October, and November numbers. What will they say now to the fashions in December and January numbers?

OUR LITERATURE.—While paying every attention to the ornamental department of our Book, we do not neglect the solid matter. While we have such writers as Marion Harland, Metta Victoria Victor, Mrs. Janvrin, Mrs. Haven, Miss Frost, Mrs. E. F. Ellett, and Mrs. Hale, the literary department is well cared for. Excellent specimens of the abilities of some of the above will be found in this number; and we feel certain that those who commence “Sunshine and Shade,” will eagerly look for its continuation.

LET it be distinctly understood that we have no agents for whose acts we are responsible, and we are only accountable to those who remit directly to us. We have no agents that solicit subscribers. Money must be sent to the publisher, L. A. Godey, Philadelphia.

“THERE is one feature,” says the Madison Courier, “in Godey which other magazines have as yet left unimitated, this is the music.”

The only reason is that the music is not prepared expressly for them. Our subscribers get original music, and are ahead of the rest of the world. After it has appeared in the Lady's Book, it is published for the public.

OUR DECEMBER AND JANUARY FASHION-PLATES.—The introduction of these double plates entail upon us an enormous additional expense, more than we dare mention. But if they please we are satisfied.

FROM an eminent literary gentleman to Mrs. Hale:—

The November number has just arrived. I am glad to see that the Book is kept up with so much freshness and spirit, and that it is so flourishing.

LETTER from a Kentucky editor:—

The Lady's Book is the sine qua non of all the periodicals for ladies that are published, and if you did not exchange with me, I would have it if the price was ten dollars a year. We can't get along without it.

MAKE UP YOUR CLUBS.—Remember that the Lady's Book is the best work for ladies published in this country. We have more than one thousand private letters testifying to this fact, and the press throughout the country is unanimous in saying that the Lady's Book is the best magazine of its kind in this or any other country. The difference in the club price of the Lady's Book and that of other magazines is only a few cents, and for these few cents you get nearly one-third more reading and engravings, besides other more expensive embellishments that a low-priced magazine cannot afford to give. Clubs must be for the Lady's Book alone, with one exception, and that is “Arthur's Home Magazine.” One or more of that work can be introduced in a club in place of the Lady's Book, if desired.

Any person, with a very little trouble, can get up a club for the Book; we have frequently been so informed by ladies—the work is so popular. It is but to call and get a subscription. Clubs are always in time, as we are able to supply numbers from the beginning of the year; yet we like them sent in soon, to know how many we shall print. Remember, that a work with 150,000 subscribers can give five times as much as a work with only half that number, and the embellishments can also be made of a very superior character.

Our terms are made plain and explicit, so that they may be easily understood. We are often asked to throw in an extra copy. In no instance can this be done, as our terms are so low to clubs that it cannot be afforded. A shop-keeper would look amazed, if a purchaser should ask him to throw in an extra yard because she had purchased twelve. And yet we are asked to add an extra copy because twelve have been ordered. It cannot be done.

MARK THIS.—The Lady's Book has become a test of gentility and good sense, and is found in every family where these predominate.—Wabasha Journal.

“THE ILLUSTRATED NEWS OF THE WORLD,” is the name of a publication issued by H. A. Brown & Co., 14 Hanover Street, New York. This is a first class family newspaper, highly embellished with wood engravings of the principal events of the day, and containing the latest home, foreign, and colonial intelligence; issued weekly. It is also a drawing-room portrait gallery of eminent personages. On receipt of $7 50 the paper, with portrait and memoir, will be forwarded to any part of the United States, post-paid, for fifty-two weeks. The paper is well got up, and the portraits are impressions from steel plates. We advise all who wish to subscribe for the paper, or the portraits, or to get single copies of the latter, to address as above.

THE best $3 00 and the best $2 00 monthly are offered one year for $3 50. Godey's Lady's Book and Arthur's Home Magazine.

Arthur's Magazine, as far as a high rank of literature is concerned, is decidedly the best two dollar magazine.—Middleton Rainbow.

Arthur's Lady's Home Magazine.—The best of the two dollar monthlies.—Richmond Religious Herald.

Arthur's Home Magazine.—This still gives new and additional proof of being the very best of the two dollar magazines.—Rushville Times.

Home Magazine.—This is the best two dollar magazine published.—Henopin Tribune.

Fully maintains the wide reputation of being the best two dollar magazine published.—Canton Ledger.

We could fill pages with notices to the same effect.

OUR MUSICAL COLUMN.

A BRILLIANT succession of Songs, Ballads, Polkas, etc., by well-known and able composers, will be given during the new year in our favorite periodical, our determination being to make this department more than ever a leading feature in the Book, and worth in itself the cost of the whole publication. Distant subscribers who look for their entire musical supplies through this medium will find their wants discriminatingly cared for, every piece we present being carefully selected from a large mass of original MSS. furnished us, the composition, harmony, and arrangement undergoing close examination.

We have to allow our opening Ballad, this month, to speak for itself. In our next, we shall lay before our readers a new and beautiful song, My Heart no more in Rapture swells, by Mr. J. H. McNaughton, one of our most popular contributors. Prof. Ambuhl will furnish the piece for March.

New Piano Instructor.—The simplest and best arranged instruction book for this instrument we have yet seen is a new work, entitled The Excelsior Piano Instructor, written by James Ballak, and published by Beck & Lawton, of this city. The first principles of the art are explained with unusual clearness, adapted to the comprehension of persons entirely ignorant of music. The importance of Time is very sensibly dwelt upon, and a new plan laid down for its acquirement; while all the exercises are arranged upon a plan of sure and gradual progression. Among the exercises are a number of new airs, a Barcarole from the Sicilian Vespers, the popular song Ever of Thee, etc., never before introduced into an instruction book. We are satisfied that a careful attention to the lessons laid down in this book will give any person a mastery over the instrument, and we are glad to bring it to the notice of our readers. Price $1, on receipt of which sum we will mail it to any address.

New Sheet Music.—Our list this month comprises:—

By Mr. McNaughton, the six following Polkas, each embellished with a handsome full-page colored lithographic title. The pieces are of double length. Price of each 50 cents: Trotty Horse Polka; Patty Cake Polka; Best Friend Polka, dedicated to Mrs. Wm. G. Bryan, principal of an excellent and flourishing seminary, at Batavia, N. Y.; Love and Beauty Polka; Pet Robin Polka; Peek a Boo Polka. The three first named are the latest issued.

The following from our own pen: O Lady, touch those Chords again, a new ballad, with easy piano accompaniment. Price 25 cents. Russell & Tolman, Boston, publishers.

Poor Ben the Piper. Five editions of this Ballad have been sold in one month. Price 25 cents, or five copies for $1. Can only be ordered of us direct.

The Grave of Old Grimes. A serio-humorous song. Price 25 cents. J. H. Hildley, Albany, N. Y., publisher.

Mr. Hildley's New Publications.—Mr. Hildley's music publishing establishment, at Albany, is one of the largest in the country. His issues are exceedingly popular, among the latest of which are: I am Thine, song, by Karl Merz, price 25 cents; Like the Streaks of Eastern Skies, by Sebastiany, price 25 cents; Kitty Moore (Minnie Moore's pretty cousin), 25 cents; Be kind to each Other, new song to familiar words, 25 cents; Songs of Praise the Angels sang, a beautiful soprano solo and chorus, one of a series of six sacred motets, by J. T. Lloyd, price 40 cents; Beautiful Star, a transcription of the popular song, Star of the Evening, by Brinley Richards, 50 cents; The Little Gipsy Mazourka, by Warren, with beautiful lithographic title, 50 cents. We can commend any of these pieces to our patrons, and will purchase and mail any of them, as well as other pieces named, free of postage, to any address, on receipt of price.

In order to accommodate our friends at a distance from the musical centres, we will attend to the purchasing and mailing, free of all postages and commissions, of any music published. Orders and musical communications to be addressed, J. Starr Holloway, Philadelphia.

The most brilliant Opera night ever witnessed on this continent was the splendid ovation in honor of the Prince of Wales, on the occasion of his visit to our Academy of Music, on the night of Wednesday, October 10. Our peerless temple of art exhibited an audience which did credit to the good name of Philadelphia as the musical metropolis of America. Full dress was the order of the evening. The heir apparent and suite, including the Duke of Newcastle, the Earl of St. Germain, Lord Lyons, and others, occupied opposite proscenium boxes in the balcony, the British and American flags and arms being tastefully arranged over the royal box. Among the many other distinguished visitors present, were Lady Franklin, wife of the lamented navigator, and Miss Chacecroft; Robert Chambers, the author-publisher of Edinburgh; the Marquis and Marchioness of Chandos; Commodore Stewart, and others. It was truly a gala night, and the performance, Flotow's beautiful Opera of Martha, was a brilliant success, the royal party frequently joining in the applause. A similar scene was never before witnessed in an American theatre, and may never be again. J. STARR HOLLOWAY.

MR. GODEY: For a long time I have wished you to know how much sunshine and happiness enters my heart as I monthly receive the Lady's Book, the most welcome of all welcome messengers; not for the wealth of the Indies would I be without it. I am a teacher, dwelling among the "lone pines" of Mississippi, far away from the home of my childhood and the loved associations of other days; and as you are the cause of this sunshine and happiness, I cannot resist the impulse which bids me take up my pen and tell you about it.

Living, as I do, so retired, and with so little society, I sometimes fear that I may become narrow-minded, as is frequently the case when one has such contracted privileges; but thanks to the treasure of a book, the particular friend of us ladies, we rise above such weakness, having our hearts and minds exalted from the intercourse which we monthly hold with its gifted companions. Oh, Mr. Godey, could I but dip my pen into my heart, then I could trace words that would convey to you an adequate idea of the grateful incense which springs up from its hidden depths as I reflect that we have a Godey—a dear Godey—who anticipates our every want, both social, moral, and intellectual. Prosperous may he be, and long may he live to gladden other hearts as he has gladdened and made better that of his subscriber.

A YOUNG LADY, capable of taking charge of the education of children under the age of fifteen, desires to enter a private family as teacher. She prefers a situation in Kentucky or Tennessee. Address, until the 1st of December, Miss Euna S., Osceola, Ill.

CLIPPING WITH OTHER MAGAZINES.—We will send the Lady's Book and either of the following magazines one year, for $4.50: Harper's Magazine, The Atlantic Monthly, or New York Knickerbocker.

HAIR ORNAMENTS.—Ladies wishing hair made into bracelets, pins (which are very beautiful), necklaces, or ear-rings, can be accommodated by our Fashion Editor. A very large number of orders have recently been filled, and the articles have given great satisfaction.

We give the prices at which we will send these beautiful articles:—

- Breastpins, from $4 to $12.
- Ear-rings, from $4 50 to $10.
- Bracelets, from $3 to $15.
- Rings, from $1 50 to $3.
- Necklaces, from $6 to $15.

- The Charms of Faith, Hope, and Charity, $4 50.
- Hair Studs from $5 50 to $11 the set.
- Sleeve Buttons from $6 50 to $11 the set.

A VIRGINIA lady writes us as follows:—

And now let me say to you that, as we gathered a few evenings since round our first Christmas tree, we remembered with gratitude the instructions we received from one of the pieces published in the Lady's Book, and I hope the beauty of the tree reflected honor on the teacher; and I am sure we all joined in the hope that you would spend a Merry Christmas and a Happy New-Year.

J E TILTON & CO., 161 Washington Street, Boston, publish, for Grecian and Antique Painting, the following elegant pictures, which they will send, post-paid, to any address, on receipt of price. New pictures constantly being published.

Each is prepared on suitable paper, with tints, etc.; and full directions to paint, to mix each color, frame, etc., without extra charge. There are no other publishers of such pictures, nor can any other pictures be made to so fully resemble a canvas oil painting, or remain perfect as these. The coarse and cheap pictures are not suitable, and disgust people of taste with these beautiful arts.

VILLA IN THE ORIENTAL STYLE.

Designed expressly for Godey's Lady's Book by SAMUEL SLOAN, Architect, Philadelphia.

In the present number of our series we present a large villa in the Oriental style of architecture, differing entirely in the design and arrangement of plan from anything that has preceded it, presenting a degree of novelty that is at once pleasing and attractive. The style being well adapted to that of a Southern climate, for which it is intended, being now in progress of erection at Natchez, Mississippi.

The plan, as represented in the diagram, is octagonal in form, with projecting wings, with large verandas between, comprising at once extensive suits of rooms, which give ample accommodation, with convenience of arrangement, suitable for a large family.

First in order will come the Basement plan, comprising C entrance hall, from which we pass to the large hall upon the principal story; A is the rotunda; B billiard-room; F play-room; G hall; H school-room; K area; E office; D smoking-room.

BASEMENT PLAN.

PRINCIPAL STORY.

Principal story comprises, A large rotunda, with niches at the angles for statuary, open entirely to the dome, which will be finely wrought in fresco. A gallery will surround the rotunda at each story. K veranda, at entrance; B hall, containing main stair; F family room; C drawing room; G dining-room; I breakfast-room; H family sitting-room; E family room; D reception room; M M dressing-rooms.

SECOND STORY.

The Second story contains six chambers, hall, and rotunda, with all the necessary dressing-rooms, wardrobes, closets, etc. etc.

THERE seems to be but one opinion on the part of the press, that the Lady's Book is the most proper present to make at this season of the year from a husband to a wife, a father to his daughter, or a lover to his lady-love. Indeed, the Port Byron Times goes further, and says:

"Any man, in easy circumstances, who will refuse to take this book for his wife, his daughter, or his sister, is not a good husband, father, or brother. It is the only book in the Union so thoroughly adapted to, and designed for the interest and benefit of the lady reader. It is 'The Book of the Nation, and the Arts Union of America.'"

TTOWN, COUNTY, AND STATE.—Do not forget to put all these in every letter you write. You do not know how much trouble it would save us.

PHILADELPHIA AGENCY.

No order attended to unless the cash accompanies it.

All persons requiring answers by mail must send a post-office stamp; and for all articles that are to be sent by mail, stamps must be sent to pay return postage.

Be particular, when writing, to mention the town, county, and State you reside in. Nothing can be made out of post-marks.

HANGING GARDENS.

THE LAST FLORAL NOVELTY.

BABYLON is to be outdone by the nineteenth century, if the plan we give can be carried into effect. We have combined the description of what Mr. Passens, the eminent florist of Flushing, proposes to do, from an elaborate article in the New York Evening Post. Whether he will be able to do it—is the question. If the project is capable of adoption, the present style of House Gardening, which we have so long advocated in this department, undergoes a complete revolution. It is a most fascinating, but, we fear, utopian state of things. But let us have the plan. How one's mouth waters at this season of the year, to be told that it is within the means of any man who builds a house to rent for $800 a year to have a garden on the roof, which, during the summer, can be filled with the most luscious grapes, peaches, plums and nectarines, and in the winter with exotic plants, the beauty of whose foliage or flowers will afford a charm far beyond the trifling cost of their maintenance. And this is the way to do it:—

A glass roof costs very little more than a tin one. Let every roof, therefore, be covered with glass, and let the garret floor be covered with concrete sloping from the centre to the sides, around which a slight depression in the floor can carry the moisture or drip, into the leaders which pass from the roof of every house to the ground. With this slight expense, therefore, you have a perfect greenhouse. Now for heating: Every gentleman knows that the upper rooms of his house are so warm from the ascending heat of his furnace that registers are scarce needed. Let the doors be kept open and the waste heat of the house will keep the garret at the highest desirable temperature. Thus your green-house is heated without any extra trouble or expenditure.

If a little extra strength is given to the beams which sustain the upper story, sufficient earth could be placed there to lay out the whole space of twenty-five by fifty feet as a garden, with winding walks, delightful carpets of moss, with camellias, &c., planted in the soil. By this mode the illusion will be complete, and in the midst of winter you may have a tropical landscape. Those who have visited the house of Prince Demidoff, at Florence, will have some conception of the beauty of such an arrangement.

But for fruit as well as flower culture the use of pots will be preferable. Let us see what can be done with these. The superficial area of nearly every city house is more than twelve hundred square feet. Deducting the space required for the statuary and the walks, there will be more than eight hundred square feet on which pots can be placed. By the most approved mode of pruning for pot culture, the diameter of foliage in a fruit tree should never exceed the diameter of the pot. You could thus place eight hundred fruit-trees in your garden, but in order to give abundant room and air we will estimate only four or five hundred. If you wish no flowers, and fruit alone, you can have forced peaches and nectarines at a season when you cannot buy them of the confectioner for less than nine dollars a dozen. From your five hundred small trees a good gardener will readily get a crop of three thousand peaches.

But if you wish the house filled with flowers through the winter, you cannot cultivate forced fruit. You can, however, have flowers, stone fruit and exotic grapes in succession. If the house has been filled with flowering plants all the winter, and you have plenty of yard room, the plants can be taken out and arrayed in groups in the yard as soon as all danger of frost is over. The house can then be filled with peaches, plums and nectarines, in pots. These can remain there till the fruit has attained sufficient size to be protected from insects; when they also can be grouped in the yard, where they will grow and ripen perfectly well. Their place in the house can then be supplied with grapes in pots, which have been retarded by being kept in a cool dark place in the cellar.

These will then bear abundantly during the summer, and before the flowering plants require to be taken in the ensuing fall, will duly respond to the tiller in Black Hamburgs and Muscats.

Two pounds to each vine, or a thousand pounds of grapes, would be a moderate estimate for the space mentioned. Both stone fruits and grapes are easily managed, and a man of ordinary intelligence could soon learn to grow them, even if his life has been passed in the midst of dry-goods or hardware.

Here, then, are new luxuries—flowers, peaches and grapes—within the reach of every man of moderate means.

HOLIDAY GIFTS.—FROM JAPAN.

THE first really valuable invoice of goods from Japan was open for inspection and sale in New York a short time ago. It comprised almost every kind of manufactured Japanese articles, the selections being made with great care and taste, by two gentlemen of acknowledged ability. The lacquered work—the most important—comes from Miaco, the city boasting the highest artistic skill in the empire, renowned for its manufactures, and the articles were furnished by the best dealers in it. Many of the cabinets and boxes are richly ornamented with heavy gold and silver work and plating, the latter being very thick and rich. In some the hinges and fastenings are of pure silver. Constructed of or inlaid with native woods of rare beauty and finish, their various grains blending to produce one harmonious effect, of various descriptions, shapes, and sizes, inlaid and decorated with enamel, gilding, mother-of-pearl, bronze, and lacquer work, japanned and polished up to the highest degree of oriental excellence, they are at once magnificent and marvellous. Japanese ingenuity seems to have been exhausted in the production of the elegant and fantastic in their design and ornament. The polish of these wares is retained for years; it will resist even scalding water. Such cabinets have, we are informed, sold for sixty to eighty dollars each in Hong Kong and Chinese seaports.

There are innumerable chow-chow boxes, containing full sets of trays, plates, etc., such as are used by Japanese princes and noblemen. Many are unusually elaborate and curious, being fashioned to resemble houses, junks, and the like. These, with the writing, smoking, and cigar boxes, constitute a large proportion of the invoice.

The writing boxes contain the receipt from which the ink is manufactured. The smoking boxes are such as those commonly used in Japan, but of the richer description, most of the receptacles for fire being of solid silver. Such boxes passed round the table after dinner, with the accompaniment of cigars, are becoming familiar to our merchants in China. The drawers ordinarily contain different brands of cigars, a piece of charcoal supplying means of ignition. There are, too, many cigar-cases of rattan work of a very durable description. The sakee bottles also invite attention. They commonly contain the spirit of the country, and will make pretty and unique parlor ornaments.

The handkerchief and glove boxes are of the richest old lacquer, very highly ornamented. This ware is most prized and sought after, next to the cabinet work.

The porcelain ware excels that of China, the inhabitants of the flowery country preferring it to their own manufacture. Nothing like it is known elsewhere for delicacy of material and beauty of construction. There are punch and salad bowls, melon dishes, dinner, dessert, and cheese plates, and cups and saucers without number, all ornamental and of the finest porcelain. Add to the above jewelry and snuff boxes, caskets of all sorts and sizes, card trays, shawl cases, toys, pictures, puzzles, bird-cage tools, bows and arrows, chains, trinkets, imitation shells and fishes (all of the brightest colors), pictures with figures in relief, and Japanese knock-knacks of every conceivable and inconceivable description, and our readers may form some idea of the exhibition.

NOTES AND QUERIES.

1. We believe that we have never before given this extremely useful Receipt for Removing Grease Stains from Paper.

Gently warm the greased or spotted part of the paper, and then press upon it pieces of blotting-paper, one after another, so as to absorb as much of the grease as possible. Have ready some fine, clear essential oil of turpentine heated almost to a boiling state, warm the greased leaf a little, and then, with a soft clean brush, wet with the heated turpentine both sides of the spotted part. By repeating this application, the grease will be extracted. Lastly, with another brush, dipped in rectified spirits wine, go over the place, and the grease will no longer appear, neither will the paper be discolored. For valuable manuscripts, books, and engravings, it will be worth the pains and time.

2. New Egyptian Antiquities.—The Bulletin de l'Institut Egyptien states that M. Mariette lately found near a mummy, discovered at Thebes, various curious articles, amongst which were these: Ten gold bracelets for the legs, two other bracelets formed of pearls put on gold threads, another of gold, well executed, bearing mythological symbols; a gold diadem ornamented with mosaics, and surmounted by two sphynxes, a mirror with gold ornaments, a figure of a king standing in a boat with two divinities pouring water on his head and two birds flying above him, a figure of a boat in gold, containing ten silver figures of sailors rowing, and one of a person singing at the prow: a poniard with a gold scabbard, the blade being the finest specimen of Egyptian workmanship yet discovered, and containing incrustated in it a piece of bronze on which are various ornaments and hieroglyphs; and a hatchet, the blade of which is in gold and the handle in wood ornamented with gold.

3. How the Christmas Wreaths look in California.—

"We are in the midst of the holidays," writes one of the best California correspondents, "the groceries, the markets, the streets are green with the boughs of evergreens; redwood and cedar, pines and myrtles give forth their fragrance. The churches are redolent of an odor that I never whiffed in the Atlantic States—it issues from a shrub which looks very much like your bayberry or candleberry. The peculiar aroma at first is that of the bayberry, but close behind it comes a faint smell as of cinnamon—making together a most delicious perfume. With this shrub the pillars of the churches, the gas-pipes and burners, the galleries and pulpits are hung, while roses, geraniums and fuchsias, all grown in the open air, fill up the spaces between the branches, and give a Juny appearance to the room."

4. New Styles of Wreaths and Headdresses.—We gave the information desired by our young lady friends, at length in our last number.

Fashions.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

HAVING had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editor of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Spring and autumn bonnets, materials for dresses, jewelry, envelops, hair-work, worsteds, children's wardrobes, mantillas, and mantelets, will be chosen with a view to economy, as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godey, Esq.

No order will be attended to unless the money is first received. Neither the Editor nor Publisher will be accountable for losses that may occur in remitting.

Instructions to be as minute as is possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice. Dress goods from Levy's or Evans & Co.'s; cloaks, mantillas, or talmas, from Brodie's, 51 Canal Street, New York; bonnets from T. White & Co.'s; jewelry from Warden's or Caldwell's, Philadelphia.

When goods are ordered, the fashions that prevail here govern the purchase; therefore, no articles will be taken back. When the goods are sent, the transaction must be considered final.

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL FASHION-PLATE FOR JANUARY.

RECEPTION AND EVENING-DRESS.

Fig. 1.—Dress of blue glace silk. There are two skirts; the lower one trimmed with ruffles of ribbon, placed in clusters of three, at a little distance apart; the front of the upper skirt has a trimming to correspond, placed en tablier, while the three puffs form with it a tunic; the puffs are caught to their places by garlands of apple-blossoms and grass; the upper one, that on the corsage, and the coronal for the hair, are with the simple foliage of the tree itself.

Fig. 2.—Dress of rich mauve reps. The skirt and corsage quite plain; the richness of the silk, and of the cape and sleeves of point Duchess, worn with it, being all sufficient. This style of corsage presents a decided novelty, and is very elegant. Hair in full raised puffs; coronal of purple Marguerites, without foliage, fastened by a knot of ribbon to the left.

Fig. 3.—Dress of violet and white gaze d'Indie in stripes; trimming, a ruche of white satin ribbon. Square corsage; sleeves with one puff and a frill.

Fig. 4.—Simple and elegant dress of green crape, over green silk; the bouffantes of the skirt, corsage, and sleeves caught up by ruches of white crape. Chataigne of Cape Jessamine blossoms, without foliage; cluster of the same on the left of the skirt; drooping wreath to correspond, mixed with foliage.

Fig. 5.—Dress of thulle, over white silk. The double skirts have alternate puffs of thulle and violet crape; the upper skirt has a broad bouffante of violet crape edged by a puff of lace, and caught at regular intervals by oak leaves in gold, the acorns being in real gold. A cluster of the same forms the bouquet de corsage, while a flat Norma wreath of leaves and acorns is arranged in the hair.

JUVENILE EN COSTUME.

Le Petit Amour in white thulle and rose-colored crape.

DESCRIPTION OF WOOD CUT LATEST FASHIONS.

(See engravings, pages 1, 7, 13.)

CHILDREN'S FASHIONS.

Fig. 1.—Boy of four. Skirt and vest of bright barred poplin; little jacket of plain gray poplin.

Fig. 2.—Street dress for a very young child. Warm cloak of cashmere, embroidered in silk or braid; white satin hood, with a ruche and loops of ribbon inside the brim.

Fig. 3.—Coat dress for little girl, in dark blue merino. The front has a plastron or flat tablier application of the same material, trimmed with braid alone, or braid and fringe, according to fancy.

Fig. 4.—Lad's blouse and trowsers, in dark kersey-mere. Renfrew cap, in black cloth.

Fig. 5.—Dress of scarlet merino, plain and full. Cloth paletot, with wide sleeves trimmed with plush; gray fur collar. Beaver hat, with velvet bands and bows, and a plume de coque to the left.

Fig. 6.—Boy's Raglan of dark cloth, with oval buttons. Renfrew cap in gray; blue neck-tie.

Fig. 7.—Little girl's coat dress of plain poplin, a pearl gray shade. The chemisettes and cuffs are of blue satin, quilted in diamonds. Round hat of blue and black barred velvet.

OPERA HOOD.

STILL another style. This is of split zephyr, of any bright contrasting colors; the balls are passed through a single thread and form a chain, with a new and pretty effect.

THE ALICE NIGHT-DRESS.

We give two excellent designs for the short night-dresses so useful in case of illness, and by many preferred to be worn altogether in the summer season.

The Alice is of white cambric; the sleeve set in a point on the shoulder; the trimming a plaiting of cambric, with a flounce of fine broderie Anglaise set on without fulness.

THE ELSIE NIGHT-DRESS.

Of striped dimity; the ruffles are all made on revers, or to turn back from the neck, front, and wrist. They are also of corded dimity, and the scalloping is done with red cotton, fastened with pearl or gold studs.

CHITCHAT UPON NEW YORK AND PHILADELPHIA FASHIONS, FOR JANUARY

Our Fashion-plate naturally leads to a few more items on the subject of evening dress.

First, as to the width and shape of the skirt: "Ill-made crinoline, worn under ridiculous or wretched toilets, had inspired some ladies who have a strong dislike to anything ugly or common, with a desire to diminish the fulness of dresses and return to the Greek or Roman tunics, but the change was soon found to be altogether impracticable;" is the fiat of the Montieur, to which admirable counsellor we are also indebted for the following valuable suggestion as to the arrangement of the amplitude of evening dress draperies, on which their peculiar elegance so entirely depends:—

"To secure all possible gracefulness in ball dresses, the plaits at top are made wide and then doubled again, and without cutting the stuff to a point; but three points of gores are added at the bottom of the under skirt, one between the widths at each side, and one behind. These points make the lower part of the skirt spread well, and form a train. The front of the skirt is always made shorter to give freedom to the feet."

Again, as to the sleeve: the bell-shaped puff is quite as much in favor as ever; it is always becoming to freshness and youth. Where the arm needs more concealment, a puff and flounce, or two wide flounces may be worn, falling nearly as low as the elbow.

In material, the widest liberty of choice is given. For young ladies, thulle, white and colored crape, gauze, tarleton, and other diaphanous fabrics, are the most suitable. Still, the rich silks (in stripes of contrasting high colors, in noiré, and particularly watered silks, in stripes of large and small waves, or brocaded silks with plain grounds, and Jacquarded figures, seem to be most sought after. They are more costly, but more enduring; they range in price from $4 to $14 and $15 a yard. We have seen one of plain Magenta and pure white, in stripes two inches wide, of oriental richness and lustre; the same may be said of many of the brocaded silks, especially where gold, scarlet, green, and crimson are brought out upon modes, black, mauve, or any plain decided ground.

Among the richest fabrics, however, velvet has regained its place, especially uncut velvet, or velours epingle; the rich shades of crimson and fuchsia colors, and, in fact, all prevailing tints are to be found. Velvet requires very little addition to its elegance. Rich lace is its most suitable ornament. We quote two French styles for making up velvets, which have novelty to recommend them:—

"An ornament on the sleeves of a very pretty nacarat velvet dress made by Mme. Bernard, one of our first rate dressmakers, should be noted. The ornament was formed by a broad gold band, and the body, which was high, was fastened by gold buttons. The skirt, quite plain and long behind, was eleven yards round.

"Another dress by the same maker was made of light peach-bloom velvet, with a plain skirt, a low body, short sleeves formed of large beret of velvet, arranged so as to leave at intervals, hollows, in which was seen a large puff of white satin. The body has draperies arranged contrariwise, reproducing the ornaments of the sleeves, that is to say, in the intervals left by the waved plaits of the velvet white satin puffings were visible. This new fashion, which it requires the pencil rather than the pen to represent intelligibly, is most happily effective."

In a splendid ball given in Paris, one of Gagelin's Pompadour costumes, worn by a youthful bride of remarkable beauty, attracted much notice. This costume consisted of a skirt of green silk looped up in two places on each side by white and pink chieories forming ribbon. The front of this skirt, which was in the apron style, was white satin decorated with white and red roses. The body had a white and pink berth, rounded behind, and beginning in front from the point of the body. The sleeves were white thulle. The headdress consisted of a white and pink chicory on one side, accompanied by roses on the other, and two large white marabouts feathers.

A charming ball cloak made of quilted satin, white outside and pink inside, with a milkmaid's hood, profusely trimmed with white and pink chieories, served to complete this toilet, so fresh and youthful.

In the wedding outfit of the bride just alluded to, among the splendid articles of all kinds, many of which had been obtained from Gagelin's were two French cashmeres, such as had never been made before. Their colors, quite novel, are as lasting as those of India, and their patterns, absolutely unique, presented a wonderful relief.

It will be noticed that necklaces have now regained their old place in popular favor for evening dress.

For all light tissues, flowers or foliage in bouquets, wreaths, agrafes, etc., are the most suitable ornaments. A parne of flowers is often almost as costly as one of gems, and includes a whole set—wreath for the hair, bouquet de corsage, and sprays for the skirt of the dress. A parne of these fragile but exquisite ornaments often costs from $15 to $100, if ordered from the best French houses; but their delicacy is so exquisite as to outrival nature. They may be set in any form most becoming to the wearer. It is absurd to wear a coronal, when a drooping wreath is more becoming, merely because people tell you "round wreaths are the most fashionable;" our steel-plate illustrates this; and the best artists mount a wreath for the face that is to wear it. We may notice among the infinite varieties of styles and blossoms a round headdress of convolvulus, with drooping branches all round, as well as the agrafes of the dress, which came from the celebrated flower manufactory of Tilman, 104 rue de Richelieu. Another headdress composed of China rose-color auriculas, divided into small tufts, accompanied a dress of China rose-silk. One, very light, was made of clematis and orange-bloom: it presented on the forehead a narrow but rounded cordon, which increased in volume behind. Another was composed of periwinkles, white lilac, and waxed orange-bloom. Both were master-pieces of taste. Bouquets to match, of an elongated form, were placed at the side of the waist. Mme. de Latre had also supplied a delightful coronet, formed of pale blue corn-flowers on the right, wheat-ears pointing upwards on the left, and, behind, a large tuft of wheat-ears and blue flowers. Last of all one of cherry-color wild roses and white lilac, extremely fresh and graceful.

When the dress is of a heavier fabric, the ornaments for the hair, which are now so popular, in gilt, etc., are very suitable; also, headdresses combining velvet and flowers of the same material, velvet and gilt, etc.

For a dress of cerise and white, for instance, large cherry-color roses with fancy foliage, daisies, lilac velvet pansies and gold anemones. A large gold torsade incloses it on one side, and a bunch of white lilac hangs down on the other.

For a cherry-color dress covered with a white thulle tunic, a coiffure presenting a cherry velvet torsade fastened by three gold buckles, and terminated on one side by a tuft of white frizzed feathers, on the other by a large bow of two loops blended with another of gold cord, the two long tassels of which hung down on the shoulder.

Lastly, for two toilets of court mourning, the following headdresses:—

A bandeau of black and violet velvet powdered with gold stars and accompanied by two tufts, one very compact, of silk violets, and the other of black and violet bows mixed with gold threads. A torsade of wide mallow ribbon blended with black lace, and fastened at the side by an agrafe of wheat-ears in silver.

Plain dresses continue to be made of thick tissues such as druggets, terry velvets, and poplins.

Ottoman veleurs is perhaps the favorite material for street dresses, and offers a sensible, suitable resistance, for once, to the mud and mire which last year fringed the rich floating flounces of costly robe silks. The corsage is almost invariably round, with a belt; the sleeves are often plain, slit up to a certain height, and buttoned behind the arm with large buttons like those on the front of the body. These buttons are continued down the front of the skirt in the cassock or Empress dresses, which are quite plain in front, and laid in wide plaits behind and at the sides.

The dresses of our best establishments spread out and fall in a peculiarly graceful manner, owing to a new arrangement most happily imagined. Another kind of sleeves is narrow at top without gathers or plaits, and wide at bottom with a turned-up cuff showing the satin lining edged by a ruche. At the top of the arm there is a fancy shoulder-knot with tags. These shoulder-knots as well as the fourragères, the frogs like those worn by hussars, ornaments in the guipure style, badges and medallions made with the crochet, the fichus and berthas of the same kind mixed with jet, are all worn more or less on rich plain goods.

In our notice of Mrs. Scofield's bonnets the past month, an error occurred in the mention of the bridal hat. The ornaments were a barbe of rich blonde, a branch of orange flowers and buds, with a light plume of marabout to the right. A novelty in the cap, was a papillon (butterfly) in velvet and gold, on the right temple.

Short, full feathers—these butterfly ornaments, long grooved leaves in velvet the color of the bonnet—golden ornaments, macarons in steel, pearl, and gilt, are among the chief ornaments of the velvet bonnets. The drawn brim in velvet, is one of the chief novelties, as, for instance, a royal purple brim, thulle cap crown, encircled by a wreath of purple chrysanthemums with golden centres. Velvet cape covered by a frill of blonde. As to colors, fuchsia, rose des Alpes, mauve, royal purple, pale and very deep green, all the clarets and maroons with deep blue, will be among the most popular. Of course the bonnets can be made as plain as desirable; one has infinite choice, and a person with good taste, may combine the best points of two or three in her order. The blonde cap is optional; brides of black lace, and plaitings of ribbon, or plaited bands extending from the forehead to the cheek are substituted in many, and an attempt will be made to do away with the cap altogether. The satin linings, put on with a colored cord or piping, betokens this, and foreshadows the style of next spring's straws.

Our notice of Genin's furs must necessarily lie over another month, owing to the crowd of information accumulating at this season of the year. FASHION.

HOOPS AND FARTHINGALES.

THE merry dames of Elizabeth's court, in a wild spirit of fun, adopted the fashion of hideously deforming farthingales, to ridicule the enormous trunk-hose worn by gentlemen of that period, determined, if not successful in shaming away the absurdity altogether, at least to have a preposterous contrivance of their own. The idea was full of woman's wit. But, alas!

LADY OF REIGN OF GEORGE III.

they were caught in their own snare; precious stones were profusely displayed on the bodices and skirts of brocade gowns, and vanity soon discovered that the stiff whalebone framework under the upper skirt formed an excellent showcase for family jewels. The passion for display thus gratified, the farthingale at once became the darling of court costume, and in its original shape continued in feminine favor till the reign of Queen Anne, when it underwent the modification lately revived for us—the hoop.

In vain did the Spectator lash and ridicule by turns the “unnatural disguisement;” in vain did grossest caricatures appear, and wits exhaust their invention in lampoons and current epigrams; in vain even the publication of a grave pamphlet, entitled “The Enormous Abomination of the Hoop-petticoat, as the Fashion now is;” the mode, for once immutable, stands on the page of folly an enduring monument to feminine persistency.

Encouraged by the prolonged and undisputed sway of the farthingale, the hoop maintained an absolute supremacy through the three succeeding reigns, though often undergoing changes which only served to make it more and more ridiculous. The most ludicrous of these alterations were the triangular-shaped hoops, which, according to the Spectator, gave a lady all the appearance of being in a go-cart; and the “pocket-hoops,” which looked like nothing so much as panniers on the sides of a donkey—we mean the quadruped. In a print, bearing date 1780, we find this absurdity ridiculed in the figure of a girl so attired, placed beside a pannier-laden ass. A droll incident is related by Bulwer about the wife of an English ambassador to Constantinople, in the time of James I. The lady, attended by her serving-women, all attired in enormous farthingales, waited upon the sultana, who received them with every show of respect and hospitality. Soon, however, the woman's curiosity got the better of her courtesy, and she gravely asked if it were possible that such could be the shape peculiar to the women of England. The English lady, in reply, hastened to assure her that their forms in no wise differed from those of the women of other countries, and carefully demonstrated to her highness the construction of their dress, which alone bestowed the appearance so puzzling to her. There could scarcely be a more wholesome satire upon the absurd fashion than is conveyed in the simple recital of this well-authenticated anecdote.

A French paper gives an amusing anecdote of a lady who went to a cathedral to "confess" in a hooped petticoat; of course it was necessary to enter the tiny confessional and prostrate herself before the iron grating between her and the priest. In vain did she make vigorous efforts at the door to compress her unyielding dress; it stoutly refused, swelling like an air bed in all sorts of ludicrous tumors at every new endeavor, until, scarlet with confusion, the lady turned and hastily made her escape, unshriven, with a few additional sins of impatience, anger, and wounded vanity to enumerate on her return.

The monstrous appearance of the ladies' hoops, when viewed behind, may be seen from the following cut, copied from one of Rigaud's views (1740). The exceedingly small cap, at this time fashionable, and the close upturned hair beneath it, give an extraordinary meanness to the head, particularly when the liberality of gown and petticoat is taken into consideration. The lady to the left wears a black hood with an ample fringed cape, which envelopes her shoulders, and reposes on the summit of the hoop. The gentleman wears a small wig and bag; the skirts of his coat are turned back, and were sometimes of a color different from the rest of the stuff of which it was made, as were the cuffs and lapels.

What a curious picture of the "hoop" times do we gain from a play of an early period!—"Five hours ago," says one of the characters, "I set a dozen maids to attire a boy like a nice gentlewoman; but there is such doing with their looking-glasses; pinning, unpinning; setting, unsetting; forming and conforming; painting of blue veins and cheeks; such a stir with sticks, combs, cascanets, dressings, purls, fall squares, busks, bodices, scarfs, necklaces, carcanets, rabatoes, borders, tires, fans, pallisadoes, puffs, ruffs, cuffs, muffs, pusles, fustles, partiets, frizlets, bandlets, fillets, corslets, pendulets, amulets, annulets, bracelets, and so many lets (stops or hindrances), that she is scarce dressed to the girdle. And now there is such calling for farthingales, kirtles, busk-points, shoe-ties, and the like, that seven peddlers' shops—nay, all Stourbridge Fair will scarcely furnish her. A ship is sooner rigged by far than a gentlewoman made ready."

"For the abolition of hoops at court we are indebted to the taste of George IV.," says Planché, in his "History of British Costume." Pity it is that they should be revived under a female sovereign; or, if not revived, their place supplied by a contrivance which, if lighter, produces the same preposterous effect. We allude of course to CRINOLINE, against which we are quite inclined to join in a crusade, as our readers may probably have already gathered.

We commend to their serious attention the following forcible remarks upon the absurdity, not to say worse, of inflated skirts, from a daily paper:—

"We have no pretensions to erudition in the specific nomenclature of the various structures of horsehair, basket-work, watch-spring, whale-bone, iron bars, buckram, wire gauze, and osier-plaiting now used by ladies for the purpose of distending their skirts to a preternatural degree of amplitude. It will be sufficient, we trust, to apply the generic term 'crinoline' to all the preposterous fabrics which convert that human form once called 'divine,' and idealized in the Venus de Medicis, into the similitude now of a Chinese tombola, now of a gigantic washing-bowl, now of a great bell covered with variegated silk, now of the receiver of a colossal air-pump. The hideous fashion of crinoline, then, dates its second efflorescence—for, in the shape of hoops and panniers, it flourished with rank luxuriance a century since—from the time of the union of the Countess Eugenie de Montijo with that exemplary public and private character who in 1852 gloried in being a parvenu, and is now hail-fellow-well-met with the Mon. sieur mon frère of the Emperor Alexander. From the adoption of crinoline at the Tuileries resulted certainly its establishment in the other courts and cities of Europe. It spread like the plague. The trade winds bore it with wide-waving wings to the West Indies. The Gulf Stream has naturalized it on the remote shores of the Spanish Main. The primeval female settlers in New York, in the days when it was a Dutch colony, were remarkable for wearing a round dozen of linsey woolsey petticoats: but the large-skirted belles of Broadway and Fifth Avenue now put, with a single under garment, their great-great-grandmothers to shame. Crinoline is an indispensable adjunct of the gala costume of colored persons at 'dignity balls;' and if its pestiferous influence continues to extend itself, we may look for the assumption of this unsightly fashion by Zulu Kaffirs in their filthy Kraals, and by the tattooed tirewomen of Queen Pomare."

The extent to which people may be led to disfigure themselves by a blind compliance with the fashion of the day was never more strikingly displayed than in the custom of dotting the face with black patches of different patterns. It might easily be supposed that the annexed sketch is a caricature, but such is not the case; it is a correct likeness of a lady in the time of Charles the First, with her face in full dress. Patching was much admired during the reign of that sovereign and for several succeeding years. Some authors think that the fashion came originally from Arabia. No sooner was it brought to England and France than it became an absolute fureur. In the former country, old and young, the maiden of sixteen and the gray-haired grandmamma, covered their faces with these black spots shaped like suns, moons, stars, hearts, crosses, and lozenges, and some even, as in the instance before us, carried the mode to the extravagant extent of shaping the patches to represent a carriage and horses.

CROCHET WORK.

SUMMER in the silent heaven,
Whence the lark had dropped to rest!
Summer in the flowery hollow!
Summer on the mountain's crest!
Summer in the girlish tresses!
And the fair face lightly bent
By a window where their shadows
In the breezy maples sent.
O'er her snowy robe they rippled,
O'er the braided chestnut hair,
O'er the white hands glancing fitly
Through the silken network there.
From the blue eyes bent and earnest
O'er the graceful task she wrought,
Downward drooped the heavy fingers
With her languor or her thought.
Gold and purple was the tissue
That those taper fingers wove,
And the soft light for the picture,
Was it wanting? happy love!
Lo, a figure leant beside her,
Tall and dark her beauty by!
Like a cedar of the forest,
With a rose plant blooming nigh!
And love never yet had language,
If it spoke not there by chance,
Through that cheek of dusky olive—
Through that dark and tender glance.

Through the glance that watched the playing
Of the shadows on her hair,
Watched the silken meshes gliding
O'er the slender fingers fair.
"Ah!" he said, "'tis woman's mission,
And it suits you passing well!
Binding thought, and hope, and daring,
In your strong and silken spell.
"Golden thread, 'tis woman's fancy!
Crooked needle, woman's wile!"
Flashed her blue eyes into archness,
Shone her red lips in a smile.
"No," she said, "the crooked needle
Is the crooked natures, wrought
By a woman's patient guiding,
Into sunny woofs of thought!
"Oft amid her wisest working,
Will it wound her fingers sore;
Oft a touch, a careless motion,
And the silken spell is o'er!
"And when even fast and finished,
Is it worth the golden hours
Wasted o'er it? worth the summer,
And the sunshine, and the flowers?
"Worth the rose that bloomed and faded
While she loitered o'er it there?
Or the hopes that spread their pinions
And then vanished in the air?"

CHAPTER V.

"THE NIGHT OF SONG."

So song—like fate itself—is given
To scare the idler thoughts away;
To raise the human to the holy;
To wake the spirit from the clay.—SCHILLER.

EDITH and her pupils lingered in the library until dinner-time, looking over the books and conversing; Edith gaining a great deal of information without asking any questions, for Martha was very communicative, and needed no encouragement to go on, and would have given the whole family history had not Edith interrupted her, when she found that she was trespassing on delicate ground, by asking some trifling question about their place of worship.

"We usually go to the Baptist church," replied Martha, "though papa is an Episcopalian; but there is no Episcopal church nearer than Augusta, and the Baptist is only six miles from here. Let me see. Look here, Mary," said she, addressing her sister, "is there preaching next Sunday?"

"I believe so," answered Mary—"yes, I know there is, for I heard papa tell Uncle Peter that Mr. Ward was coming home with us, and would preach to the blacks in the evening."

"Can you ride horseback, Miss Edith?" asked Martha, displaying a great deal of interest; but, without waiting for a reply, she continued: "Because if you can't, why, you'll have to learn right away; for there is only a foot-path to the meeting-house, and we can't go in the carriage without going two miles out of our way. But if you can't ride in the saddle, I reckon you can ride behind papa, for our horses all tote double."

Edith, very much amused, asked what she meant by "toting double."

"Why, carrying two, of course. Didn't you ever see anybody ride behind like a bag of meal coming from mill?"

Edith confessed her ignorance of that mode of travelling, and Martha proceeded to explain.

"Why, if you ride behind papa, you will have the saddle blanket to sit on, and you will find it a very comfortable seat, if you don't tumble off; but you won't do that if you put your arm around papa, and hold on to his coat. That's the way I used to do before I had my horse. I've such a splendid horse, Miss Edith; his name is Selim, and he knows me as well as the green grass he eats. Don't be, Mary?"

"Your riding skirt is green, Matty, and I reckon that is the reason," said Mary, with the most innocent manner in the world, though Edith detected a smile lurking around the corners of her mouth.

"If that is the reason, you better keep out of his way," replied her sister, tartly, "for you look exactly like a blade of grass in your green skirt, and he might snap you up by mistake."

"Ha! ha!" laughed out Nelly, who was setting things to rights. "You better not sed anyt'ing, Miss Mary, for Miss Matty always comes out of an argiment upside down."

"You mean right side up, Nelly," said Mary, laughing. "But mind your dusting, and don't disturb papa's book there, for you know he doesn't like his books and papers interfered with." And, as she moved the volume carefully to one side, Edith's eye caught the title of a poem, and she smiled as she said to her self: "No, George, no fear of the governess being treated shabbily by one having a taste for Schiller."

The sight of the volume recalled to her mind the little reading circle around the work-table at home; and, repeating from her mother's favorite poem, "The Battle,"

"Brothers, God grant when this life is o'er

In the life to come that we meet once more,"

she left the library, in company with the girls, to obey the summons to dinner.

The dining-room, a long, narrow apartment, contained no furniture save the chairs and table and an old-fashioned sideboard with marble top and glass reflectors. The floor was covered with matting, and on the walls were hung a few pictures in heavy gilt frames. Aunt Cilla, a middle-aged negro woman, waited upon the table, and Josh, the black boy before alluded to, stood behind his master's chair, and, by means of a long string, kept in motion a covered frame or fan which was suspended to the ceiling, and served to keep off the flies.

Edith noticed Mr. Ellis more particularly than she had before done, and perceived for the first time the striking likeness between Mary and her father. "Then Martha must look like her mother," thought she, and, glancing at the young lady who, by right of seniority, occupied the seat at the head of the table, she wondered if the mother had been as slovenly in appearance, and thinking, if so, the contrast must have been as great between the parents as in the daughters. Mr. Ellis was a tall, fine-looking man, with a head which phrenologists would have pronounced "intellectual," large hazel eyes like Mary's, and thick, wavy chestnut hair, which fell back from his broad, polished forehead without betraying a single thread of silver. His dress was neat, even to preciseness, and his manners were easy, conversing without effort. He did not seem to look upon Edith as a stranger, but asked questions about her journey, often anticipating her replies, and making comments as if she had just returned to Beech Bluff after a short absence, instead of having arrived only the day before a perfect stranger.

After the meal was finished, Mr. Ellis asked Edith if she had tried the piano.

"No, I have not," she replied; "we have spent the morning in the library."

"Will you do so now, and favor us with some music?"

"Certainly, if you wish it."

And, rising from the table, they passed through the family sitting-room into a large, elegantly furnished apartment with windows opening to the floor and commanding a view of the lawn. Opposite the door at which they entered was an immense fireplace with marble mantel, above which hung the portrait of a lady so much resembling Martha that Edith guessed it at once to be that of her mother. The centre-table was covered with elegantly bound books and numerous expensive trifles, betokening a refined taste either in the master or mistress of the house—perhaps both.

Mr. Ellis opened the instrument, which stood in a recess between two doors—one leading into the library and the other into the school-room—and then seated himself at one of the windows. Mary knelt on a low ottoman at his side, and leaned on the arm of his chair, while her sister commenced pacing slowly up and down the room, tracing out the pattern of the rich Brussels carpet with her foot, until arrested by her sister's rather impatient "Don't, Matty! Please sit down!"

Running her fingers lightly over the keys,

Edith commenced playing selections from a favorite opera. Martha was at her side in a moment, her face expressing the utmost delight; and when the music ceased eagerly begged for "something else." Edith continued to play piece after piece without turning round to note the effect upon her other listeners, for, indeed, she had almost forgotten their presence, so occupied was she with Martha, whose countenance varied with the expression of the music until Edith thought her positively beautiful. At length she ceased playing, and was about to rise from her seat, when Mary touched her lightly on the shoulder, and asked, in a timid voice, if she would not sing something. "O yes, do!" pleaded Martha, adding, in a low voice, "papa is so fond of vocal music!"

Playing a short prelude, she commenced that beautiful Scotch ballad, "Annie Laurie," and as her clear, rich voice rang through the rooms, no other sound was audible save the chirping of birds and insects; for, with the negro's characteristic love of music, the house-servants had suspended work, and were gathered in silent groups at the open doors and windows. Uncle Sigh had thrown down his pruning-hook at the first sound of the piano, and his dusky form leaned against the library door, hat in hand, and his gray woolly head bent forward, as if afraid of losing a single note.

No Prima Donna could possibly have felt more gratified at the repeated encores of a large audience, than did Edith at the effect of this simple ballad upon her hearers. Silence reigned even after the last note had died away, and was not broken until she rose to leave the instrument; and then, Martha—the untamable, harum-scarum, wild, wilful Martha—threw her arms around Edith's neck and burst into tears, exclaiming, "I can't help it, Miss Edith, indeed I can't, for I am so sorry that I intended to be so disagreeable if you wouldn't let me have my own way. When I feel wicked, you will sing to me, won't you?"

Edith was taken completely by surprise at this unexpected reception of her song, and scarcely knew how to act. Mr. Ellis, seeing her embarrassment, stepped forward to relieve it, and placing his hand on his daughter's head, he said, smilingly, "Ah, Matty, I knew there was some good in you; I do not despair of your becoming civilized yet." And then turning to Edith, who had been pulled back upon the piano-stool by Martha's weight, and who blushed intensely as his eye rested upon her face, he continued, "Whose breast has mail to music proof? not Matty's, certainly. Your 'magic measures' seem to have entered her soul, and I hope they will have an abiding influence."

"It seems to me," said Edith, "like a flash of sunshine dispelling the cloud of doubts and fears in which I was enveloped this morning, after listening to a portion of Miss Hannah's experience from the young ladies; I doubted my own strength and wisdom to govern rightly, and I feared the school-room might witness some unpleasant scenes, but Matty's confession of her hostile intentions and her penitence encourages me to believe that we will get along most amicably. What do you think, Matty?" said she, raising Martha's flushed face to her own, and imprinting a kiss upon her cheek.

"Why, I think I'll try to be very good."

"And when you are bad, honey, Miss Eden can punish you by not singing," interrupted Uncle Sigh, who had bowed himself into the room, and stood in the most deferential attitude before the group at the piano.

"Well, Sigh, how did you like the music?" said his master.

"Bery fine, Massa Jacob, bery fine;" replied the old negro, with a succession of bows. "I tink it am sperior to Miss Hannah's playing wid one hand. Howsomever, I would like to ask Miss Eden if she can sing any camp-meeting hymns, case I tink her voice am perticly calkilated for dat perticular style ob music."

Mr. Ellis seemed very much inclined to laugh, though he refrained from doing so out of respect to the old man's feelings, who obviously thought he had paid Edith a very great compliment.

"I play and sing a great deal of sacred music," said Edith, but "never having attended a camp-meeting, I am ignorant of the style you speak of."

"Den you is not a Methodist?"

"No, I am an Episcopalian."

Evidently disappointed that Edith was not of his "pursuasion," he thanked her—for what she did not know—and bowed himself out of the room; and a moment after, Aunt Cilla's voice was heard in no very gentle tones, chiding him for his "indignity in standing so long 'mong de white folks in de big room. I reckon Miss Eden 'll sing agin fore she gwines home, but dat rose-bush you dug up and lef in de sun won't hold up it's head agin if it dies, dat's sartin;" to which Uncle Sigh made some rejoinder, and was answered in a still louder key, "camp-meetings am all bery well in der place, but don't you go to brung 'em in de house for to bodder young marster."

"Uncle Sigh and Aunt Cilla are both old house servants," said Mr. Ellis, in answer to Edith's questioning look, "and therefore privileged. Aunt Cilla was my nurse when I was a child, and though 'old marster' has been dead these ten years, she continues to call me 'young marster,' and will do so when I am gray, if she lives till then. She forgets that I am a few years older than when she used to protect me from the mischievous annoyances of the 'little darkies.'"

"Is she Uncle Sigh's wife?" asked Edith.

"Yes, and she thinks a heap of her old man; but the camp-meeting fever he gets occasionally annoys her excessively, for she is a member of the Baptist Church. But they are good, pious old negroes, both of them."

"Why are they called 'Uncle' and 'Aunt'?"

"It is a mark of respect to the old negroes on the place, as much as the 'Miss' in addressing you."

"I am becoming enlightened," said Edith, laughing. "The idea of your having any respect for your slaves is quite a new one to me."

"I suppose so," said Mr. Ellis, good-naturedly; "but I hope you will have a better opinion of Southern planters when you go home; I have no doubt you will acknowledge yourself a Northerner with Southern principles, unless you have come here to 'make a note' of the objectionable features of slavery for the purpose of writing a book, which I very much doubt, for you look too honest."

"Oh, if you are becoming suspicious of me," said Edith, laughing, "I had better travel home again as soon as possible. At all events, I must not ask any more questions on the subject. But do I look as if I could write a book? one that would settle the affairs of the nation?"

"Well, not particularly; I have not discovered any blue stockings yet," rejoined Mr. Ellis, jocosely; "but," he added, more seriously, "I have no doubt you would be as much missed if you were to leave us now, though you have been here so short a time, as was Mr. Stillingfleet in his absence from the Blue Stocking Club, in the days of Dr. Johnson. How would you like to have Miss Edith run home without beginning school!" addressing his daughters.

"Oh, not at all," said Mary; "she has promised to read so many books with me, and besides, Matty wouldn't become civilized."

Here the conversation was interrupted by the sound of the tea-bell. After tea, Martha, who had been unusually quiet during the meal, proposed a walk in the garden.

"Take your flute along, papa, and play for us, please, on the Indian mound."

"Bring it from the library, then," said her father; and in a moment it was in his hand, and the two girls were running on, leaving their father and Edith to follow at their leisure.

"There is a remarkable echo on the mound Martha mentioned," said Mr. Ellis, as they proceeded slowly down the walk, "which, when I play my flute, has almost the effect of a duet, the players situated at a distance from each other. The mound is an artificial elevation, supposed to have been thrown up by the Indians during the skirmishes in the early part of the Revolution. Whether that particular spot was selected to make the echo answer a 'savage' purpose, I am unable to say, but think it very likely. It is a favorite resort of Martha's, who goes there for the purpose of exercising her lungs, I judge, for I often hear her sending forth sounds very like an Indian war-whoop, which the distant hill faithfully returns."

"What was that?" asked Edith, starting suddenly, as a sound, not unlike the shriek of a locomotive, fell on her ear, twice in succession, though more distant the second time.

"It is confirmation strong of what I've been telling you," answered her companion, laughing heartily. "The young lady has reached the mound before us."

A few more steps brought them in sight of the spot; Mary had thrown herself on the grass, while Martha, having planted herself directly in the middle of the green knoll, was inflating her lungs preparatory to a repetition of the shriek, when she saw her father and Edith approaching; running down to meet them, she exclaimed eagerly, "Did you hear the echo? wasn't it splendid?"

Mr. Ellis played several familiar airs, and Edith was charmed with both the music and the echo.

"I am not surprised at Matty's fancy for the spot," said she, "for it is certainly very attractive; and such a delightful resting-place under the shade of this sycamore."

As they turned to leave the mound, she remarked that the flute was an agreeable accompaniment to the piano.

"Yes," said Mr. Ellis, "I used to accompany Mrs. Ellis when she played."

"Do the girls play?" asked Edith, thinking that she ought to have asked the question in the afternoon.

"Not of any consequence. Their mother gave them lessons, but they never liked to practise, and we did not urge them to it, though Martha has a decided talent for music, and possesses a fine voice. Miss Hannah was not at all musical, and since Mrs. Ellis's death, the piano has seldom been opened."

When they entered the house, Mr. Ellis, looking at his watch, desired Nelly to ring the bell for prayers. The house-servants and those of the field hands who were church-members, assembled in the sitting-room with the family, and listened attentively to the reading of the Psalms for the evening, and during the prayer bowed their heads reverentially.

That night Edith laid her head on her pillow in thankfulness that her lines had been cast in such a pleasant place. Thoughts of home filled her mind; mother, brother, sister, and friend, each and all claimed their share of remembrance, and thinking of them she fell asleep.

CHAPTER VI.

CHESTNUT GROVE.

The very sooth of it is, that an ill habit has the force of an ill fate.—L'ESTRANGE.

THE next day was Saturday, and as Edith had been informed that Uncle Anthony was sent to the post-office every Saturday evening, she seated herself in the library directly after breakfast, for the purpose of writing letters home.

"O Miss Edith, Miss Edith!" exclaimed Mary and Martha in the same breath—running on to the piazza, and throwing open the window-shutter, "papa is going to Chestnut Grove instead of Uncle Anthony, and he says that we can go along. He is going directly after dinner, about four o'clock."

"Are you going in the carriage?" asked Edith.

"No ma'am, on horseback."

"But you know I never rode."

"I told papa," said Martha, "that you could not ride horseback—I mean that you never did ride—and he said you could take your first lesson to-day, and I am to ride one of the carriage-horses and let you have Selim, and Mary is going to ride behind papa."

"But I have no skirt," suggested Edith.

"Never mind that; nobody'll see us but Mr. Irving and the blacks; but you might wear mine, only it would be a mile too large for your waist, and Mary's is a yard too short for you."

Smiling at the "mile" and "yard," Edith, after thinking a moment, said—

"Perhaps I can alter the skirt of my travelling-dress."

"Is it tucked?" asked Martha.

"No," said Edith; "but it has a deep hem, and is turned in at the top."

"That 'll do first-rate," said Martha; "I'll get it, and give it to Oak; she 'll fix it." And running up stairs she brought the dress down; and, calling a girl who was sewing in the sitting-room, she handed it to her, saying—

"There, Oak, Miss Edith wants you to fix that dress for her to ride in."

"Yes, Oak," said Edith, "I would like you to let down the skirt, if you please."

"Der 's a right smart turned in, Miss Eden, and I reckon the hem won't have to come out," said the girl, examining it.

"Very well," returned Edith; "let it down at the waist, then, and I guess it will do for this afternoon and to-morrow."

"Better keep it for ridin', Miss Eden, for you won't get anything as purty dis side 'Gusta; allers 'mired dark gray misel. Young missus and Miss Mary ort to have some black 'terial for der skirts, for dey looks very funny a ridin' out wid black bodies and green skirts; but dey don't know, and Massa Jacob don't neber notice wimmen's fixin's. I reckon I'll ax him to git some dis evenin';" and nodding her head with a "dat 's so," she disappeared, leaving Edith alone.

The letters were finished before dinner-time, and going up to her room, Edith found her dress, finished and neatly pressed, lying on the bed. The young ladies' room adjoined hers, and she heard Mary expostulating in an earnest tone with her sister.

"Please don't wear that log-cabin, Matty, for you look so ugly in it. Wear the white sun-bonnet."

"I'll do nothing of the kind," said her sister. "The white sun-bonnet is so small it shows all my hair."

"Well, can't you comb your hair? You haven't combed it since the last time we went to church, I am sure."

"Indeed, I combed it the day papa went to Augusta for Miss Edith."

"I saw Miss Edith look at your head yesterday," said Mary, "and I reckon she did not think it looked very neat."

"I suppose then that she 'll begin at my head to civilize me; but what are you going to wear?"

"My garden-hat."

"You look just like a boy in it, with your short curls."

"Mamma used to like it, you know, and it is so comfortable. But here comes Nelly; won't you let her plait your hair, and tie on the black ribbons?"

"No, indeed; plaiting breaks the hair."

"I don't think it breaks it half as much as the hard knot you leave it tied in," said Mary.

"Come, Miss Matty," said Nelly, who entered just then to assist her young ladies in dressing, "low me to comb up your har, and 'stonish de fo'ks wid a smooove head."

"I'll 'stonish' you with something else," said her young mistress, "if you don't have my saddle blanket and riding-skirt ready. And tell Uncle Peter to put the martingales on Flash, or his head will be in my mouth all the way, and I don't like the flavor."

"What are you going to do with that album, Matty?" asked Mary.

"Why, my name has never been written in it since papa gave it to me, and I saw Miss Edith's portfolio, and she draws beautifully; and I'll just ask her—"

"O sister!" interrupted Mary; "let me write your name in it!"

"You! indeed I'll not! Miss Edith 'll do it with a flourish; she 'll make an elegant pig, or something, and write my name on the side of it."

"Where is the post-office, Mary?" asked Edith, putting her head in at the door.

"On the store door," answered Martha.

"On the store door?" repeated Edith, interrogatively.

"Yes, ma'am; it's nothing but a letter-box. Mr. Irving keeps the store and 'tends to the mail. But I declare, Mary, if there aren't the horses! and a mule! And the dinner bell hasn't rung! Here, you Nellie! run down and ask Aunt Cilla if she's going to send Josh along on the mule with the dinner."

"There's the bell now," said Mary.

"Uncle Peter was aforehand wid de beasts, case marster gin him half holiday to gwine over to Dudley's plantation to see his old 'oman, and I reckon he's in a hurry," said Nelly, as they went into the dining-room.

"Are you timid, Miss Edith?" asked Mr. Ellis, as Edith stood on the block ready to mount.

"I don't think I feel particularly courageous, but I presume we are not going in a gallop," answered Edith, smiling.

"We will not! Matty will probably disappear as soon as she is in her saddle; but we will ride slowly, though you would find it much easier riding if you would let Selim strike into a pace, for he is a fine pacer," said Mr.

Ellis, as he assisted Edith into the saddle. "Now seat yourself firmly, and take the bridle in this hand—between your fingers, so! Is your foot in the stirrup? No. There, all right so far. Here, Peter, lead Selim off a few steps to make room for Flash."

Seated on her horse, Edith looked around with a great degree of interest to see the others mount. Martha walked to the block in a manner so stately, and so out of character with her dress, that Edith laughed in spite of herself.

The long green skirt trailed on the ground behind, while the wearer held it up in front at a fashionable height, revealing the hem of her black dress, and displaying her well turned ankle in a manner that would have done credit to a city belle. Her arms and shoulders were shaded by a cape of white dimity, reaching to the waist, and tied at the neck with black ribbons. The log-cabin sun-bonnet, which had so shocked her sister's pride, was of blue berdè, made with casings, into which were run pieces of pasteboard, bringing it far over the face and most effectually concealing the uncombed hair. In her hand she carried a switch, stripped of all its leaves, except a few at the end, which bobbed about as if nodding in recognition of the green skirt. Stepping upon the block, she adjusted the saddle-cloth, then, seizing the pommel of the saddle, she sprang into her seat with astonishing agility, considering her weight, and without farther ceremony than a wave of her hand, and "I'll wait for you at the Branch," she galloped down the lawn and was soon out of sight. Her father looked after her a moment, then mounting his own horse he rode to the block to take up Mary, who looked so exceedingly pretty in her little garden hat with its black ribbons, that Edith did not wonder at her preference for it; though, to be sure, the short curls did give her somewhat of a boyish appearance. Her arms and shoulders were bare, and as she gathered up her long skirt with one tiny, white hand, Edith thought "What a lovely picture!" Seating herself behind her father, she threw one arm around him, and, peeping around at Edith, she said, with the usual blush, "This is such a nice broad seat."

Selim deserved all the encomiums his mistress bestowed upon him, for he was indeed a noble animal. Edith thought he displayed a great deal of sagacity in turning so cautiously, as if aware that he was carrying a timid rider, and as he followed the slow steps of Uncle Peter down the lawn, she felt quite as safe as if she were walking. Holding the gate open,

Uncle Peter touched his cap respectfully, saying, "Gib Selim de bridle when you get to de big road, Miss Edin, and don't 'tempt to guide him, for you mought steer wrong, and he knows de way."

Mr. Ellis smiled, and said to Edith, "You ought to become an accomplished horse-woman, with so many to teach you."

"Yes," said Edith, "I ought to know something about riding; Matty gave me a lesson." And then she laughed as she recollected that a part of her instructions was to throw her arm around Mr. Ellis and hold on to his coat.

"We must not allow you to contract any bad habits in the beginning," said Mr. Ellis; "so you will permit me to commence at once to correct any that I notice. Firstly, you bend forward too much; and, secondly, your muscles are too much on the strain; relax them, and hold yourself up, for, in your present position, if Selim were to stumble, you would be thrown over his head without any warning. And that would be an ill fate indeed. There, that is better!" said he, approvingly, as Edith drew back her shoulders and settled herself more comfortably in the saddle.

"You spoke of Selim being a fine pacer," said Edith. "I must acknowledge my ignorance of the term as applied to horses."

"Webster will tell you that pacing signifies lifting the feet on the same side together," returned Mr. Ellis. "If you feel inclined to give him—I mean Selim, not Webster—a trial, just give your bridle a sudden jerk, and he will understand the signal."

Edith obeyed, and the horses paced along together in a manner which she thought much more agreeable than the tedious walk; and as her timidity gradually wore off she began to enjoy the ride.

"I hear horses' feet down the road," said Mary, "and I reckon Matty is coming back to meet us. Yes, there she is; I caught a glimpse of her white cape." And, in a moment, Matty galloped up to them, and, wheeling her horse, exclaimed—

"How dolefully slow you ride. But how nicely you sit, Miss Edith! Don't you think you could gallop with me, now?"

Edith declined, saying she thought that would do for another lesson.

"I've been waiting at the Branch fully ten minutes," said Martha, "and do you know, papa, that it is swollen from the rain last week, and we'll have to ford it?"

"What are you going to do, Martha?" asked Edith.

"Why, let our horses swim across," answered Martha. "I'll go in first, and you do just like me; drop your bridle, pull up your skirt, and pick up your feet in this way." And, suiting the action to the word, she made a perfect bunch of herself, and looked so comical with her feet upon the horse's neck, that the rest of the party laughed aloud.

The sound of running water notified them that they were near the "Branch," and a turn in the road brought them to the side of it. "Come on!" said Martha, and her horse plunged in and crossed the narrow stream; laughing, she called from the otherside, "Don't let Selim shake you off, Miss Edith, when he comes out!"

"I stand shivering on the brink and fear to launch away," said Edith to Mr. Ellis, who was waiting for her to arrange her skirt. He laughed, and, taking the bridle over his arm, said, "Are you ready?"—and before she had time to assent or object, the horses were bearing them over almost without perceptible motion.

"Well," said Edith, "I feel as if I had performed a wonderful feat; something in the 'grand and lofty tumbling' style."

"'Twas first-rate!" said Martha (that "first-rate" being with her the superlative degree of excellence). "You are a heap more sensible than Miss Hannah. Why, we never got her 't'other side of Jordan' while she was at the Bluff."

"Martha!" said her father, sternly.

And, coloring slightly, she gave the pasteboards a sudden jerk over her face, saying: "I'll meet you at the store." Waving her switch in a majestic manner, she brought it down on her horse's neck, and the log-cabin and green skirt were again in rapid motion.

The "store" was a low wooden building with a porch in front, but without any sign over the door or display of goods in the windows to indicate that it was a place of business. The broken panes of glass and tumble-down fence gave the whole place a dilapidated appearance, and Edith thought the grove at the back of the house looked far more inviting than the crazy looking porch in which were sitting several men, who all arose and disappeared in the dark looking door when our party approached.

"Where's Matty? There's Flash with her skirt on the saddle," said Mary.

"Gone round to see Janett, Miss Mary," said a gentleman, stepping from the porch. Then, saluting Mr. Ellis with a nod and "How do, Ellis?" he gave Edith an inquisitive look; and, at Mr. Ellis's introduction, "Mr. Irving, Miss Stanford," bowed quite low, and, lifting his head with a jerk, said: "Happy to make your 'quaintance, ma'am. Right smart rain last week. 'Sist you to 'light, ma'am?" Edith extended her hand; and, grasping it in a business-like manner, he almost pulled her off the block; then, wheeling around so suddenly as to make the horse start, he addressed himself to Mr. Ellis: "Horses want water, Ellis? Yes? Here, you Jack, take horses to creek"—abbreviating his words and sentences as if life were too short to allow the use of pronouns and articles, and there was an absolute necessity for abridging all other words.

"What'll look at, Ellis?" said Mr. Irving, as they stood beside the counter in the not very cleanly looking store.

"I believe the young ladies wish some black material for riding skirts."

"Nice alpacas? Nothing else to show. Best in the 'ouse," replied Mr. Irving, elevating his eyebrows and striking the counter at every exclamation."

"That will do, Mr. Irving," said Martha, thrusting her pasteboards in a window near him. "Please cut off twelve yards, and don't forget the sewing-silk."

"Letters for you, Ellis, top the pile. Yes, Miss Matty, twelve yards."

Walking to a desk behind the door, Mr. Ellis took up the letters, and, looking them over, put three in his pocket. Edith looked at them wistfully, but said to herself: "It is too soon; I'll not receive any for a week;" then, taking those she had written out of her pocket, she was about to hand them to Mr. Ellis, when Mary stepped to the door, and lifting the lid of a small wooden box that was nailed to it on the inside, she said, with a look of sly humor: "Put them in the office, Miss Edith."

The purchases were made, and stowed away in a small carpet-sack which was hung on the pommel of Martha's saddle. Edith was glad when they were once more in the fresh air, for the smell of tobacco which proceeded from a corner where the occupants of the porch had stationed themselves, affected her very unpleasantly. Crossing the yard, they were followed closely by Mr. Irving, who led Selim to the block himself; and while Edith put on her skirt he worked his fingers nervously, and the moment it was fastened, seized her hand, and with a jerk of his head, said, "'Sist you to mount, ma'am?" She had barely time to settle herself in the saddle, and before her foot was in the stirrup, he grasped the bridle, and leading the horse off a few paces, stood, holding him by the bit, until the others were ready to start, when he let go with a flourish of his arm, and started back as if he expected Selim to go off like a rocket. As Edith bowed, in acknowledgment of his services, his manner and attitude reminded her forcibly of the ring master in a travelling circus she had visited when a child.

Tea was ready and waiting when they reached home, and they seated themselves around the table with spirits exhilarated, and appetites considerably sharpened by the ride. Mr. Ellis was particularly merry and agreeable, and Edith thought his animated countenance gave him quite a youthful appearance, and he looked scarcely old enough to be the father of those two tall girls. Lifting her plate, she passed it to him without looking down, until the girls both exclaimed, "Look under your plate, Miss Edith, under your plate!" She colored with surprise and pleasure as she took up a letter, and, looking at Mr. Ellis suspiciously, said, "Where did this come from? It must have been written the day after I left home." He laughed heartily, as if he enjoyed her surprise, and said, "You must excuse me for not handing it to you before, but I knew you would like to be alone when you read it, and I feared your anxiety to learn the contents would prevent your enjoying the ride home."

Immediately after prayers, which were an hour earlier on Saturday evening, Edith went to her room. "Dear Gracy," said she, unfolding her letter, "I would know your graceful handwriting among a score of others." And then she read how poor Grace, sad, lonely, and out of sorts, had gone to her sister's room the evening after her departure, and, after a fit of weeping, had concluded to write and tell her that George was very grum, mamma terribly low-spirited, and the whole house so desolate that it was quite unbearable. Then came a long string of fond wishes for dear Edie's happiness, followed by as many resolutions to look upon the bright side of life—and the letter closed with a quotation, beginning, "Away with melancholy," and many assurances of sisterly affection. "Bless her dear heart," said Edith, returning it to the envelop. "I hope the next letter will be a more cheerful one;" and though she felt grieved at the sadness of her mother and her brother's grumness, which she knew so well how to interpret, she was happy at having heard from the dear ones at home.

SAINT VALENTINE'S DAY.

BY MART MOORE.

Old times are changed, old manners gone.

LAY OF THE LAST MINSTREL.

VALENTINE's day in my grandfather's time; it was something worth looking forward to then; you should hear the old gentleman talk about it. The ice of many a courtship was broken; the heart of many a maiden won through the medium of those emblematic pictures and flattering rhymes sent on that licensed morn. Young men—my grandfather among the number—were known never to have retired to rest at all, but to have spent the night previous under their mistresses' window, for the purpose of gaining her first glance in the morning, and thus, according to the old superstition, have the right of being her Valentine for the rest of the day, or, what was perhaps still more important, her husband for life. Young girls, in order to avoid the sight of a disagreeable suitor, would shut themselves up for the entire morning; others, by various clever stratagems—peeping through little friendly holes in the window curtains; sitting with their eyes shut for hours, until they heard the wished-for step or well-beloved voice—endeavored to take in destiny, and cheat the fates! Postmen were known to have fainted beneath the weight of Cupid's doves, Hymen's temples, and gold rings their bursting bags contained. One misanthropic man of letters committed suicide on Valentine's eve by throwing himself, bag and all, into a river near my grandfather's house, leaving a note on the bank stating his reasons for the act: hatred to marriage, and a desire to save his fellow-creatures from that misery, as the woe of the fourteenth of February was generally a fool by the first of April.

But Valentine's day in the nineteenth century—the sober, intellectual, satirical, nineteenth century—is a very different affair. "These are the days of advance." In our onward march of civilization we have trampled the Maypole under our feet, dethroned its pretty queen, and turned Cupid out of doors. "Strong-minded young ladies' sneer at such "senseless things," and youth itself will soon be as much out of fashion as the rest.¹ But yet, with all these disadvantages to battle against, Valentine's day, although the mere ghost of its former self, still continues to have its old "match-making" propensities; truth still lurks in those annual rhymes, and many a proposal those love lines have contained has ended in smiles and blushes, wedding favors, and bride-cake at Whitsuntide. There's my cousin Mabel and Minnie Grey, they are living examples of this last fact.

Of course you have never seen my cousin Mabel; but if you had you would certainly say she was the prettiest girl you had ever beheld. Female critics of beauty, it is true, found fault with her nose as being "somewhat too short," and her mouth as "a little too large;" but then her eyes were so blue and soft, her eyelashes so dark and long, her hair so rich and bright, you forgot every other fault in looking at them; and as to her dimples, they would positively have made Hebe jealous, could that young lady have seen them. Yet Mabel, strange to say, with all her beauty, had reached the mature age of eighteen without a lover. Her father, a country clergyman, had jealously kept his fair blossom to nestle by his side, hidden from all "vulgar eyes" in the old ivied parsonage of a retired little village; rarely, if ever, allowing her to take part in any of the festivals and junketings given by their neighbors; those pleasant, innocent "merry meetings," where rural flirtations are got up, and the partners of a dance so often become the partners of a life. The consequence was, that when Mabel came to spend her Christmas with us, she had not been a week away from her leafy home before she danced exquisitely, flirted scientifically, and had caused half a dozen young men to wear turn-down collars, and seriously contemplate suicide.

Now, as my father loves a full house, and declares "a merry Christmas" would be an utter impossibility without merry guest and good cheer, with "that so plenteous," that, like the jolly Frankelien, at this time, you may be sure Miss Mabel had every opportunity of exercising her newly acquired accomplishments.

"It snowed in his hous of mete and drinke,"

Teddy Green proposed for her five minutes after the first introduction, was refused, and has never since been heard of. Jack Sharp, the vicar's son, enlisted as a private soldier, to the unspeakable grief of his parents, because Mabel had expressed a liking for an officer. Ephraim Jones, an old friend of my father's, a tedious, proverbial bachelor of fifty, "full of wise saws and modern instances," forgot himself so far as to present Mabel with some verses of a most amatory nature, and was observed to have had a most suspicious liking for walking by moonlight for some time after. The number of healthy appetites she ruined, the many sleepless nights she caused, are beyond my calculation; yet I suppose the world has never seen a conqueror more careless of conquests than my cousin Mabel. I often wondered that in lighting so many flames in the hearts of others she never burnt her own fingers. I began to think the old saying, that "everybody has been in love once in their lives," an utter mistake, and that Mabel bore a "charmed life," for here January's last days drew nigh, and her laugh was as merry, her dimples as pretty, and her eyes brighter than ever.

"Come, come, this won't do, Mabel," said my father; "it is positively unfair. Here have I displayed the finest assortment of goods, with every wish to please, and you are going to leave me without making a choice. If you are as fastidious over your ribbons as your lovers, I pity the shopman."

"Liberty for me;

No man's wife I'll be,"

sang Mabel, and we all gave her up as incorrigible.

"Can you write a good feigned hand?" said Fred Pratt, entering the library where I was sitting alone, indulging in what Mr. Weller calls "a referee." "Not that I'm aware of," said I. "Because, if you can," continued Fred, "just direct this envelop"—and he put down a bulky looking letter on the table. "I've been trying a new kind of penmanship the whole morning, but I don't think it will do"—and he showed me several hieroglyphical specimens. "If you had a Chinese or Egyptian postman, it might," said I, examining them. "But what do you want to feign your hand for? I hope, Fred," I continued, in a dignified manner, "you would not be guilty of so mean an action as writing an anonymous letter; remember, 'the man who can write an anonymous letter only lacks the bad courage to grasp an assassin's knife.'"

"It—it—it's only a Valentine," stammered Fred; "to-morrow's Valentine's Day."

"A VALENTINE!"

I was never more surprised in my life.

Fred was certainly the most bashful man I had ever met—Goldsmith's hero was bad enough, but Fred was worse. Why, he could no more have behaved as Marlow did to Miss Hardcastle, than he could have flown; and yet here was Fred sending a Valentine! How he ever got his "courage up to the sticking point," is still a mystery to me. "And who's the lady, Fred?" I inquired; "I never observed you admired any one in particular."

"Mabel Grant, of course," said Fred, with cheeks in an alarmingly apoplectic condition.

"Mabel Grant!"

Here was another surprise.

"Why, Fred, we all thought you disliked her; you never joined in praising her—never danced with her—seldom spoke to her; in fact never caught 'the prevailing epidemic,' as I imagined at all."

"I thought her far too beautiful and good; and myself too mean and unworthy ever to aspire to her at first," said Fred, in a husky tone; "but I love her so much now, I must tell her all—or—or—die;" and he smote his forehead after the manner of men in his condition.

"Come, old fellow, don't be downhearted," said I, quite moved.

"I've no other way of letting her know what I think and suffer but in this way," continued he, taking up the bulky letter.

"And a very good way too," said I, encouragingly. "What sort of verses are they? Mind they're strong."

"I composed them myself," said Fred; "they express exactly what I feel;" and he took out the Valentine.

Such a Valentine! bunches of forget-me-nots—clusters of roses, which, on being raised up, disclosed the altar of Love—a bleeding heart pierced with an arrow, lying upon it—with all the rapidity of a change in a pantomime. A delightfully healthy-looking little Cupid stood at the bottom of the page unrolling a scroll on which were inscribed in golden letters these lines:—

"Doubt thou the stars are fire;
Doubt that the sun doth move;
Doubt truth to be a liar;
But never doubt, I love."

I said I thought I had heard the lines before; but as Fred indignantly denied my suspicion, I withdrew the assertion.

"I would not feign my hand in sending such a Valentine," said I.

"Wouldn't you?" said Fred, interrogatively.

"No; concealments of that sort are only required when you send uncomplimentary penny ones. I should let her know who sent it; direct it in your own writing."

And he did, after a little pressing, with much confusion, in a hand that would have done honor to a Brobdignagian, with a seal to match.

"I love her so much," he began again—but I was off to look for Mabel.

I found her after a short search sitting in her own room writing, with a sheet of paper before her, which she hastily thrust into the table drawer as I entered.

"To-morrow's Valentine's Day, Mabel; are you going to send any?" I inquired.

"Not I," said Mabel, with just the faintest tinge of a blush in her cheek. "I would not receive such a nonsensical thing, let alone the sending; I have far too great a respect for the name of Love, than to take it in vain in unmeaning rhymes."

"Not always unmeaning," I said. "I have known the vows fervently made in those pictorial billet-doux, as fervently kept; it all depends upon the man, you little sceptic."

"You are certainly going to send a Valentine!" interrupted Mabel, eagerly.

Entre nous, this remark was both sudden and unpleasant—I had sent one that morning, written and posted under immense difficulties—my father having the book I had copied the verses from in his pocket, which I was forced to pick, as I couldn't remember the last lines; and the post-office, when I arrived, being tenanted by Jack Sharp inside, and guarded by old Jones outside, both evidently on the same errand, I had to remain down a by-lane a whole hour. I never hated old Jones so much!

"You are certainly going to send a Valentine!" repeated Mabel, in triumphant glee. I saw it was no use denying it, for "I was blushing as red as a beet."

"Well, what if I am?" said I, endeavoring to be dignified; "I always practise what I preach; I see no crime in it."

"No more do I," said Mabel, confidentially.

"I am going to send one, too, only I didn't like to tell you; I thought you might laugh;" and she drew forth from the drawer she had kept jealously shut, the most splendid specimen in the paper-cutting line I have ever beheld—you couldn't have told it from the finest Valenciennes—the verses, delicately inscribed in azure ink, looked as if they had been written by Titania with dew gathered by fairy fingers from the cup of a bluebell.

"And who's it to, Mabel?" said I, in a friendly, careless manner—I was dying to know.

"Guess."

"I can't."

"Try."

"It's no use, I could never find out; you never showed you liked any one in particular."

"Well, I don't think this one likes me," said Mabel, with a sigh. "He's so hard to please," she continued pettishly, "or so hard-hearted, I don't know which. I don't think he likes women, only I liked him from the first, and as I'm going home next week, it's no harm just to hint it to him;" and she looked quite sad for a few minutes, but on lifting up her head, she saw something in the pier-glass opposite which seemed to console her surprisingly, for after looking for a few seconds, she went on again quite gayly, "Don't waste so much thought upon the riddle, cousin; do you give it up?"

"Yes—who is it?"

She came quite close and whispered—"Fred Pratt!"

"Who?"

"Fred Pratt!"

I felt horribly inclined to throw my arms about my cousin, and kiss her from pure joy—but, as it might have alarmed her, I restrained myself, and calmly went to post the Valentine.

The auspicious morn arrived, the sun (contrary to Fred's expectations) did nothing original; but rose at his usual hour in the east, accompanied by a few common-place looking clouds—things proceeded in their accustomed way—perhaps a little more laughing and whispering among the girls, until the clock struck nine, then a great change became perceptible, tunes began to be hummed, indicative of perfect ease of mind in the hummers—books diligently read, as if the salvation of the readers depended upon them, conversations on important subjects, carried on in the most careless and reckless manner; suddenly in the midst of it all, like a clap of thunder, rat! tat! went the front door knocker. "It's the postman! the postman!" screamed a chorus of voices—two young men became immediately agitated, and left the room—Minnie Grey upset her tea, and I broke a plate.

In came the servant (I thought she would have been suffocated with her own importance) bearing a large tray before her, on which were piled letters of every description, from the imposing looking official dispatch, with its huge seal, that must have consumed a stick of sealing-wax, down to the delicately scented, exquisitely made "billet-doux," that should have had a sylph for a postman, and a fairy for its sender. Such laughing and blushing—such anxiety in spite of the pretty head-tossing, saucy pouting, and assumed carelessness—such curiosity to find out the writing—such an innocent, foolish, happy time never was seen.

But where was Mabel?

She had never left her room; her Valentines, no small number, had been taken up to her. Of course, what took place between her and them, no mortal can ever know; but, after a little time, we heard her door open, and her half suppressed screams—for, between surprise and joy, she had well-nigh fallen into his arms.

"Into whose arms?"

Fred Pratt's of course. Poor fellow, he had spent the whole night on the landing, and had thus gained her first glance and first greeting in the morning.

"I had no other way of saying how much I loved you," said he, half laughing and half crying, like the good-hearted simple fellow he was; "I've been very unhappy ever since you've been here."

"Are you happy now?" said Mabel, looking desperately pretty and coquettish, clad in her morning dress and blushes, as she laid her dimpled hand on his.

He only answered by kissing it passionately.

"I never thought that you loved me," said Mabel, pouting. "You never showed it."

"Why, I always loved you," said Fred, "from the very first, and—"

And what more they said, we must leave to the imagination of those of my readers who have been in the same position themselves.

My father says—and he has had experience in such matters—that we may make up our minds to wedding-favors and bride-cake at Whitsuntide.

HOPE.

BY J. HOWARD SMITH.

It dwelleth in the inner heart,
It liveth in each throbbing breast,
It calmeth as our days depart,
It bringeth heavenly, peaceful rest.

'Tis this that bids us urge our way,
'Tis this that lights the blackest sky,
'Tis this that drives doubts and fears away,
'Tis this that fits us all to die.

'Tis this that calms when world storms shake,
'Tis this that supports when loved ones die,
'Tis this that upholds when friends forsake,
'Tis this that brings absent loved ones nigh.

Hope is the day-star when dark billows roll,
Hope is the gift our God hath given,
Hope is the anchor of the Christian soul,
Hope dwells on Earth: it lives in Heaven.

THE OLD TURNPIKE ROAD.

BY VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND.

"It's two cents for foot passengers."

It is very singular, but I hear those tones still; the small, sweet, susceptible voice, winding in and out of the delicate syllables, and I see the little brown, thin hand which was thrust up at the toll-gate. I was sixteen years old at that time, and I have doubled the years since then; but the little hand is before my eyes now, and the voice, sweet as an old tune, in my ear still. I see the old turnpike road, too, which I had come upon suddenly, twisting itself like a rumpled brown ribbon along the hills and among the fair pasture fields on either side.

"You're rather small to tend toll-gate," I said, as I slipped the money into the child's hand.

She looked up, and smiled a smile that was not completed on the lips, but ran up into all the dark, sunburnt features, and did for them what sunlight does for Catawba wine, and emphasized itself in the eyes; which were large, and of a kind of brown or dark agate.

"O no! I shall be eleven years old next August!"—with an air which said her age ought to prove her a person of good judgment; one who might be trusted in almost any important conjunctions or relations.

I was amused at her half childish, half mature manner, which latter would have sat rather comically upon her if it had not been for her extreme sincerity; and I was about to answer her remark with another, when a wagon drove up with a farmer, who was evidently a neighbor, for he asked in a loud tone after "Mrs. Plummer's rheumatiz," and how the seine was coming on; and the little girl darted into the house, and I kept on my way.

On what very small, hidden springs does God turn the great events of our lives! That very morning my grandfather Bryant had shown me a large seal ring which had belonged to his youngest son, my Uncle John, who died in his early manhood, smitten by a sudden fever in the East Indies.

"It just fits my fore-finger"—as it slid easily over the joint.

My grandfather looked at it tenderly. "Poor boy!" he said. "He used to wear it on his little one." And he shook his fine old gray head. "You better let me keep it for you a little longer, Bryant; I'm afraid it will slip off your finger."

"Well, let me have it an hour or two, grandpa." I had my way, as I always did.

But a little while later, a fancy seized me to go off into the woods; and I had rambled farther than I expected, and came out upon the turnpike three miles from my grandfather's.

I was passing the summer at Longwood. My father had conceived a dread that I inherited something of my mother's delicacy of physique, because I had her features, and he had sent me up into the country in the hope that fresh, bracing air and daily exercise would counteract any tendency to disease. But the fears were unnecessary in my case; if my mother had given me her face and figure, I had my father's stamina of constitution.

I was his idol. All the love which was not buried in the grave of his girl-wife was poured on the head of the child she left him. My father was a very rich man, twenty years my mother's senior, proud, stately, reticent. I had been nursed in luxury and indulgence of the most debilitating kind. I was a selfish, exacting, impulsive, yet, on the whole, good-natured boy; I made everybody's ease or comfort subordinate to my own wishes or whims; but it was a habit with me, and I was unconscious of it. I was naturally studious, and out-door life in the woods and fields was a perfect passion with me, and saved me from becoming effeminate.

My father had found my mother in the first flush of womanhood at her country home, at Longwood, where he was stopping for a week. People said that her beauty won his heart, but this was not all the truth; her graciousness of soul, the gentleness and beauty of her life gained for her what her face never could, with its delicate, sweet outlines, its "gentian eyes," and its marvellous sweetness of expression, which made the face of my mother seem like the face of an angel.

"See, here, you must have dropped your ring just after you paid me the money, for I found it on the ground." The little girl panted out the words, breathless with her long run, for I was nearly half a mile from the toll-gate.

"So I must!"—taking the ring. "Dear me, what a run you have had ! How did you know it was mine ?”

“I saw it on your finger when you paid me. Oh-h !” This last word, which suddenly shut off the rest of her sentence, ran through her lips in a groan, and her forehead contracted with sharp, sudden pain.

“What is the matter ?” I asked, in much concern.

“Why, you see, I stumbled over a stone, and I’ve hurt my ankle, for it aches.” And here the tears forced themselves into the brown eyes.

They touched me, for I was very sensitive to suffering. “Come and sit down on the stone fence,” I said, for it ran low along the side of the road, and I helped her to it, and sat down beside her. “You’re very, very kind to bring me my ring ; but I’m sorry you’ve hurt you.”

“I was in such a hurry, you know.”

“Does your ankle hurt you ?”

“O yes, hard !”

“It’s too bad ! What can I do for you ?”

“Nothing, I guess, thank you.” But she winced with the pain as she said the words.

“If you’ll let me hold you so that you can rest your ankle here on the rail, it’ll feel easier.”

“I’m afraid I’m too heavy.”

“No.”

I lifted her up gently, for she was a light little creature, and seated her on my knee, and she rested her foot on the rail.

“There, now, doesn’t that feel better ?”

“Yes, a great deal.” Then she looked in my face with her bright, deep, unabashed eyes. “You are very kind to me !” she said.

Nobody had ever spoken such words to me before. People had caressed and flattered me, but it was almost the first time in my life that I had ever had the luxury of doing good to another.

“I think it is you who have been kind to me.” And I removed her brown gingham sun-bonnet, and smoothed her hair.

Then we fell to talking—and I learned that the little girl’s name was Margaret Willoughby ; that her father and mother were dead ; that she had neither brother nor sister, and lived with her grandmother, who kept the toll-gate, and knit seine for the farmers to go fishing in the summer. They were very, very poor folks, indeed, Margaret said, with a sweet, earnest gravity on her little face ; still her grandmother had managed to buy her, that summer, a straw bonnet, trimmed with white ribbon, and a pink lawn dress, and a pair of Monroe shoes ; and it was her belief and conviction that she looked as nice as the other little girls, when she and grandma went on Sundays to the brown-stone meetin’-house on the green.

I drank all this in greedily. It was a new revelation of life to me ; and the perfect freshness of the child—the entire simplicity and earnestness with which she confided to me her history and her heart, drew me towards her ; and I kept on questioning her farther, and watching the quick changes that came and went in her face, with her bright, quick, intelligent answers.

At last she rose up hastily, “Oh, what will grandma say ‘cause I’m gone so !” But with her first step a sudden pain shot through her ankle.

“Margaret, you can’t go home alone ; I’ll walk with you ; lean on me :” and I slipped my arm round her waist, and half-carried, half-led the light figure along, so that little weight came on the sprained ankle. “Now, supposing, Margaret,” I said, as we moved slowly on, “that you were very rich, and could have everything you wanted to, what would you do with your money first ?”

She twisted the strings of her gingham sun-bonnet a few moments, thoughtfully, around her fingers, and then she looked up with a sudden light over her face.

“Oh, I know.”

“Well, tell me.”

“I’d jest have some new dresses, and go to the Academy on the hill ; and I’d buy a whole lot of new books to read. You see we haven’t but about a dozen at home, and I’ve read ‘em over and over.”

“I’ve got more than you could read in a dozen years, at home ; and I’ll send you a little library.”

How her eyes shone and danced. Then she answered in her sweet, grave way, “I thank you ; more than I can tell, I thank you !” then, after a little pause, “Can you spare so many, though ?”

“Oh, yes ; I can get more easily enough.”

She looked up in my face with a searching curiosity, but she did not speak.

“What are you thinking about me, Margaret ?”

“That you must be rich.”

“How do you know ?”

“Oh, I can tell. I al’ays knows rich folks.”

“Don’t you like them ?”

“Not very often. They’re so proud.”

“Am I proud ?”

The same searching look into my face ; but this time there was a doubt in her eyes. "You look so, but you don't act so."

It was a delicate compliment, and I thanked her for it.

We had now reached the toll-gate; and a little old woman in a white cap and a calico short-gown, put her head out of the front door of the little yellow, one-story house, that sat close to the gate.

"Oh, Maggie, child, I didn't know what had taken you;" and she stopped short on seeing me.

"Why, grandma, I had to run a long ways before I could get to him with the ring, and I've sprained my ankle, and he had to come home with me."

"Dear me!" said the old woman, inspecting me with her dim eyes, on this informal introduction; "I'm sorry she's made you so much trouble."

"It's of no consequence whatever, ma'am, only I think her ankle may require immediate care."

The old lady invited me to walk in, and her granddaughter indorsed the invitation with her eyes.

But the long summer day was leaning toward the night, and I had a walk of three miles before me; so I declined the invitation, but promised to accept it during the week; and I took leave of the old lady and the little girl, and went up the old turnpike road, laying plans to serve my new acquaintance, and musing on all she had told me—and the voices of the coming evening began to wake up prophetically in the woods, but no voice whispered to my soul that God had sent His angel to walk with me that day!

On reaching home, I learned that a letter had been received from my father, stating that his business required his going abroad immediately; and that he had concluded to have me accompany him, as the time of his return was somewhat indefinite, and I could pursue my studies in Europe as well as in America. I was to leave my grandfather's the next day.

I have quite often wondered that in the midst of the interest and excitement which this news occasioned, the little girl at the toll-gate did not quite escape my mind. But she did not; I had a private interview with my grandfather, and related to him the history of my meeting with Margaret Willoughby, and succeeded in awakening the old gentleman's interest in my little protégée, and obtaining his promise that he would send her for two years to the Academy on the hill.

The four days which intervened before our departure were occupied with the hurry and bustle of preparation; but I managed to find time to prepare a large box of books, of a miscellaneous kind, poems, histories, stories, &c., which were duly sent to my grandfather's care, for the little girl at the toll-gate.

CHAPTER II.

"Come, Bryant, put your book down, and hold this skein of silk for me, please."

She said the words in her pretty, half-peremptory, half-coaxing way, as she came toward the lounge where I was lying close by the open window, reading, alternately, the page of that beautiful spring day, and the page of the book which I held in my hand.

One, somehow, seemed to harmonize and fit into the other. The face of the late May looking down on the summer, had caught the glory and the gladness thereof. The fruit trees were puffed and fluted with blossoms, and full of the song of birds. The dozing winds breathed sweet fragrances into the window; and the sky wore the bright, radiant, triumphant smile of the completed spring, upon its face.

And the book which I was reading wore a smile too upon its face: the smile of one whose hope and whose trust were in the love of our Father who is in heaven.

The volume was a collection of miscellaneous stories and poems, and the unknown writer was evidently a woman, and in her youth. There was a glow and freshness about her genius which could only belong to the May of life. There was a little throb of sadness, too, running through the pages, which touched with their soft, healing, wondrous skill, the loves and the sorrows of human life. Much, the writer had rejoiced; somewhat, she had suffered; but the sunshine and the rains had alike nourished the sweet, gentle, loving womanhood which warmed and sanctified the pages. I thought all this before Annie, the wife of my cousin Frederick Mathers, came to my lounge, and knelt down by it, with a skein of silk slipped round her dainty fingers. She had a kind of passion for crocheting and embroidery; and for all those nick-knacks with which women are forever busying themselves about.

Annie was a bright, merry, good-hearted little thing; no great depth or force to her, to be sure; but she was just such a wife as Fred needed: full of domestic tact and taste, very pretty, and graceful withal. So she gratified him æsthetically, for he was naturally fastidious.

Twelve years lay between this spring and the last one I had passed at Longwood. They had brought many changes to me, as they usually do to all lives. My grandfather had laid his gray head under the grasses, six years before; and a sudden fit of apoplexy had stricken my father, just as he was on the eve of returning to America, three years before.

One night, twelve months later, while I was travelling through the south of England, that great and terrible misfortune befell me, which swept out, for a time, all my hope and desire in life. The bridge over which our cars were passing broke down; many of the passengers were hurled over a precipice into the river, a hundred feet below. I was thrown upon a part of the bridge which remained, and I remembered nothing more. A long, slow illness followed. I was internally injured, my ankle broken, and I found myself a cripple for life; I believed, then, a confirmed invalid. I returned to America a year later, somewhat improved in health, but still physically a wreck of what I had been.

Frederick Mathers, my only cousin on my father's side, had been my most intimate companion and friend during my boyhood; and we had kept up an intermittent correspondence during my residence abroad, for I had graduated at a German university. Frederick was a young physician: he had married six years before, and was succeeding well in his profession. But he was still poor, while I was the only heir to my father's wealth.

I easily persuaded my cousin to go to Longwood and take up his residence in the gray old stone house, which my grandfather had built. We had the interior a little rejuvenated and modernized, without seriously altering its old-fashioned physiognomy, for I am no iconoclast. Early in the preceding March we had settled down here. It was the only spot on earth which was home to me. Fred and Annie were enchanted with their new residence, and we daily congratulated each other on the success of our project.

"Bryant," Annie began, in her light, quick way, while the silk ran in a crimson ripple over her rapid fingers, "I think it's high time you were waked up. You've just done nothing but settle down here over your books, ever since we got snugly under this blessed old roof. Fred says you ought to pass two-thirds of your days under the trees, from this time to November."

"You mustn't make it so pleasant in the house, then, that a fellow can't muster up courage to get out of it."

"Well, if that's all that's wanted to get you out, I assure you nothing shall be left undone on my part," with a comical dip of her bright head, and an arch laugh running out of her blue eyes.

"And accomplish it, no doubt, because you are a woman; but, Annie, if you got me out-doors, it wouldn't be far, or long;" and I glanced at the crutch which stood at the foot of the lounge.

A little sadness crept across the brightness of her face; "Oh, yes, you will, Bryant;" but the sentence was broken into by an urgent summons from some neighbor, which at once took Annie down stairs. I lay still, amidst the bright sunshine and the dozing winds, but, for awhile, the thoughts which came over my soul were like those cold mists which sail in from the northeast, and cover the face of the earth every November.

I thought of my bright, careless, affluent youth; of my proud, strong manhood, all crushed out of me in an hour; of the broken dreams, and health, and hope; of the slow life, and the crippled limb that I must carry to the grave; and I laid my head back with a slow, weary heartache, and almost longed to die.

And with that last thought a new light and warmth came through the mist, and glorified it. Whatsoever my life was, my death would be better for the evil that had befallen me. Had I not learned in that long, wasting sickness, patience and submission, love to God and to man?

"Uncle, Uncle Bryant, see what I've got for you!"

A slender thread of sound came through the open door, and there was the soft patter of a child's feet in the room, and a little head with clusters of shining curls, and pretty red lips that were always full of the motion of talk and laughter, came up to me, and a little hand, that was like a sea-shell, held up triumphantly before my eyes a cluster of white roses. Large, queenly, luscious flowers they were, their snowy blossoms full of heavy passionate fragrance, as they lay half sheltered in a covert of green leaves.

"Oh, Harry, my pet, where did you get these beautiful roses?"

"Miss Willoughby gave them to me," lisped the voice of six summers.

"And who is Miss Willoughby?"

"She's my school-teacher, you see; and I went home with her to-day, and when I saw the flowers growing all round the front window, I spoke right out, 'Oh, how Uncle Bryant would like some of them!' And Miss Willoughby smiled, and said, 'Would he, dear?' And then she gave me these, but I knew she meant 'em for you, though she didn't say so."

"What do you know about this Miss Willoughby, Annie?" I asked of Harry's mother, when she returned to my room.

"Very little; I've seen her but once. She struck me as a quiet, ladylike person; a little over twenty; and, altogether, her manner pleased me. She teaches the district school, and I sent Harry to her, just to get the little rogue out of the way for a few hours. I remember, now, that Mrs. Peekham told me the school-teacher's name was Margaret Willoughby, that she wrote poetry occasionally, and supported her grandmother, who is an infirm and very old woman."

"Margaret Willoughby, Margaret Willoughby!" The name seemed to go in slow, silver liquid echoes up and down my thoughts, as though it came from some far country in the past, and wound through all the years, and called to me, soft and faintly, "Margaret Willoughby."

"That's it!" I brought my hand down suddenly, and with no little emphasis, on the table.

"What's it?" cried Annie, half springing from her seat with the start I had given her.

"Something I've found in my thoughts."

"Bryant, you are the oddest man alive," answered Annie, and a laugh ran out of her lips as she wound Harry's silken curls around her fingers. And I sat there opening and shutting my eyes, and thinking of that far-off day when I first met Margaret Willoughby.

I could see it still, the old turnpike road, winding away like a brown, crumpled ribbon through the green pastures, on either side, and the little girl at the toll-gate, with her small, tanned face and strange, bright eyes. I had not thought of it for years; but it all came back now, vivid as a thing of yesterday, and I recalled now a letter which my grandfather had written during my first year in Germany, in which he mentioned Margaret Willoughby, stating that he had sent her to the Academy, and that she was a remarkably intelligent child, and he was much interested in her. And that little girl had blossomed into womanhood, and taught school, and wrote poetry now; and she had not forgotten, I had evidence of that in the roses that were like great snowy goblets pouring out delicious fragrance in the tall Venetian glass on the table.

I kept my own counsel, but I resolved that not many days should go over my head before I looked on the face of Margaret Willoughby.

CHAPTER III.

"GRANDMA, we shall have strawberries and cream by week after next. I've been out amongst the vines, and they're doing finely."

The voice fluttered out of the front window of the dainty little white cottage, as I stood at the gate that June morning. The house looked in the distance like a little white cup hidden among the trees. It couldn't have contained more than five rooms. It was picturesque enough, though all bugged round with wood-bines; and on either side of the grass plat was a bed of flowers with a fringe of box.

The next moment she came to the window, where her voice had just preceded her, and she shook out a table-cover of red and black, in that quick, skilful way which made one feel at once that her hands were used to all that kind of work. She did not see me, but I had a good view of her face. It was a strange, contradictory one, for the eyes, of a large deep brown, had the look of a child; the look I remembered, full of wonder and wistfulness, with endless smiles and variations in them; but there was a certain gravity about the mouth and a sweet seriousness about all the oval features which thought, and discipline, and sorrow could alone have given them. It was not a handsome, pretty, beautiful face, but there was a charm about it. So I watched her as she arranged the books on the table, wiping off the dust with a small cloth, and humming snatches of old tunes or replying to some question of her grandmother's, who must have been in another room and probably a little deaf.

At last I went up to the house, and she came to the door with a face full of surprise. She did not recognize me.

"Miss Willoughby," I said, offering her my hand, "I have come to thank you for the roses you sent me by your little pupil, Harry Mathers, the other day."

What a leap of surprise, recognition, pleasure, and timidity there was in her face! Then she put her hands, her little soft, warm hands in mine, and said, just as she would have said it thirteen years before, on the old turnpike, "I am very glad to see you, Mr. Hamilton."

I went into the parlor and sat down. It was the neatest, plainest, cosiest little spot imaginable. There was a dark ingrain carpet, and cane seat chairs, green lounge, and a little table covered with books. We sat down on the lounge. I saw her glance at my crutch and my crippled limb, and such a sweet sadness came into her eyes as I have seen in children's when their mothers' faces were sorrowful.

"I thought it most likely you had forgotten us," she said.

"O no. I remember the old turnpike road, and the toll-gate, and the little girl with the sprained ankle."

A smile ran into her lips and then over her face, but I knew a word more would have brought something into her eyes besides a smile; so I said, quietly: "Did you get the books I sent you?"

She answered my question indirectly: "If you could have seen me the day they came, or have known the marvellous treasures which they opened up to me; if I could tell you of the new life which they nourished in my soul!" She stopped here abruptly, but her face finished the sentence as even her voice could not have done.

After this, I have no remembrance of what we talked about, but there were few pauses in the conversation, and I remained three hours.

Margaret Willoughby was a new revelation to me; for, be it remembered, I have met with the noblest born and highest bred, the loveliest and most gifted women of both hemispheres, and I had learned what it takes so many near a lifetime to learn—that no grace of mien, no gift of mind or person, no outward adorning can make a lady; I mean that sweetness and gentleness, that tenderness and sympathy which Luther meant when he said: "The heart of a Christian woman is the sweetest thing this side of heaven." And Margaret Willoughby was this—a lady by the will of God! I knew it during that morning that we passed together, for school had a week's vacation.

We rambled over many subjects, and, though I cannot recall these, I remember perfectly the impression which Margaret Willoughby's conversation left on me. What struck me at first most prominently was a kind of childish artlessness which wound its golden thread through her whole speech and manner; yet it was tempered with a sweet womanly gravity, and dignity, and thoughtfulness, just as the expression in her eyes was by the rest of her face. Perhaps somewhat of this was owing to her small knowledge of the world, for she told me she had never been thirty miles from Longwood in her life. But she had read, studied, lived; and so she had bloomed into her young, sweet, fragrant womanhood like the white roses she had plucked for me.

I saw the young school-teacher very often after this; for, as the summer grew, I gained strength of body and soul, and we had frequent rides together; and there was a little fringe of woods back of the small white cottage where we used to go, and sit, and listen to the brook, whose silver waters tangled themselves with gurgling leap and laughter over the stones; and Margaret was never weary of listening with those bright child-eyes and that womanly face of hers to the stories I had to tell her of foreign countries. She had read much and seen little, and this always gives to a woman a kind of strange, contradictory air and manner. She had something, too, to tell me of her life; of its struggles and aspirations, and how, after she had attended the village Academy five years, she was offered the situation of village school-teacher, and since then her grandmother's increasing age and infirmities had rendered her unfit for any active cares or duties. I looked at the small, trembling figure, and wondered at the brave, true, strong soul which it held.

"I shall leave you here to take care of yourselves with a great many doubts and misgivings, but there's no help for it," said Cousin Annie, as we all gathered in the sitting-room after tea, one evening just in the opening of September. She had been summoned to the bedside of her mother, who was ill—not dangerously so, but in that state of mingled nervous excitement and prostration which required her daughter's care and society, and Frederick had given his wife "leave of absence" for a month.

We all felt sad enough at the thought of missing Annie's bright face and cheery voice about the house, and I knew the lightness of her tones was assumed to hide something deeper in her voice, as she pushed an ottoman to her husband's feet, and, throwing herself on this, rested her cheek on his knee while Harry perched himself on the other.

"I expect Bryant and I'll make awkward work, keeping old bachelor's hall," laughed the young husband, as he smoothed the yellow silken hair that lay in its abundant beauty on his knee.

"Our case looks dubious, Fred. We shall have nobody to scold us for not being punctual at dinner, or keeping the rooms in disorder—in short, for committing any of these numerous delinquencies by which the sons of Adam have managed to keep the tongues and tempers of the daughters of Eve in a constant state of excitement during the last six thousand years."

Annie lifted her head, and shook with playful threatening her white hand in my face. "Bryant," she said, "I wish you would take one of those daughters of Eve you've just maligned so to wife before the next twenty-four hours goes over your head."

"Thank you for your benevolent wishes. If I could only find her now!"

Here Harry slipped off his father's knee, and pattered up to me, and put his pretty face close to my ear. "Uncle Bryant," he said, confidentially and earnestly, "I know of somebody you could get to be your wife."

"Who is it, my pet?"

"Miss Margaret Willoughby."

How his father leaned his head back and laughed, while his mother clapped her hands and shouted!

"But how do you know she'll have me, my boy?"—lifting the little fellow on my knee.

He nestled his head on my shoulder. "I'll ask her to-morrow, and see."

Another peal of mirth; Annie's sweet laughter tangling in and out of her husband's.

"No, thank you, Harry; I prefer to 'speak for myself' on such a subject, or I fear that I should meet with no better success than Miles Standish did with the Puritan maiden, Priscilla."

"And probably Uncle Bryant will select a somewhat different 'maiden' from your school-teacher, Harry, when he does speak for himself."

"How do you mean, Annie?"

"Why, I mean different in position, family, fortune, everything. Do you know, Bryant, Mrs. Peekham was wondering this afternoon that you could visit Miss Willoughby so often. She says she has never had any position in Longwood, that she's low-bred, and her grandmother kept the toll-gate!"

"And what did you tell her, Annie?"

"Oh, I told her that I knew nothing about Miss Willoughby, having never met her but once, only she was a little protégée of yours once, though I knew you had no serious intentions in that quarter."

"How did you know it?"

She turned and faced me. "Why, Bryant, you haven't, have you?"

"It has just struck me that I have."

"Well, that's cool, old fellow!" It was Fred interposed here, not knowing exactly how to take me.

"Now, Bryant, are you in sober earnest?" asked Annie, coming over to me.

"Yes; I think I shall take Harry's advice, and ask Miss Willoughby to be my wife."

"Oh, Bryant, what will Mrs. Peekham—what will the world say?"

"Do you think I should stop to inquire, Annie Mathers? Do you think when I found a woman whose soul was crowned with those rare and beautiful jewels above all price, which make a loving and Christian womanhood—do you think I would not gather her to my heart, sooner than a crowned queen, and holding her there, its joy, and light, and completeness, do you think I should care what Mrs. Peekham or the world said of it?"

"No, I wouldn't if I were you, Bryant!" out spoke Annie, for her heart was full of noble and generous impulses that responded quickly to the right touch.

"No! a thousand times no!" answered the deep, emphatic tones of her husband.

And then I told them a little of all Margaret Willoughby had been to me: how, unconsciously, the knowledge and the love of her had wakened my life into true and higher purpose; and how her sweet, childlike faith had called to mine, which lay cold and dormant in my soul; and how the great sorrow of my life had taught me, at last, a new submission to the will of God, our Father; and how I, who once longed to die, was now willing and rejoiced to live for His sake. And when I concluded, my cousins came and placed their hands in mine, and said: "Bryant, may you be very happy with the wife of your choosing!"

I went up toward evening to the little white cottage set like a cup among the trees. Margaret was sprinkling a moss rose-bush, in the front yard, with a small watering-pot. She came toward me, her brown eyes full of their shy smiles, and the soft flush going in and out of her face. She wore a lawn dress, with sprigs of pink scattered over the white ground, and the sleeves were looped back from the small white arms. We talked awhile of the sunset clouds, of the flowers in the yard, of the farewell of the summer, and then I said to her, "I have a book, Miss Margaret, and out of its sweet, fresh, perfuming pages I have selected a little sketch which, with your permission, I shall read to you."

"Thank you;" and we went into the parlor together; but when I drew the book from my pocket, she glanced at it and said, with a sudden drawing in of her breath, "Oh, is that the book?"

"You have seen it, then?"

"I—I have heard of it;" and she turned away, and seemed very intent on smoothing the folds of her dress.

The book was the one which I had read that day that she had given Harry the roses.

It struck me that her manner was a little singular, but I sat down and opened the book, and she sat a little way from me, and listened to my reading. She sat, as I said, a little apart from me, her hands lying still in her lap, except when the little fingers fluttered restlessly against each other, for they had a kind of habit of motion. The sketch was a very brief one: a little exquisite, pathetic picture of a country home and hearts made very heavy with the anguish of misapprehension and parting, and glad unspeakably with the sudden joy of meeting and reconciliation.

"Isn't it a touching little thing?" I asked, as I closed.

"I—do you like it so much?" and her face was radiant.

"Yes—don't you?"

She opened her lips—her blushes came and went—suddenly it flashed across me—

"Margaret, you wrote this book!"

She tried to look astonished, but she was not used to dissemble. She buried her face in her hands, and broke into sobs.

"Margaret, dear Margaret, have I no right to your secret—the right of one who would be neither friend nor brother, but more, and better than these?"

She understood me, but only sobs kept swaying back and forth the small, slender figure.

Once, and once only, I tried her. "Margaret, you do not answer me. Is it because you cannot love a man who is crippled for life? whose health can never be?"—

Her face sprang up from her hands. The tears were held in check upon it.

"Oh, Mr. Hamilton, you do not think so meanly of me as that!" and I was answered.

Then, for the first time, I gathered her to my heart, and kissed the red blossom of her lips, and thanked God that she belonged to me for life; that she would walk by my side, true, tender, sweet, loving till death took us apart—my wife, in the best and holiest meaning of that blessed word.

Two years she has been this—two years which have taught me how priceless was the pearl I found on the old turnpike road—the pearl that I found, and wore on my heart—Margaret Willoughby!

"AFTER MANY DAYS."

BY ALICE B. HAVEN.

THE noon train came thundering along, whirling dust into the dry, heated air. The porter at the station bestirred himself—the coachmen who had been standing in knots on the platform, discussing their horses, and telling wonderful tales of the sagacity or "grip" of their dogs, separated hastily, and hurried to their posts. A heavy rumble, a shriek, and two quick, impatient snorts from the engine—the train had arrived.

"Here we are, Lawrence!" and a bright face looked past the brakeman. "Give us your shawl, old boy."

The "old boy" had the face nineteen, not so cheerful as that which had the smile of a homecoming to light it, but strongly marked, and already darkened by a silken moustache; his form, though reduced to travelling uniformity by a linen duster, was tall and lithe; and altogether the friends were as gentlemanly as the graduates of old Harvard usually are, and strode along the platform with the conscious ease and superiority of their age and position!

"Well, Dennis!"—and the cheerful face grew still more attractive with the light of the first recognition—"how are you all?"

The man touched his hat respectfully, and took the packages from the young gentleman.

"Hearty, sir; and you're welcome home, Master Frank."

"Thank you, Dennis, glad enough to get here. Come, Lawrence, jump in; give 'em the reins, Dennis, and see what's left in the old bays." The boyish delight was irrepressible, for every step brought him nearer home; every object was familiar. Past gray stone walls and long reaches of field and meadow—past orchards already bending beneath the coming plenteous harvest—brown farm-houses, and spruce modern cottages—there was the iron gate of Ireton at last.

A huge Newfoundland bounded out as it opened, and sprang up, with a noisy bark, to the carriage-door he could not reach.

"Hi, old Bouncer!" shouted Frank, leaning over, and snapping his fingers by way of an inducement to follow them, and on the noble old dog came, making great leaps of joy, and barking a perfect shout of welcome, that brought two other dogs of "lower degree" to join in the chorus, and an expectant face to the wide hall door.

"Oh, papa, here they are!" and "papa," the owner of Ireton, and father of Frank, wheeled himself across the room in his invalid chair, almost as rapidly as his daughter had walked.

It was Frank's married sister—the visitor knew it must be her, for Frank called her Laura, as he sprang out, and gave her a great hug; and as he ran up the steps after it, he called out almost over his shoulder, "You take care of Lawrence—that's him at last."

The visitor could scarcely believe at first glance, that he had heard aright. The Mrs. Phillips who wrote Frank such sedate, motherly letters, and forwarded boxes with a maternal affluence of good things, had been in the mind's eye a tall, dignified, rather severe and "finished" person; while the lady who extended her hand so pleasantly, and said, "We are glad to see you after so many disappointments, Mr. Bryant," was as simple and cordial in her manner as a child, and carried no symptoms of all the Latin and German she had accomplished about her.

"Papa is an invalid just now, as perhaps you know. Of course you do, as that was the reason we did not come to Commencement. He has strained his foot in some way; let me take you to him."

"This is Mr. Bryant, papa." And the young gentleman found himself in the presence of a courtly man, older than he expected, but with a face full of enthusiasm, and just now it was all centred upon his boy, the pride of his old age. His son's friend had a cordial welcome, given with an apology for not rising, and the hope that he would make himself one of them. Indeed, cordiality was the peculiar grace of all the Iretons, towards those who had any claims whatever upon their courtesy; and in a few moments the restraint of the arrival and first meeting had passed away, and Lawrence could look about him and see for himself that Frank's eagerness to get home had its full excuse.

A pang of envy went through his heart, to see the atmosphere of loving appreciation which encircled him. Othello himself did not have more attentive listeners than Frank, for the recital of the doings of Commencement day. Mr.

Ireton looking into his face with such manifest satisfaction and pride in his improvement and general standing—for fifth in the class of forty, and at old Harvard too, was by no means to be despised. Mrs. Phillips hovered about him, and waited on him, and laughed at his clever sallies; Bouncer, quite satisfied at being near his young master, stretched his fine length upon the rug beside him; and the servants who came with the luncheon-tray evidently looked upon him as prince royal of the Ireton domain; but as Frank's friend Lawrence had nothing to complain of, and, as Valedictorian, Mr. Ireton deferred to him with marked approbation and interest.

After the hot, restless race for the championship of his class, the reaction was yielded to with an almost indolent spirit. The home life at Ireton was so quiet, so genial, kept by intellectual resources from stagnation, yet almost selfishly complete in itself. Mr. Phillips was absent, but his wife was accustomed to frequent short journeys on his part, and a long letter from him arrived every morning as punctually as breakfast. Mr. Ireton was always ready to lay down his book or his review for a talk with these fresh young minds, and his fund of anecdote and reminiscence of those to whom Lawrence looked up with hero worship—the friends and antagonists of Mr. Ireton's professional life—always had a strange fascination for him. It fanned the already feverish ambition of his nature, and, in their long drives or strolls, Lawrence talked of all he should achieve, and wondered at Frank's "slowness of heart."

"It's all very fine, Lawrie, and I'll be on hand, you know, to hear your first speech in the Senate; but all I ask is a year or so of adventure—no jolly hard work though, like the Northwest Passage—and then to settle down with—well, somebody," and he rapped his breast pocket significantly, "if she doesn't jilt me by that time, you know."

For Frank already fancied himself deeply in love, and his father, being sensible, and knowing, from his own experience, that such things often cure themselves if not interfered with, had interposed no harsher mandate than two years' travel. Consequently, Frank came down very early in the morning, certain days of the week, and not unfrequently drove over himself for the letters.

If he could have known what a fate lay sealed within the business-like document that he brought for his friend on one of these excursions, he would have been tempted to pitch it into the road, and at least defer the evil day;

but, happily unconscious of all but his own ecstasy in a letter of twelve pages, written in a very fine hand, on very pink paper, he tossed the lawyer-like epistle to Lawrence, who had just risen from the breakfast-table, and plunged into buttered muffins and an avalanche of endearing epithets at the same time.

"We waited for you, you see. Your father does not come down this morning. Mrs. Phillips was quite uneasy at your long stay, and has gone to 'that blessed baby,'" Lawrence said, brightly, turning his letter about with careless scrutiny. "It's not my guardian's writing; it ought to be, by the post-mark."

Frank was swallowing his nectar too intently to hazard a guess. "If you only knew the comfort your picture is to me, my best-beloved!" he read. "It lies open before me now, and I see your own sweet smile, and seem to hear your precious words of tenderness again." While the lines before Lawrence Bryant's eyes wavered, and flickered, and then stood out again, harshly, un pityingly, until the realization of the truth came upon him with a groan that roused Frank from the Elysian Fields, and brought him to his feet with a hurried exclamation of fright and alarm. So soon the brightness had gone out of that young face, and the mouth, round which a deadly whiteness gathered, was set firmly and defiantly.

"What is it, Lawrence? what is it, old fellow?" And, for the first time in their intercourse, the hand he laid on his friend's shoulder was rudely shaken off; the time for sympathy had not yet come.

"Frank told me I should find you here. I hope I have not disturbed you?"

"O no. But perhaps you wish to read alone, Mrs. Phillips." And Lawrence caught up the broad straw hat that he had flung upon the library table an hour before with a reckless gesture. When the light step of Mrs. Phillips aroused him, he had been leaning forward, with his head upon his hands, in a bitter, aimless reverie.

"Do not rise," Mrs. Phillips said, gently, as if to a froward child. "I came to see you; Frank asked me to come and talk with you. You have had bad news."

"My father was very unfortunate in the guardian he chose for his son"—and the thin lips curled; "he left my childhood to the tender mercies of a boys' boarding-school, and now he is dead, and I am notified that my property is involved with his own. Though I do not know why I should trouble you with this—I thought —I felt as if”—and here the proud face softened and flushed, and his voice faltered.

“You thought I wished to know what the bad news was, that I might sympathize with you; that was right. I am afraid Frank is right, too—that you are too proud to wish it.” Mrs. Phillips sat down in the large study-chair near him, and waited for the flash that she expected her words would call forth.

“You have not lost everything?” How hard it seemed that one for whose future career so many kindly prophecies had been spoken should be cut off on the very threshold of life from the means of pursuing it!

The quick tone of interest was very grateful to the sore spirit. “I do believe you are sorry for me, Mrs. Phillips, and I will tell you the truth. I drew a large check a month ago to pay off my last term’s bills, and must have two or three hundred dollars by me, and that is all I can count upon.”

It seemed like utter destitution to the tenderly reared woman who heard it. All around them were evidences of wealth and abundance. The thick Turkey carpet, the massive library tables with their rich covering, the stands of costly engravings, the niches filled with volumes in substantial and tasteful bindings. And this was her father’s house; her own home was scarcely less luxurious, and her husband would have lavished all his substance on the adornment and pleasure of his young wife, if she had been capricious or exacting; but she was neither; thanks to the judicious and liberal culture of her home, she had higher objects of enjoyment. Still, she had never known a care;

The sweet sense of providing.”

A happy recollection flashed into her mind as she longed for some comforting word to say to him. “Mr. Phillips had less than that when he began life; I have often heard him say so.”

Lawrence looked up eagerly; but his brow clouded again. “I have read of such things, Mrs. Phillips; there was Whittington, you know”—and a playful light struggled with the clouds; “but, then, in such cases people have always been brought up to depend upon themselves.”

“Yes; but they had to struggle towards the means with which they achieved their career—capital or education; fortunately you cannot lose that.”

“But my law studies are not even commenced. Oh, Mrs. Phillips, you don’t know, you can’t tell how hard it is!”

Mrs. Phillips had just come from her sweet nursery cares. There was a baby’s coral in her hand; she had just taken it from her infant’s clasp as she had fallen into a sweet sleep. The chime of its silver bells had brought Whittington to his mind. It was her first child, and this new maternal tenderness gave her such added sympathy towards all, and a gentle dignity to her youthful beauty, for she was scarcely older if as old as the young collegian. Poor boy! he had no mother or sister to go to.

“I do not mean losing my property altogether,” he said, as if, ashamed that she should think he was covetous or grasping; “but I seem to have nothing to turn to, nothing to stimulate me. Before this came I was unhappy; I have envied Frank his home life, his father’s approbation and pride in his success, and the love he has from you all; I felt myself a miserable outcast from home. If this had happened to Frank, he would have something to work for; something to spur him to achievement. Do you see what I mean? I am not selfish enough, even with my isolated experience, to make my own comfort a motive.”

“But you are ambitious!”

“I thought I was; and if I am, so much the worse with unsatisfied dreams and longings to scourge me. I wish I were dead, and out of it all!”

“Believing it is better to meet death Than suffer desolation?”

she said, softly but reprovingly, and Lawrence knew what she intended to call to mind.

Only the night before, they had passed the evening there so happily; Lawrence reading aloud to the family circle gathered around him, full of enthusiasm for his new-found poet, Mrs. Browning. It was thanks to Mrs. Phillips that he had discovered all the strength and noble structure of her verse. There lay the book now, with the pearl paper-folder marking the “Drama of Exile,” where they had laid it down. Mrs. Phillips drew the volume to her.

“We must not pluck death from the Maker’s hand
As erst we plucked the apple; we must wait Until He gives death as He gave us life,” she read, in her clear, sweet voice.

Lawrence had been stripping the envelop which had brought him the evil tidings, and as the voice ceased, he threw the fragments from him. “It shows I am only a child, when I prided myself on manhood,” he said, with more of impatience than penitence, “and a boor, to talk so to you; but your kindness betrayed me into it. I never have had a woman's sympathy, and it is like a cordial, but it has made me forget myself; I shall never forget your goodness, though."

"Wait"—and Mrs. Phillips put up her hand as he started to his feet. "There is something beyond this that may help you; that made me think of it. Won't you listen a moment?"—and she turned the leaves hurriedly.

"A child's kiss

Set on thy sighing lips shall make thee glad;

A poor man served by thee shall make thee rich;

An old man helped by thee shall make thee strong;

Thou shalt be served thyself by every sense

Of service which thou renderest," she read, eagerly. "Have you not something remaining when God leaves with you the power of doing good and making others happy? Is not that an object in life?"

"I believe it is what you live for, but it does not come near enough to me. If I were working for love's sake—"

"Let duty's sake be your motive, and love will bring the reward," Mrs. Phillips said, taking heart at the tremulous quiver of the lips—the bitter hardness was yielding. "Do not give up a single aim of life, if it was worthy, or, when love comes, you will have no shelter for her!"—and a sweet smile lighted up her earnest face. "I am sure you will be brave, and you must not leave us—I came almost expressly to say that—until your plans are decided."

The longing to comfort this lonely heart shone out of the bright yet pitying look which he met, as he stood silent for a moment. His eyes were dim with a mist almost of tears, but he saw the sparkle of the diamond hoop that guarded the broad wedding-ring upon her hand.

"I shall never forget this morning," he said, earnestly. "I shall never forget you, Mrs. Phillips, and if I live to accomplish anything it will be your work."

The young mother went back to the cradle of her sleeping child, and wondered if Lawrence Bryant's mother had watched thus over his babyhood; and thought how hard the fate that had left him without a single tie to life; and then reverie ended in a prayer, as all her reveries over this cradle insensibly did, that the watchfulness of Heaven might shield this tender, helpless creature from all the storms and frosts of the world.

Mr. Phillips was to come that day. It was a pretty sight to see the little one arrayed for her father's arrival, and the eagerness of its mother to display every beauty to the best advantage. The rosy flush on its soft cheek gave a new brightness to the blue eyes, copied from her own; the soft flaxen waves of hair were coaxed into tiny curls; the delicate lace and cambrie of the little robe looped back to display the dimpled shoulders. Certainly, Mr. Phillips had all that heart could ask for in his wife and child. But there was an old love that came between him and them, the devotion to business life. They were the episodes, business was his real existence; not that he was lacking in any tenderness, or detected this disloyalty to his young wife; nor did she lack anything—we cannot lose that which we have never had, nor mourn for that we have never known. She felt that she was loved, that her happiness was consulted, that she was the wife of a man to whom many looked up, and all honored, and for the rest her child filled all her heart.

Lawrence came home from a long, exhausting walk, that had worn off the first fever of the spirit, leaving behind the certainty of loss, the constant recollection of a necessity for exertion, just as Mrs. Phillips came out upon the piazza to watch for her husband's arrival from the train. It was a bright summer day, just removed from oppressive heat, and she wore a soft muslin dress, with ample fulness, floating about her light figure and harmonizing with its graceful outlines. Rippling bands of golden hair just touched the shell-like ear, and met in a heavy coil behind it. Nothing could be more simple than her dress; for, even here, baby's comfort was consulted—she must not be kept at arm's length to preserve costly robes or hurtful ornaments. She had broken a cluster of late blooming roses, that twined about the pillars of the porch, and fastened them in the knot of ribbon at her throat, and as he came near the house, under shelter of the avenue, he watched her defending them with one hand from the grasping little morsel, whose dimpled hands clutched at all the blue eyes beheld.

There was a crashing of wheels upon the gravelled road, as a carriage turned in at the gate, and a happy cry of welcome to baby's father. The guest of the family had never seen him before, and he drew farther away not to interrupt the meeting. Still it was not a trespass to watch it; the servants looked on, baby's nurse to whom she had been consigned for the moment, and Dennis who reined in his horses that Mr. Phillips might alight. And there was Frank, attracted by the noise, putting his head out of the library window. So he stood still, and saw the kiss of welcome from the loving wife of the successful merchant, and the child's arms guided into a caress, and the hearty shake of the hand from Frank. How surrounded with love he was! how much besides wealth was made tributary to his happiness!

He had a hard struggle with himself before he could decide to join them at the dinner-table. Inclination prompted him to gather his wardrobe together, and leave them with a note of thanks for all their kindness to him; but their hospitality and real friendliness demanded more of him. At the last meal he had sat among them as an equal, the heir of a fine property, and free to enter any circle where affluence and good breeding reigned; and now he made his first self-conquest in going to them again, feeling that his position was wholly changed, that he received their attentions on sufferance, and not by right; and above all meeting this stranger, who doubtless by this time knew his whole story, and stood ready to insult him by pity. But he went down nevertheless.

It was some relief to find that Mr. Ireton had not come down; he was not ready to hear his misfortunes alluded to, even kindly. Indeed, his host did not yet know that any had befallen him, for he was suffering so with his limb that Mrs. Phillips hesitated to give him mental uneasiness.

Mr. Phillips's manner was most cordial, whatever he knew. Lawrence was met as the successful man of his class, and Frank's friend alone, so that all the poor boy's proud intentions to keep him at a distance vanished; and in the evening, when Frank was called to his father, and he had gone out to inhale what comfort he could from the soft night air and the fragrance of his cigar, Mr. Phillips came out with similar intent and joined him in his solitary promenade.

"We were all taken by surprise at Gerard's insolvency," the merchant said, presently. "But I had no idea, until Laura told me an hour ago, that he had involved your affairs. It is not generally known. It's a bad business, very bad"—and he returned his cigar to his mouth with a meditative puff.

There was no gainsaying this assertion; indeed, Lawrence made no response whatever; the old pride sealed his lips at this open allusion to his affairs from one he had just seen for the first time.

"I am going back to town to-morrow," Mr. Phillips said, with the same business-like directness, "and it occurred to me, when Laura was speaking about you, that I might possibly forward some of your plans."

"I have no plans," Lawrence said, with a coldness that made him ashamed of himself the moment after.

"I dare say—I dare say; it's too soon. But if Gerard has managed to sink all your income, you can't go on with your law studies at once; though, as I told Laura, there is not the least need at your age to abandon the thing altogether. Not in this country, where a clever man can't help getting on. Frank says you can go through fire and water to accomplish your intentions; a pity so much real talent should be wasted on a profession."

"It is not likely to be thrown away very soon," said Lawrence, with a harsh laugh.

"I don't wonder you feel it, not at all; but never fear that a practical experience of life will ruin your chance at the bar. What could you do, do you suppose? Now, I'm not curious, not at all; don't think me so."

"Do, I'm sure I cannot tell!"—and the lament of the unjust steward passed through his mind. "Dig I cannot, and to beg I am ashamed."

"Well, to come to the point, for Laura charged me not to stay too long in the night air"—and Mr. Phillips fastened one button of his thin summer coat, by way of precaution—"it's the most singular thing; we were just looking about us for a reliable enterprising man to take charge of some Western lands that have just become available in market. We took them for a bad debt, you understand, and they are likely to turn out well. How would that suit you?"

It was more than a plank that had drifted to this shipwrecked life; a good, steady raft, that would float him securely; and if he could forget the luxury and abundance of the ship, and have patience with its tardy progress, why might he not reach the shore in safety? But he knew nothing whatever of business details; in this he was behind the lowest clerk in the employ of Phillips & Company. A new revelation to one who had gloried in his intellectual grasp, in the treasures of knowledge he had accumulated, and looked down contemptuously on all who had not reached his stand-point.

Accustomed to see everything in a straightforward business light, Mr. Phillips attributed the hesitation on the part of the young man to a consideration of the profits likely to accrue.

"We had thought best to give an interest in the affair instead of a salary, and should intend the percentage to be liberal, but with your talents you might not think it worth while. However, don't decide at once—there is no occasion to, for we can communicate by letter. Some one is calling—it is Frank calling you."

And never did an interruption come more opportunely; a tumult of thought that bewildered him had been roused by the friendly proposal of one who took his integrity if not his ability on trust, the man he had been ready to shun a few hours before. Priding himself on his independence, and rashly self-reliant from the education of circumstances, he, for the first time, longed for advice and counsel. The pride that would have scorned both, and that prompted him at first to resent any inquiry into, or discussion of his affairs, had been for the time cast out, and he followed Frank with a feeling of relief, when he found Mr. Ireton had sent for him.

"Your interest and confidence in me are so entirely unlooked for that I do not know how to thank you," he said, as they turned towards the house.

"Not at all, not at all." And Mr. Phillips went back to his wife quite satisfied, for he had done a friendly thing at her suggestion, and, as men sometimes will, he unconsciously took all the credit of it to himself.

Mr. Ireton forgot his injury for the moment, and essayed to rise from his chair, as the haggard face of Lawrence met him.

"My dear boy," he said, with the familiar address used habitually towards his own son, "why in the world did you not come and tell me about this affair immediately? Who is your legal adviser? whom do you propose to consult?" and for once Lawrence yielded entirely to apparent good feeling, and found himself pouring out all the difficulties, and disappointments, and—thanks to Mr. Phillips—the possibilities of his position, receiving a father's thoughtful counsel in return.

In another week, the long-talked-of visit to Ireton had been paid, and Lawrence leaned back in the carriage as Frank returned to the house for a forgotten commission. He could but think of the great change that had passed over him there; one more look—Mr. Ireton had wheeled himself to the library window for a parting nod—Mrs. Phillips followed Frank down the steps, and extended her hand to him again. "Come to us at any time, as if you were coming home," she said; and Ireton was left behind.

"After many days!" Who could have the courage, if prophetic gift of vision were offered to them, to look on the changes in any life or fortune which we find "after many days?"

Lawrence Bryant thought something like this, as, five years after his entrance into life, he turned, for the first time, towards the place that was so associated with it. For himself, there was nothing to regret; his present position was above all that he could have looked forward to—he had grown up with the fortunes of the West; and with an income from landed property in one of its busiest towns equalling that which he had lost, he had made a brilliant opening in his professional career. This had not been done by magic, or a single stroke of good fortune; tireless activity, proud integrity, and patient labor had united in his life; and, better still, remembering the quick sympathies that had reached him in his great trouble, he had endeavored to repay the debt by ministering with word and deed to the sorrowful and the unfortunate. His feverish ambition had been chastened and re-directed, and there remained but one thing to be claimed of fortune—a home.

"Come to us at any time, as if you were coming home." The echo of those words haunted him continually of late, and at last he had come. The bustling depot stood glaring in the sunshine as on his first arrival; the houses looked familiar—he could even remember the very trees that they had climbed or sketched by the roadside that first happy week. There was the iron gate at last, and Bouncer, poor old dog, stretched in the supineness of old age before it. No more glad leaping and shouting for him—only a whine as the roll of carriage-wheels came faintly to his dull ears—and he raised his head, peering about with almost sightless eyes; then his head sank again between his paws with a low growl, for it was a stranger, and not the one he watched for.

There was no trace of neglect in the beautiful grounds, they were well kept up, but a painful quietness brooded over the old place. At this hour—for it was almost sunset now—the family had usually gathered on the shady piazza, but there was no sign of life, except a child's hat with its blue ribbons, as it had fallen to the floor; and the hospitable entrance-door was closed, showing how rarely a guest was received.

The waiting man who had been Mr. Ireton's own attendant opened it. He did not recognize the gentleman who asked to see his mistress; nor was it strange, for the years that had brought gray hairs to Harris had shaded the boyish face he would have looked for in Mr.

Bryant with a silken, curling beard and bronzed the delicate face with the sun of the prairies ; the slender figure had given place to breadth and fulness, and there was a tone of command in the deep, ringing voice. Even Mrs. Phillips did not at first recognize her brother's friend, as she came forward with an inquiring look, and bowed distantly. Distantly to him ! when his heart almost suffocated him with its rapid pulsations, and, after he had said "Mrs. Phillips !" the tremulous voice could not trust itself further.

He missed the kind, benignant face that had looked up with a parting "God bless you !" from the empty invalid chair. He longed for the hearty, brotherly kindness of Frank's welcome ; and the friend who had been the first to uphold him in his great trouble, who had been as the angel of his life in daily recollection, met him as a stranger !—Not when the voice made her look up full into the dark eyes that mirrored all this conflict of feeling, for her own drooped with instant recollection of all that had befallen them since then, and the desolation of the house to which he had come.

"O Lawrence ! Mr. Bryant ! is it you ? It is next to seeing Frank himself !" she said, quickly. "You were very kind to come to me. Papa would have been so glad !"

And, as they talked afterwards, "with sighs between," Lawrence realized fully how utterly lonely her once bright life had become ; nothing left of all its fulness save her child. The close widow's cap told a part of the story, and the vacant chair the rest ; and, while all these changes had come upon his home, Frank was still in a foreign land, changed to a selfish, purposeless wanderer by the fickleness that was not worth the cost.

When the lights came, and the tea equipage with them, Lawrence looked eagerly to see how she had borne all this ; he dreaded a visible signet of sorrow in the face he had last seen so radiant with health and happiness. There was less roundness, the lines had become finer, and the fair hair was completely hidden ; but she had not grown old ; time, that had done so much for him, seemed to stand still with her.

It was late when Harris came to say that his old room was prepared for him, and they had talked without stirring from their places all that evening. There was so much to be related and listened to ; for, though letters had passed now and then, and more frequently of late, during Mr. Ireton's illness, the half had not been told. It was two years since Mrs. Phillips had returned to her old home with a fatherless child, and now that protection was taken away from her. It was very, very sad, and his own lonely boyhood and youth rose up before him ; for, though he was in the familiar chamber once more, and had realized the dream of years in returning to Ireton again, he could not sleep ; his heart was full of restless questionings and wild yearnings. Could it mock him ?

How softly and gratefully the fresh morning air came in at the open window after his feverish night ! The calmness of nature seemed to promise peace, even to his craving soul, and he went out of his chamber door to find a shy little one standing before him with her hands full of gay flowers she had snapped close to the stem, and was coming to offer to her mamma's friend and Uncle Frank's friend. She shrank from the touch of the silken beard on her baby cheek, but she liked being taken up in his strong arms, and carried swiftly down the stairs, and thus to her mother in the breakfast-room.

Mrs. Phillips looked almost as girlish as ever in her plain white morning-dress with its knot of black ribbon, and her fair hair uncovered. It must have been for the first time, for the child clapped her hands, and said, "You are so nice, mamma, without that ugly old cap !" and Lawrence thought the same, if he did not say it.

"I have had the library opened this morning," Mrs. Phillips said, as they rose from the table ; "I thought it would seem more like the old time, and I will join you there presently ; or perhaps you would like to walk."

No ; the library suited his mood best, though he did not open a volume, but sat there and dreamed until her light step roused him, as it had done on that memorable morning. She had a work-basket in her hand and her keys—all so natural and homelike. Lawrence adjusted the outer blinds to shield her from the glare, and tried not to feel impatient when little pattering feet came seeking "mamma ;" but looked for some wonderful bribe, and found it in his gold pencil-case. Then he leaned back in his chair again, and watched the white hands busied with the needle, and the head bent a little above the work, and the child playing at her feet. So they talked on again, but not so earnestly as the evening before ; snatches of talk with long intervals of silence between, until the child wearied of her play, and fell asleep on a rug upon the floor. He stooped down to lift her up, and lay her upon the sofa, looking earnestly at the delicate features and small curved mouth ; and then kissed the red lips as he said to himself, "Yes, she is only like her mother."

"Poor little Blanche!" Mrs. Phillips said, tenderly. "Her childhood will never be as bright as mine. The loneliness was all to come." Yes, they had indeed changed places since she had stayed and comforted his desolateness. How much he owed her he could never make her comprehend; but it swept over him with startling vividness. He did not return to his seat again, but pushed away the basket from the lounge, craving to be near her.

"I sat here once in this very place, Mrs. Phillips, more lonely than words could express, and you came to me. Oh, I have never forgotten it; and when I heard that your child was left without a protector, I said to myself, she should never want one while I lived. I came here to say it to you."

"Yes, that is all I came to say," he went on more hurriedly, "but I find I cannot stop there—I cannot go away again, and leave you as unprotected as that child; not if you will let me shield you." She did not speak or look up, but a scarlet flush stole over neck and brow. "All these years you have been set in my heart as a Madonna before her worshipper—something afar off—but your living presence has shown me my error. I love you—I have loved you since—I cannot tell when!" and he drew away her hands from their work almost fiercely, and looked eagerly into her face, holding them both between his own.

The glitter of a wedding-ring did not warn him away now; no, nor anger, nor pain, in the face where he sought to read her answer. The arched lips quivered—the hands trembled in his own—"If it were not wrong! oh, if it were not wrong!" that was all she said; and then, "I have been so lonely!" and a long, quivering sigh as he drew the fair head close—close to the strong heart throbbing with the wild hope and love of that confession.

"Oh, Laura, you told me years ago to come to you as to my home, and I have come. Will you not have faith in me?"

"They all trusted and loved you so, Lawrence. You seemed last night like all that was left to me of them. I clung to the thought of your sympathy when papa was taken; and I put away my weeds because you had come."

He showered kisses upon the rippling waves of hair. "And I owe everything to you; oh, Laura, you do not know what love is—love that has never had an object to waste its intensity upon. You have shared a heart with the world and the hurry of life; but you have never had a rival here, my comforter, my angel, my own wife!"

And thus both lives had found fulness for famine, "after many days."

WINTER WINDS.

BY NETTIE LEE CRANDALL.

FERCELY blow the winter winds,
With a cheerless, dismal sound,
And to his boisterous music dance
The snow-flakes o'er the frozen ground,
And all is dark and drear.
Dark clouds are o'er my heaven spread,
Fresh storms are bursting on my head,
But one ray of light and joy is shed
My lonely path to cheer.

It is the thought through all these scenes,
However cheerless, strange, or new,
For me one smile of kindness beams,
One faithful heart is true—
One soul's deep love is mine!
Shining with pure, unwavering light
Through sunny day or stormy night,
Filling my soul with strange delight
And thought of God divine.

I thank thee, Father of high heaven,
That sorrow has been mine,
Else these thoughts had not been given,
In vain this humble light would shine
On life's uneven way:
For it alone are sorrow's showers,
With one ray to light the darkened hours—
To glad my heart, fill it with flowers,
And teach me how to pray.

I've sought the love and praise of all
In other days—and with regret
Sighed for a power to chain all hearts
That none one moment could forget,
Whatever sky above me:
But now, while journeying here below,
Though fierce the winds may blow,
I only wish, in joy or woe,
One faithful heart to love me.

PARNASSUS.

BY WM. ALEXANDER.

PARNASSUS! thou dost lift thy head sublime,
As when the Muses haunted thee of yore,
And Castaly her crystal stream doth pour
Adown thy sides, and will till the end of time,
Fed by the everlasting snows, which find
A home on thee. Thy fount's delightful lymph Afforded draughts inspiring to each nymph,
Of the so tuneful nine; and Homer blind,
To whose great genius wondering nations bow,
Drew inspiration from thy cooling spring,
And bards who would pretend high strains to sing,
Must quaff thy waters full as deeply now,
But fled forever from sweet Castaly,
Are all the nine, and echo murmurs where are they?

MR. AND MRS. RASHER

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MISS SLIMMENS."

CHAPTER II.

THE PARTY.

I wish you wouldn't call it a house-warming, my dear; when people lived in two-story houses, and did their own work, they called such things "house-warmings," and it sounds so old-fashioned. I know you've a ponchong for everything old-fashioned: it seems to be a weakness of yours; I expect every day to see you come down with your grandfather's long-tailed blue on—though as for that, you'll scarcely have a chance now, for when we left the other house I sent it to the dogs. You wouldn't have taken fifty dollars of any man's money for that coat? What was it worth, I'd like to know, but just to clutter the closet, and get moths in it? Still, if you feel so bad about it, I'm sorry I sent it off. It went through the Revolutionary War, and you was proud of it? Oh! if I'd have thought about that, I'd have kept it, for it's quite fashionable to have relics of the Revolution. What was your grandfather, my love? A general? "A blacksmith." O get out! "And as brave as the bravest general; who followed the army to shoe the horses, and put shoes on General Washington's own horse many a time, and was wounded twice in battle." La! that's all nice enough, but I'm not going to brag about it before folks. "It's a different style of forgery that's the aristocratic thing now-a-days; a man may forge a check, but not a chain, if he wants to keep in good society. Only blow your own bellows loud enough, and you'll be all right with the world." Why, Rasher, I didn't know as you had so much morphine in your nature; you're usually so cheerful. Come, now, let's talk about my party, or my fate, as Mrs. Fitz-Simmons calls it. I'd like to make out the list of invitations this evening, so's to get the cards engraved. They ought to be out a week beforehand. I'm going to have them very large, and very square, and several of 'em to each person; one small square one, colored, with "Admit the Bearer" on it, and one—what's that? No, it won't be ridiculous, either! Didn't his Royal Highness—what if it was at a public building, instead of a private house? I know it ain't necessary, but it's stylish, and that's enough. Once for all, Rasher, let me settle all these little points of etiquette; you're very good in your way, but somehow you've no faculty for comprehending all the little niceties; in other words—there's no making a silk purse out of a sow's ear? There it comes again! those eternal allusions! However, you think the purse is a pretty full one, if it isn't of silk? That's so! Nobody could be more generous or better hearted than you are, my love; and if you'd only get over some of your queer ideas, and quit punning—especially allusions to your business—I should be one of the happiest women in the world. You can't guess how uncomfortable you make me when we're in company; I feel every minute as if I was sitting by a powder magazine that was going to explode; I'm so afraid of them terrible little escapades of yours. You thought it was me who did all the blowing up? Well, I do it in the strict seclusion of the family circle, if I do; and if you'd confine yourself to the same, I shouldn't mind what you said. Not even if you said your darling Marier wasn't the woman she used to be? No, not even then; I've no ambition to be the woman I was, when one silk dress a year, and two bonnets satisfied me.

But let's get back to the invitation. I shall have no difficulty in making out my list. You've no idea of the people that have left their cards since we changed our residence; dozens and dozens of all the brown-stones up and down the street, and they're all just the sort of folks I want at my fate. Mrs. Fitz-Simmons knows the most of 'em, and has probably been the means of their calling. As the girls are going to be at home, we must have plenty of young people to dance; Cerintha never looks better than when she's dancing. You don't like to see her whirled around in the arms of them dancing bears? It's not just the way we used to do, to be sure; but this is an age of progression, and what the world thinks is right is right.

I haven't written a word to the girls yet about the new house or the party: I intend it to be all a surprise. I've ordered their dresses, and they're being made up now. A maize-colored moire-antique for Cerintha, with lace flounces; and a white puffed thull for Felicia. You should have thought white would have been prettiest for both of 'em, seeing they're only school-girls yet? I'll warrant you! A book-muslin, tucked, with pink and blue ribbons, cost, including making up, ten dollars apiece! But girls don't dress in that manner now-a-days. A moire-antique ain't a bit too rich for Cerintha's style, and the color suits with her hair. She ought to have a set of pearls, but I won't ask for them till she's out of school, since the house and all had to be paid for this year.

Who are you writing down there? Your old friends, the Griggses? If you intend to invite the Griggses, then I'll give up the party at once. There! there! there! Now don't get mad, and tear the paper in two; if you want to keep on friendly terms with them, I shall have no objections to making a nice little tea-party especially for them, and ask the Fishers at the same time. I don't want to have it said that I've forgotten my friends, and I can have them here often, in a quiet way, but not to my fate. It would spoil every speck of pleasure I might take. Mrs. Griggs used to be a good neighbor when we were first married. Many's the afternoon we've set, and sewed, and talked together; but she always was rather a common woman, and her husband had bad luck, and she'll have nothing to wear, if she's asked, but her old black silk, and she'll feel bound to come, for fear we'd be hurt if she shouldn't. La, how blind some people are! If she had any delicacy, she'd feel that—because you've made money in the pork business, and Griggs has failed in the hardware line, there ought to be no farther intimacy between the fat and the frying-pan? What a trying man you are, Rasher! It's in your line to be trying? Go on with your list, go on. "Mr. and Mrs. B. Baker." There, you needn't try to help me about the invitations; I'd rather make them out myself. One would think you were obeying the injunctions of the Scriptures literally, to ask in the beggars of the street, when everybody knows that if the Bible wasn't entirely figurative, we couldn't get along at all.

What are you leaning back on the sofa and sighing in that melancholy way for? I'm not going to offend your old cronies. If you want to ask Griggs to a cigar and a glass of sherry in the dining-room, when you're alone of evenings, I shall not object; and I expect to have to ask his wife here three or four times a year. And the same with the Bakers and the Fishers. You think I ought to send Polly Griggs a new dress to wear to the party, if she hasn't got any, instead of slighting her on that account? Well, if you ain't the oddest man! Who ever heard of such a thing? I'm sure it would never have come into anybody's head but yours. If you feel like dressing up your neighbors in silks and satins you'd better begin at once. But do remember that charity begins at home. Here's Cerintha in want of that set of pearls, and I haven't treated myself to that camel's-hair shawl yet, and you're talking about my giving Mrs. Griggs a silk dress fit to wear to my party! You remember when she used to lend me her white crape shawl when I would go to a calling? Mr. Rasher, will you take your heels down off that satin-damask rose-colored sofa, and try and sit up like a gentleman? You're tired? Indeed, and what's tired you? I think a man worth as much money as you might afford to hire other people to do his work. As long as you're in business you'll have to attend to it, and you're not rich enough to quit off yet, 'specially at the rate the money is flying? There it comes—reproaches a-ready! I don't believe a woman ever gave a party in the world that her husband didn't reproach her for it—except the wedding-party, which they're always glad enough to attend. You didn't intend any reproach at all—you're perfectly willing I shall be happy my own way? Come, let's go into the library. If you're tired, you can lounge there as much as you please. Oh, I forgot to tell you the silver came home to-day, and it's splendid. Mrs. Fitz-Simmons was here when it came, and went down with me to look at it. She said all those little pigs running about on the teapot and everything were sweet and very appropriate. I thought perhaps she had reference to your business, so I told her they weren't pigs at all; that the wild boar occupied a conspicuous place in the old country heraldry, and had been the crest of your family ever since the Conquest. She asked me what Conquest, and I told her I didn't know. She said it must have been the Porcine War, and I told her quite likely. She asked me the meaning of "Salve Lardum," for Mrs. Fitz-Simmons don't understand Latin as well as she does French, and I told her it signified that "Discretion was the better part of valor;" which she thought was a very pretty motto, and very suitable to anybody in the mercantile line. Her husband's a lawyer, but he don't make a quarter the money you do, so we've very good reasons for being friends—she likes my money, and I like her influence; and if she says impertinent things, once and a while, I have my little revenges.

But if I don't get about my list, I'll never get all the names down. Mrs. Fitz-Simmons says, if I want to make myself popular, and have my parties successful, I must have perfect suppers and plenty of wine. The music must be good, but the wine must be better—that the young men who give life and spirit to such occasions only ask plenty to eat and drink, and music to dance by, and girls to dance with, to be satisfied—if they are treated well in these respects, they'll praise me and come again. Very modest of 'em? Don't talk about modesty, Rasher, if you don't want to be ridiculous. Mrs. Clarence Cornell says it's immodest to talk about a thing's being immodest, for, if we were all as pure as we ought to be, everything would be pure to us, which is the reason the very most respectable ladies can dress and behave as they do, which seems to me to be very good reasoning, indeed, and I hope you won't be going and making a fool and a bad man of yourself, and proving yourself to be full of evil thoughts, by being prudish about matters that all fashionable people know are proper. You're suited, if the women are? What's that tacked up against those books, like a notice of a sheriff's sale against a wall? Read it and see?

WANTED. A Governess, for two full-grown people, who, having suddenly become wealthy enough to purchase a library, want somebody to explain it to them. She must understand the history of Grease, French, Hog-Latin and Politenes, and be capable of giving the butler orders when the lady of the house is up a stump. Celery satisfactory.

Now, Rasher, that's your handwriting, and your spelling too: how long has it been up there? That friend of Mrs. Cerulean's was here to-day, that literary gentleman, that she thinks such a lion. What's that? see-lion, you guess, by the way she shows him up as if he were at Barnum's? Oh, hush; he was here this very afternoon, looking at the books, and I know now what he was laughing at, though he pretended it was something else. If you will play practical jokes, play 'em on somebody besides me. Oh, you needn't go to hugging me like a bear; that's a certain sign you feel guilty.

Well, Cerintha, the party's over. The butler's putting away the things, and there's a plateful of grease on the dining-room carpet, I saw this morning, when I went in to take a cup of tea to clear off my headache. I had your and Felicia's breakfast sent to your bed, for I knew you wouldn't want to get up till noon. It's twelve now, and I couldn't wait any longer to come in and talk over the affair. Did you enjoy yourselves, girls, as well as you expected? I think it was a splendid affair. If it hadn't been for that accident, which really made your father angry, and if it hadn't been for two or three things he would say, and his atrocious puns, I should think the party was a great success. Mrs. Fitz-Simmons congratulated me before she went away. She said she hadn't been to a party this season that cost so much—the supper was exquisite—and who furnished the liquors? You know I didn't let your father see my dress until I was all ready for the evening, and then I let him in my chamber to get his opinion. He said I looked as nice as if I'd been corn-fed. What did you say? You think it wasn't exactly in good taste for the hostess to be dressed so much—Magenta velvet and white plumes? Why didn't you say so before, then, and I would have altered my style? You danced better than any girl in the rooms, and Felicia looked the prettiest. And I don't think you need to be ashamed of your mother last night, girls. Everybody was complimenting me, and my girls, and my furniture, and my house. Mr. Easaby asked me where I got so fine a collection of pictures, and whether I bought them by the square yard or by the piece. I was glad to tell him what a bargain I got in them, and he congratulated me on it in the pleasantest manner. Your father was in the best of humors, full of his jokes and talk, but, for my part, I'd rather he'd a been more silent and retiring, for, though he made a good deal of laughing, he made so many faux pas, he kept me in a constant state of reprehension. When Mrs. Girand lost off that elegant necklace she wore, he told her "she was casting her pearls before swine," which wasn't very flattering to those nice young men who surrounded her. Which reminds me again of the accident. The butler tells me those young gentlemen who cut the ropes, had first gone up stairs to the private liquor room, and drank too much brandy-and-water, and they felt so funny and full of mischief, they didn't know what to do with themselves; and happening to pass the dumb-waiter, one of 'em said it would be a deuced good thing to cut the ropes, and the rest laughed, and thought it would, and two of 'em did it, and down went the waiter with all them fancy bottles and cut-glass on it, and that splendid great punch-bowl and a lot of my finest porcelain.

When we heard the crash, I turned quite pale, for I thought some of the floors had broke down, or something awful; but when your pa saw the mischief and found out how it was done, he was real angry about it, which isn't very common for him. I begged and implored him to say nothing, and he finally got good-natured again; but I heard him telling Senator Brown, at the supper-table, he thought it was "cutting it rather too fat," and if the young men thought they could treat him in that manner, they 'd got the wrong pig by the ear; they should never be asked to his house again. But I must coax him out of that, for those very young gentlemen belong to the cream of our set, and they only happened to take a little too much. Of course, if they 'd have been in their senses they wouldn't have done it. You hope he won't offend young Spangler? I noticed he danced with you twice, last night, my dear; so I went straight to Mrs. Fitz-Simmons and asked her, confidentially, all about him. He lives rather high, and belongs to one of the real old families; but they 're not very wealthy, and she don't know where he gets all the money he spends. He's after a rich wife; and I presume he 'll propose on the first opportunity. I don't think your father would like to see his money going to pay that young gentleman's debts and extravagancies. Still, he's got style, and style is—. You don't intend to marry him, but you want the éclat of his attentions? Oh, very well! I see you can take care of yourself, my love. Felicia, here, is such an innocent little thing, she's after her father's own heart. I shouldn't wonder yet if she married some clerk or music-teacher, because she imagined herself in love with him; when, if she 'd only—"husband her resources, she 'd be all right!" Goodness, gracious me, Rasher, what brought you home this time a day, and up into this chamber. "She can find plenty of scoundrels ready to husband her resources, and when they 'vé got them, won't care whether they husband your pretty Felicia or not." You're such a croaker, you 'll make your daughters believe the world 's full of designing men after their fortunes. What 's that, Felicia, darling? If you get as good a man as your papa, you 'll be satisfied? And well you may! He's always been a good provider, and an indulgent husband. I've only three faults to find with your father: the first is, his being in the pork business—the next his habit of playing practical jokes—and the last, his dreadful, utter want of style. He has no air. He isn't hurt at my saying it, for he knows it himself. Put on the best broadcloth of the latest make, Janvin's gloves, and Genin's hat, it don't make a bit of difference, he's still the same plain, fussy, short little man, a-biting the fingers of his gloves, and looking as if he wasn't to home in his own house nor his own clothes. He has no air. It's the trial of my life, but I can't help it. What did you say, Rasher? You're like the Englishman's scalded pig? Clear out of this chamber! I won't permit my daughters to hear such foul allusions; I—. It wasn't a fowl allusion, it was a piggish one! Go along down stairs before I take the broomstick to you. I've forgotten the use of the broomstick? Come, come, Rasher, the chambermaid may be listening at the door. I wish you wouldn't refer to the past so frequently. You may stay if you 'll behave yourself, for I want to ask you about the party. But first tell me what brought you home? The stage? Nonsense! what did you come home for? For the rest of the day? But what was your object in coming so early? You didn't object? I 'll quit asking you questions, if I'm to be bothered in this manner. You've come home to see your little girls? Oh, well, that's natural enough, I suppose, seeing you had so little chance of talking to them yesterday. But they're not little girls any longer, you see. Cerintha's shot up like a bean-stalk. As for Felicia, she 'll always be little, like you; but she's got her full growth.

Everybody complimented our table last night, Rasher. The new silver made a gorgeous appearance; everybody looked at it, and got everybody else to look, and noticed our coat-of-arms, and told each other the motto. I heard young Flummery whispering to Mrs. Clarence Cornell that he couldn't have believed his own ears, if he hadn't have seen with his own eyes. There were so many smiles and whispers at first, I was afraid something was wrong. I asked James if anything had gone wrong, and he said there had not; he 'd never waited on a nicer table. Flummery made himself very polite to me after I noticed him laughing with Mrs. Cornell. He helped me to salad, and put cream in my coffee when I told him I took it. As he held the cream-jug in his hand, he looked again at our coat-of-arms. "Salve Lardum," said he, very gravely. "I was not aware of the Rasher device till this evening, though I've been quite a student of heraldry. What is your receipt for curing bacon, Mrs. Rasher?" "Curing bacon, Mr. Flummery!" I exclaimed, beginning to be offended, as I always am at such allusions. "Yes, madam," he replied, "I supposed that curing it was the surest manner of saving it; though, doubtless, your ancestry saved theirs by taking to their heels at the proper moment." "It is an article," said I, "that I never have in my house; I do not remember now that I ever tasted any. I have no receipts for curing it." "Mrs. Rasher," said he, suddenly, "you have had no sugar yet." And he turned to the waiter to get me some. Just then, I noticed you poking that Senator Brown in the ribs, and laughing outrageously. I knew you was telling him of some of your practical jokes; your very countenance showed it, and I involuntarily tried to look at my back to see if you hadn't labelled me with some motto or something, in your usual good taste. Now, husband, I want to know what you and the Senator were having so much fun about. If you've been playing any trick on me, I want to know it; if I ever find it out, you'll repent it. I declare, if you ain't laughing again at the very remembrance of it! I'll ask the Senator myself the next time I see him. I'll tell you another thing that young Flummery said to me, though I'm sure I don't know what it means. I don't comprehend half he says, but he's excruciatingly polite, and has the reputation of being witty. Mrs. Fitz-Simmons says she couldn't think of having even a small social reunion without him, though I must confess, privately, I don't fancy him so much as she does. Says he, "Mrs. Rasher," says he, "have you read the late popular work, 'Darwin on the Origin of the Species?'" And says I, "No, Mr. Flummery; I've been so busy lately getting fixed in the new house, and all; but I expect it's in the library, for I told the man to have all the popular things." And says he, "I was just thinking it might be possible your family were descended remotely from their own coat-of-arms." And I said, "Of course we were!" with a good deal of emphasis, and asked him if it was a book of heraldry, and he smiled, and said it was; the most reliable book of heraldry extant.

my first party. To be sure I'm sorry for that prank of the young gentlemen, breaking up the crockery so, which was rather wild of them; but youthful indiscretion must not be judged too severely, especially when committed by the members of our first families. You wish they had spared your punch-bowl? You and Griggs would have had fine times over that punch-bowl this winter, wouldn't you? I'm sorry it was broken, I'm sure, for it would have been a comfort to me at the opera and other places, where you don't choose to go along—"and where I don't choose to have you"—to think you were comfortable at home. But, as I was saying, I've only one lasting regret, which is that I didn't succeed in getting the Liverpools here. I'd set my heart on having them, which I knew would be the means of fixing my position in society. What's that? If there's any danger of my slipping out, I'd better be fastened in with a bottle of liquid glue? What a tormenting man you are, Rasher! You've no more sympathy with my peculiar feelings than—don't hug me, don't! I ain't your spare-rib! get out! call me your duck or your goose, if you want to, but don't dub me your spare rib any more. I can't stand it.

Mrs. Fitz-Simmons says that our cards of invitation were very unique. I told you I understood such matters, and that they would be just the thing. Did I have "Complimentary" printed on all of 'em, or were the reserved seats one dollar extra? Don't be inquisitive, my love. Come into our room and let the girls dress. Hurry yourselves, my darlings, for there will be floods of company here within an hour. Semi-toilet, you know; but I'll run in and see how you look before I go down.

You've been around this early settling up bills? well, I must say, if you live to be a thousand, you'll never learn how to do things genteelly. As long as people know you are rich, and can pay when you get ready, they're in no hurry to be paid. It's only poor people, or those in doubtful circumstances, who have to pay on the spot. If it wasn't convenient for you to pay, of course you'd have to; but seeing you can just as well pay any time, people feel hurt to have you settling up so soon. It ain't the style. These folks would rather you'd be in debt to 'em than not. But you'd rather not be? That was very commendable when you did a small business, and wanted to be certain about making both ends meet, but it wouldn't hurt you a bit now if you never paid your debts. Let me see the bills; $50 for cards, engraving, &c.; $200 for flowers; $250 for music; $300 for wines: $800 for supper, attendance of waiters, loan of silver, &c. (that man's bills are always enormous, but I couldn't be sure of a success without him); $1,600 total. "Add the milliner's bills" (mantua-maker's, I suppose you mean), "and $150 for breakage; $50 for ruining carpet; and a hundred or two for sundries, and you'll have nearly two thousand dollars." Well expended, Mr. Rasher. I'd have given a thousand dollars alone if the Liverpools had come. How? Perhaps, if I'd privately offered them that sum, they might have accepted, as they're said to be getting as poor as they are proud? The bills are very moderate indeed, considering the brilliancy of the affair. Five years from now, if you should live and prosper, you won't think anything of giving ten thousand for a grand party once a year. The Pillsburys do it. What are you ciphering there, on that piece of paper? How many pills, twenty-five in a box, at twenty-five cents a box, must have been inflicted upon trusting humanity, at a profit of seventy-five per cent. on the whole, in order to have enabled the Pillsburys to give that ten thousand dollar affair? Pshaw! what a horribly coarse-minded person you are, to be thinking of such things. You might just as well inquire—How many barrels of mess? Rasher, you're hitting that cologne-bottle with your elbow! There it goes down upon my Brussels carpet; thank goodness, it wasn't the ink-stand. You shouldn't think I'd have a "Brussels" carpet on my floor? Did I ever hear about Paddy's pigs? No, nor I don't want to. "A gentleman met Paddy with a drove of pigs, and, says he, 'so you're driving your pigs to Bath, are you?" and Paddy says, 'whist! whist! if ye plaze, sir, and don't be afther spaking so loud, for sure they think they're going to Dublin, sir, or they wouldn't stir a step!'" And that's just as much like you, Rasher, as two pins. If I want to drive you one way, I have to pretend I'm driving you another. I'm constantly endeavoring—To pull the wool over your eyes? Yes, to pull the wool over your eyes, if you will have it so—but it's always for your own good, always! If you'd a had your own way, you'd stayed in that three-story brick, and worn your old white hat forever. I've persuaded you into a house, and a butler, and a carriage, and gloves, and a decent hat, and a party, and—A coat-of-arms? Yes, and a coat-of-arms, which you never would have had the ambition to look up, and discover who your ancestors were, if it hadn't been for me. What's that? I'm a great woman? You've told me so several thousand times in the course of our connubial relations, and you haven't said afar from the truth. I intend to be a great woman; and if you had one bit or grain of spunk you'd be a great man, in some way—politically, or officially, or some way. You meant I was a great woman in a corporeal sense? And what kind of a sense is that? Come down to the warehouse scales to-morrow, and get weighed? There it is again; sometimes I wish to goodness you'd live in your warehouse, and never come out of it; you'd be more to home there than in my elegant—My elegant?—yes, my elegant—there's the bell. Company for the next four hours; but you needn't mind about coming down, unless you wish to, my dear.

THE BLACK SHEEP.

CHAPTER III.

Two school-girls sat in their room, on the last night of the term, deeply engaged in laying plans for the ensuing vacation. The taller, and by a few months the elder, of the twain was Evelyn Tyndale, now grown into a handsome, intelligent-looking girl of eighteen. Her companion—by name, Minna Moore—was a plump blonde, with rosy cheeks and a profusion of ringlets; lips always willing to form themselves into a ravishing smile; a white brow, rarely, if ever, visited by a frown, and languishing blue eyes. This last feature was her most potent weapon in Cupid's warfare, since they took the enemy by surprise. They alone kept her face from being positively what the French call riante—a species of beauty that captivates many hearts, and seldom breaks one. But Minna Moore's eyes promised a depth of feeling, an unfathomable mine of tenderness, while she was, in fact, the most impassive coquette that ever knotted up a lover's heart-strings and then flung by the plaything for another more attractive; and this without a pang of compunction for, or even consciousness of the mischief she had done. Evelyn, spoiled and somewhat selfish though she was, had far more genuine feeling, and was more to be relied upon. Yet the girls were chosen mates, and on the morrow Minna was to accompany her friend home for a visit of a month.

"As to beaux," Evelyn was saying, "I do not think we shall suffer. Besides Henry Carroll, and Tom Delisle, and other transient visitors, there is my brother Sterling, who lives next door to us; his wife loves company as dearly as I do, and, when she cannot go with me, most obligingly releases him from home-duty, and insists that he shall escort me; and for concerts, exhibitions, etc., there is Allen, if we can do no better."

"He is very young, is he not?" asked Minna.

"Hum-m-m! not exactly a boy, although he does not seem like a man to us. Six and eighteen—can it be possible that he is twenty-four years old? How ridiculous!"

"Why ridiculous? Why do you laugh? Is he so very juvenile in appearance?"

"My dear girl"—still laughing—"I never think of Allen's being my senior; the idea has all the force of novelty; yet facts are stubborn things, and he certainly preceded me into the world by half a dozen years."

"What is his profession?"

"He is a clerk in my father's store. § Sterling is a lawyer. The brother whom we lost was the genius of the family; mother weeps whenever his name is mentioned; she has told me that but for the comfort she found in me, then a babe but two years old, she must have died of a broken heart when he was taken."

"She had still two other children left," said Minna, wondering.

"True; but Sterling lay at the point of death. The night after Egbert died they watched his elder brother from sunset to sunrise, expecting every breath to be his last. They say that poor, dear mamma has never been the same since that awful time."

"And Allen?" said Minna, pertinaciously. She was determined to know why she had never heard more of a grown brother whom she had hitherto supposed, from Evelyn's casual mention, to be a youth, a mere lad.

Evelyn colored and bit her lip in vexation or embarrassment. "Oh, the boys were so different! and Egbert was the favorite. Although he had not completed his tenth year at the time of his death, he was studying Latin and the higher English branches, and stood first in all of his classes. He was, moreover, gifted with remarkable beauty, while Allen was always uninteresting from his infancy."

"He is not handsome, then!"

"Not in the least. I do not know that he would be really homely, if he took more pains to please, to render himself attractive; but, as I have heard mamma quote a hundred times, 'There is a black sheep in every flock,' and our small circle cannot boast of being the exception to the rule. You will love Sterling the moment you see him; his address is as fine as his person."

Minna shook her head wilfully. "I am not sure that I shall not prefer the younger brother; my tastes are singular sometimes."

"It will indeed be an odd whim that leads you to fancy Allen. He is very shy, very reserved, and does not care at all for ladies' society. He is useful to perform escort duty when there is no one else at hand who can serve that purpose; but, dear me! a man of straw would do as well, if one could work the puppet with wires."

"You are complimentary!" laughed the other. "Charity, if nothing else, would impel me to undertake the civilization of this Orson. See if we do not become excellent friends. I have a presentiment."

Allen Tyndale had no prescient visitings of good or evil as he plodded homewards to tea on the evening of his sister's arrival. As a babe, he had loved her very dearly; but, his bruin-like gambols for her entertainment being generally productive of scoldings from his mother and outcries from the child—frightened or hurt by his rough handling—he had learned to keep at a distance, and abate his caresses. He tried hard to win her to some return of the affection he felt for the pretty little sister who queened it over the whole household, as child and girl; but she, accustomed to universal homage, scorned the votive offerings of one so humble and unlovely. He was ever to her "only Allen." That word "only!" When used in such a connection, what mournful tales can it not tell of misappreciation, and slight, and injustice!

Thus the boy struggled up to man's estate, unknown by those most nearly allied to him by blood; unnoticed by the community at large. When he reached a suitable age, his father withdrew him from school, and offered him a clerkship in his store. It was accepted without a word of comment or gratitude, and no hint of a preference for that or any other profession as a means of support. "He does his work faithfully," was his father's invariable reply to the mother's inquiries as to his suitability for the situation; "but I cannot make the lad out; he has always been a living mystery to me."

If his performance of business duties was mechanical, he was yet more of an automaton at home. After Sterling's marriage, he was useful, now and then, in the capacity described by Evelyn, and when called upon never refused to act the undesirable rôle of the imaginary straw-man—a proof that he bore no malice for past neglects, and was not selfishly partial to his own pursuits. Allen's pursuits! the idea would have been as novel and amusing to Evelyn as was that of his seniority to herself.

Ignorant that his sister had set this particular evening as the probable time of her return, Allen admitted himself by his pass-key to his father's residence. The footman was toiling up the staircase with a huge trunk on his shoulder, taken from a pile of luggage in the hall. It was characteristic of the young man, that, instead of questioning the servant, he glanced at the trunks to ascertain the owner's name. The upper one was his sister's, and his momentary curiosity satisfied, he was turning away, when the different lettering of another caught his eye—"Minna Moore." The thought of meeting a stranger, particularly a young lady, diverted him from his design of proceeding to the family sitting-room, and sent him off to his own chamber. When the tea-bell rang, he ventured forth, and went down softly by the back stairs—a boyish habit he had never abandoned, and one much complained of by his mother, as "a sample of Allen's skulking ways."

His pace was quickened on the second floor by the opening of the front chamber door, and a gush of musical laughter issuing therefrom. He stopped on the lowest step, screened by the turn of the wall, from the view of those above, and listened to the footsteps and rustling robes that passed through the upper hall. Then a fresh, young voice he recognized at once as a fitting accompaniment to the laugh that yet thrilled him with its delicious peal, said some words, the meaning of which he did not catch, eagerly as he drank in every note, and Evelyn replied as they entered the parlor. He was free to pursue his flight. His primary intention had been to quit the house and sup at a restaurant, so intense was the anticipated agony of sheepishness into which he knew he would be plunged by the introduction that threatened him. Now, an accession of hardihood, or a change of desire, directed him towards the dining-room. He was possessed by an unaccountable wish to see the owner of that laugh. Yet he hardly raised his eyes at her entrance; and, after his awkward bow, as she was presented, appeared to be completely extinguished, if one could by any stretch of imagination have conceived that he had ever shone with inherent or borrowed light. Taciturn as usual, he seemed absorbed in the business of the hour and place, his plate receiving all of his regards. When he made his mental catalogue of Minna's charms, it would have puzzled the closest observer to discover, yet scarcely a motion of hers was unremarked; not a syllable lost; and her mirror had not reflected her bright face more perfectly, as she took her last satisfied peep at it when dressed for supper, than did the heart of the "bashful brother," for whom Evelyn made an apology that was contemptuous in its carelessness.

He lingered without the parlor-door when the meal was concluded, trying to summon resolution for the desperate feat of entrance. If he could only glide into a dark corner unseen and unspoken to. But the full blaze of the chandeliers streaming down upon the carpet, sending its mocking light to his feet through the door, which was ajar, told him of the cruel brilliancy that pervaded every part of the room. As he still hung back, there was a ring at the door. More visitors! The next moment he was half way up to his own dormitory. This was in the third story—a spacious and comfortable apartment, for which Mrs. Tyndale had no other use, or his quarters might not have been so eligible. It was the family habit to regard Allen as a person of low tastes, the fear most frequently expressed concerning him being, lest he should, by and by, fall into vicious company, "as is so apt to be the case with young men destitute of intellectual resources," the mother lamented. This is a sentiment, by the way, that oftentimes offends our ears, from the lips of those whose knowledge of the world and of human nature should be sufficient to teach them the fallacy of the notion. It is not your "man of very ordinary intellect" who roars out the bacchanalian song in the streets, when honest people are abed; not the "heavy plodder" who rattles the dice and shuffles the cards; not the "stupid nobody" who earliest fills the drunkard's grave and the felon's cell. Let the annals of the pen, the press, and the rostrum tell whether commanding talents or immortal genius is incompatible with proclivity to vice; a security against slavery to crime.

That Allen Tyndale had not fallen from the right path of honesty and sobriety was assuredly not in consequence of his parents' guardianship, or the ennobling influence of home-loves.

In this, his sanctum, there were nowhere visible tokens of the unworthy tastes of which he was accused. The library was small, and not very choice, as to literary merit; but it was free from works of exceptionable morality. There was a flute with a music portfolio; and another of drawings lay on the desk, the box of pencils beside it. The furniture was plain, and neither new nor well kept; but its abuse was the result of the housemaid's neglect, and not his fault. Against the walls hung several fine engravings, neatly framed; and these were the sole articles of mere ornament there. Happy was, it for the desolate-hearted boy that his tastes were few and simple; that his reserve had led him to avoid, rather than to court the society of his kind!

He sat down to his desk, and drew out an unfinished drawing. He was but a copyist of the creations of others. He had never conceived, much less executed, a good original picture, but he loved to sketch, and practice had made him a tolerable draughtsman. He had patience, too, and his copies were minute and faithful. His present model was a female head—a crayon portrait he had picked up at a sale. The lineaments were strongly marked, full of character, but wanting in beauty. The workmanship was admirable, however, and on this account Allen had bought it and commenced its study. To-night, he eyed it with distaste. How grimly uninviting it looked! how angular its outlines! how hard and cold its eyes! how severe and even vixenish appeared the mouth! "Pshaw!" he said, after a few strokes, "I cannot draw. I wish I had never seen the fright!" Pushing it away from him, and out of sight, he continued to mark idly upon a sheet of paper that had covered the drawing. He was writing now. His own signature was repeated in a variety of styles and chirography; then the name of the city and State; finally, with a negligent air, he traced the address he had read on the trunk below—"Minna Moore." He said it aloud, as he wrote it. "A pretty name!" he added, with an affectation of nonchalance; "and a pretty girl! If I had her likeness to copy, I don't believe I would get tired of it before it was done." From this, he began to speculate about the probable doings of the party down stairs; who was the visitor who had frightened him away. "Perhaps it is Henry Carroll. He was an old beau of Evelyn's—or Tom Delisle. I wonder if he will not fall in love with Miss Moore! He is a handsome fellow."

He was not conscious of sighing, but he did it, nevertheless. He heard the distant piano, and went out into the passage to listen. A set of fashionable polkas was well played; then a lively waltz, followed by a prelude to a popular song. Was it Evelyn? If so, she had greatly improved in taste and execution, for she did love music enough to become a proficient. More likely that Minna Moore's white fingers were sweeping the keys. Very cautiously he sought the lower story. The conservatory door was open, and all was dark within. Yet more stealthily he went in, and ensconced himself in a position which commanded a view of the parlors, trusting to the friendly obscurity to conceal him from the eyes of the merry party of young people. Henry Carroll and Tom Delisle were both there, and Allen's surmise was further correct as to the songstress. The witching melody, to which the very shrubs and flowers about him seemed to harken and vibrate, was poured from the coral lips of Minna Moore. Her back was towards the conservatory, but her face was visible in a large oval mirror, suspended above the piano—a whim of Evelyn's, which was excessively annoying to more timid performers.

Now, it so happened, that, by the merest accident (?) in the world, Minna's blue eyes were cast upwards to this glass at the instant that Allen's figure stole across the dim background. They were keen of sight, those liquid orbs. He was seen, recognized, and his motive penetrated, before the deluded youth found a covert. Song after song followed, and still the mirror assured her, by her chance peeps at it, that the new denizen of the conservatory, whom she had so promptly classified, was there yet. Nor did he move when she at last arose, and bowing a graceful acknowledgment to the compliments of her auditors, seated herself where her unseen admirer might feast his eyes, and once in a while hear a strain of silvery laughter. Opportunity for escape was afforded and improved by him, when the two gentlemen said, "good-night."

"Quite an adventure, I declare!" murmured the beauty, as she rolled up her hair for the night. "I am not without hopes of making something of him yet, unpromising specimen though he seems."

His shyness was almost a match for her arts, and but that pique kept her firm to her purpose, she would have given up the pursuit, as altogether unworthy of her manœuvres. Fortune, at last, granted her the opening for which she was watching. The girls were engaged out to an evening party, and Minna, having completed her toilet, ran down to the parlor to get a full-length picture of herself in the tall mirrors that reached from floor to ceiling. She started, in unfeigned surprise, when she saw there Allen, flute in hand, looking over the music-rack. He was cognizant of their engagement, and not doubting but that they had already gone to fulfil it, he was now searching for the notes of a song he had, while in his leafy retreat, heard Miss Moore sing the previous night. The recollection of the manner in which this pleasure had been obtained conspired with his customary diffidence to overwhelm him. He had no power to move or articulate, but, with face on fire, and lips that moved without sound, stood, a culprit, detected in the very act.

"Am I an intruder?" asked the clear voice he knew so well.

Her manner was a bewitching mixture of frankness and girlish modesty—a wish to please and fear of appearing forward.

"O no, madam! I had no right—I just wished to—that song you sang last night." There, he had let it all out! And with a crushing sense of this upon him he relapsed into confusion worse confounded.

"What was it?" The pink-tipped fingers were busy with the loose music. "Maybe I can help you find it. Let me see! What did I sing last evening that was worth remembering?"

"Don't trouble yourself; it's of no consequence," was the Toots-ish reply of the abashed swain.

"Not to you, perhaps; but I am bent upon showing my gratitude to you for the compliment you have paid to my poor vocal efforts. I dare say I am Yankee enough to guess what the song was. See if I am not!" holding up a sheet.

"That is it! How did you know?" he asked in surprise. Already several shades of bashfulness were banished by her easy and cordial bearing. That gleeful laugh! Did Minna Moore know how passing sweet it was? Was its joyous chime always as involuntary as she would have it seem? Its contagion was made evident by a smile from Allen. He even dared to meet, for a second, the arch glance of those beautiful eyes. After all, this talking with a pretty woman was not such a formidable matter. In deed, he found it rather pleasant than otherwise.

"Did not I tell you that I was a Yankee? Seriously"—and she spoke as if she meant it—"I could not have mistaken the object of your search, since it was the only piece I sang which could have gratified the taste of a musical amateur."

The bit of flattery was not the less palatable to Allen, because such morceaux were seldom dealt out to him.

"Evelyn will not be down for fifteen minutes yet," was the next attack. "Will you not accompany me while I play your favorite?"

She had taken the song from him, and seated herself at the instrument before he could refuse.

"Oh, not now!" he stammered. "I am very sorry—I cannot play—at sight, I mean; I am a poor performer at any time. You must excuse me."

"Then you will learn it, will you not? I have a brother who plays a little, a very little on the flute, not nearly so well as you do, and we often practise together. It will be so much like home—be such a gratification to me if you will now and then imitate him in this respect. What a beauty of a flute! Please let me have it for a moment. Ah, I thought so! Edwin—my brother—has one of the same make. He says no judicious flutist will ever use any other."

She drew her fingers caressingly over the polished wood, played as carelessly with the silver keys as if she never dreamed how she was consecrating it in his eyes, henceforth and forever.

"The tone is exquisite, and you finger well!" she said, on a sudden, flashing a bright smile up at him. "How astonished you look! You are longing to ask how I know that. Shall I confess that I set my window open last Saturday night, and was rewarded by some chance, far-off strains from the retreat where you so selfishly think to confine all your music? I heard you play this." Piano and voice glided into the air that had drawn him into the conservatory on that first memorable night. "Not another note without an accompaniment!" she said, with a charming imperiousness, and breaking off in the middle of a stanza to touch the flute.

Allen obeyed, whether against his will, or with its consent, he could not determine. Inspired with courage by her praises, or the music, he played a good second, much sweeter and more correct than his enchantress had expected. Her enthusiastic encomiums were ringing in his ears and heart as he bade her "Good-night," just in time to escape his sister, who descended the front stairs as he went up the back. He had promised, too, that he would again "remind her of home," by bringing his flute into the parlor when there was no "vexatious evening company," an engagement he remembered with a sensation of mingled terror and delight.

"Behold the beginning!" said the exultant fairy, dashing into the "Huntsman's Chorus," to cover the retreat of her late companion, as his sister sailed in.

"You are a complete band in yourself, Minna!" she exclaimed. "I was sure I heard two or more instruments."

"Only a triumphal march to herald the approach of the Queen of Love and Beauty!" was the response—a sentiment warmly seconded by Evelyn's sworn knight, Henry Carroll, who entered at the same instant, with Tom Delisle, to escort the young ladies to the festal hall.

Minna was too skilful a general not to follow up the advantage she had won, but too wary to alarm the intended captive by over-brisk measures. Evelyn, quick-sighted as she was, did not for a long time suspect her brother's ensnarement. She could not help remarking that he was so much more at ease with Minna than with herself or any one else; that he mingled more freely and frequently in the family circle, and was altogether "wonderfully like other people"—a change dating from the week after her return home. Minna's manner, too, could not escape notice; she behaved towards him with a gentleness and affability remarkable even in this eminently popular damsel.

"Minna's good-nature is really absurd at times," said Evelyn to her mother. "It must have been a sad bore to sit and talk to Allen for an hour, as she did last night, and Tom Delisle trying to attract her attention the whole time! She tolerates Allen out of politeness to us, I suppose, and, if she were not so obliging and soft-hearted, she would content herself with that. He is unused to so much notice, and is not at all likely to appreciate it. She puts herself quite out of the way to give him a pleasant word or look."

There was no exaggeration in this description of Minna's conduct. It fell short, indeed, of expressing the various means of fascination brought to bear upon the unsophisticated victim. Unweariedly she adapted her themes and conversation to his limited capacity, and never were commonplaces endowed with more interest. She divined his tastes, and catered to them; his prejudices and dislikes, and humored them; foreseeing, as the inevitable sequel to her painstaking, the development of a passion mightier than any other that had entered his soul. And all for what? At first that the idle moments of an incorrigible flirt might be whiled away in a pastime so congenial to her fancy; afterwards to tempt and secure game really worth the trouble of setting the net.

The hour of her departure came; a cause of regret to Mr. and Mrs. Tyndale; of as much sorrow to Evelyn as she could feel at the going of any one while Henry Carroll remained near her; to the dupe of the coquette's wiles a season of blacker darkness than he had ever endured before in the gray, still life she had of late changed into a sunny, happy day. Within her trunk were stowed away handsome presents from her entertainers and the friends she had made during her visit; there was one—the most valuable of all—from Allen; but this, for reasons best known to herself, she omitted to mention to his sister.

Mr. Tyndale attended his fair guest to the depot in person. Her escort was to meet her there; and, expecting to see him, he was surprised yet not sorry to recognize Allen in the person who opened the carriage door when they stopped.

"Ah, Allen! I am glad you happened to be here. Just get a through ticket, and have those trunks checked, will you? There are four and a hat-box. I will see Miss Moore into the cars."

Minna could have laughed outright at the expression of consternation, the blank disappointment depicted in the son's countenance as he received this cool order; but she struggled with her risibles, and, giving a slight pressure, that might or might not have been accidental, to the hand that helped her to the ground, she demurely followed the old gentleman, who, ignorant of the blighted hopes, the frustrated purpose accruing from his selfish arrangement, hurried his fair charge under shelter from a heavy shower just beginning to fall. Allen pressed towards the "office," hoping still to gain a brief interview with the lady of his love by promptly securing the ticket and checks. But each man there had his own reason for eagerness in the same object, and he had to struggle desperately for the coveted articles.

"Just saved your distance!" said his father, rather sharply, as, wet with rain and perspiration, and out of breath, the young man made his way through the crowded aisle to where sat Minna, chatting gayly with her travelling companion and her late host. "I began to think that I had better have gone myself."

Minna spoke one little sentence in an undertone when she took her ticket. No ordinary phrase of thanks or regret would have called up that flush into his cheek, and fired the leaden eye. "I wish he had!" was her aside to the father's remark, and these four words were some balm to his bleeding spirit; sustained him from downright despair when she was actually speeding away from him, and he stood on the wet platform gazing after the smoke-enveloped train, the rain soaking his garments, and, hanging above his heart, the prospect of loneliness insupportable, desolation unspeakable in the weeks and months that must elapse before he saw her again.

CHAPTER IV.

It was the height of the bathing season at Long Branch. The white flag was up, signalling the hour when ladies and gentlemen might together enter the surf; be partners in a wild frolic with the waves, tenfold more exhilarating as well as innocent than the gayeties of the nightly "hop." The porticoed hotels skirting the beach sent forth each its streams of seaward-bound travellers, and the sands soon presented a lively spectacle. Costumes the most fantastic and varied were too common to call forth more than a passing smile or observation. One dash of spray, one fall of the curling waters ever hastening towards the shore, and all were alike, noticeable only for superior daring or an excess of cowardice.

"There is the lady whose very pretty face smote you with such admiration yesterday," said a gentleman on shore to his friend. "Not even the disfiguring bathing-dress can alter the fact of her beauty. She has spirit, too; see how fearlessly she ventures out!"

"I would not object to exchanging places with her attendant," answered his companion. "He is not an ill-looking fellow, either. I imagine he is more than passably handsome in his dry land habiliments."

"You know him, do you not?" interrogated the other. "It is Tom Delisle, our old school-mate."

"Is it possible? And is that his sister?"

"I cannot say. If so, she has a most devoted brother. I devoutly hope that she is not his wife. In that case, the honeymoon is not over. Aha!"

The ejaculation was elicited by the breaking of a heavy wave over the outermost line of bathers, and the shock it gave them. Delisle saw it coming, and bracing himself by a firmer foothold, threw his arm about the waist of the lady whose hand he had been holding. She would in all likelihood have fallen but for this support. Her hat was tossed on shore by the breaker, and her long hair rolled down upon her shoulders. The exclamation of the spectator, above quoted, was repeated, in a tone of astonishment, by a solitary individual within hearing.

"There is your most adoring cavalier, Allen Tyndale," said Delisle, on their way to the shore.

"Ah, indeed! Where?" asked Minna.

"Just beyond those two gentlemen with white hats. He has been watching us for ten minutes or more."

And watching he was now, with a bitter gnawing at his heart, that was only allayed, not removed, by the smiling, familiar welcome wafted to him by the toss of her little hand, so snowy beneath the dark blue tunic, as she emerged like Aphrodite from the foamy billows. The hope of seeing her was all that had brought him to this place. He had become possessed of information respecting her whereabouts by chancing to overhear a remark of Evelyn's to her now accepted lover, young Carroll.

"Minna will spend a fortnight at Long Branch in August. If it were not for my important preparations for—for October," smiling and blushing as she brought out the words, "I would join her there."

For six months Allen had dreamed and planned how he would take advantage of his summer's vacation from business to pay a visit to his idol at her own home. This seaside excursion promised better things than a formal presentation of himself at the door of the yet unknown pater familias. Leaving his family under the impression that he was going upon an indefinite Northern trip, he took the most speedy conveyance for the popular resort that, just now, was all the world to him. An examination of the registers informed him at which hotel her party was staying, and not perceiving that Tom Delisle's name was upon the same page, he engaged a room for himself. Then, in the perversity of his diffidence, dreading the interview he yet longed for, as the dearest boon Fortune could bestow, he dared not send up his card, but strolled restlessly down to the beach, and there found her when he was least prepared for the meeting.

When Minna, in dry attire, came forth from her bathing-house, he was nowhere to be seen.

"How long has Mr. Tyndale been here?" she inquired of Tom Delisle.

"I do not know. He probably arrived this morning. I had not seen him before his appearance on the beach just now."

"Will you find out where he puts up?"

"If you desire it, certainly," he rejoined, rather stiffly.

"You know," added Minna, in pretended confusion, "it is natural that I should want to hear from Evelyn."

"Of course; the most natural thing imaginable. The letter which I brought from her is already two and a half days old, and your anxiety for later tidings must be extreme."

This touch of sarcasm was more welcome to the hearer than the utmost display of alacrity in the execution of her will would have been. It proved exactly what she wished to ascertain: viz., that the speaker was sufficiently in love to render him the most unreasonable of men; a point from which the next step is a leap into the quagmire of declaration. It seemed preposterous that a handsome, intelligent fellow of fair fortune, and a favorite in society, should be jealous of a nobody like Allen Tynedale; yet Delisle was unaffectedly uncomfortable. There was no accounting for women's fancies. They had set all laws of cause and effect in love affairs at defiance, since the days when Titania became enamored of Bottom. The experience of the previous winter had showed that, for some reason, Allen's attentions were not disagreeable. Tom entertained sundry annoying memories of times when those pretty shoulders had been wilfully turned from himself, as his shy rival approached. Her embarrassment in speaking of him, her awkward attempt to frame an excuse for her desire to meet him, were omens that boded no good to his own suit. Let her feelings be what they might, Allen's coming would assuredly interfere with his enjoyment of her company.

Minna's head was down, and her face screened from observation by the broad brim of her straw "flat," and they walked back to the hotel in silence. She did not look up as they paused at her door. The sorrowful droop of the black lace curtain surrounding that hat appealed to his generosity.

"May I come up for you at dinner-time?" he asked, in a relenting tone.

"If you please."

The sad, gentle accents cut him to the heart.

"You are displeased with me! Forgive my rudeness! I was unjust, ungentlemanly, cruel! And to you, the most—"

Had this been a suitable place for a proposal, he would have been allowed to proceed. As it was, she checked him, by holding out her soft, ungloved fingers in token of amity. He still hesitated, after she had withdrawn them modestly from his prolonged pressure; but although his heart and eyes were full of pleadings for one forgiving glance, one glimpse of her countenance, she went into her room, and shut the door after her without raising her head. Once there, she waited until his reluctant footsteps died away in the distance, before she threw the friendly hat to the floor, and danced around it in such exuberance of triumph, that one might have supposed her crazy.

"Wait until to-morrow, and we shall see whether Ella Price will say, as she did last night, when I told her of my last winter's work with Allen the Irresistible, 'Le jeu ne vaut pas la chandelle!'"

Allen stood in the hall as she passed through to dinner. She bowed smilingly, but his face was gloomy, and he did not advance one step to meet her. Why should he—how could he, when she leaned on Tom Delisle's arms? Nor did he seek her when the two hours of agonizing tediousness spent at table were over. They were at opposite ends of the same board. He might have feasted his eyes upon her fresh, joyous beauty, if he had had the heart to look. He retired to his chamber, and pacing its narrow limits, he brooded darkly upon his disappointment, until the sea-breeze, stealing in through the window, in some measure cooled his fever, and tempted him to inhale it in more abundant draughts.

The bank above the sands was thronged with gay promenaders, and, shrinking in his sick-heartedness from their merriment, he went down the steep flight of steps to the beach. The water was very rough, and the great waves smote angrily upon the shore, spreading wide sheets of foam far beyond the point where they broke. Absorbed in thought, Allen took no notice of their treacherous advances until his wet feet admonished him of the propriety of keeping nearer the solid ground. He was picking his way carefully along the foot of the perpendicular bank when a scream made him look behind him. A lady, with a nursery-maid and child, had been overtaken by the water while collecting the bright pebbles left by the retreat of a former wave. There was no danger, but all appeared terrified by the sudden wetting. A child or a woman in distress could never be overlooked by our hero, shy though he was; he ran back, and caught up the little girl, whom the nurse had dropped or upset in her endeavor to save herself.

"You are not hurt; only a little wet and a good deal frightened," he said, soothingly, shaking the sand from her clothes.

"I am a thousand times obliged to you. You are very kind," said a sweet voice. And the lady pushed back her hat, flooding him, as it were, with the liquid light that poured from her blue eyes.

It was now Allen's turn to let go the struggling innocent. He actually staggered backwards under the overwhelming surprise.

"Take Bessie to the house," continued Minna to the maid; "she will take cold, if her feet remain wet. Mr. Tyndale!"

The calm politeness of manner departed with the nurse. The ripe lips were trembling, the eyes swimming in tears or what looked like them, and her tone! A heart of granite must have melted under the grief and loving reproach she contrived to throw into that single exclamation—"Mr. Tyndale!"

Still he could not speak. There was a lump in his throat; a wild throbbing at his heart that deprived him of utterance; made respiration almost agony.

"Won't you shake hands with me?" pursued the winning accents. "Or have you indeed forgotten old times and old friends?"

"Forgotten!"

It was all the pale lips could say, as he clasped the tiny hand in his own, and, figuratively speaking, again laid his forehead in the dust before her, that she might plant her foot upon his neck.

They walked and talked together until the supper-gong summoned the scattered parties to the hotel. After tea she was still his for a saunter along the portico until it was time to attend the "hop" at a neighboring house. She named the place; not carelessly, but as if certain that he would not fail to meet her there, although she was "obliged, by a prior engagement, to go thither with some one else." He fully intended to obey the delicious hint; but, reflecting that her toilet required some time to perfect, and that his, as he meant to be only a looker-on, need undergo no change, he repaired to the seaside, which had already a strange fascination for him, there to ruminate upon this sudden and wonderful happiness.

The moon was in the zenith, and her path across the waste of waters was like the passage of myriads of silver-winged fairies. Not one drop of spray there but had its ray, flashing, quivering, sparkling. O for a word or a combination of words that may even faintly express the restless radiance, the changing from brightness to glory in that gorgeous highway of the Queen of Heaven!

Allen gazed, and wondered, and thought until he was tired with walking in the deep sand; and, retiring to the shade of the bank, cast himself down in a boat drawn up between two bathing-houses, and lay listening to the booming surge, and dreaming. Occasionally a figure, or perhaps a group, passed between him and the illuminated tract of ocean. No one appeared to see him; but it did not occur to him that he was really concealed from casual observation. Therefore, when two ladies stopped so near to him that the stiff breeze rustled their dresses almost in his face, and bore every syllable of their conversation to his ear, raised as their voices were to overcome the noise of the surf, he did not move. Had he been sure that he must play the eavesdropper in remaining where he was, it is questionable whether he could have found the nerve to arise and discover himself.

"What a consummate tactician you are!" said one of the fair strangers. "Do you really mean to say that the rencontre which seemed purely accidental to us lookers-on from the higher grounds was a bold, studied step to recall your recreant admirer? And poor Mrs. Courtney was 'so concerned,' and 'so grateful,' and 'so charmed' with your good-nature in going with Bessie when she cried to 'pick up pretty stones!' I don't suppose you pinched her to bring about the lamentations you quieted so amiably, did you?"

"Not exactly!"—Allen's heart halted in its rapid beatings at the voice, and the low, musical laugh that accompanied it; "but I deserve the credit of having instigated the self-willed infant to the desire expressed by directing her attention to the riches cast up by the waves, that proved themselves such able abettors in my womanly manœuvre."

"I hoped you gained enough by said manœuvre to recompense you for the loss of your new gaiters."

"I was fortunate even there. The boots are uninjured, except that the tips may be a trifle less glossy. The walk in the warm sand that succeeded my wetting dried my feet comfortably by supper-time. Even if they had been ruined, I should not have been inconsolable, well as they fit; should have considered it but a small mishap, one of the minor misfortunes of war."

"How much longer do you intend to drive two in hand?" interrupted the other. "Take care! it is a dangerous game!"

"I grant it—to the inexperienced," was the confident rejoinder. "I remember, moreover, your insinuation against my adorable Allen, as expressed in the French proverb. Hearken, O unbeliever! My politic show of interest in the arrival of the interesting youth this forenoon was a bullet in the heart of the real game. Whilst I was making sure of the decoy here upon the sands this afternoon—partly because he might yet be useful to me, partly because my heart softened at the thought of his miserable state, and I was not loth to leave him 'with a sweet taste' of me 'in his mouth,' as the children say; while I was doing this, a certain young gentleman was galloping restlessly through country lanes and woods to while away the tedium of the afternoon which I had named as the period I desired for deliberation upon the subject of a letter slipped into my hand at dinner. Now, since this cogitation occupied less time than he expected, was I to mope in my room, like Marianna in the 'moated Grange,' through all the glorious sunset? This would have been especially nonsensical after I had seen my melancholy second-best strolling towards the beach. To cut short my story, at ten o'clock I am to meet the writer of this document in the pavilion on the bank back of us, and give him his answer. I was in a very good-humor towards the whole world, as you may suppose, so, as I could spare an hour after supper to the aforesaid No. 2, who the fates have decreed shall be No. 0 by to-morrow, it was but kind in me to bestow this parting blessing."

"How did you get rid of him finally?"

"Poor fellow! He is now diligently staring into the windows of the 'National,' expecting to recognize me in every girl that floats by in the waltz. It hurt my conscience to fib out-right to him, but it was necessary to get rid of him. He is called the 'black sheep' of the family, and he is very like a sheep-burr in his pertinacity, where he once fastens himself. What a noisy heathen old Neptune is! Let us go on. I do not care to crack my voice before the interesting interview at 'ten o'clock this moonlight night.'"

And warbling the song she had quoted, she walked away.

CHAPTER V.

NONE of Allen Tyndale's kindred have looked upon his face since that summer night, four years ago. A brief line to his father, dated from New York the day after he left the seashore, is all the direct intelligence they have ever had from him. It stated his intention of immediate departure from the country, without assigning his reasons for doing so, or his destination. A month later, an acquaintance just returned from a Southern tour informed Mr. Tyndale that he had met his son in New Orleans, in company with several Filibusters of Walker's army; had spoken to him, and received a sullen recognition, which, however, did not surprise him, as the young man was evidently intoxicated! Every means of inquiry was resorted to by the alarmed parent, but no further information was ever gained.

The mother knows not if the son she nurtured upon her bosom is still a fugitive and a wanderer upon the earth; or, if he moulders in a nameless grave; or, more distressing yet, if he's in a malefactor's cell, awaiting the day of doom. On her the stroke has done its work. Remorse, late and ineffectual, sets before her his shadowed childhood; his embittered youth; his neglected manhood; and asks, "Was there no balm in a mother's love—no pity in a mother's heart, that could more than compensate to him for Nature's deficiencies and the world's slight?" This voice it is whose accusations have robbed spirit and body of rest; made her old while yet in her prime—a change that causes friends to wonder, and acquaintances to conjecture what mysterious grief thus weighs her down, which arouses the husband's fears for her health and reason, and the daughter's indignation at the extravagant expenditure of sentiment upon an object so unworthy.

"It may seem unsisterly in me not to sympathize with mamma's anxiety," she says to her friend and neighbor, the still pretty and blooming Mrs. Delisle, "but what else could she—what could any of us expect? You know yourself, Minna, that Allen was always our 'black sheep!'"

READ ALOUD.

READING aloud is one of those exercises which combine mental and muscular effort, and hence has a double advantage.

To read aloud well, a person should not only understand the subject, but should hear his own voice, and feel within him that every syllable was distinctly enunciated, while there is an instinct presiding which modulates the voice to the number and distance of the hearers. Every public speaker ought to be able to tell whether he is distinctly heard by the farthest auditor in the room ; if he is not, it is from a want of proper judgment and observation.

Reading aloud helps to develop the lungs just as singing does, if properly performed. The effect is to induce the drawing of a long breath every once in a while, oftener and deeper than of reading without enunciating. These deep inhalations never fail to develop the capacity of the lungs in direct proportion to their practice.

Common consumption begins uniformly with imperfect, insufficient breathing ; it is the characteristic of the disease that the breath becomes shorter and shorter through weary months, down to the close of life, and whatever counteracts that short breathing, whatever promotes deeper inspirations is curative to that extent, inevitably and under all circumstances. Let any person make the experiment by reading this page aloud, and in less than three minutes the instinct of a long breath will show itself. This reading aloud develops a weak voice and makes it sonorous. It has great efficiency, also, in making the tones clear and distinct, freeing them from that annoying hoarseness which the unaccustomed reader exhibits before he has gone over half a page, when he has to stop and clear away, to the confusion of himself as much as that of the subject.

This loud reading, when properly done, has a great agency in inducing vocal power, on the same principle that muscles are strengthened by exercise ; those of voice-making organs being no exception to the general rule. Hence, in many cases, absolute silence diminishes the vocal power, just as the protracted non-use of the arm of the Hindoo devotee at length paralyzes it forever. The general plan, in appropriate cases, is to read aloud in a conversational tone, thrice a day, for a minute, or two, or three at a time, increasing a minute every other day, until half an hour is thus spent at a time, thrice a day, which is to be continued until the desired object is accomplished. Managed thus, there is safety and efficiency as a uniform result.

As a means, then, of health, of averting consumption, of being social and entertaining in any company, as a means of showing the quality of the mind, let reading aloud be considered an accomplishment far more indispensable than that of smattering French, or lisping Italian, or dancing cotillions, gallopades, polkas, and quadrilles.—Hall's Journal of Health.

LESSONS IN MOSS PAINTING.

BY C. E.

In this kind of painting, moss is the first article to be procured. It can be found in forests or swamps, and there is also a few varieties to be found in the open fields. The moss that grows in pine woods or rocky places is much the best, as it keeps its color better in drying. Four varieties are necessary ; more can be used to advantage. That of the darkest color will be found growing on the bodies of trees, in small tufts. After procuring your moss, place it with the top down on paper near the fire, and dry quickly without scorching. After it is dry shake off all impurities, such as dead leaves, grass, sand, and rotten wood. Moss that grows in swamps must be thoroughly washed, as the roots are always dirty, and hard to clean after they become dry. As soon as it is dry put it away in a dark place until time to use it.

Procure a sheet of bookbinder's pasteboard, or get a thin board made perfectly smooth, or, what is better still, a canvas prepared the same as for an oil-painting. If pasteboard or board is used, it should be coated with thin paste, and paper muslin laid smoothly upon it, the glazed side up ; it will be firm when dry, if the paste is good ; but there must be no wrinkles, as that spoils the beauty of the picture. After it is dry take a crayon or pencil and sketch a landscape ; if not used to drawing, procure a picture to copy from. Any one can sketch a landscape sufficiently well if they have one to look at. A picture with old ruins, distant mountains, one or two large trees, with river or lake partly visible is a good subject ; or an old, ruined saw-mill, with trees, mountains, and the mill-pond in sight. There is a picture sold at the print-shops called the "Ruined Abbey," which looks beautiful when copied. One thing I wish to observe here—the larger the picture is made, the better it looks. Never attempt to get too much on a picture of moderate size, as it invariably looks cramped and clumsy.

—If we work upon marble, it will perish ; if we work on brass, time will efface it ; if we rear temples, they will crumble into dust ; if we work upon immortal minds—if we imbue them with high principles, with just fear of God and of their fellow-men, we engrave on these tablets something which no time can efface, but which will brighten to all eternity.

DIRGE.

UPON old Time's empurpled flood
How deep are shadows cast!
Here written are in fire and blood
The records of the past.
I gaze upon a lone, bleak shore,
And hear the lion's fearful roar
Where towers and temples reared of yore
Their spires into the sky;
And see all desolate the wold,
Once smoothly paved with purest gold,
Where heroes dwelt, and gods of old
Smiled on them from on high.
Cities of yore that proudly stood,
Lay level with the ground,
And o'er them awful solitude
Reigns mournfully profound.

O'er old Judea's hills and plains—
The golden land of yore—
No more the great Jehovah reigns,
As in the past, no more.
And where they reared the cross on high,
The bloody cross of Calvary
That bore Messiah up to die,
Gave back to God the Son—
Is now a fearful hold, and strong
Of Moslem rule and Moslem wrong,
And superstition's mighty throng
Bow down to gods of stone.
There is no end to woes of earth,
No end to human strife;
All gayness here is madness—mirth
Is mockery of life.

Though free in heart, and brave and stout,
And strong to raise a battle shout,
None but have entered with a doubt
The dark, mysterious tomb;
And as the ages onward flow,
Still shall the souls of mortals go,
With doubt of joy and fears of woe,
Into eternal gloom.

Thus doubts and fears encompass all
That breathe this mortal breath;
Thus doubting, fearing, trembling, fall
Before the reaper Death.

Mem'ry is all with sorrows fraught;
O past! how sad thou art!
And mournful is man's present lot,
The erring feet must smart,
Yet in the future looms no light
To guide our footsteps on aright,
But all is fearful, black as night—
As wintry night with rain!
And musing of the coming years,
With eyes bedimmed with many tears,
I, burdened with these doubts and fears,
Oft deem that life is vain.
But still there seems to be a goal
Beyond the present day,
To energize the weary soul
Upon life's thorny way.

The past is one eternal tomb,
A dwelling of the dead;
Wide o'er the present endless gloom,
Broad wings and dark have spread.

Still ages on in darkness glide,
Still life and death stand side by side,
And will, till vast oblivion's tide,
Dark rolling fearfully,
Shall separate them far and wide,
And leave between an awful void;
Man hath no choice, but must abide
In boundless misery,
Must bow before affliction's rod,
Must sink despair beneath,
Until the universal God
Reclaims the soul from death.

UNDER THE SNOW.

BY M. W. HACKELTON.

GATHER the white shroud over it;
Cover it deep with clay;
Dust of the pure and beautiful,
Hide in the dust away;
Silent and cold and motionless,
Freezing the soul with woe—
Make for the dead a sepulchre
Under the drifted snow.

Veil the closed eyelids reverently;
Eyes that have been thy heaven,
Holy with trust and tenderness,
Love to their light had given.
Seal the pale lips all silently;
Lips that have clung to thine,
Dewy with love's sweet ecstasy,
Rich with its glowing wine.

Gather the white shroud over it,
Mourn for the glory fled—
Faith, thou art lost forever!
Love, thou art cold and dead!
Silent and cold and motionless,
Freezing the soul with woe—
Over the icy sepulchre
Gathers the drifting snow.

MY BIRTHDAY.

BY MRS. M. M. HINES.

I STAND midway on my journey,
And behold where the rising sun
In a flood of crimsoning radiance
Told of a life begun.

And I look far away to the westward,
An untravelled and lengthening plain
See the tops of the mountains of evening,
Where that sun will set again.

Around me the glare of the noonday,
Yet back glancing well do I know
That my footsteps have passed the meridian,
By the shadows beginning to grow.
Yet, if with brave heart I press forward,
Nor murmur and faint by the way,
I need fear not when deepening shadows
Come with the closing day.

For when the last gleaming of sunset
Shall fade in the softening west,
A kind guide is coming to bear me
Away to the land of rest.

NOVELTIES FOR FEBRUARY.

Figs. 1 and 2.—Night-caps for a bridal wardrobe: the most tasteful, and at the same time becoming and serviceable styles that we have given in years.

Fig. 1 is particularly comfortable; it is cut in one piece, and the crown receives the full twist or braid of hair. The frill is put on in a new way, and, together with the band and bow, is of the same material as the cap, fine linen lawn. The frill is scalloped in needle-work; the band and strings have a narrow rolled hem. Fig. 2 is of the same material, the crown coming into the cape, and the band looped instead of tied; the strings are broad, and all the trimming has a needle-work finish.

Fig. 3.—Dress cap of white over black blonde; trimming, blonde, full blown rose, buds, and foliage, with a large bow of black velvet ribbon at the opposite side.

Fig. 4.—Fichu of black and white lace for evening dress; it is trimmed between the rows of lace by narrow black velvet, and a rosette of the same, with long loops, fastens it at the waist.

wear, of tarleton, French muslin, or crape; they set close to the wrist with frills of the same material.

THE CINDERELLA SLIPPER.

(See engravings, page 108.)

Material.--Two skeins, each of four shades, of scarlet wool, the darkest to be the color of a dark clove pink, the next of a military scarlet, the next two shades lighter, and the next two shades lighter again; one bunch of No. 6 steel beads; one-quarter yard of Penelope canvas, that which measures twelve double threads to the inch; four wool needles; and one reel of No. 33 cotton.

This pretty slipper is adapted for a child four years old, but may be made either larger or smaller. Its glittering appearance, which sparkles with every movement of the foot, has an exquisite effect. As a morning slipper for young ladies, it cannot fail to please; for fancy fairs it would also prove a very salable article.

First pencil from the engraving the outline of the slipper in thin writing or other paper; then cut it exactly in the pencil marks; pin or tack it on the canvas; then, with needle and black cotton, tack an outline on the canvas, outside the paper all round, but observe to have only 16 stitches across the instep; fasten the cotton off securely, and run a black thread through the centre between the 16 stitches. Now, with the darkest wool, cross-stitch over this outline of cotton. Then commence to work the slipper thus: Begin first stripe close to the line of instep, but two stitches of the canvas from the centre thread of black, and having the heel of the slipper at the right hand; with the lightest shade on the 2d row of canvas from the centre work 8 cross-stitches; then slip the needle under four threads of canvas, and work 8 more stitches on same row; then slip 4; 8 more stitches; slip 4; work any that may be left in same row. Take the 3 next shades, and work exactly the same. Thus there will be two rows of wool stitches on each the dividing line of black thread.

2d stripe.—Miss 2 rows of canvas; with lightest shade work 2 stitches; miss 4; work 8; miss 4; work 8; miss 4; work the remainder with the remaining three shades exactly the same.

3d stripe.—Miss 2 rows of the canvas; work 8; miss 4; work 8; miss 4; work 8; miss the remainder, and finish the stripe towards the heel in similar manner.

It will be scarcely necessary to give any further directions for this pattern, which latter must be worked entirely over the slipper before proceeding to work the bars across, which are worked exactly in the same way; but, instead of slipping the needle under the canvas, the needle will be slipped under the 4 worked rows; but observe that all the stitches are crossed in the same direction. The intersection of these bars will cause 4 stitches of canvas to be left between each bar (see engraving), and these 4 stitches are filled up with steel beads, thus: Take No. 30 cotton, doubled, and fine needle; fasten the cotton into back of slipper; thread two beads; cross these over the stitch of canvas the same way as the wool stitches are crossed; then 2 more over next stitch, and the same over the other 2 stitches of canvas. Thus there are 8 beads in each 4 stitches of canvas; but, as the beads would wear off round the sole, and round the edge of the slipper where the binding comes, fill these squares in with steel colored twist, or silk used double. The slipper should be trimmed with a rosette of scarlet or cerise color satin ribbon, of a tint not to obscure the brightness of the wool.

THE RAILWAY STOCKING.

TO BE WORKED IN COTTON THREAD OR WORSTED.

Cast on the needles as many stitches as would be required for an ordinary stocking for a child. Knit it once around, then rib it until an inch long, then bind off. Take up the stitches and commence knitting straight around plain stocking stitch until you have a finger and a half done; then knit once around, dropping every other stitch off the needle; then stretch out the stocking, and the stitches will run down until it reaches the ribbed piece, and no farther, forming a beautiful open worked stocking. Having kept the remaining stitches on the needles, finish off the toe by knitting straight around, narrowing every time on each needle. It will shape itself on the leg, and will be sufficiently long, as it only requires two fingers in length for a lady's stocking.

BAG TO BE BRAIDED ON VELVET OR CASHMERE.

Gold braid on velvet, or cerise on black cashmere, are both pretty.

To those who are unacquainted with the method of transferring the designs to velvet, or any dark material, it would be as well to say that the pattern should be drawn on thick paper, then carefully pricked. Then the pattern should be laid over the material to be worked, and some powdered starch or whiteness rubbed over it; on removing the pattern, the design will be traced in white spots, which are then to be followed out with a camel's-hair pencil and white lead.

 INSERTION.

A NORWEGIAN MORNING OR BONNET CAP, IN SHETLAND WOOL.

Materials—Half an ounce each of cerise and white Shetland wool; two steel knitting pins, No. 12; crochet hook, No. 2.

CAST ON 240 stitches. K (or knit) two plain rows *; now knit one stitch; take two together; knit 115 stitches; take two together, and take two together again; now K the remainder, taking two together before the last stitch. The next row back is plain; now repeat from * till there are 18 ribs of knitting in which there are 36 rows alternately decreased and plain. Take the white wool—knit three rows in the same way, which is one rib and one row, decreasing as before: K one stitch; take two together; wind the wool twice over the pins; take two together, wind twice over the pin again till there are 41 holes; then take two together twice; make 41 holes again; take two together; K 1; now knit three rows plain, again decreasing as before.

Now, with cerise wool, knit six ribs or twelve rows, decreasing as before. Then with white the same as the first white stripe. Then continue with white and cerise alternately till there are four white and four cerise stripes irrespective of the first deep border. Now, with cerise, knit 16 rows, decreasing as before. This finishes with one stitch. For the border along the front, with cerise, make 2 L stitches, with 1 ch between each L; in one loop of the knitting 3 ch; 2 more L as before in an equal space to the 3 ch: this is along the front only. 2d row, 9 L with 1 ch between each u the 1 ch; 1 ch dc between next 2 L; 1 ch 9 L with 1 ch between each u next; 1 ch repeat. This last row is worked with the knitting at the back within the row of L stitches. Run cerise ribbon in the alternate holes of the white rows, and the same in the alternate L stitches of the border.

THE KNITTED WINTER SPENSER.

Materials.—Seven skeins of dark fleecy four-thread; one skein each of gray fleecy, four shades; No. 8 pins; No. 1 Penelope crochet hook.

Stitch Brioché, thread forward, slip 1, knit 2 together, the same backwards and forwards.

Cast on 141 stitches, knit 2 plain rows.

Knit 40 rows.

Knit 4 ribs besides the outside half rib. Increase, do this by picking up two of the back stitches with the right hand needle, placing them on the left, wool forward, slip 1, knit 1, knit 39 ribs, increase as before, knit 4 ribs.

Knit 10 rows.

Knit 5 ribs, increase, knit 39 ribs, increase, knit 5 ribs.

Knit 10 rows.

Knit 6 ribs, increase, knit 39 ribs, increase, knit 6 ribs.

Knit 10 rows.

Knit 7 ribs, increase, knit 7 ribs, cast off 2 ribs, knit 21 ribs, cast off 2 ribs, knit 7 ribs, increase, knit 7 ribs.

Pass off the fronts on to a thread, knit 44 rows for the back, increase a rib on each side nearest the shoulder.

Knit 10 rows.

Decrease by casting off 1 rib 8 times—that is, 1 rib at the beginning of each row; there will be 8 ribs, and 7 ribs on the top of the neck.

Knit a plain row, cast off.

Take up the front, knit 7 ribs, increase, knit 7 ribs.

Knit 10 rows.

Knit 8 ribs, increase, knit 7 ribs.

Knit 30 rows.

Increase a rib the side nearest the shoulder.

Knit 10 rows.

Cast off three ribs, then decrease every row equally till to a point.

FOR THE SLEEVES.—Cast on 81 stitches, knit 22 rows.

Increase a rib, knit 60 rows, decrease a rib, knit 22 rows, cast off.

Work 4 rows of long stitches in crochet all round with the four shades of gray fleecy.

CHEMISE PATTERNS.

INDIAN CANOE WORK-BASKET.

FOR CARRYING ON THE ARM, WITH A LITTLE PIECE OF WORK OR KNITTING.

Materials.—One ball of crochet cord, gray or drab; one knot of colored satin cord; satin ribbon, and a coarse crochet hook.

MAKE a chain loosely, nine inches long, and work on it one row of sc. Then hold on the cord, and work over it, 4 stitches, 2 ch, miss 2, 1 stitch over cord; 2 ch, miss 2, repeat to the end. At the finish of the row, cut off the crochet cord, but not the satin, which bend back along the next row, and work in the same way; only the last of the four stitches must come on the second chain stitch after the four of the previous round. The third row the same. At the fourth you again bend back the satin cord, and do the same stitches, making the fourth crochet stitch come over the third of last row. In the fifth row, the satin cord is, as in the third, ready to work over; do the same as the fourth. After these five, cut off the cord nearly close. Do one row of sc without the satin cord. Then the open row, thus: 1 long to stitch, 1 diamond open hem: repeat to the end. Then a row of sc. Now resume the satin cord; repeat the five rows with it, and the three without, until five cord stripes are done. Do one row of sc, and then a row round: that is, on the foundation chain as well, to close the two sides for the top of the basket.

With a needle and crochet cord join up and fasten the threads at the two ends.

Run a narrow ribbon through the open rows under the diamonds, and over the straight bars.

Make the handle exactly like one stripe, with the satin cord; with a simple scallop edge on each side, thus: *1 sc, 3 ch, miss 2. *repeat to the end.

2d row.—*1 sc on each ch, 1 sc over sc, inserting the hook in the row beneath it. *repeat to the end.

The handle should be about eleven inches long, and sewed inside the basket, which may be lined with silk, or not, according to the taste of the worker. The ends of the basket are drawn, so as to be rounded. Quill some ribbon, and set it on round the top, with a bow of broader ribbon at each end.

The diamond open-hem is worked thus: begin with the thread three times round the work, as for long treble crochet: do half the stitch, having drawn it twice through. Pass the thread twice more round, miss two, and work an ordinary long to stitch, only draw the hook through at the third movement; 2 ch, put the thread once over the hook, and do a dc stitch where the two bars join. A perfect cross or X is thus made.

KNITTED CUFF IN BRIOCHE.

STITCH WITH CROCHET EDGE.

Materials.—Six skeins of colored four-thread Berlin wool; one skein of black Shetland wool; No. 15 pins; No. 2 Penelope crochet hook.

Cast on 57 stitches, knit two plain rows, knit 70 rows, knit two plain rows, cast off. Sew up the cuff.

On the side that was cast off make 5 chain, dc into 2d loop, 5 chain, dc into every second loop.

With Shetland dc under the 5 chain, 5 chain, dc under next five, 2 chain, twist the wool twice over the hook, 7 long under next 5, 2 chain, repeat.

Do under the 2 chain, 5 chain, dc under the 2 chain, 5 chain, dc under the 5 chain, 5 chain, repeat.

WINTER CUFFS IN DOUBLE KNITTING.

Materials.—White four-thread Berlin wool, and four skeins of scarlet; two bone or wooden pins of such a size that a string put tightly round shall measure half an inch.

DOUBLE knitting is one of the best stitches that can be used for comforters, cuffs, and chest-protectors, also for babies' cot-covers, being very light, soft, and elastic, and not liable to get hard in the washing, and, of course, being double, the warmth is very great.

For a Lady's Cuff.—Cast on in scarlet wool 56 stitches, and for a gentleman's 66 (the number of stitches must always be even). Knit 4 plain rows, then join on the white, and *; knit 1; bring the wool in front (but not over the pin). Slip 1, pass the wool back. Repeat from *. Each row is precisely the same.

Observe that the last stitch of each row is always slipped, and also that the back loop in each row is the one which is always slipped.

A CRAPED NECK-TIE.

Materials.—Cotton, No. 60; a pair of bone knitting pins, No. 12; two lumps of sugar dissolved in half a pint of hot water, and let remain till cold; two chenille tassels.

THIS is one of the prettiest articles for a neck-tie that can be made; having, when finished, all the appearance of soft white crape, and may be adopted either in mourning or out, by adding either black, colored, or white tassels.

Cast on the pin 460 stitches, and knit in plain garter-stitch till it is five nails wide; then cast off, but not too tight; then sew a strip of calico on to each side, but only so that it can be easily untacked. If the work is at all soiled, wash it with white curd soap and water; then rinse it perfectly, and squeeze it in a cloth very dry; after that dip it in the sugar and water, squeeze it slightly, and lay it out on a doubled sheet to dry; afterwards take off the calico, sew it up, and add the tassels. The washing and rinsing in sugar and water will always give it the appearance of being new.

KNITTING BASKET.

PERHAPS there are few kinds of work which require a basket expressly arranged for their own reception so much as knitting, on account of the almost fatal injury which it sustains when needles are drawn out and loops are dropped. The central opening is in bright blue Berlin wool, as well as the small part within the loop at each end. The ground within the diamonds is in maize-color. Both of these are much improved by being worked in floss silk. The ground on the exterior of the design is shaded crimsons, dark, medium, and light. It requires three pieces of this form to make the basket; the two sides must be worked alike, but the third, which is the bottom of the basket, only requires to be worked in the stripes of the shaded ground. All three must be stitched on card-board of the same shape and size, neatly lined with silk or German velvet, and sewn together on the outside, the stitches being concealed by a row of beads. After this the handle must be attached, which may be of double wire, twisted round with a little cotton-wool, and then with ribbon and beads. All this being done, a silk cord must be taken, the end fastened down close to the handle, and the cord wound round and round, each twist touching, but not over-wrapping the last, until about an inch and a half of the end of the basket is enclosed, this being an important point for the safety of the needles.

A NEW STYLE OF BIB.

MADE of Marseilles, with rows of machine stitching on it. It buttons round the neck, and is fastened round the waist with a band.

NIGHT-DRESS WITH PLAITED YOKE.

THE yoke is not cut off, but plaited on the whole piece, and cut into shape afterwards, the plaits being confined by a narrow band stitched on both edges.

INSERTION FOR A CHILD'S DRESS.

EMBROIDERY PATTERNS.

THE NOVELTY.

A MUSLIN night-dress, with yoke and trimmings of heavy piqué.

A BLACK SILK APRON FOR A CHILD.

TRIMMED with two ruffles of narrow ribbon, with three rows of narrow velvet above it.

Receipts, &c.

GENERAL DIRECTIONS FOR SOUPS AND STOCK.

ALTHOUGH celery may generally be obtained for soup throughout the year, it may be useful to know that dried celery-seed is an excellent substitute. It is so strongly flavored that a drachm of whole seed will enrich half a gallon of soup as much as will two heads of celery.

Mushrooms are much used, and when they cannot be obtained fresh, mushroom catsup will answer the purpose; but it should be used very sparingly, as nothing is more difficult to remove than the over-flavoring of catsup.

A piece of butter, in proportion to the liquid, mixed with flour, and added to the soup when boiling, will enrich and thicken it. Arrowroot, or the farina or flour of potato, is far better for the thickening of soups than wheaten flour.

The finer flavoring articles, as catsup, spices, wines, juice, etc., should not be added till the soup is nearly done.

A good proportion of wine is, a gill to three pints of soup: this is as much as can be used without the vinous flavor predominating, which is never the case in well-made soups. Wine should be added late in the making, as it evaporates very quickly in boiling.

Be cautious of overseasoning soups with pepper, salt, spices, or herbs, for it is a fault that can seldom be remedied; any provision over-salted is spoiled. A teaspoonful of sugar is a good addition in flavoring soups.

Verdure is added to soups in the proportion of a quarter of a pound for a tureen of soup for eight persons; it should be broken, then blanched in cold water, and is better if stewed in broth before it is put into the soup.

If soups are too weak, do not cover them in boiling, that the watery particles may evaporate; but if strong, cover the soup-kettle close. If they want flavor, most of the prepared sauces will give it to meat soups, and anchovy with walnut catsup and soy will add to those of fish, but must be used sparingly.

If coloring be wanted, a piece of bread toasted as brown as possible, but not blackened, and put into soup to simmer for a short time before its going to be served, will generally be found sufficient. Burnt onions will materially assist in giving a fine brown color to soup, and also improve the flavor, or burnt sugar, the usual brown ng, may be used.

To clarify soup, put into it, when first set on, the whites of one or two eggs beaten to a stiff froth; skim the pot constantly and the liquor will be clear when strained. Soak the napkin in cold water before you strain hot soup through it, as the cold will harden the fat, and only allow the clear soup to pass through. Clarifying destroys somewhat of the savor of the soup, which ought, therefore, to be more highly seasoned.

It is very usual to put forcemeat balls, of various sorts, into many different soups, for the purpose of improving their flavor and appearance.

There is sometimes great prejudice against the use of particular sorts of seasoning and spices. Garlic is amongst these, and many a dish is deprived of its finest flavor for want of a moderate use of it.

Tomatoes would also be found a great improvement in many kinds of soup. If onions are too strong, boil a turnip with them, and it will render them mild.

In stirring soup, do it always with a wooden spoon.

By a tureen of soup is generally meant three quarts.

Soup-Herb Powder, or Vegetable Relish, is an excellent article to keep on hand; it may always be used when fresh herbs cannot be had. Make it in the following manner: Take dried parsley, acid savory, sweet marjoram, lemon-thyme, of each two ounces; lemon-peel, cut very thin and dried, and sweet basil, one ounce each. Dry these ingredients in a warm (not hot) oven, or by the fire, till you can pound them fine in a mortar, and pass the powder through a hair-sieve. Put this powder in a clean, dry bottle, and keep it closely corked. The fragrance will be retained many months. It is an economical and delicious flavoring.

Stock.—The basis of all well-made soups is composed of what English cooks call "Stock," or broth made from all sorts of meat, bones, and the remains of poultry or game; all of which may be put together and stewed down in the "Stock-pot," the contents of which are by the French termed Consommé.

This is chiefly used for the preparation of brown or gravy soups; that intended for white soups being rather differently compounded, though made in nearly the same manner.

Brown Stock.—Put ten pounds of shin of beef, six pounds of knuckle of veal, and some sheep's trotters, or a cow-heel, in a closely covered stewpan, to draw out the gravy very gently, and allow it nearly to dry in until it becomes brown. Then pour in sufficient boiling water to entirely cover the meat, and let it boil up, skimming it frequently; seasoning it with whole peppers and salt, roots, herbs, and vegetables of any kind. That being done, let it boil gently five or six hours, pour the broth from off the meat, and let it stand during the night to cool. The following morning take off the scum and fat, and put it away in a stone jar for further use.

Or: Put into a stewpan a piece of beef, a piece of veal, an old fowl, some slices of ham or bacon, and all the trimmings of meat that can be obtained; add to these materials, where such things are abundant, partridge, grouse, or other game which may not be sufficiently tender for the spit. Put a little water to it, just enough to cover half the meat, and stew very gently over a slow fire or steam apparatus. When the top piece is done through, cover the meat with boiling water or broth; season with spices and vegetables; stew all together for eight or ten hours in an uncovered stewpan; skim off the fat, and strain the liquor through a fine sieve, or woollen tamie, known by cooks as a "tammy."

Brown stock may be made from an ox-cheek or an ox-tail, brisket flank, or shin of beef; which will, either together or separately, make a strong jelly, if stewed down with a piece of ham or lean bacon, in the proportion of one-half pound to every seven pounds of meat; but the shin of beef alone will afford a stronger and better flavor.

This stock may also be reduced to a glaze by boiling the skimmed liquor as fast as possible in a newly-tinned stewpan until it becomes of the desired consistence and of a good brown color; taking care at the same time to prevent it from burning.

White Stock.—Take scrap or knuckle of veal, ox-heel, or calf's-head, together with an old fowl and the trimmings of any white poultry or game which can be had, and lean ham in the proportion of one pound to every fourteen pounds of meat. Cut it all into pieces (add three or four large unroasted onions and heads of celery, with a few blades of mace; but neither carrots, pepper, nor spice of any kind but mace); put into the stock-pot with just water enough to cover it. Let it boil, and add three onions and a few blades of mace; let it boil for five hours, and it is then fit for use.

MISCELLANEOUS COOKING.

CALF'S HEAD.—Choose one as fleshy and as fat as you can. Let the butcher clean the hair well off, but do not have it skinned. When it is chopped or sawn down the middle, scoop out the eyes, and cast them away. Take out the tongue and the brains, and remove that portion of the jaw containing the teeth. Place the whole in water, and soak and clean them well. Put the head into the boiler or stewpan, also the tongue, and cover them well with water. Put the brains into a linen cloth with a little chopped sage. Boil the whole for two hours, skimming carefully. As soon as it boils and has been skimmed put in a couple of carrots, two or three onions, a bunch of parsley, thyme, and bay leaves, and a quarter of a pound of fresh butter. Salt and pepper to taste. Take out the brains and chop them finely, and place them in a dish, with the tongue laid in the middle. Serve up the head with parsley and butter. Here, again, the liquor may be saved for soup.

Should you have occasion yourself to take the hair off, the process is not difficult. Soak the head for ten minutes in warm water, then powder it well with rosin, and have plenty of boiling water ready; dip in the head, holding it by the ear, and scrape the hair off with the back of a knife carefully, so as not to scratch the cheek. Then wash the whole.

MOCK TURTLE SOUP.—Get a calf's head with the skin on, and a couple of pounds of pickled pork, fat, and without bones. Have the head cleft in twain, soak, and wash it clean; soak and wash the pork also. Lukewarm water is best. Lay both in a soup kettle, with a couple of peeled onions, a bundle of sweet herbs, two heads of celery, some pepper, pounded mace, and salt. Fill the kettle with water, and boil gently till the meat is quite tender. Then take out the head and the pork, separate the meat from the bones, and put the bones back again into the soup to stew for some hours longer, then pour the contents into a large pan. When cold take off the fat, strain the soup, and thicken it with flour first browned in a frying-pan with a little butter. Add the juice of a lemon, and a wineglassful of some dinner sauce. Cut the meat of half the head, and the pork also, into pieces an inch square, and warm it up in the soup with egg-balls, and forcemeat balls also (the latter of good pork sausage-meat). A tablespoonful of moist sugar, well stirred in, will be an improvement.

VEAL FRITTERS.—Cold veal and veal suet chopped fine, equal quantities; the same of grated bread; a little shred thyme and parsley, salt, nutmeg, and pepper. Mix all together with an egg. Fry brown. Serve up with melted butter.

PIG'S FEET JELLY.—Boil the feet, ears, and hocks in a little water until the bones will come out. Add a small quantity of salt, pepper, mace, and cloves whilst boiling. When the bones and gristle are all taken out, put it into a mould and press it.

TO PICKLE A HAM.—Two ounces of saltpetre, half a pound of sugar, one pound of salt. To be rubbed every day. Let it lie a month.

RAISED PORK PIES.—One quarter of a pound of flour, one pint of water, to three-quarters of a pound of lard for the crust.

To four pounds of meat add two sage leaves, one ounce of pepper, one ounce and a half of salt, and a little nutmeg. Melt the lard and pour it on the flour whilst hot. Stir it as you would a pudding, till all the flour is well mixed. When cool enough to handle, work it till it is quite pliable, then raise it into pies. This quantity will make four nice sized pies.

BIRCHTRING DUMPLINGS.—Half a pound of flour, half a pound of beef suet, half a pound of raisins and currants mixed, a quarter of a pound of treacle or sugar, a teaspoonful of carbonate of soda, a little salt, and as much milk as will make it into a very soft dough. Boil three hours in a buttered shape.

CAKES, PUDDINGS, ETC.

LEMON PRESERVE FOR CHEESECAKES.—Quarter of a pound of butter, one pound of loaf-sugar, powdered; six eggs, leaving out two whites; the rind of two lemons, and the juice of three. Put all into a brass pan, and let them simmer till they thicken like honey, at the same time keep straining them. Put into small jars, and keep in a cool place.

RATAFIA PUDDING.—Put a pint of good milk into a saucepan with the yellow rind of a lemon pared thin, a little cinnamon, and about two ounces of sugar. Place this by the side of the fire to simmer very gently for about a quarter of an hour. In the meantime, put into a basin the crumb of two small rolls, sliced thin, some pieces of Savoy cake, or four sponge cakes, a quarter of a pound of ratafias, and a quarter of a pound of almond cakes, and pour the boiling milk over, taking out the peel and spice. Cover close with a plate until nearly cold and the cakes are well soaked; then break five eggs into a basin, whisk them up well, and beat them well in with the mixture, adding a glass of brandy, a glass of sherry, and some grated nutmeg. Butter a quart mould well all over on the inside, and garnish it with stoned raisins, dried cherries, slices of orange, lemon, or citron-peel, and fill it with the mixture in the basin. Tie a piece of buttered paper over the top, and put the mould into a saucepan of boiling water, to reach about halfway up the sides of the mould. Boil about an hour and a quarter.

GINGERBREAD LOAF.—One pound of flour, one pound of treacle, a quarter of a pound of butter, one egg, one ounce of ginger, some candied peel, a few caraway seeds ground, and a teaspoonful of soda. Bake in a slow oven. Mix the flour in gradually; the butter and treacle to be milk-warm; put the soda in last. Let it stand half an hour to rise.

POTATO PUDDING.—Take half a pound of bread crumbs, half a pound of potatoes, boiled; half a pound of suet, chopped fine; two eggs, well beaten. Mix with milk, and boil four hours.

TO MAKE QUEEN'S CAKES.—Take a pound of sugar and beat and sift it, a pound of well-dried flour, a pound of butter, eight eggs, and half a pound of currants, washed and picked; grate a nutmeg and the same quantity of mace and cinnamon; work your batter to a cream, and put in your sugar; beat the whites of your eggs nearly half an hour, and mix them with your sugar and butter; then beat the yolks nearly half an hour, and put them to your batter. Beat the whole well together, and when it is ready for the oven, put in your flour, spices, and currants. Sift a little sugar over them, and bake them in time not more than thirty minutes.

THE TOILET.

TO HAVE GOOD HAIR.

ABOUT once a fortnight, boil for half an hour or more, a large handful of bran in a quart of soft water. Strain it into a basin, and let it cool till it is merely tepid or milk-warm. Rub into it a little white soap, then dip in the corner of a soft linen towel, and wash your head with it thoroughly, dividing or parting aside the hair all over, so as to reach the roots. Next take the yolk of an egg (slightly beaten in a saucer), and with your fingers rub it well into the roots of the hair. Let it rest a few minutes, and then wash it off entirely with a cloth dipped in pure water; and rinse your hair well, till all the yolk of egg has disappeared from it. Afterwards, wipe and rub it dry with a towel, and comb the hair up from your head, parting it with your fingers. In winter it is best to do all this near the fire.

Have ready some soft pomatum, made of fresh beef-marrow, boiled with a little almond oil or olive oil, stirring it all the time till it is well amalgamated, and as thick as an ointment. When you take it from the fire (and not before) stir into it a little mild perfume; such as rose-water, orange-flower water, extract of roses, oil of carnations, or essence of violets. Put it into gallicups that have lids, and keep it for use; always well-covered. Take a very small quantity of this pomatum, and rub it among your hair on the skin of your head, after it has been washed as above.

At any time you may make your hair curl more easily by rubbing into it some beaten yolk of egg (washed off, afterwards, with clear water), and then putting on a little pomatum before you pin up your curls. It is well always to go through this process when you resume curls after having worn your hair plain.

All hair should be combed every morning with a fine-toothed comb, to remove the dust which insensibly gets into it during the preceding day, and to keep the skin of the head always clean.

To prevent your bonnet being injured by any oiliness about your hair, baste a piece of white or yellow oiled silk inside of that part of the bonnet where the crown unites with the brim, carrying the silk some distance up into the crown, and some distance down into the brim or front.

Clean your head-brushes by washing them thoroughly with a bit of soft sponge tied on the end of a stick, and dipped into a warm solution of pearlsh, prepared by dissolving a large tablespoonful of pearlsh in a pint of boiling water. When the bristles have thus been made quite clean, rinse the brushes in hot water, letting them remain in it till it becomes cool or cold. Afterwards drain the brushes, wipe them with a clean cloth, and set them upright before the fire to dry.

The most convenient way of cleaning combs is with a strong silk thread, made fast to the handle of a bureau drawer—in front of which seat yourself, with a towel spread over your lap to catch whatever impurities may fall from the comb. Holding the comb in your left hand, and the thread in your right, pass the thread hard between each of the comb-teeth. Afterwards wash the comb in soap-suds, rinse it in cold water, and dry it with a clean cloth.

NURSING THE SICK.

In Cases of Illness almost as much depends upon the nurse as upon the medical treatment; indeed, unless there is some one calculated to carry out the instructions of the medical man, it is hopeless to expect much benefit from them. Some people are nurses by nature, and require no teaching, while others scarcely ever attain even the proper mode of smoothing a pillow or arranging the bed-clothes. Cheerfulness and alacrity without boisterousness are the essentials to success, especially if united to that womanly sympathy with suffering which tends so much to soften the hours of pain or sickness. Even the dress should be attended to, for invalids are very captious and inclined to find fault wherever there is an opening for criticism. The colors should be light and pleasing to the eye, avoiding on the one hand those which are sombre and mournful, and on the other those which are decidedly gaudy. Officeousness in nursing is disliked by most invalids; but in this respect there is great difficulty in hitting the happy medium, some people preferring to be left alone, and only wanting the aid of a nurse when they find the necessity for it, while others, who are, however, but a small minority, are best pleased when they are constantly being asked if they want anything.

Punctuality in carrying out the medical directions is a great virtue in the nurse, and should be carefully instilled into her by these who engage her. The meals and medicines are always ordered to be given at stated times; and in the severer forms of disease it is always a good plan to write down the precise time for each, so that the nurse has a table to apply to in case of forgetting her instructions. In typhus fever, in which the convalescence is accompanied by great prostration of strength, and in which as much food as the stomach will bear must be given, this point should be carefully carried out.

In Changing Bed or Body Linen, the nurse should take great care to see that they are well aired, and, indeed, almost scorched at the fire. Some tact is often required to effect the change without fatiguing the patient. In very bad cases the body linen may be taken off and put on again without raising the body from the bed, by slipping the night-gown over the head, and taking the arms out, then rolling the whole body towards the other side of the bed, the foul linen is left behind, and may be removed. In putting it on, the night-gown is gathered up into a fold in front, and laid upon the part of the bed which the patient has just left, then rolling her back again, the back lies in the proper way upon the back of the gown, and the front may be lifted over the head, after which it is easy to put the arms in the sleeves, and to pull all smoothly down. In order to change the under sheet a somewhat similar plan is adopted. After folding it in half, it is laid upon the side of the bed unoccupied by the patient, the upper half is then folded over and over again close to the side, upon which the patient is turned or rolled; and in doing this the assistant nurse or housemaid draws the folded part of the sheet smoothly to the other side, and thus the patient is restored to her original position. Constant changing of the linen is desirable in all diseases, but especially in fever, in which, indeed, a daily change is often necessary.

In Giving the Food ordered for the invalid, everything ought to be scrupulously clean, and arranged with some pretensions to elegance. The sickly stomach is easily offended, and a dirty cloth or a disagreeable-looking fork or spoon would easily destroy the appetite.

Every Good Nurse is fertile in expedients to relieve pain or weariness, but she takes care that as far as possible they are successful. If a bed-chair is wanted, and is not at hand, a common light chair, turned upside-down and placed behind the back, answers very nearly as well. If the patient is weak, a cord may be fastened to the posts of a four-post bedstead, or to a couple of hooks in the ceiling if these are not used, and by the aid of this as a fixed point the patient is enabled to raise herself whenever she likes with much less difficulty than she would experience with the unstable support of the nurse. If it is desired to lift a heavy patient from one side of the bed to another, the nurse must get on the bed and stand above her, and will thus have a good purchase. Sometimes the four corners of the sheet being held by four stout persons standing on chairs the helpless patient is lifted from the bed while it is shaken and made comfortable. At others, one side is shaken up while the patient is lying on the other, and afterwards that side in its turn is put straight. Indeed the clever nurse has no end to the expedients to which she may have recourse in this department, remembering always not to exceed her province by tampering with the medical treatment.

The Proper Ventilation of the Sick-Room is a point of the greatest importance, varying in degree with the nature of the disease and the time of year. Sometimes the window should be left open day and night; but this is not often safe, and is only applicable to sultry weather. A draught of cold air on the person of the patient should always be avoided.

The Amount of Light to be admitted may safely be left to the wishes of the patient in most cases.

The Degree of Artificial Warmth maintained by a fire is also greatly under the control of the patient's feelings, though these are not always the best guide. The medical man, however, will give instructions on this point. In all cases an even temperature should be kept up.

No Superfluous Furniture should be allowed in the sick-room, and especially in cases of fever, where curtains and carpets are likely to hold the infection, and should therefore at once be removed.

After Infectious Diseases, the bedding is generally sent to be purified, which is accomplished by the aid of lime. A weak solution of chloride of lime may be sprinkled over sheets and body-linen before washing, but all foul linen, etc. had better be burnt. In very bad cases the walls of the room should be washed down with a solution of chloride of lime, and then repapered or painted.

MISCELLANEOUS.

WASHING.—A little pipe-clay dissolved in the water employed in washing linen, cleans the dirtiest linen thoroughly, with about one-half the labor, and saving full one-half of soap. The clothes will be improved in color equally as if they were bleached.

TO CLEAN SILK.—Dresses cleaned by the following method have not the appearance of being cleaned:—Quarter of a pound of honey; quarter of a pound of soft soap; two wineglasses of gin; three gills of boiling water. Mix and let stand until blood-warm. Spread the silk on a clean table, with a cloth under it—there must be no gathers. Dip a nail-brush into the mixture and rub the silk well, especially where there are stains, or the most dirty or spots, and with a sponge wet the whole breadth generally, and rub gently. Then rinse the silk in cold soft water; hang it up to drain; and iron it damp. The quantity stated is for a plain dress.

EXERCISE.—Exercise should not be continued after the effort has become at all painful. Our muscles, like the rest of our bodies, are made susceptible of pain for the beneficent purpose that we may know that they are in danger, and may thus be excited to do everything in our power to remove them from it. It is a mistaken notion that exercise of all kinds and under all circumstances is beneficial. Unless it is adapted to the condition of the muscles, it will prove the agent of death—not the giver of health.

BITING THE NAILS.—This is a habit that should be immediately corrected in children, as, if persisted in for any length of time, it permanently deforms the nails. Dipping the finger ends in some bitter tincture will generally prevent children from putting them to the mouth; but if this fails, as it sometimes will, each finger end ought to be encased in a stall until the propensity is eradicated.

FLUID INK.—Ink may be rendered fluid by putting into the inkstand a small quantity, about the size of a pin's head, of prepared ox-galls, which may be purchased at any artist's color-shop.

RICE-FLOUR CEMENT.—An excellent cement may be made from rice-flour, which is at present used for that purpose in China and Japan. It is only necessary to mix the rice-flour intimately with cold water, and gently simmer it over a fire, when it really forms a delicate and durable cement, not only answering all the purposes of common paste, but admirably adapted for joining together paper, cards, &c., in forming the various beautiful and tasteful ornaments which afford much employment and amusement to the ladies. When made of the consistence of plaster clay, models, busts, bas reliefs, &c., may be formed of it, and the articles, when dry, are susceptible of high polish, and very durable.

TINCTURE FOR THE TEETH.—Take of Florentine iris root eight ounces, bruised cloves one ounce, ambergris one scruple. Bruise the root, and put the whole ingredients into a glass bottle, with a quart of rectified spirits of wine. Cork close, and agitate it once a day for a fortnight, keeping it in a warm place. About a teaspoonful is sufficient at a time; in this a soft tooth-brush should be dipped, and then worked into a lather on the teeth and gums. It cleanses the teeth, strengthens the gums, and sweetens the breath. Apply the tincture in the morning, and before retiring to rest.

TO CURE HAMS.—One gallon of old beer, two pounds of sugar, one pound of bay-salt, one pound of common salt, and one ounce of salt prunella. The above is sufficient for twenty pounds of meat.

HAIR WASH.—A young lady friend of mine, says a writer in the London Field, was recommended by a coiffeur to use sage-water. She was obliged to discontinue its daily use, as it made her hair too thick. Pour boiling water on the sage leaves, and let them remain some time in the oven or near a stove; then strain and apply to the root of the hair daily. If any pomade is needed, an equal mixture of cocoa and olive oils, with a little perfume, is very efficacious.

TO WASH CHINA CRAPE SCARFS.—If the fabric be good, these articles of dress can be washed as frequently as may be required, and no diminution of their beauty will be discoverable, even when the various shades of green have been employed among other colors in the patterns. In cleaning them, make a strong lather of boiling water; suffer it to cool; when cold, or nearly so, wash the scarf quickly and thoroughly; dip it immediately in cold hard water in which a little salt has been thrown (to preserve the colors); rinse, squeeze, and hang it out to dry in the open air; pin it at its extreme edge to the line, so that it may not in any part be folded together; the more rapidly it dries the clearer it will be.

CONVERSATION AND READING.

We lately received a letter from one of our warm friends, requesting us to recommend a "Course of Reading that would tend to improve the powers of Conversation."

This request was made on behalf of a young lady who had been carefully educated, was not deficient in ability or in knowledge, but in the power of expression; she could not sustain her part in society for want of words to express her ideas and feelings. Such was the sum of the letter; nor is this the first application of the kind that has been made us. Many such cases have been brought to our knowledge, and most pressing entreaties urged that we would suggest some way of improving the powers of conversation, and acquiring the art of talking well.

We have only time or space for a very brief reply to these repeated requests, but will endeavor to meet the questions as directly as we can for the benefit of all our readers.

Eloquence is, undoubtedly, the gift of nature, or rather of nature's God; we have seen this proved in every class of life. Those who have not this talent of eloquence innate need not, however, despair of acquiring enough readiness of mind and speech to perform their parts creditably in society and pleasantly to themselves and their friends.

That often quoted saying of Bacon—"Reading makes a full man, writing an exact man, and talking a ready man"—has its foundation in truth; yet no matter how full any man's or woman's mind may be, it does not follow that he or she will talk well. The art of conversation must be acquired by practice, readiness comes by this practice; but to make the conversation interesting, exactness, that is, care and attention to both matter and manner, is essential. This exactness can only be gained in perfectness by the habit of arranging thoughts (our own or others) in writing; thus studying the charms and graces of expression and making it our own by the habit of composition. We do not mean authorship, writing books or articles for magazines, although such efforts, when time and duties permit, are improving as intellectual exercises, even when only intended for private perusal. We mean letter-writing, making records of pleasant conversations, copying out the best specimens of poetry and prose from the writings of eminent authors; all these methods aid a young person to converse well, by giving the right knowledge of using words.

This is not all, however. You may learn to talk glibly and fluently, you may have a good choice of words, and may be familiar with the niceties of grammar, what is all this if you have no matter to discuss? "Words are (often) the aching void of thought." Here reading must come in. Reading nourishes the intellect, gives spur to thought, embellishes the taste, enriches the reasoning faculties, and kindles the imagination while striving for its highest power—its creative energy. Thought, reason, taste, imagination, with the power of expression and the habit that renders expression easy—these would form the art of conversation; governed by moral principle and purity of heart, this art of conversation would be the highest exponent of social happiness and human enjoyment. If enlivened by mother wit and originality of idea, so much the better, certainly; but the "charity that never faileth" is indispensable.

The average of mankind may not, perhaps, be gifted to ever reach the standard we have set up; but the average, in our own land certainly, may acquire varied knowledge and the power of imparting it agreeably, and this we call good conversation, if not the best.

There may be—like the young lady on whose behalf we were desired to write—young persons uncomfortably timid and shy. These must strive to overcome their social defects by the resolution not to yield to the spell. Modesty is a great charm in a young girl; its excess is far better than its opposite. We would prefer even repulsive and awkward shyness to boldness and boisterousness. Still the reverse of wrong is not always right, and an unsocial and obstinate reserve or silence is not indicative of amiability or real modesty. Silence is sometimes the result of stupidity or of vanity, and those who will not talk should be sure to show that they feel an interest in the conversation of others.

It is the duty of every person who goes into society to contribute, with an effort, if that is necessary, to the innocent enjoyment of the company. The young person who is quite a novice, and unaccustomed to the encounter of tongues, may find it of use to read stories in which dialogue prevails, being careful to choose those written by good authors, and such as have themselves enjoyed the advantages of good company. We will mention as perfectly fulfilling these conditions and as being unexceptionable in every way, the stories of Miss Edgeworth and Miss Austen.

Another method of improving the powers of conversation is to commit dialogues to memory, and repeat them frequently, because the forms of conversation and the proper dress of thought would be thus made familiar as the common modes of household speech. When we consider how many hours every day, and for how many years ladies must repeat passage after passage before they can "discourse eloquent music" on the piano, it ought not to be expected that, without any regular practice or method, they should, spontaneously, discourse well in speech on the far more comprehensive passages that daily life and the world's history offer for discussion.

We will sum up our counsel by urging Lord Bacon's advice: "Read regularly and carefully; write frequently and polish what you write; practise assiduously how to entertain your friends, vis à vis, with the fruits of your studies."

MISSIONARY WOMEN.

THE SCHOOL AT TOUNGHOO.

In our last number we gave a brief notice of Mrs. Ellen B. Mason, and the school she has established in Burmah for the instruction of the Karen women and girls. We stated that Mrs. Mason had returned to the United States some month since, with the purpose of obtaining means to establish a school for the Tounghoo girls and young women. Tounghoo is in the interior of Burmah; a lovely place, with ranges of mountains six and seven thousand feet high, and a delightful climate. Mrs. Mason says there are one hundred and twenty-five thousand heathen women, without a single teacher; yet they are willing to receive instruction. We have before us the circular she has issued, and we hope our friends will prove her friends and assistants. We will give the most important points.*

WOMAN'S UNION MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF AMERICA FOR HEATHEN LANDS.

"In view of the deplorable state of heathen women in Burmah, India, China, and Africa, and in view of the many hindrances which prevent single ladies from engaging in direct personal effort for their salvation, those who feel interested in the subject have resolved to organize a woman's society, in which the ladies of all denominations may work together efficiently for their perishing sisters.

The one object of this society shall be the Evangelization of heathen women. To effect this object, the society will undertake to send out and support ladies from America as Bible readers and teachers, TO RAISE UP AND SUPERINTEND NATIVE FEMALE LABORERS FOR THEIR OWN COUNTRY WOMEN, and the preference shall always be given to the widows and daughters of missionaries.

This society shall have the following permanent officers: namely, Vice-Presidents and Managers. And any ladies' society may become connected with this by sending a copy of its doings to the Secretary, when the Directress, Secretary, and Treasurer of such society shall become Vice-Presidents of this society, and every twenty-dollar Collector shall become a Manager."

* * * * *

"Any gentleman may become a BROTHER of the society, and be entitled to quarterly reports, by the payment of $100. Any gentleman who shall found a Tutorship, or support a Bible reader, by the payment of $400 annually, shall be a Life Director of this society."

Mrs. Mason has appended to the circular extracts from letters of approval from about fifty eminent men, comprising clergymen of all denominations of missionary Christians, presidents and professors of colleges, and men of business who take a deep interest in the spread of Christianity. Concerning the need of this mission, in which Christian women are to be the teachers and evangelizers of heathen women, Mrs. Mason says, in her warm, womanly way, mingling deep humility with ardent zeal:—

"We propose that we women walk very humbly; not in antagonism to the gentlemen's societies, but doing our utmost to become agents for them, of whom they will not be ashamed.

We propose that no subscriber be received into this society who lessens in any measure her annual payments to the present existing bodies.

What we ask on the part of our sisters is some sacrifice, that they make an extra effort, and come to the relief of their perishing sisters.

In Tounghoo and the Red Karen land it is estimated that there are one hundred and twenty-five thousand heathen women. In the A. B. F. M. Union there are more than twelve hundred female life-members. What are these female members of the Union doing for these one hundred and twenty-five thousand heathen women?

* Those who would like the circular shall have it sent by writing to us and remitting postage.

Have they, for their conversion or education, or for raising up Native Instructors, a single School?

Have they a single Teacher?

Have they a single Bible Reader?

Let them answer.

We are reproached for pleading in behalf of woman. But we will have no unkindness towards any brothers or sisters who withhold their sympathies, or who scorn our work of little things. We only say, it seems to us that the responsibility of enlightening these one hundred and twenty-five thousand heathen women rests almost wholly upon the Christian women of America."

Mrs. Mason wants, to insure the success of her plan, one hundred Collectors, ladies, who will pledge to collect and pay twenty dollars a year for five years. Then she hopes and expects her school will become, like the Karen school, self-supporting. The circular says:—

"Fifty Collectors are already secured, and without taking a single dollar from the gentlemen's societies,

It is proposed to send out two ladies this fall—one a Baptist, for the Burmese women of Tounghoo, and one not a Baptist, for the Hindus. The one for Tounghoo is now ready to embark. Mrs. Mason paid her own passage home, and her passage back to Burmah is raised by ladies in England."

Now we want our friends to aid in this good work. We want to find, among the thousands on thousands of our readers, at least twenty ladies who will pledge themselves as Collectors to pay over, between this time and the first of November next, the sum of twenty dollars each, for the Tounghoo mission, thus becoming Managers in this interesting society. If the money is collected and sent to Mrs. S. J. Hale, care of L. A. Godey, with the names of the contributors, we will pay it over and give the record in the Lady's Book.

As a premium to each Collector, we will send one copy of the Lady's Book, free for ONE YEAR, commencing when the twenty dollars is paid in to us. Who will begin?

A TRIBUTE

TO THE MEMORY OF HENRY VETHAKE TOTTEN.

Dust to dust, and earth to earth!
Birth is death, and death is birth!
Man at birth begins to die—
Death is immortality!

Life! it is a transient state,
Even at its longest date!
But how few, with lasting strength,
Linger to its greatest length!

Standing here we mourn, to-day,
One who quickly passed away;
One who saw no waning time—
One who perished in his prime!

In his prime—Alas, too soon!—
Ere his day had reached its noon!
Full of promise, earnest, true—
Perished with his goal in view!

So the eagle, as he springs
Heavenward on untiring wings,
Ere he gains the starry sky,
Stricken, falls to bleed and die!

But, for him, the fatal dart
Vainly sought a vital part;
Dying here, he rose to be Deathless through eternity!

Deathless in a world of bliss;
Safe from all the ills of this;
Let us follow where he trod,
'Twas the way to heaven and God!

Earth to earth, and dust to dust!
Mingle with the earth we must;
But boy and Death's gloomy gate,
Lies an everlasting state!

These clay tenements of ours
But restrain our nobler powers;
Only are our spirits free,
Through Death's awful mystery!

FRANCIS DE HAES JANVIER.

BOOKS WORTH READING.—We can commend the publications of Robert Carter & Brother, 330 Broadway, New York, to all our readers who want books for children and youth that need no excision nor caution from parental care. We know of no better selections for Sunday reading and family libraries than might be made from their publishing house, and the prices are reasonable. In our Literary Notices of this month will be found notices of some of these interesting books.

Sheldon & Co., New York, publish excellent books for home reading, and for the young.

Darby & Jackson, New York, have been successful in publishing the best American novels that have appeared during 1860. These are "Nemesis," by Marion Harland, "Benajah," by Miss Evans, and "Rutledge," author not yet known.

D. Appleton & Co., New York, are issuing a work which should be bought by all families that can afford the expense—"Chambers's Encyclopædia. A Dictionary of Universal Knowledge for the People."

BRITISH PERIODICAL LITERATURE.—We have this rich mine of intellectual culture and varied knowledge so easily at command that its great worth is not appreciated. The republication in New York of the four large quarterlies—The London, The Edinburgh, The North British, and The Westminster; also that old and celebrated magazine Punch—places the best wisdom of Europe and intelligence of the movements of the world in our power for less money than a lady pays for her Spring bonnet, which she often throws aside as useless at the end of the short season.

We have before noticed these works, and remarked that the Lady's Book, with the best of these British periodicals, and a good weekly paper would make a library of useful and improving reading that would educate the children and interest and instruct the most intelligent family in our land.

In the London Quarterly there have appeared two important papers that we wish every woman in America could have the opportunity of reading. The first "The Missing Link," etc.; the other, "Deaconesses." We mean to give our readers, soon as we have room, a synopsis of these remarkable papers.

In the North British for November, we find the following just tribute paid to our good friend, Dr. Holmes, as the "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table," of which the reviewer remarks: "A very delightful book, a handy book for the breakfast table. A book to possess two copies of; one to be read, marked, thumbed, and dog-eared; and one to stand up in its pride of place with the rest on the shelves, all ranged in shining rows as dear old friends, and not merely nodding acquaintances," etc. Of the author it is truly said, "He is a poet as well as a humorist. Indeed, although his book is written in prose, it is full of poetry, with the 'beaded bubbles' of humor dancing up through the hypocrene," etc. "Dr. Holmes is national. One of the most hopeful signs of this book is its quiet nationality." This last observation is true, and the writings of Dr. Holmes deserve, for this true patriotism, the highest honor.

SEWING-MACHINES. Which is the Best?—The New York Dispatch thus sums up the matter, and we are of the same opinion, that "the Wheeler & Wilson machines make the lock stitch, the only stitch that cannot be unravelled, and that presents the same appearance on both sides of the seam; a fact of itself sufficient to account for its having the highest premiums awarded to it at all the State fairs held for the past few years. No other than the lock stitch has given such universal satisfaction, and our advice is, if you want a sewing-machine that will do your own family sewing in a very superior manner, or if you wish to earn a livelihood by sewing for others, do not get any other than a Wheeler & Wilson machine, and you will then feel certain that you have one that will give you the fullest satisfaction." We give this in reply to a letter from "our friend;" she will find these machines at 505 Broadway, New York; also at 625 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

MISS S. J. HALE'S BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES, 1826 Rittenhouse Square, Philadelphia.

This school is designed to give a thorough and liberal English education, to furnish the best facilities for acquiring the French language, and the best instruction in music and the other accomplishments. An accomplished French teacher resides in the family, and also an excellent teacher of music, who gives her personal attention to pupils while practising. The moral training and the health and physical development of the scholars are carefully attended to.

TO OUR CORRESPONDENTS.—The following articles are accepted: "A Day in a Pastor's Life"—"Our Darling"—"Once upon a time"—"A Mother's Trial"—"Love"—"Not all a Waif"—"Dying"—"Coming and Going"—"Indian Summer in America"—"Kitty"—"Winter"—"We were straying in a valley"—"Spring"—"Summer"—"The Just Recompense"—"Leaves from Eveline Lewis's Journal" (we would like the address of the writer)—"Pictures"—"The Memories of Thomas Hood"—and "Eventful Evenings."

The following articles are declined: "Song"—"A Fragment"—"Home"—"Sunrise"—"Acrostics and other Poems" (we have no room, and these poems are better suited to the parties for whom written. The author can have them returned by sending stamps)—"To Sarah"—"Remembrance"—"To Mrs. A. K. H."—"Verses to Miss H. A."—"Life"—"The Spirit of Intellect" (some beautiful thoughts and fine passages in the poem, but the piece is too long. The writer will do best in shorter poems)—"Affluence"—"A Dirge"—"Contemplation"—"What shall be done for the Union?"—"Earth, Air, and Water"—"Happiness"—"There is hope for me"—"An Ode" (too long, and rather commonplace)—"Elegance"—"The True Way of Living"—"Why do we Roam?"—"The best time to Marry"—"I wish it were spring"—and "My Love."

We have other articles on hand that will receive attention next month.

Will "Saverell" send us her address?

The author of "A Day in a Pastor's Life" is requested to send us her address.

Health Department.

BY JNO. STAINBACK WILSON, M. D.

TEETHING OF CHILDREN.—Teething is a healthy, natural process, and not a disease. Still the condition of the system at the period of teething is such as to constitute a predisposition to disease; and this predisposition is but too often developed into actual, open disease, by improper feeding, excessive drugging, uncleanness, insufficient clothing, and impure air. On all these points we have perhaps sufficiently enlarged.

The process of teething is generally completed between the sixth and thirtieth month from birth. The symptoms are redness, swelling and tenderness of the gums, with a free secretion of saliva or spittle, and a disposition on the part of the child to gnaw or bite any hard body that may fall into its hands. With these symptoms there are frequently more or less restlessness and fretfulness, and sometimes there may even be feverishness; and especially if the little one is allowed to indulge in meat, butter, pastries, and crude, indigestible food, which would be improper in all cases, and which is almost sure to result in disease in the irritable and inflammatory condition of the system which exists at the period of teething.

One of the most common accompaniments of teething is looseness of the bowels. The discharges may be frequent and watery, differing but little, except in consistency and frequency, from natural, healthy evacuations. But perhaps oftener than otherwise, in the present mode of baby management, they are not only loose and watery, but greenish and curdled, indicating a considerable degree of irritation of the mucous membrane lining the intestinal canal. Now the discharges from the bowels during the process of teething should be regarded as an effort of nature to relieve irritation—as a safety vent for the expulsion of morbid matters. Hence, within certain limits, these discharges are salutary, and therefore they should never be checked suddenly.

On the other hand, the equally grave error should be guarded against of letting a child run down to skin and bones, and perhaps into the grave, under the idea that "it is only a bowel complaint from teething," and that no harm can come of it.

Here then is Scylla on one hand, and Charybdis on the other. If the bowels are checked suddenly with astringents and opiates, the child will in all probability be thrown into a wasting fever, and die of inflammation of the brain, stomach, bowels, or lungs. If the exhausting drain is permitted to go on unchecked, the little sufferer will waste away and die from debility. And the difficulty in these cases is increased from the fact that the wasting is so gradual from day to day, that the child may be reduced beyond the point of recovery before the alarm is taken.

What shall be done then? Shall we resort to opiates and astringents to check the bowel complaints of teething? We answer, unhesitatingly, no. Such remedies may be safe in the hands of a very prudent and judicious physician, but for mothers and nurses never. The fact is, the danger from debility and exhaustion is much less than that from the fever, convulsions, and inflammation that are likely to arise from injudicious attempts to check the discharges. Indeed a child will hardly ever die of the diarrhoea of teething, under the following treatment, which is equally safe and efficient, while it is so simple and plain that even a wayfaring woman, though a fool in things medical, "need not err therein." Teething is accomplished in many instances without the slightest inconvenience; and we feel no hesitation in saying that this would almost always be the case, with due attention to the directions which we will now give.

The feverishness of the system should be allayed by warm or tepid bathing, regulating the temperature of the bath according to the degree of heat; that is, the hotter the skin, the cooler the water, &c. Bathing has a most happy effect in soothing the nervous and vascular excitement; and the best of all is, it is a safe remedy, being free from the danger of congestion of the brain, and those disorders of the stomach and derangements of the general system so likely to ensue from the use of opiates and soothing syrups, powders, mixtures, &c. To quiet the restlessness, and to allay the feverishness attendant on teething, the wet sheet pack commends itself strongly to the consideration of mothers both for efficacy and for convenience. If the excitement is not very great, the sheet need not be cold, but may be dipped in warm or hot water. The warm bath, or sheet pack is especially valuable when used at bedtime. In quieting restlessness, and in inducing refreshing sleep, either of the above remedies is superior, safety and efficiency both considered, to any drug, animal, vegetable, or mineral.

In addition to general bathing, teething children should have the mouth washed frequently with cold water; and they should be allowed to drink freely of pure water, gum-water, or slippery-elm mucilage. If the child is not weaned, it should be restricted to the mother's breast; if weaned, the diet should consist of cow's milk, hot-water tea, rice-water, toast-water, parched rice, rice boiled in milk, arrowroot, tapioca, crackers or biscuit crust grated in milk, &c. &c. Under this simple treatment, combined with exercise in the open air, and a strict avoidance of all stimulants in the way of food, drink, or medicine, ninety-nine cases in every hundred of teething will terminate favorably, and all the dangers of this critical period will be safely passed.

Should any direct means be necessary to allay the irritation of the bowels, use a small syringe filled with pure cold water after each evacuation. If the discharges are acid (which will be indicated by their greenish appearance), then give a teaspoonful of a solution of carbonate of soda, or a few grains of chalk or magnesia, repeating the dose of either, at intervals of two or three hours, until the stools become less frequent and more natural in appearance.

If the gums are hot and swollen, they should be freely lanced, cutting down until the tooth is plainly felt grating on the edge of the instrument. This is a simple and safe operation; it can be performed by any one, and often gives the greatest relief. Indeed, sometimes all remedies will fail to have the desired effect until the irritation caused by the pressure of the tooth on the gum is removed in the manner indicated. Various washes are used by people with the view of softening the gums, and some seem to think that there is great virtue in the brains of rabbits!

It is hardly necessary to say that such things can have no specific power to accomplish the end designed, and that such absurd superstitions should be utterly discarded by all intelligent people. Yet rubbing the gums with some substance that is not so hard as to irritate, and not disgustingly filthy in its nature, is harmless, and pleasant to the child, and therefore it may be allowed an India-rubber toy, or something of the kind.

Books by Mail.—Now that the postage on printed matter is so low, we offer our services to procure for our subscribers or others any of the books that we notice. Information touching books will be cheerfully given by inclosing a stamp to pay return postage.

When ordering a book, please mention the name of the publisher.

From T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

HARRY COVERDALE'S COURTSHIP AND MARRIAGE. By Frank E. Smedley, Esq., author of "Frank Farleigh," "Lewis Arundel," "Lorrimer Littlegood," etc. etc. Embellished with illustrative engravings. There is a world of rich humor in the writings of this author, nor is there lacking a vein of deep and earnest sentiment lying beneath; and these two qualities render his works most entertaining, and worthy to be classed among the best romances of our times. Price $1 25.

THE THREE COUSINS. By James A. Maitland, author of "The Watchman," "The Diary of an Old Doctor," "Sartaroe," "The Lawyer's Story," etc. This might with tolerable propriety be termed a story of the sea, for the scenes seem distributed equally on land and shipboard. The story opens in New York, but it is not long before the reader finds himself transported to the Pacific Ocean. The tale is of exciting, and, at times, almost tragic interest. Price $1 25.

HOLLICK'S ANATOMY AND PHYSIOLOGY. Illustrated by a Perfect Dissected Plate of the Human Organization, and by other separate Plates of the Human Skeleton, Arteries, Veins, the Heart, Lungs, Trachea, etc. By Frederick Hollick, M. D., the celebrated lecturer. This will be found a most useful work. The dissected plate which is given in the book is very valuable, conveying as it does, far better than any description can do, an idea of the exact relative positions of the organs of the human body. Price $1 25.

THE NOBLEMAN'S DAUGHTER. By the Hon. Mrs. Norton, author of "Woman's Reward," "Kate Bouverie," "Sorrows of Rosalie," "Undying One, and Other Poems," etc. etc. This is a short yet pleasing tale of high life, whose opening scene is laid in France, in the time of Louis Fifteenth. Price 25 cents.

THE GREATEST PLAGUE OF LIFE; or, The Adventures of a Lady in Search of a Good Servant. By a Lady who has been almost "Worried to Death." Where is the housekeeper who will need to hear more than the title of this book to become interested at once in a tale which may prove to be but the repetition of her own trials? The lady who has been almost "worried to death" will, we are certain, find abundant sympathizers in her narration of the comical adventures and misadventures which befell her in her long-continued "search." Price 50 cents.

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

TRAVELS IN THE REGION OF THE UPPER AND LOWER AMOOR, and the Russian Acquisitions on the Confines of India and China. With Adventures among the Mountain Kirghis, and the Manjours, Manyars, Tongous, Touzents, Goldi, and Gelyaks, the Hunting and Pastoral Tribes. By Thomas Witlem Atkinson, F. G. S., F. R. G. S., author of "Oriental and Western Siberia." With a map and numerous illustrations. We have been in some doubt as to how this volume should be characterized. It may be called a book of travel, a volume of history, or an ethnographical, geographical, topographical, and statistical account of southern Asiatic Russia. With equal justice it might be called a species of "Siberian Nights' Entertainment," so replete is it with thrilling narrations that appear almost fabulous. But, whatever the reader may conclude it to be, he will not, certainly, deny that it is one of the most captivating books of its class, and, as a narrative of travel, lively and gossiping, not often equalled. The illustrations are numerous, and of much more than ordinary artistic excellence. Price $2 50.

LIFE AND CORRESPONDENCE OF JOHN A. QUITMAN, Major-General U. S. A., and Governor of the State of Mississippi. By J. F. H. Claiborne. In two volumes. This memoir of one who became, "by his own exertions, eminent at the bar, on the beach, in the army, and in the councils of his country," and yet "maintained through life his personal virtue and political integrity," will be found not unworthy of the noble character of its subject. With no pretension to literary elegance, it is plain, frank, and downright, and, therefore, however much the reader may sometimes differ from the conclusions of its author, he will at least render to them the respect due to their candor and sincerity. Aside from its political bearings, of which we do not presume to judge, this biography must, or should, prove a warm incentive to the young men of our country, no matter what may be their original station in life, to endeavor after high position by means of honest and unrelenting industry. Price $3 00.

EVAN HARRINGTON; or, He Would be a Gentleman. By George Meredith. This is by far the most lively, varied, and attractive novel on our list. It is a picture of English life among the gentry, though the hero is born of low degree, the son of a tailor, and a tailor himself. Though perpetually haunted by the "shop," he persists in being a gentleman, if only a gentleman tailor, and a gentleman he finally remains. The characters introduced in the course of the story are well chosen and remarkably well sustained; and the narrative constantly changes from one incident to another, without any pause of dull moralizing or sentimentalizing. Whenever it deals in morals or philosophy, it is brief and to the point, making the spice of the whole book, of which spice there is enough and not too much. Price $1 00.

THE FOUR GEORGES. Sketches of Manners, Morals, Court and Town Life. By W. M. Thackeray, author of "Vanity Fair," "The Virginians," "Pendennis," "Lovelace the Widower," etc. etc. With illustrations. Our readers have, perhaps, heard enough with regard to these lectures on the "Four Georges," Kings of England, to render it unnecessary for us to enter into expiatory details. There is a piquancy, a commingling of private with public history about them that cannot fail to attract the interest of the most indifferent reader of biographies. This we are free to say without sanctioning all the conclusions, philosophic or otherwise, of the distinguished satirist who is the author of these spicy and original sketches. Price 75 cents.

OUR YEAR: A Child's Book, in Prose and Verse. By the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman." Illustrated by Clarence Dobell. In this delightful little book, Miss Mulock has given evidence that she knows as well how to administer to the tastes of children, as to those of older people. The volume—a most attractive one in appearance—contains prose sketches of each month in the year, each accompanied by an appropriate poem, and illustrated by an engraving. Price 75 cents.

"MY NOVEL," or, Varieties in English Life. By Pisistratus Caxton. Library edition, in two volumes. This work by Bulwer, the second in the series of the Caxton Novels, has just been issued by these prominent New York publishers, in a plain yet neat style, suitable to meet the wants of those of moderate means, who wish to supply themselves with the best class of light literature. Price $2 00.

WHEAT AND TARES. This story comes to us unclaimed by any author, and depends entirely upon its own merits for success or failure. It is a simple and pleasing picture of English life, with an undercurrent of religion running through it, as its title would imply.

ODD PEOPLE. Being a Popular Description of Singular Races of Man. By Capt. Mayne Reid, author of "The Desert Home," "The Bush Boys," etc. With illustrations. The author gives to his young readers, and, in truth, to older ones also, entertaining descriptions of and facts concerning various peoples which inhabit this earth, our knowledge of which has been heretofore very limited. The Bushmen, the Amazonian Indians, Esquimaux, Laplanders, Patagonian Giants, Fuegian Dwarfs, as well as others of equal curious interest, receive attention in their turn. Price 75 cents.

From D. APPLETON & Co., New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

HOPES AND FEARS; or, Scenes from the Life of a Spinster. By the author of the "Heir of Redclyffe," "Heartsease," etc. In two volumes. This novel, from the pen of one of the best, if not the most popular of modern writers of fiction, is eminently worthy the reputation of its author. Replete with noble sentiments, attractive but not sensational incidents, and pointing an exalted moral, it is so far out of the customary order of works of its class, as to be allowed the claim of meritorious originality. The character of the heroine is a charming one, and is charmingly depicted. Price $1 50.

EDUCATION: Intellectual, Moral, and Physical. By Herbert Spencer, author of "Social Statistics," "The Principles of Psychology," and "Essays: Scientific, Political, and Speculative." There is certainly no science of deeper importance than that of education. This is universally admitted. But, as to how and to what extent that science is to be best developed, there are various and conflicting opinions. The education of the intellect only, is urged by some: others lay greatest stress upon moral education; while with many, the highest importance is attached to the training of the physical man. Taking the broad ground that each of these systems is excellent in its way, the author of the volume before us eloquently and forcibly advocates a union of the three as being the most certain of resulting in the well-being of the human race. We earnestly commend his reasonings, arguments, and analogies to the consideration not only of the partisans of each special system, but to the friends of education in general. Price $1 00.

CONSIDERATIONS ON SOME OF THE ELEMENTS AND CONDITIONS OF SOCIAL WELFARE AND HUMAN PROGRESS. Being Academic and Occasional Discourses and other Pieces. By C. S. Henry, D. D. The ten different articles in this volume, which bear more or less on the questions of intellectual and social progress, contain many arguments ably stated and sustained, though not of a character likely to be popular. They are, however, eminently deserving of honest and unprejudiced attention. Price $1 00.

THE HOUSEKEEPER'S ENCYCLOPEDIA of Useful Information for the Housekeeper, in all branches of Cooking and Domestic Economy. Containing the First Scientific and Reliable Rules for putting up all kinds of Hermetically-Sealed Fruits, with or without Sugar, in Tin Cans or common Bottles; also, Rules for Preserving Fruits in American and French Styles; with Tried Receipts for making Domestic Wines, Catsups, Syrups, Cordials, etc.; and practical Directions for the Cultivation of Vegetables, Fruits and Flowers, Destruction of Insects, etc. etc. By Mrs. E. F. Haskell. This is not only one of the best and most thoroughly practical cook-books which it has been our fortune to examine, but it takes in a wider range of subjects than is common in works of the kind: treating of the dairy, the flower and vegetable gardens, the sick-room, with simple remedies for accidents, and for the diseases incident to children, a large number of miscellaneous receipts, and much information and advice in regard to marketing, cooking, and housekeeping generally, which will prove invaluable to the young housekeeper if heeded. Price $1 25.

FIRST GREEK BOOK; Comprising an Outline of the Forms and Inflections of the Language, a Complete Analytical Syntax, and an Introductory Greek Reader. With Notes and Vocabularies. By Albert Harkness, Ph. D., Professor of Greek in Brown University, author of "Arnold's First Latin Book," "A Second Latin Book," etc. From the brief examination which we have given this work, we judge it to be a most excellent one of its kind. The exercises are brief, yet full and perfect, and the mode of instruction simple and judicious.

PRIMARY HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES: made Easy and Interesting for Beginners. By G. P. Quackenbos, A. M., Principal of "The Collegiate School," New York; author of "Illustrated School History of the United States," "A Natural Philosophy," "First Lessons in Composition," "Advanced Course of Composition and Rhetoric," etc. We are glad that this want, so long sustained, of a school history of our country suited to the comprehension of and capable of interesting the very youthful has at last been supplied. Many histories designed for children's libraries have been written and published, but the need of such works for the school-room seems to have been overlooked. Thus the study which might be rendered the most attractive has been too often considered the duller and most wearisome, for the lack of proper text-books.

THE LITTLE NIGHTCAP LETTERS. THE BIG NIGHTCAP LETTERS; being the Fifth Book of the Series.

THE FAIRY NIGHTCAPS. By the Author of "Nightcaps," "Baby Nightcaps," "Aunt Faunty's Stories," etc. We have received these three concluding numbers of the series of the six Nightcap Books, which "Aunt Faunty" offers to her numerous juvenile friends. These are most charming children's books, and we hope parents will not overlook them during the coming holidays. Price 50 cents.

WHERE THERE'S A WILL THERE'S A WAY. By Alice B. Haven (Cousin Alice). Among the most pleasing and profitable writers for both old and young, we place Mrs. Haven in the front rank. She is plain and sensible in her style, and her writings have a high and sound moral tone, which, instead of causing the slightest approach to dullness, is, perhaps, their greatest charm. This tale, like the many others she has written, is a truthful picture of common life, and will be liked all the better for the absence of anything wonderful or extraordinary in it. The book has an elegantly illuminated title-page, and is interspersed throughout with engravings. Price 75 cents.

NEW FAIRY STORIES FOR MY GRANDCHILDREN. By George Keil. Translated from the German, by S. W. Lander. This little volume contains five tales translated from the German, the source from whence we obtain our choicest treasures of fairy and legendary lore. Each tale is illustrated by a fine engraving. Price 50 cents.

From DICK & FITZGERALD, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

THE SONGS OF IRELAND: Containing Songs of the Affections; Contrivial, Comic, Moral, Sentimental, Satirical, Patriotic, Historical, Military, Political, and Miscellaneous Songs. Edited and annotated by Samuel Lover, author of "Handy Andy," "Rory O'More," "Legends and Stories of Ireland," etc. Profusely illustrated with engravings, designed by Phiz and Harrison Weir, and engraved by Dalziel. These are selections from Moore, Sheridan, Goldsmith, Gerald Griffin, Charles Mahon, Dean Swift, Hon. Mrs. Norton, Miss Edgeworth, and other celebrated Irish poets. The mention of these names is a sufficient guarantee for the excellencies of the book, while, considering it in its character as a volume of Irish poetry, it will commend itself especially to those who hold "old Erin" in remembrance, or regard her with feelings of respect. Price $1 25.

ETIQUETTE AND THE USAGES OF SOCIETY: Containing the most Approved Rules for Correct Deportment in Fashionable Life, together with Hints to Gentlemen and Ladies on Irregular and Vulgar Habits. Also, the Etiquette of Love and Courtship, Marriage Etiquette, etc. By Henry P. Willis. A neat little book containing rules of etiquette and advice concerning behavior, given with clearness and explicitness. Its title is a sufficient explanation of its contents. Price 25 cents.

HIDE AND SEEK: A Novel. By Wilkie Collins, author of "The Woman in White," "The Dead Secret," "After Dark," etc. Without possessing the absorbing interest of "The Woman in White," or the varied incidents of some of his former tales, this new novel by Wilkie Collins brings no disgrace to the reputation of its author. If we were to find any fault with it, we should say that the plot is not sufficiently veiled to the reader, and he is enabled to foresee the denouement too soon. Price 50 cents.

From DERRY & JACKSON, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

WHIMS AND ODDITIES. With One Hundred and

Twelve Illustrations, and National Tales. By Thomas Hood. There is no necessity of our reminding our readers of the infinite humor of Hood. In the present volume they will find some of the rarest specimens of that humor, both in the text and in the illustrations. The "national tales," which form nearly one-half the book, are sufficiently entertaining, but scarcely surpass the average merit of the magazine stories of the day. Price $1 25.

WILL HE FIND HER? A Romance of New York and New Orleans. By Winter Summerton. This is one of those exciting fictions replete with incidents of the most intense and stirring character, which are very properly called sensation novels. We have no liking for such, ourselves; but, perhaps, many of our readers may derive entertainment from the one under notice, which is certainly a superior specimen of its class. Price $1 25.

METHODISM SUCCESSFUL, And the Internal Causes of its Success. By Rev. B. F. Tefft, D. D., LL. D., Late President of Genesee College, author of "Hungary and Kossuth," "Webster and his Masterpieces," etc. With a Letter of Introduction by Bishop James. This is a volume which religious people of every shade of belief may not find it unprofitable to read, and which cannot but prove of the deepest interest to the particular denomination of whose principles, distinguished representatives, and religious operations it more especially treats. Price $1 25.

From RUDD & CARLETON, New York, through SAMUEL HAZARD, JR., and J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

THE PETTY ANNOYANCES OF MARRIED LIFE. From the French of Honoré de Balzac. Translated by O. W. Wight and F. B. Goodrich. Though we do not feel fully prepared to admit the vraisemblance of the pictures of married life in this volume of the excellent American translation of the works of the inimitable Balzac, we cannot but acknowledge their characteristic vigor and piquancy of satire, albeit it must be further conceded that the force of said satire depends a great deal upon those peculiarities of French wedded life which are neither American nor universal. Price $1 00.

A TRIBUTE TO KANE, and other Poems. By George W. Chapman. A volume of poems which, though they display no extraordinary genius, nevertheless do great credit to the taste and sentiment of their author.

LAVINIA: A Novel. By G. Ruffini, author of "Doctor Antonio," "Dear Experience," "Lorenzo Benoni," etc. Three volumes in one. This is pronounced an extraordinary production. It comes from the pen of an Italian whose former works created no little sensation in this country. The scene of this novel changes between Rome, Paris, and London, and the hero and heroine are an Italian and an Englishwoman. The author possesses a remarkable command of the English language, both in its rhetorical and familiar use. Price $1 25.

THE GREAT PREPARATION; or, Redemption Draweth Nigh. By the Rev. John Cumming, D. D., F. R. S. E., Minister of the Scottish National Church, Crown Court, Covent Garden; author of "The Great Tribulation," etc. First Series. The lovers of ingenious speculation on the Scriptural prophecies will find much in this new volume, by the celebrated Dr. Cumming, to interest and employ their minds. The Reverend Doctor, without claiming to be a prophet, distinctly informs us that we may expect the downfall of the Pope, and the great Sabbath of the world, about the year 1867. Price $1 00.

WA-WA-WANDA. A Legend of Old Orange. Local

in its associations, this poetical legend, which has for its original in metre and style the Hiawatha of Longfellow, will probably find more appreciative readers in the locality it celebrates than in the world at large. It contains many descriptive passages exceedingly quaint, yet not unpleasant, in their pastoral simplicity, and not a few gems of poetical sentiment. But its resemblance to Hiawatha will provoke comparisons very little in its favor.

From CROSBY, NICHOLS, LEE, & Co., Boston, through T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

GERMAN POPULAR TALES AND HOUSEHOLD STORIES; Collected by the Brothers Grimm. Newly translated. With illustrations by Edward H. Wechnert. First and Second Series. What a rich treasury of delight do these two volumes of little stories present to the young people! Nearly two hundred tales of fairy wonder, and of rustic legends, full of humor, pathos, comicality, touching tragedy, childish whimsicality, and deep moral truth—all written in a naively simple style which an intelligent four-year-old cannot fail to comprehend, and yet which the wisacre of sixty will not find unacceptable to his maturer intellect. Price $2 50.

LIFE AND RELIGION OF THE HINDOOS. With a Sketch of my Life and Experience. By Joguth Chunder Gangooly (baptized Philip). Here we have most reliable information concerning the Hindoos, their manners, customs, and religion, written, not by one who has resided for a few years in the English settlements in India, and who, necessarily, can have but an imperfect knowledge of the subject of which he treats, but by one eminently qualified to speak with correctness and certainty: a native, who has been educated and converted to Christianity. The book is written in very good English, and the subject-matter cannot prove otherwise than interesting. Price $1 00.

From J. E. TILTON & Co., Boston, through Wm. S. & ALFRED MARTIN, Philadelphia:—

QUIET THOUGHTS FOR QUIET HOURS. By the author of "Life's Morning," "Life's Evening," "Sunday Hours," etc. The reflective mind will find choice mental food within the pages of this little book, which contains simple, almost child-like sketches, each intended to illustrate some moral truth. The book is not intended for those who can only be satisfied with masterly and artistic literary productions; but those who can be satisfied with truth in simple, homely garb, will take delight in its pages.

THE CHAPEL OF ST. MARY. By the author of "The Rectory of Moreland." The Chapel of St. Mary is a novel which we have no hesitation in commending to our readers. The style is elegant, and the story a quiet yet pleasing one. Price $1 00.

THE KING OF THE MOUNTAINS. From the French of Edmond About, author of "The Roman Question," "Germaine," etc. By Mary L. Booth. With an introduction by Epes Sargent. This story is the most pleasing we have yet seen from the pen of M. About. It is in some sort a satire on modern Greece, which, if its condition be at all like it is herein represented, certainly is a deserving object of satire. The narrative is sufficiently interesting, but the chief merit of the book is in its quiet humor and keen though not splenetic wit. Price $1 00.

From TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston, through S. HAZARD, Jr., Philadelphia:—

FAITHFUL FOR EVER. By Coventry Patmore, author of "The Angel in the House." The rich promise which the author of this volume gave in his earlier works is not so abundantly fulfilled as we could have wished. Nevertheless, he has given us a sweetly simple poem, not remarkable, certainly, but, at the same time, of something more than common excellence. Price $1 00.

TOM BROWN AT OXFORD: A Sequel to School Days at Rugby. By Thomas Hughes, author of "School Days at Rugby," "Scouring of the White Horse," etc. The first volume of this work has just been issued, and has been received by us. Nos. 11 and 12 of the monthly parts have also come to hand. Price 75 cents per bound volume, and 12 cents per monthly part.

LEGENDS OF THE MADONNA, as Represented in the Fine Arts. By Mrs. Jameson. A new and enlarged edition, in blue and gold, of one of the authoress' most elaborate works, explanatory of Christian art, as exhibited by the Madonnas of the great masters. The present volume, which forms one of a uniform series of Mrs. Jameson's works now in course of publication by Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, is illustrated by an exquisite portrait of the authoress, from a photograph taken but a short time before her death. Price 75 cents.

From SHELDON & Co., New York, through PECK & BLISS, J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., and E. H. BUTLER & Co., Philadelphia:—

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF MRS. EMILY C. JUDSON. By A. C. Kendrick, Professor of Greek Literature in the University of Rochester. We gave a somewhat extended notice of this book in a previous number of our magazine, therefore we deem it unnecessary to do more than call attention to it now.

THE FLORENCE STORIES. By Jacob Abbott. Visit to the Orkney Islands.

THE OAKLAND STORIES. Claiborne. By George B. Taylor, of Virginia.

These are each the third edition of two series of children's stories, and will prove most acceptable to the little ones. Those especially who have already obtained the preceding numbers of the series will not overlook these.

From CHASE, NICHOLS & HILL, Boston, through T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

HOYLE'S GAMES; Containing the Rules for Playing Fashionable Games. Carefully revised from the last London Edition, with American Additions. The advertisement to this edition says: "The present edition of Hoyle's Games contains all that the English copy does, together with upwards of thirty-five games, mostly American, that have never before been published." Price 75 cents.

We have also received from the same publishers, a smaller edition of "Hoyle's Games," which, if not exactly like the one above mentioned in its contents, is at least very similar. Price 35 cents.

From W. A. TOWNSEND & Co., New York, through J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

FAMOUS BOYS, and how they became Great Men. Dedicated to Youths and Young Men as a Stimulus to Earnest Living. Price 75 cents.

THE WHITE ELEPHANT; or, the Hunters of Ava and the King of the Golden Foot. By William Dalton, author of "The War Tiger," "The Wolf Boy of China," etc. With illustrations by Harrison Weir. Price 75 cents.

THE WAR TIGER; or, Adventures and Wonderful Fortunes of the Young Chief and his Lad Choro: A Tale of the Conquest of China. By William Dalton, author of "The White Elephant," etc. With illustrations by J. S. Melville. Price 75 cents.

We have grouped together these three handsomely bound and illustrated volumes, as they are all from the same publisher, and the two last by the same author, and are also all intended for youthful readers, though they are not, strictly speaking, children's books. The first gives brief biographies of Daniel Webster, Eliza Kent Kane, Henry Havelock, Robert Fulton, and many others who have become distinguished men by a careful cultivation of their talents. The two latter describe respectively adventures in Ava and China, which, though the author acknowledges them to be fictitious, are yet claims for them a careful adherence in his description to the manners and customs of the countries referred to. There may be a degree of improbability in the incidents related; but this, perhaps, to the youthful reader at least, will seem no drawback to their merits, while the narratives are sufficiently strong to awake the mind of the duller reader.

From F. A. BRADY, New York, through T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

THE RAMBLES OF FUDGE FUMBLE; or The Love Ramblings of a Lifetime. By the author of the "Arkansas Doctor," "Rattle-head Travels," etc. Price 50 cents.

LIONEL JOULEY: A Scrap to Love me; Leave me not. By Pierce Egan, Esq., author of "The Castle and the Cottage," "Snake in the Grass," "Flower of the Clock," etc. Price, paper cover, 50 cents.

ELLEN MAYNARD; or, The Death Wail of the Hawk-huntress. A Story of Real Life and True Love. Price, paper cover, 50 cents.

From JAMES EBBERT, New York, for sale at LUTHERAN PUBLICATION OFFICE, 42 North Ninth Street, and by DR. J. C. HART, Druggist, 24 South Second Street:—

SKETCHES OF TRAVEL in South America, Mexico, and California. By L. M. Shaeffer. The contents of this neat and pleasant little volume of reminiscences of life among the miners of California originally appeared in the columns of a religious paper. The period of time embraced in the sketches extends from 1849 to 1852, a period in which the ever singular characteristics of California existence were at the height of their singularity. This fact alone should give value to the work, which is written in a simple attractive style.

From THOMSON BROTHERS, New York, through W. S. & A. MARTIN, Philadelphia:—

PAUL BLAKE; or, The Story of a Boy's Perils in the Islands of Corsica and Monte Cristo. By Alfred Elwes, author of "Ocean and her Rulers," etc. With illustrations by H. Anelay. This is one of those stories which, designed for the reading of young persons—we do not mean children—will, by its unflagging interest, copiousness of incident, and thrilling adventure, inevitably retain the attention of almost every class of readers.

CONSTANCE AND EDITH; or, Incidents of Home Life. By a Clergyman's Wife. With illustrations. An attractive story, intended for youth, the perusal of which will convey to their minds and hearts wholesome moral truths.

From FLORENCE SCOTT, New York:—

BIOGRAPHICAL, HISTORICAL, AND INCIDENTAL SKETCH OF OSSIAN E. DODGE. This is No. 10 of Scott's Dime Library. It comprises a brief biography of the well-known musician and humorist, and a number of sketches of his most notable and funniest doings. To those who know how to enjoy a hearty laugh, we especially commend this book, assuring them it will afford them many a one before they reach the last page. Price 10 cents.

From F. W. HURTT & Co., Columbus, Ohio:—

THE OHIO EDUCATIONAL MONTHLY. (Successor to the Ohio Journal of Education.) A Journal of School and Home Education. Official organ of the Ohio State Teachers' Association. We have received the numbers for October and November, being Nos. 1 and 2 of the new series, of this publication. The November number contains a steel engraving of Rev. P. B. Wilbur, late President of the Wesleyan Female College, Cincinnati. A sketch of Mr. Wilbur's educational career, by Rev. D. W. Clark, editor of the Ladies' Repository, accompanies the likeness. Both numbers contain interesting articles from well-known friends of education.

From ROBERT CARTER & BROTHERS, New York:—

THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS. By John Bunyan. With explanatory Notes, by Thomas Scott, D. D. Illustrated by Charles Bennett. It is unnecessary to say anything of a book so well known as this, except that it is beautifully printed in a volume just of the right size, and that the illustrations are excellent, each character being delineated to the life. We are sure that if there are any libraries still unsupplied with this important work, their want could not be better met than by this edition. Price 50 cents.

THE KING'S HIGHWAY; or, Illustrations of the Commandments. By the Rev. Richard Newton, D. D., author of "Rills from the Fountain of Life," "Best Things," etc. This work consists of Addresses or Familiar Sermons to the Young on the Commandments, illustrating each in a manner at once simple and forcible. The book is one that will be read with interest even by those who shrink from considering serious things, and from its earnestness and warmth is calculated to do great good.

THE LAST WEEK IN THE LIFE OF DAVIS JOHNSON, JR. By J. D. Wells, Pastor of the South Third Street Presbyterian Church, Williamsburgh, L. I. A very interesting account of the last days of a young man who was suddenly called, in the midst of health and thoughtlessness, to prepare for death. His conflict and his final conquest are related in a very striking and impressive manner.

TUPPY; or, The Autobiography of a Donkey. With illustrations. This story of the life and adventures of a donkey is told in a lively and interesting style, and will be very amusing to the children, for whom it is written.

DAYS OF OLD. Three stories from Old English History. For the young. By the author of "Ruth and her Friends." These are stories of the early periods in English history, going back to the time when the Druids held sway. They are beautifully written, and will be improving, not only from the excellence of the style and the purity of the moral, but from the information they give of the life and manners of that time.

DAYS AT MURHEAD; or, The Lessons of Little Olive's Midsummer Holidays. This is one of the prettiest and best little books for the young we have seen for some time. Very lively and interesting, at the same time inculcating good morals, particularly unselfishness of life and temper.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

OUR ENGRAVINGS.—“A High Walk in Life” is one of our “brag” plates. No publisher can equal us in this, or, in fact, in any other department.

This February Fashion, is it not even better than those that have preceded it? We think it is, anyhow. These double fashion-plates are a bitter pill for our imitators: they cannot accomplish that even in an indifferent way. They may imitate the old style of fashions that we have abandoned, and no doubt they will, but they can't attempt this. We have further surprises for them yet.

There is no authorized medium for the fashions but Godey. Any one who notices can see that other magazines only follow ours from month to month. We receive, besides our foreign fashions, from A. T. Stewart & Co., Brodie, and Lord & Taylor of New York, and T. W. Evans & Co. of Philadelphia, and of articles for mourning from Besson & Co. of this city. Other magazines only copy after we have published.

“No Longer Baby.” How expressive! or, in other words, the young one's “nose is out of joint,” a matter to be realized in any family where there is more than one child.

OUR NEEDLES.—Owing to the immense demand for the needles, we may have been dilatory in supplying; but we now have an ample supply on hand, and can send at once to all who may order.

READ THIS.—We insert nothing in our Book that does not belong to it, and are not responsible for any circulars, catalogues, or advertisements that may be inserted by dealers to whom we send the Book. We are getting tired of these complaints. If people would only look for themselves, and see by whom these documents are published, they would not charge us with their insertion. Read the article on first page of the cover of the Book.

OWING, we suppose, to our beautiful fashions, it is almost impossible to keep pace with the demand for our Book. The cry is “send as soon as you can.” We presume persons compare and see for themselves the difference between our fashions and those of other magazines. We can unhesitatingly say that nothing published in France or England comes up to our fashion-plates, and we challenge a comparison.

OUR LITERATURE.—The newspaper press says of us that, “although Godey devotes a portion of the Book to fashion matters, the literature of the Lady's Book stands very favorable compared to that of magazines devoted exclusively to literary matter, and, in fact, surpasses most of them.”

THE Middleton Register says: “By clubbing, Godey can be had almost as cheap as the cheapest magazines, while each number contains more than twice as much reading matter, and more than twice as many engravings as any other magazine.”

POSTAGE ON THE LADY'S BOOK.—Postage for three months, if paid in advance at the office where it is received, four and a half cents.

REGISTERING LETTERS.—When this matter was first proposed, some of our subscribers may remember that we protested against it energetically, again and again, as only a plan by which thieves might, without any trouble, ascertain which letters had money in them. The present Postmaster-General, in his report, says, of registered letters: “They bear a mark which indicates to all through whose hands they pass their valuable character, and this indication serves rather to invite depredation than to prevent it.” Why then will persons register letters? We do not pretend to look after a loss when persons write us that they have registered their letters—knowing full well that the money can never be recovered.

SOME HINTS.

In remitting, try to procure a draft, and don't fail to indorse it.

Address L. A. Godey, Philadelphia, Pa. That is sufficient.

If a lady is the writer, always prefix Mrs. or Miss to her signature, that we may know how to address a reply.

Town, County, and State, always in your letter.

If you miss a number of any magazine, always write to the publishers of the magazine. If Arthur's, address T. S. Arthur & Co., Philadelphia; if Harper's, address Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York.

When a number of the Lady's Book is not received, write at once for it; don't wait until the end of the year.

When inclosing money, do not trust to the sealing matter on an envelope, but use a wafer in addition.

Mrs. Hale is not the Fashion Editress. Address “Fashion Editress, care L. A. Godey, Philadelphia.”

When you send money for any other publication, we pay it over to the publisher, and there our responsibility ceases.

We can always supply back numbers.

Subscriptions may commence with any number of the year.

THE Fashion Editor desires us to say that she receives orders from those who are subscribers and those who are not; in fact, she never stops to inquire whether they are or are not subscribers to the Lady's Book.

THE PHILADELPHIA CITY ITEM.—Mr. Fitzgerald's handsome weekly is among the most valuable and interesting of our exchanges. It is a literary, business, fine art, and dramatic paper of fourteen years' standing, and is at this moment more popular and prosperous than ever. As a poetical paper it has no superior in the country, and, as a general literary medium, occupies a distinguished rank. It is essentially the theatrical, musical, and fine art paper of the United States. Among its poetic contributors we observe writers not unknown to fame—Miss Bridges, Miss Donnelly, and Dorgan, and Stockton. Mrs. Jacobus of Alabama (one of the “Women of the South” distinguished in literature) commences her story of “The Ashtons” next week.

Club of $25.

MICHIGAN, Dec. 4, 1860.

It is with pleasure I send another club for the Lady's Book. I could not do without it, and others think with me that it is a monthly blessing in a home. Each month better and better.

H.

OUR MUSICAL COLUMN.

Prof. Edward Arnold.—This gentleman, well known to our musical friends as one of the best of our correspondents, has been appointed to the musical professorship in Mount Allison Ladies' Academy, Sackville, New Brunswick, a flourishing institution, which has done its pupils manifest justice in this appointment. We predict that the standard of musical education in the Academy will be materially advanced henceforth, as the Professor is not merely the graceful and pleasing composer which he is known to be by the Godey patrons, but a brilliant performer, and thorough musician and instructor as well.

Union E. Dodge.—We are glad to learn that this pleasant humorist and successful concertizer is again at his old vocation, and is delighting large audiences in the West with his droll performances in music and Monusiana. He is assisted in his entertainments by Mr James J. Clark, one of the best baladists in the country, a gentleman of thorough culture and excellent style, and well known, moreover, as a composer of numerous popular ballads. During January and February they will appear in the different towns in Michigan, and we advise the readers of Godey whose localities they may visit not to lose the opportunity of seeing and hearing them, for Dodge alone, as a man of infinite jest and merriment, is worth going miles to hear. Mr Dodge was the composer of the famous Masonic Song in our December number.

New Sheet Music.—Our bulletin of new music for the month comprises the following, any of which we shall be glad to forward to any address, free of postage, on receipt of price in stamps. Orders to be sent to our own address, Philadelphia:—

By Mr. Everest, one of our best contributors: From Early Morn; In all the World; The Home of my Sweet Adelaide; Thou Little Star; Dear Mountain Home, and O It is Pleasant, a beautiful barcarole from Weber's Oberon. The first, second, and fifth of these are especially worthy of notice, but our readers will be pleased with any of them. Each 25 cents.

From Messrs. Firth & Pond, New York. Three capital songs by Signor G. Stigelli, of the Italian Opera, as follows: The Dream of Home; I know a pair of Hazel Eyes; and Were I a Soldier. This last is a splendid piece of music, martial-like and spirited, and admirably suited to a clear, ringing voice. Price of each 35 cents. Also two beautiful melodies. Under the Willow she's Sleeping, and Cora Dean, both by Stephen C. Foster, the popular composer of Gentle Annie, etc. Each 25 cents. A new edition of the ever popular Dixie's Land, now warbled everywhere, the same firm also issues at 25 cents; and a brilliant new Quickstep, Skyrockets, by Grafulla, composer of Captain Shepard, at the same price. At 50 cents, Messrs. Firth & Pond publish brilliant variations on Dixie's Land, by Charles Grobe, whose name alone is sufficient guarantee of the merits of the piece. We will cheerfully purchase and forward any of these pieces.

Music Declined.—We are compelled to decline the following MSS. sent for insertion in the Book: Home Polka; Leave me Now; I do not Forget; Katie Bell, and Prince of Wales Waltz.

J. STARR HOLLOWAY.

We ask the attention of every housekeeper to two books they cannot well do without. "Mrs. Hale's Housekeeper's Book," price $1.25; and "Mrs. Hale's Cooking Book," price $1.00. With them, they can get along; without them, they cannot.

THE CELEBRATED BUTCHERS' PROCESSION.—Who is there amongst us can remember that? Some of our old folks perhaps. Yes, and they refer to it as one of the events they do remember, and as being more splendid than anything of a more recent date. It was called "White's Great Cattle Show;" we remember seeing an old print of it, but it has been reproduced. Aaron Clement of this city, residence No. 5 Pennsylvania Railroad Building, 5 Willing's Alley, has brought it out anew, but still preserving all the quaintness of the original—the old-fashioned dresses; Chestnut Street as it was, etc. But it looks bright and new, and is a picture that all should have to remind them of bygone times and bygone scenes.

THE VA. Western Review says: "Godey's Lady Book is the worthy favorite of all intelligent and fashionable ladies. The vaude mecum of the élite, a necessity in every family."

HAIR ORNAMENTS.—Ladies wishing hair made into bracelets, pins (which are very beautiful necklaces, or ear-rings, can be accommodated by our Fashion Editor. A very large number of orders have recently been filled, and the articles have given great satisfaction.

We give the prices at which we will send these beautiful articles:—

- Breastpins, from $4 to $12.
- Ear-rings, from $4.50 to $10.
- Bracelets, from $3 to $15.
- Rings, from $1.50 to $3.
- Necklaces, from $6 to $15.
- Fob-chains, from $6 to $12.
- The Charms of Faith, Hope, and Charity, $4.50.
- Hair Studs from $5.50 to $11 the set.
- Sleeve Buttons from $6.50 to $11 the set.

A YOUNG LADY, capable of taking charge of the education of children under the age of fifteen, desires to enter a private family as teacher. She prefers a situation in Kentucky or Tennessee. Address, until the 1st of December, Miss Euna S. Osceola, Ill.

THE OLD FRANKLIN ALMANAC FOR 1861.—Winch, 320 Chestnut Street, has it for sale, and it is a most useful publication, containing a little of everything that is useful to the business man or the housekeeper. Price 14 cents.

VILLA IN THE GOTHIC STYLE.

Designed expressly for Godey's Lady's Book by SAMUEL SLOAN, Architect, Philadelphia.

CALIFORNIA, Nov. 1860.

The ladies of this place, like all the women of this wide-awake republic, find the Lady's Book a necessity in their daily lives; a companion not the less charming for being useful; a parent, aid, and comfort to the inexperienced young housekeeper; a safe adviser to both matron and maid when comes up the great question, "What shall we wear?" And not only does it administer to the outward adorning; how many times for me has it soothed the disquiet of a vexed and weary spirit by its well-told trials of other lives! Ah, Mr. Godey, if the ladies could vote, they would make you the next President—dear, glorious old Union-saver that you are!

Club of $52 60.

WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

It always gives me great pleasure to get up this club, for I feel that the Lady's Book is a necessity and a luxury that a lady cannot do without. Therefore, the ladies of this place return their most sincere thanks for the great enjoyment that they have received from the Lady's Book. They also recommend it to every mother and wife as a treasure, and only wonder how they great can do without it.

MAINE, Dec. 1, 1860.

You must surely think that we appreciate your surpassingly beautiful and most excellent magazine. It is truly a gem that no lady of taste and refinement would willingly dispense with. May you live a thousand years to publish the Lady's Book, never growing old, and may the same unprecedented success and prosperity ever attend you!

"THE ILLUSTRATED NEWS OF THE WORLD."—We mentioned, on page 84 of our January number, that this publication was issued from New York. We make the correction. The proper address is Messrs. H. A. Brown & Co., 14 Hanover Street, Boston, Mass.

SCHOOL TEACHING.—With regard to the practice of giving scholars lessons to be studied at home, an indignant writer says:—

"The whole system of merely hearing lessons recited in public schools is a cunning fraud of teachers, falsely so called. Those teachers teach nothing; they sit majestically enthroned in their school chairs, to decide daily whether the parents have done their—that is, the teachers'—work at home, and to punish or reward the scholar for the parents' ability or ignorance.

"When we pay taxes for public schools, or enormous fees for private ones, we want tutors, not magistrates, for our money; we want the men and women employed in schools to do something more than sit up in state and ask questions; we want them to teach our children something they did not know, and not send them home to be taught, that they, the teachers, may diurnally go through the farce of hearing them recite what parents have taught them and they know already."

The same remarks will also apply to private schools. We have long been disgusted with this system, that makes parents the teachers, and the so-called teachers the hearers of lessons. Let all lessons be learned in school, under the eye of the teacher. St. Mark's Episcopal Academy—Rev. J. Andrew Harris—is free from this objection. We copy the following from his circular:—

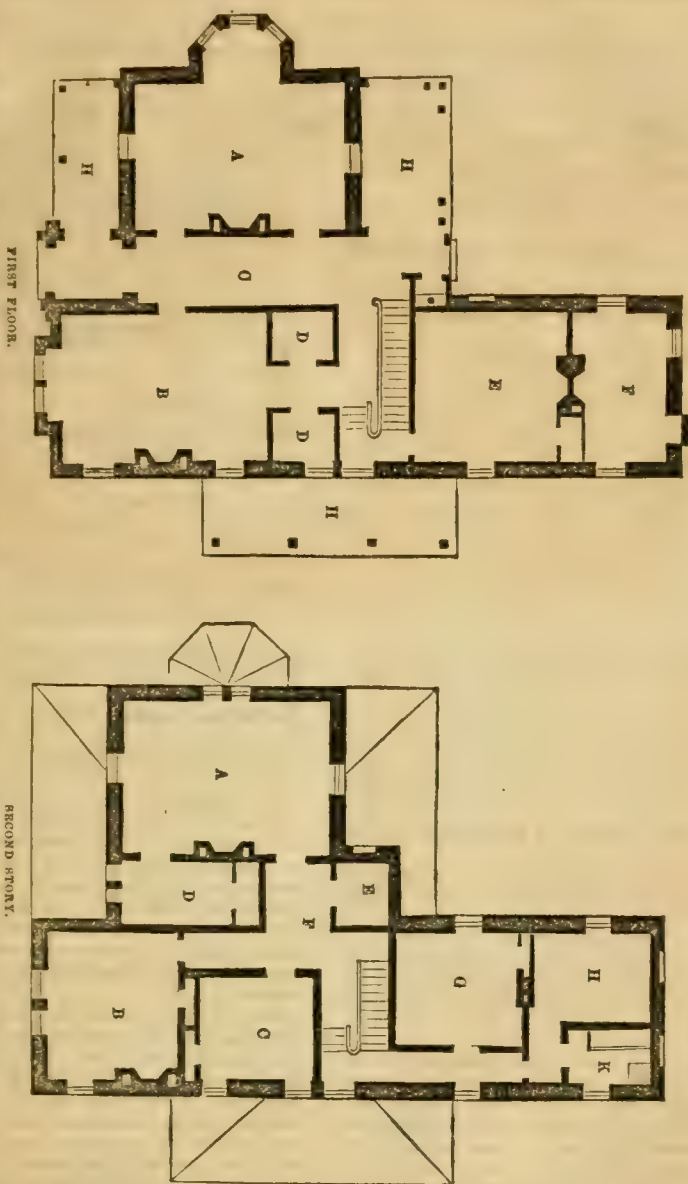

"As much time as possible will be allowed boys to prepare their lessons during school hours, under the direction of a teacher; an arrangement which will relieve parents from the trouble of taking the teacher's place at home."

EMBROIDERY PATTERN FOR A PIANO STOOL.

(See plate of Tiger in January number.)

To be worked in cloth or velvet, with chenille or wool or else on canvas, and the ground filled up with some dark color which will throw out the figures well. The Footstool in this number is to be worked the same way.

PLAN AND DESCRIPTION OF VILLA IN THE GOTHIC STYLE.

First floor — A parlor, 18 by 24 feet; B dining-room, 16 by 22 feet; C hall, 6 feet wide; D D pantry and china closet; E kitchen, 16 by 16 feet; F back kitchen; H H H H porch.
Second story — A chamber, with dressing-room D; B and C chambers; E hall; F Hnon closet; G chamber; H chamber; K bath-room. The attics have sufficient light for three commodious rooms.
 The cost for this building, if the walls are faced with stone, will be $65,500.

A LADY from Ohio writes us: "We are fast becoming convinced that the best is always the cheapest—just as you say. So they subscribe for your magazine."

THE BEST JEWEL TO WEAR.—Jewels are an ornament to women, but a blemish to men; they bespeak either effeminacy or a love of display. The hand of man is honored in working, for labor is his mission; and the hand that wears its riches on its finger has rarely worked honestly to win them. The best jewel a man can wear is his honor; let that be bright and shining, well set in prudence, and all others must darken before it.

MISSING NUMBERS.—Those who do not receive a January number must write for it at once, and so with every other number of the year; if they do not, we do not feel obliged to supply them. A club will be sent for 1861, we will say, and we are then informed that certain numbers in 1860 never came to hand. This may be so, and then again it may not; they may have lost the numbers by lending them, and then call upon us to supply the deficiency. Now let it be distinctly understood that we will only supply missing numbers when they are written for at the time. When you receive a February number, and the January number has not been received, then write.

A WORD FOR THE WOMEN.—The delicate female hand, the most beautiful and pliant instrument in the world, once thoroughly educated, the whole world of design is opened to her, and the field of her labor is boundless. There is scarcely an article of home manufacture in which we have advanced much beyond the rude old Saxon style. Every article of household use, as far as design is concerned, has to be reformed, and will be, as our tastes advance. Why, then, should not the trained female artist hasten to share the work with her brother artist?

NOR FAIR.—A person, to save the expense, will subscribe to a low-priced magazine, and then say to one of our subscribers, "Lend me your magazine, and I will lend you mine." This is not exactly a fair exchange, but we know it is done. We caution all our subscribers against such exchanges. Poverty is no sin, and if a person cannot afford to take the Lady's Book, then take a lower-priced magazine, even if it is not so good.

J. E. TILTON & CO., 161 Washington Street, Boston, publish, for Grecian and Antique Painting, the following elegant pictures, which they will send, post-paid, to any address, on receipt of price. New pictures constantly being published.

Each is prepared on suitable paper, with tints, etc.; and full directions to paint, to mix each color, frame, etc., without extra charge. There are no other publishers of such pictures, nor can any other pictures be made to so fully resemble a canvas oil painting, or remain perfect as these. The coarse and cheap pictures are not suitable, and disgust people of taste with these beautiful arts.

They are the originators of several of the most popular new styles of painting, and publish the valuable book, ART RECREATIONS. Their careful experience of several years is given in this book, with that of Professor Day, the pioneer teacher, who has successfully taught in Europe and the best seminaries in New England.

Its value to teachers will be obvious, and to those living at a great distance, for it gives instructions how to make all materials used, valuable receipts, etc. Some of the branches taught are Pencil Drawing, Oil Painting, Crayon Drawing and Painting, Paper Flowers, Moss-work, Papier Mache, Cone-work, Feather Flowers, Hair-work, Potichimanie, Leather-work, Theorem Painting, Gilding and Bronzing, Taxidermy, or the Art of Preserving Birds, Grecian Painting, Antique Painting, Oriental Painting, Wax Flowers, from the crude wax to the beautiful and perfect flower, fruit, etc.; Sign Painting, Shell-work, Painting on Ground Glass, Magic Lantern, Imitation of Pearl, Sealing-wax Painting, Panorama Painting, Embroidery, Coloring Photographs, Water-coloring, the Aquarium, etc.

The work is elegantly illustrated, large 12mo. Price $1 50. This and all our pictures and books sent, post-paid, by mail.

PETERSON'S PHILADELPHIA COUNTERFEIT DETECTOR.—A most useful adjunct to every man in business. Corrected by the celebrated Drexel. It is an invaluable work, and one that should be in the store of every one. Anybody remitting us $3 shall receive the Lady's Book and the Detector one year.

BASSINETTE.

FOR OUR YOUNG READERS.

Fig. 1.

To make the framework of this, take a piece of cardboard, and cut out the bottom, Fig. 2; take another strip of cardboard, cut it out the shape of Fig. 3, and cut half through the dotted line on the front of the card, split with a penknife the outside pieces, turn round the long strip, and fix them under the bottom of Fig. 2; the sides of the bassinette may be joined together with a piece of thin paper over each end.

Fig. 3.

The two rockers must be cut out to the pattern, Fig. 4, the upper portion of the card split down to the dotted

Fig. 4.

The three ribs for the top must be cut out to the shape of Fig. 5, bent over, and the ends fastened with a little gum.

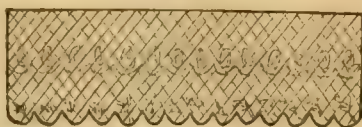

The framework being now complete, take a piece of light blue or pink glazed lining, cut this to the shape of the inside, and cover the ribs with the same; put over this lace, then a frill of lining round the outsides, and also cover these with a frill of lace not farther than the ribs, and put a piece of quilled ribbon round the edge. Then cut out the shape of Fig. 6 for the top, first cutting out the same figure in glazed calico, putting it under the lace; tack the straight edge round the first rib, not gathering it at all, and do the same with the other two ribs, gathering it a little as you proceed. The ribs must be covered with quilled ribbon. For the curtains take a rather broad piece of lace, and cut it to the pattern, Fig. 7. Catch it up in the middle with a bow made as Fig. 8; tack down the side, and catch this up at each end with similar bows, but with much longer ends, and also another bow at the foot.

Fig. 7.

Fig. 8.

For the bedding of the bassinette, commence by cutting

Fig. 9.

Fig. 11.

out of strong calico the feather bed, Fig. 9; double over at the dotted line and backstitch it together all round, except the top; turn it on the right side and stuff it with feathers or wadding, and, when quite full, turn in the top a little, and sew it over neatly. For the pillow, take a piece of the same material, and cut it out to the shape of Fig. 10; double it over at the dotted line, stitch it together, and fill it in the same manner as already explained. For the pillow-case, take a much finer piece of calico and cut it the same shape as Fig. 10, only a very little larger, to allow it to slip over the pillow; cut through the dotted line in this, run and fell round the curve, and hem where you have cut through the dotted line; turn it on the right side, and sew three small buttons on, also button-holes, and finish it off by putting some lawn frills all round the pillow-case to make Fig. 11. For the sheets, cut out of fine calico the shape of Fig. 12, leaving one square at the corners, and without frills for the bottom one, and hem it; for the upper sheet round it at the top, as in Fig. 12, and hem this also; frill a piece of lawn on to the upper part which is to turn over. The blankets must be made a little less than the sheets, and in the same manner as already described in the bed. The counterpane can be made of a small pattern marcella, and the shape of Fig. 13; sew round it a piece of work, which will finish the bassinette.

This, like the bed, may be made any size, taking care to keep each part in proportion, as well as the bedding, etc.

TOWN, COUNTY, AND STATE.—Do not forget to put all these in every letter you write. You do not know how much trouble it would save us.

PHILADELPHIA AGENCY.

No order attended to unless the cash accompanies it.

All persons requiring answers by mail must send a post-office stamp; and for all articles that are to be sent by mail, stamps must be sent to pay return postage.

Be particular, when writing, to mention the town, county, and State you reside in. Nothing can be made out of post-marks.

Chemistry for the Young.

LESSON XVII.—(Concluded.)

376. The result of this combustion is nothing but water, as can be demonstrated by setting fire to the mixture in a dry, closed vessel, by means of an electric spark. If, instead of filling the bladder with mixed gases, pure hydrogen be employed, and if this gas as it escapes through the tobacco-pipe stem be inflamed, the flame being allowed to burn under a dry bell-glass, water may be seen to deposit as dew. When thus produced, water is absolutely pure, but as occurring in nature it is always contaminated by foreign substances, from which it must be purified by distillation. On the large scale this operation is performed by stills, but the chemist more frequently has recourse to retorts, flasks, etc. For extemporaneous distillations, where the condensation of all the vapor is no object, the subjoined apparatus answers very well. It consists of two flasks joined together in the manner indicated, one flask serving as the heater or evaporator, the other as the condenser. The latter may be put into a basin, and its upper surface covered with a slip of blotting-paper, on which is allowed to fall continuous drops of cold water from a funnel, into the neck of which has been thrust a notched cork. The supports necessary to keep the parts of this apparatus in place are not indicated, because they may be just what the operator pleases, so long as the end is served. When, however, complete refrigeration is necessary, the annexed method is preferable.

The apparatus consists of an external tin plate tube about two inches in diameter and fifteen long, to which a cork is securely fastened at each end, water-tight by means of white lead. Through both these corks is thrust a glass tube (a), and next two pieces of small glass tube are soldered on as represented, one of the pieces being terminated by a little funnel. The operation of this instrument is as follows: Cold water being poured into the funnel, continuously enters within the metal tube, and comes in contact with the heated glass one; the water becomes heated, too, and therefore lighter; hence it rises to the syphon, and runs out. The distilling apparatus may be joined at (a) by means of a short length of vulcanized India-rubber tubing, or by means of a slip of unvulcanized sheet India-rubber slightly moistened with turpentine, heated, and wound tightly round under extension.

377. Before taking leave of oxygen it will be well to indicate the enormous amount of this element existing in nature, and the important functions to which it is subservient. When prepared separate from other bodies, oxygen exists in the gaseous form, as we have seen. When combined, however, it may be solid, liquid, or gaseous. Thus nearly one-half by weight of the common substance flint is oxygen; eight-ninths by weight of water, and one-fifth by measure of the atmospheric air. In short, no less than two-thirds of the whole components of the globe, and its denizens, animal and vegetable, are made up of oxygen! And calculations have been made to prove that the amount of oxygen consumed daily in the operation of breathing, combustion, and fermentation, is no less than the enormous sum of seven millions one hundred and forty-two thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven tons!

378. Viewing the great tendency of oxygen to effect combinations, especially with metals, we cannot wonder that the latter are so frequently discovered in natural combination with it, constituting ores termed native oxides. A slight consideration, moreover, of the chemical qualities of gold and platinum will explain the reason why they are never found in combination with oxygen, but occur in an evident or metallized state. Hereafter it will be found, when we come to treat of furnace operations, that the process of smelting, or getting metals out of their ores, involves the abstraction of the oxygen with which these metals are so generally combined; not that oxygen is the only non-metallic element which enters into the constitution of ores, inasmuch as sulphur, chlorine, phosphorus, and some others take this part; but oxygen nevertheless is the most usual, and therefore most important.

Centre-Table Gossip.

CHILDREN'S PLAYTHINGS.

MANY a young mother, looking upon the waste and destruction consequent upon the holidays, is ready to vow, that when her precious ten-months-old baby arrives at toys, it shall never abuse them after this fashion. But she finds to her mortification that her paragon of a "puppet" mashes her dolls' heads, breaks up the animals to get at the squeak, lames the tin driver and his cart, and tears her favorite pictures out of the "Pleasure Book," for the sake of convenience in kissing Mother Hubbard's dog, just the same as other children do. Care does not come by nature, and order and economy must be taught to the owners of the lavish Christmas treasures, as well as to their elders and betters. Thus toys become helps to education, as well as opiates and bribes to cross babies. They may be instructed not to break them as easily as they are taught to keep their hands from their mother's cherished China and Bohemian ornaments; and, above all, they may be taught how to play with them; many a child wantonly destroys a toy because he is tired of just looking at it, and handling it, and does not see what else it is good for.

As soon as a child is old enough to play, they attach themselves the most to those that have "the most play in them." Blocks, for instance, for they can be placed in so many forms; a cart that can be trundled about and holds things; dolls that can be dressed and undressed; the delight of a little girl's heart, a tea-set; and, above all, the baby house, and the miniature store or shop, in which they can mimic the regular doings of those around them.

Paper dolls and paper furniture were a great blessing to the rising generation, and, when they are not abused, exercise ingenuity, patience, and perseverance. The last novelty in the way of cardboard toys, and, to our thinking, the best, is the "Little Builder" and "Little Engineer," published by the Appletons. The first is a complete village—church, mill, cottages, bridge, etc. all readily cut from their printed and colored flat surface, bent into shape, and secured by paper rivets, which have a corresponding slit to receive them in the walls, roofs, and towers. Nothing could be more ingenious, unless it is the "Little Engineer," in which a complete train of cars, with all their belongings, lie snugly folded. The children can make them up for themselves, and there is no end to their combinations afterwards; while at the same time, unless they practise patience and exactness, they ruin everything; and here is a valuable lesson as well as quiet amusement for stormy days.

After all, a book lasts the longest, and the cultivation of a taste for reading should be every mother's care, by reading aloud before they can read for themselves, and inciting them to be able to do this. Children love Bible stories naturally—attention and imagination are called forth; but on a weekday, do not be afraid of "Jack the Giant-Killer," "Cinderella," or "The Wonderful Lamp." They are the toys of intellect through which a higher object is gained, if the teacher is only skilful.

A TRUE FRIEND.

EVERY woman who has seen the able apology put forth by Dr. Holmes, for those indescribable ills which our sex are peculiarly heirs to, owes him a vote of thanks. If we believed in testimonials of silver tea things, we should propose that one be presented to the Professor, by the ladies of the Centre-Table, forthwith. We have ever tried to show our readers that a woman's true wisdom, with regard to her physical condition, is to avoid all that can overtax it, unless poverty forces one into the necessity of so doing. Thus we advocate the sewing machine, and every household invention that lightens a woman's work. It is wretched economy to save the wages of a servant, and spend the whole amount in a single doctor's bill; to train up fretful ungovernable children, because the mother's health has been shattered in their infancy, through a mistaken idea of duty to them. A stout-armed nurse, carefully overlooked, can attend to many physical wants of a child; but who can take a mother's place, when the mind hungers for knowledge, and the soul cries out for guidance? And now comes a wise and learned man to the rescue, with pitying, friendly words.

"An overworked woman is always a sad sight—sadder a great deal than an overworked man, because she is so much more fertile in capacities of suffering than a man. She has so many varieties of headache—sometimes as if Jael were driving the nail that killed Sisera into her temples; sometimes letting her work with half her brain, while the other half throbs as if it would go to pieces; sometimes tightening round the brows as if her cap-band were Luke's iron crown; and then her neuralgias, and her backaches, and her fits of depression, in which she thinks she is nothing, and less than nothing; and those paroxysms which men speak slightly of as hysterical—convulsions, that is all, only not commonly fatal ones; so many trials which belong to her fine and mobile structure, that she is always entitled to pity when she is placed in conditions which develop her nervous tendencies."

Read it to your husband when he tells you that "Tompkins' wife gets along with one girl; or, his mother brought up nine children without a sewing machine;" his mission is to gather wealth, but yours is to keep that which is your best capital, a healthy mind and body.

NOTES AND QUERIES.

1. "The best work on Good Behavior."—Miss Leslie's "Behavior Book" though some look at it as descending too much to trifles, is full of valuable suggestions. There is also a good volume on the subject published by Fowler & Wells. But with the best advice, many are not improved, because a true spirit of courtesy is wanting. It has been well said, "No woman can be a lady who would wound or mortify another. No matter how beautiful, how refined, how cultivated she may be, she is in reality coarse, and the innate vulgarity of her nature manifests itself here. Uniformly kind, courteous, and polite treatment of all persons is one mark of a true woman, and of a true man also."

2. Garden of Acclimation.—This institution is placed in Paris, and differs from an ordinary zoological garden in this: the object is not to form a museum of rare animals, but to acclimate to France useful animals indigenous to other countries. It is under the protection and established through the exertions of Baron Rothschild. Great pains have been bestowed upon the China silk-worm, the alpaca, the lama, the camel, the various beasts of burden of uncivilized countries, and, in fine, on the raising and domesticating of all animals of foreign climes susceptible of adaptation to the uses of civilization. Extensive experiments will also be made in the crossing not only of breeds, but of races. This new and interesting garden occupies a space of thirty acres, and is handsomely laid out in walks and drives, the animals, birds, and insects occupying each the kind of growth, location, and temperature to which they were accustomed in their native land. The affair is a joint stock company, encouraged by government. The admission is 20 sous on weekdays, and 8 sous on Sundays.

3. French Diamonds.—They are nothing more nor less than paste, in the manufacture of which the French excel. The basis of the imitations is a fine, pure, and white glass composition, called Strass, after its inventor, STRASS, of Strasburgh, who attained the object of sundry experiments by achieving perfect imitations of the "real" gems in the three particulars of hardness, specific gravity and refraction of light. Strass, the basis of the pastes, is a compound of silex, potash, borax, red-lead, and sometimes arsenic. For imitating the colored gems, various coloring ingredients are employed. Numerous establishments in Germany and France are now engaged in the manufacture of the Strass and colored pastes, each of which possesses secrets, acquired by experience, for producing these articles in the greatest perfection.

Fashions.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

HAVING had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editor of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Spring and autumn bonnets, materials for dresses, jewelry, envelops, hair-work, worsteds, children's wardrobes, mantillas, and mantelets, will be chosen with a view to economy, as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godey, Esq.

No order will be attended to unless the money is first received. Neither the Editor nor Publisher will be accountable for losses that may occur in remitting.

Instructions to be as minute as is possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice. Dress goods from Levy's or Evans & Co.'s; cloaks, mantillas, or talmas, from Brodie's, 51 Canal Street, New York; bonnets from T. White & Co.'s; jewelry from Warden's or Caldwell's, Philadelphia.

When goods are ordered, the fashions that prevail here govern the purchase; therefore, no articles will be taken back. When the goods are sent, the transaction must be considered final.

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL FASHION-PLATE FOR FEBRUARY.

Fig. 1.—Dinner-dress, also suited to a small evening party. Dress of slate-colored poult de soie, the skirt single, and ornamented by a rich Greek pattern of apophry in black velvet, edged by a narrow gold cord and extremely narrow ruche of black silk ribbon; three puffs of black satin to correspond cover the hem of the skirt. The waist is in broad fan-shaped plaits, moderately low. The scarf ceinture, or girdle, a marked feature of the winter dress, has an application of velvet, and is edged with the ribbon ruche. The sleeves are quite new, and in excellent taste. The velvet torsado which crosses the hair is relieved by lappets of the same and blossoms of the yellow jessamine, which relieve its sombre style. Pearl necklace.

Fig. 2.—Evening-dress for a very young lady. Robe of embroidered muslin, with double skirt; the lower one has five narrow flounces; the upper has a rich pattern of embroidery to correspond with the flounces. The waist and sleeves are of muslin, drawn in longitudinal puffs, with insets of embroidery. Corset cut square on the shoulders. Cicche peigne and sash of the same ribbon—a rich taffeta plaid, with a Greek fringe woven in one. Nothing could be more simple or charming for a young lady just coming out.

Fig. 3.—Dinner-dress of taffeta rose des Alps, made quite plain; its chief point being the new sleeve, which is tasteful as well as quite new. It is a modification of the Francis First; the fullness being quite at the back of the arm, and caught into puffs by bands of ribbed velvet ribbon, several shades darker than the dress, edged with narrow gimpure lace. Headdress composed of loops of ribbon (black and gold), with two full blown roses to the right, the lower one set in black blonde.

Fig. 4.—Dress of delicate brocaded silk, a single rose on a gray ground. Garibaldi coat, fitting rather closely to the figure, trimmed with folds of reps silk; buttons of the same. Bonnet of rose des Alps, in velvet; the curtain having an edge of blonde. A half wreath of grapes, to correspond with the shade of velvet, alternating with tufts of leaves, falls to the right. A single cluster of grapes crosses the forehead and forms the garniture of the blonde cap, with leaves from the wreath bending under the brim.

Fig. 5.—Bridal morning-dress, elaborate and tasteful; material a rich corded silk, maize shot with black. The waist fits neatly to the figure, with bretelles of satin ribbon plissé or fluted; the front of the skirt turns back in a gradual slope, the trimming being continued from the bretelles. The corsage is closed, and the skirt ornamented by bows of gold-colored satin ribbon. The sleeves are a graceful flowing shape, and a small, round pelerine is trimmed to correspond. Hair dressed low, with a black and gold net. Small, upright ruff of embroidered muslin; loose sleeves of the same. Underskirt of plain cambric, with ruffles finished by needle-worked points.

Child's dress.—Renfrew jacket and full skirt of ribbed cloth, a new shade of tan color; the jacket has pretty pattes of braid, and is trimmed by bias folds of silk, a contrasting shade. Black velvet cap.

THE ZOUAVE.

We vary our report for this month, and give an indoor costume instead of the pardessus to which we have hitherto confined our illustration. The season for the latter has so far advanced that no further novelties are desirable. Instead, therefore, of them, we present this graceful undress for home wear.

We need only explain that the ornamental design is wrought in gold braid upon a black cloth ground. This embroidery is much improved by a bright green silk cord, or braid, accompanying the gold, as the harmonizing effect of this color relieves the garish crudity of the metal. The sleeves are also cross-laced with cording to match, completed by tassels.

Velvets, instead of cloth, make extremely beautiful and becoming articles of this description, and any favorite color may be employed.

CHITCHAT UPON NEW YORK AND PHILADELPHIA FASHIONS, FOR FEBRUARY.

By reference to our ample fashion-plate, which has unusual fidelity to existing modes as well as unusual grace to recommend it, the new Francis the First sleeve, a prominent novelty, will be perfectly understood. The puff at the back is a pointed gore, coming into the sleeve proper just above the elbow, being set in with a slight fullness. The rich velvet and lace bands make it a desirable sleeve, for a handsome material, where a tight one is to be avoided, and something fresher than the pagoda is desired.

The original Francis First is still worn more or less, the last improvement being a band with ends or lappets fastened by a button at the bottom, that is, the under part of the sleeve. Tight sleeves are chiefly made up for walking-dresses, in heavy materials, and then are lightened by puffs and jockeys at the top, and often a deep-pointed cuff at the wrist. In flowing or pagoda sleeves there is great variety, being principally found in the arrangement of the trimming. The back seam or back part of the sleeve is frequently trimmed richly, or the flat, by which is meant the front, if it were a coat sleeve for instance. In bishop sleeves there is generally a loose cuff, allowing a small undersleeve or frill of lace, pointed and prettily trimmed. Elderly ladies find a tight cuff, pointed on top, a very comfortable fashion. The fulness at the top may be plaited and confined by buttons, or simply gathered. We have before us a bishop sleeve, with a very deep close-pointed cuff reaching half-way to the elbow, with a corresponding jockey or cap above the puff. Another good sleeve is a pagoda shape, quite short on the forearm. The flat has a trimming of two ruches, placed parallel with each other so as to inclose a plain bias of silk the width of a ribbon. The dress itself is of violet silk, the ruches are of two shades of violet ribbon, box-plaited in the middle; and at intervals, in the strip thus inclosed, are rosettes of violet-colored silk and black lace. The corsage and skirt have trimmings to correspond, the plain spaces being considerably wider, allowing treble rows of rosettes placed in diamonds. In some of the gored dresses—we mean where each separate breadth of a plain skirt is gored—one edge of each breadth is trimmed and made to lap over the next. It is a pretty style for some materials. Skirts gored in this way insure a good slope, and are generally becoming; but few people like to waste the material, and prevent all future repairs by turnings upside-down, where economy is a consideration, as we are glad to suppose it is with most of our readers.

We have just opened a pretty design for a dress of plain silk; the skirt full, the breadths gored without overlapping, and trimmed at the bottom by five narrow flounces, fluted, not plaited or gathered on, the upper part only being attached to the dress with a small heading. Between each flounce there is a space of about half an inch; the dress is of black silk, the flounces and headings being bound with white silk. The corsage is plain, and ornamented by a row of buttons, quite large, black with white centres. The sleeves are demi-wide at the lower part, and finished by turned-up cuffs or revers. These are cut with large scallops, and bordered by a narrow fluted frill of black silk edged with white. A similar frill extends up the back seam to the shoulder. The centre, or broad sash, is of black ribbon edged with white, the bow quite on one side.

One deep flounce or plissé of the same silk as the dress is also worn. If a plissé, it should be about ten inches wide, and the same distance from the bottom of the dress. If a flounce, it is about fourteen inches deep, headed by one row of wide black velvet ribbon, and several widths of narrow. A wide velvet is placed above the hem of the flounce, which is an inch deep, and corresponding rows of smaller ones.

Another skirt—the dress being violet silk—has three narrow flounces or ruffles around the bottom of the skirt, headed by a bouillonné of the same. The corsage is low, and made high for ordinary wear by a small round pelerine, coming just on the shoulder, buttoned up in front, trimmed with a puff (bouillonné) and two frills. The sleeves are demi-wide, puff at the top; at the bottom the same trimming that is on the pelerine. Black velvet waist ribbon, bow, and long ends.

Shirts having placons or a plain piece set on the front, variously ornamented, or side trimmings of lace, ruches, or passementerie, are frequently seen; also plain skirts, with putees of passementerie, mixed with jet or tassels, and most elegant of all, flat bows of guipure lace, are perhaps the favorite style of the larger part of the community the present season. The trimming on corsage, sleeve, and skirt should always correspond.

The rich armure (striped) silks, and those watered in stripes, certainly need very little decoration beyond a white silk facing to the sleeve, with the satin ruche, either white or the predominating color of the dress, placed inside. Fancy buttons are in great demand, lozenge-shaped and oval as well as round; and the flat ornaments of passementerie were never surpassed in variety and richness. The fancy for black, corded or turned up with white, which the French artistes give us in consideration of Eugénie's becoming court mourning, first for her sister, the Duchess of Alba, and then for the Empress of Russia, is a marked feature of the season in cloaks, bonnets, and, as we have seen, in dresses. We may come to like it, but the contrast is too startling for immediate use!

The Garibaldi wraps manufactured by Brodie are an improvement upon the design we give, inasmuch as the sleeves are more flowing and buttons are plentiful. It is the favorite garment of the season. The pardessus Circassini is new. It is made of the same fancy tints in ribbed cloth, dark brown being the best shade. It laps completely from left to right, from the top to the bottom, in an oblique direction, fastened by a row of buttons. The sleeves are extremely full; have three flat plaits on the shoulder, each plait having four lozenge-shaped buttons. All the edges of this garment are trimmed by a border of a new rough woolly or furry texture called Astracan de laine.

Bonnets of quilting remain in great favor. There is a novelty which we can scarcely give by description. For instance, a bonnet of dark green velvet, lined with a paler green satin; on each side the lining turns over the edge of the brim in a point, making a revers of the satin on the velvet, which is edged with very fine gold cord. The cape of velvet has the satin lining forming a pointed revers in the same way. These revers, both on the brim and curtain, are fastened by small gold buttons.

Among the best bonnets of the season, one, composed of black velvet, is trimmed with ruches and puffs of blonde, a bouquet of damask roses without leaves, and a long black ostrich feather, passing along the right side, is disposed much in the same way as on the round hats. A bonnet of black quilted silk has been trimmed with fuchsia-color velvet, white blonde, and black lace, and an agrafe of jet. We may mention another bonnet, composed of velvet of the beautiful tint of the Parma violet. This bonnet is trimmed with passementerie, tassels and ruches of blonde. There is no trimming on the curtain. Several bonnets intended for negligé costume are composed of a combination of silk and velvet. When feathers are employed in trimming bonnets destined for plain costume, they should be small and in tufts. For bonnets worn in a superior style of outdoor dress, one long feather often forms part of the trimming; frequently it is fixed on the top of the bonnet, and then passes down the side and across the top of the curtain.

Some of the prettiest morning caps we have recently seen are of a round form; they are composed of insertion and guipure, and are trimmed with a frill of guipure and bows of ribbon. Morning caps are sometimes lined with silks of different colors, as lilac, blue, etc.

I am dreaming of thee, dearest,
Still I dream of thee alone;
We shall meet again in heaven,
For the earth when thou wert near me,
Was a paradise to me,
And where'er I dream of heaven
I am dreaming still of thee.

There are hours when dreary shadows
Cast their gloom upon my heart,
When I think how well I love thee,
When I feel that we must part I
For I know there is no other
Ever can be so dear to me,
And where'er of love I'm dreaming,
I am dreaming still of thee.

When the stars are softly smiling
Through the lone and silent night,
Then I think of thee and Heaven,
With a holy, calm delight;
For thy spirit is so radiant
In its love and purity,
That where'er I dream of angels
I am dreaming still of thee!

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH, 1861.

THE STEAM-ENGINE FAMILIARLY EXPLAINED.

WHEN you see the tea-kettle steaming away upon the fire, we dare say you have never thought much about it, except that you have rejoiced to hear Black Sukey sing so loudly, and warning you that tea is ready. But you will be astonished to hear that the tea-kettle can show you the first principle of the steam-engine. What is it that puffs out of the spout, and round the cover? Steam, you will answer, and perhaps laugh at the question, because "every one knows that." Well, you are right; it is what is usually called steam: but we must tell you that it is not really steam, it is vapor. It was steam till it entered the air, and then it became vapor, or water divided into a very great number of small particles or drops. You can prove this by holding a cloth in it, for it will wet the cloth; or if you hold a cold plate in it, you will soon see that it becomes covered with drops of water. This is the first thing that you have to learn about steam. Water heated till it boils is turned into steam; when the steam comes in contact with the cold air it becomes vapor; but if it is exposed to something still colder, it becomes water again. You must remember this, or you will not understand what we are now going to tell you.

Water, then, must boil in order to be converted into steam; till then it sends out a very little vapor, but not enough to diminish the quantity of water to any perceptible degree; but as soon as ever the heat is so great that a thermometer held in it rises to 212° it is said to boil, and from that moment it begins to pass off into steam; and if the kettle is kept on the fire, all the water will pass off in this manner, or "boil away," as it is usually called. But we must now tell you, that when water is in the form of steam it expands, as it is termed; that is, it takes up a great deal more room than it did before. We could tell you exactly how much it expands, if we thought you could understand; but as we wish to make this lecture as easy as possible, we will not puzzle you with this at present. Now, you will see why the lid of the kettle appears to want to come off when the water is boiling, and keeps rising and shaking whilst the steam puffs out round it. It is because the kettle cannot hold all the steam that is created within it; the steam, therefore, escapes as fast as it can, and lifts the lid to get out into the air. Now, can you guess what would happen if we were to stop up the spout and fasten down the lid, still keeping the kettle on the fire? We will tell you. The steam inside would go on increasing, and press harder and harder against the sides and top of the kettle till they burst. This will give you some idea of the great power of steam, when it is confined in a close vessel, and cannot escape. In this way even the thickest iron vessels could be blown to pieces; and one of those clever men, who first thought of making use of this great power of steam, used to fill pieces of cannon with water, and then stopping up the end and the touch-hole, burst them by putting them on the fire. This would be very foolish now, and you need not try any experiments of the kind, as it would be very dangerous; but the man I have told you of wished to see how much power could be obtained by steam, that he might contrive to turn it into some use; and, therefore, his experiments were so far from being foolish that he deserves our gratitude for going into all this danger for the good of others. The name of this individual to whom we are so much indebted was Papin, and we will now see how this great power of steam, which he discovered, is made use of. In the diagram, Fig. 1, is represented a boiler of simple construction, made of plates of iron or copper, riveted very strongly together. It is a large vessel fixed in brickwork, with a furnace underneath; and, first of all, we will suppose it to have a cover fitting tightly into the hole at the top. We have put letters on the different parts, that you may understand us better. A B is the boiler, C is the brickwork, D the fireplace. E the ash-pit below. Now, if we take off the cover, we can pour water into this boiler at the top, and half fill it. The lines at B show you how the water would appear if you could see into the boiler; then, by means of the fire, we can convert this water into steam, so as to fill the space above, marked A; and if we put on the cover, the steam will soon increase, and press with great force on the inside of the boiler. We will now remove the cover, and put a tube in its place, with a cork pushed into it nearly to the bottom, but not very tightly fitted to it. This we must fix into the top of the boiler, so that the steam cannot escape round it; thus A is the top of the boiler full of steam, B is the tube, and c the cork, Fig. 2.

Fig. 2.

The steam, you see, cannot escape, unless it can, by pressing against the cork, push it out of the tube; but, as we have not made it fit too tightly, it will very soon be pushed up in the tube, and allow the steam more room. But supposing we were suddenly to put out the fire when the cork was nearly pushed to the top of the tube, and pour cold water upon the apparatus, the steam would be cooled, and it would become water again, and require no more room than it did at first; and thus it would cease to press against the cork. Now I dare say you would suppose that the cork would remain where it had been pushed to, but it would not; it would immediately sink down to the bottom of the tube, exactly where it had been placed in the first instance.

We will explain to you. Fig. 3 represents our apparatus as it was at first, before the water was converted into steam by the heat of the fire. You see that there is a space between the surface of the water and the bottom of the cork; this space is filled with air, and there is room enough for the air and nothing else. To make it easier, we will not puzzle you with telling you of the expansion this air undergoes, when it is heated, but you may suppose it to remain exactly the same in quantity and size, throughout our experiment. When steam rises from the boiler, it makes room for itself as well as the air, by raising the cork to the top of the cylinder; but having now again got rid of the steam, while the cork is in that position, you will at once see by referring to Fig. 4, that there is a space between the air and the cork quite unoccupied, and, therefore, the air outside the cylinder will press upon the cork, which is unsupported, and force it back to the same position which it occupied at first. You will be able to understand this, by referring to the diagrams. We have assumed here that the air always occupies the same space, because it made this part of our lecture easier. We will still quite full. The air left has expanded, and its particles grown larger and thinner. Thus you see that heat expands water by converting it into steam, and it expands air by increasing the size of its particles; and you also see that if some of the air in a vessel is removed, the remainder will immediately expand to fill up the space. When, therefore, the cork is at the top of the tube, as in Fig. 4, there is not really a vacant place between the air and water, as we at first supposed, because the air in the top of the boiler will expand to fill it (for you will observe that it is just the same as if we had filled the boiler and tube with air, and then taken away that which was between B and C).

Fig. 3.

Now some of you say that if there is air in the whole space below the cork, it will not return to the bottom of the tube, as we said at first; but it will, for the air above it is thicker and heavier than that which is now below it, and, therefore, presses upon it with greater force; but it will not push it down lower than it was at first, because when it has arrived there the air above and below it will be exactly equal in thickness, or density, as it is called, and so the cork, being pressed upwards and downwards with equal force, will now remain at rest, and the apparatus will be in all respects in the same state as it was when we began.

And now we have done with what we are afraid some of our young friends have thought "a dry beginning;" but there is an old saying and a true one, that "you must walk before you can run;" and if we had left out all this introductory part you could not have understood the rest. Hoping you have attended closely to what we have been telling you, we will go on now to show you how the principles you have learned are applied; in fact, we are going to show you how the first steam engine was made. Here is a picture of it in its simplest form, and it was used to pump water. The name of its inventor was Thomas Newcomen, either an ironmonger or a blacksmith, who lived at Dartmouth, in Devonshire.

A is a tube bored very smooth on the inside, and fitted into the top of the boiler (B), as in our last experiment. We will, however, now begin to call it by another name; it is termed the cylinder of the engine. Its lower end is made smaller, and has a stopcock inserted in it. You do not, perhaps, know exactly how a stopcock is made, although you often see them used in water or beer barrels. The diagram represents one taken apart, and put together. You see that it consists of two parts. A is a plug of wood or metal with a hole cut through represents a box or vessel filled with air; the particles of air are represented by the globes drawn in it. There are, you see, a great many of these little globes or globules, and they are all small, and together fill the vessel. Now look at Fig. 6; it represents the same box after we have taken away some of the air. There are now fewer of these globules, because we have removed some of them, yet the box is it; this fits into a tube (B); and, though made to fit it very closely, can be turned round by its cross handle. When, therefore, it is turned so that its hole is in the same direction as the hollow tube, anything may be passed through it, as steam, water, or air; but when the plug is turned so that the hole is against the side of the tube, the tube will be stopped, and nothing can pass through it. One of these stopcocks, then, is placed at the bottom of the cylinder, so that by turning it we can allow the steam to pass through it from the boiler into the cylinder, or prevent it from doing so. In this cylinder is placed what is called a piston, which is, in fact, very like the cork we placed in the tube in our first apparatus, and it will move up and down in the tube just as the cork did. It is not, however, really a cork, but a round piece of metal, made to fit the cylinder by having tow wound round its edge, exactly like the piston that you have seen in a syringe or common squirt. To this is attached a metal rod (E) called the piston-rod. F is a beam turning upon a fixed centre, like the beam of a pair of scales. The ends, you will perceive, have an arched piece attached, to the highest point of which a chain is attached, made like the chain in the inside of a watch. To one of these chains the piston-rod is attached, and to the other the pump-rod.

Fig. 6.

Thus you perceive that if we can contrive to work one end of the beam up and down, the other will also move, but in the contrary direction. We will, therefore, show you how the end to which the piston-rod is attached is alternately moved in this way, by which movement the pump (G) is worked, and the water pumped out of the well (H). The boiler is half filled with water, as before, and the cock (S) is closed till the steam raised by the fire (C) presses with some force against the top and sides of the boiler. The tap (S) is then turned, and the piston, which was at the bottom of the cylinder, is raised by the steam below it. This will not push up the end of the beam to which the piston-rod is attached, the latter being only united to it by the chain; but the other end of the beam being weighted so as to be the heaviest, will now preponderate, and the pump-rod will be lowered. The piston being now near the top of the cylinder, the steam cock is shut and the cold water cock (T) opened; the cold water from the cistern (L) will now spirt into the cylinder, and turn the steam into water again, or, as it is termed, condense it; and this water will pass off by the pipe (K) into the well (H), or elsewhere. The cock (T) is then stopped, and, there being now no steam or air below the piston, it will descend with great force, being pressed down by the air above it. This alternate opening and shutting of the cocks (S and T) will, therefore, be all that is needed to keep the engine at work. The greatest force being required in the downward stroke of the piston (because the power is needed to raise the pump-rod and bucket), and this being effected by the pressure of the atmosphere acting on the piston whilst there is a vacuum below it, this kind is called an atmospheric engine. That the quantity of water and steam in the boiler may be known at pleasure, there are two short pipes (M and N) inserted in it, the end of one just dipping into the water, the other a little above it; thus, if steam issues from both, on turning the taps, there is too little water, and if water flows from both, there is too much; but if steam issues from the upper one and water from the lower, the water is at the proper level.

Now we have got our engine to work, so far as pumping water is concerned; but we hear you remark that this is a very clumsy and unsightly machine, working slowly and unevenly, and not at all like the pretty engines you have seen, looking so clean and bright, in a jacket of green paint, with bright steel glittering here and there. But look at this egg. How unlike the beautiful green and gold kingfisher sporting in the stream! Yet the principle of the future bird is there, and by slow degrees the bird will spring from it; but it will be long ere the brightest feathers deck its form. So with our engine; it is but the bird newly hatched; it has neither arrived at its full strength or symmetry, and requires yet a great many improvements. First, it requires to be very closely watched, for it cannot make a single stroke until the cock-boy has done his office of admitting steam and cold water alternately. The first improvement was to make the engine do this work for itself. A boy was the inventor of this new movement—an idle boy, named Humphrey Potter; for, wishing to go and play, he tied the levers of the cocks to the beam and to each other, and thus made the beam, in its alternate motion, open and shut them. This was afterwards improved in various ways; but the greatest improvement was the removal of the stopcocks and levers, and the introduction of slide valves. Before this was introduced, however, the engine was very much altered; the cold water was no longer admitted to the cylinder, but the condensation was carried on in a separate vessel, by which the cylinder was kept hot. This was a great point gained, for when the steam in the old engine was first admitted to drive up the piston, part of it was condensed by the cold cylinder, and this condensation continued till the cylinder was heated to the temperature of the steam, and then only the piston began to ascend. This was the invention of James Watt, to whom all the other improvements we shall mention are also due. You have observed that as yet the power of the up and down stroke in the atmospheric engine is very different; and, although this was of little consequence in pumping water, it would be a serious drawback in the application of steam-power to driving machinery. Watt, therefore, proposed to use the force of steam both in the up and down stroke, and in turn condensed the steam from each end of the cylinder. For this purpose he fitted a cover to the cylinder through which the piston moved, air and steam tight. The mechanism by which the steam was alternately admitted above and below the piston was at first rather complicated, but it is now very simple, and we will therefore explain it to you. C is the cylinder with its cover (A), through which the piston-rod works, steam tight; the openings for the steam are at the side, and are marked o; these are connected with a cylinder or tube (b) closed in the same manner as the large cylinder; in this another tube (d) works up and down, steam tight at the parts d' d', but leaving a space round it between these points. The rod (e) is worked up and down by the engine, and by it the tube is made to occupy one of the three positions of which it is capable. If you look at the diagram, you will easily understand this, although we have only drawn it in the position it occupies when the piston is at the bottom of the cylinder. Steam being admitted from the boiler by the pipe (S), will flow round the inner tube, and enter the cylinder in the direction of the arrows, and thus raise the piston; at the same time the air or steam above the piston will pass down this inner tube (d) into the condenser, by means of the pipe (T) leading to it. Now, suppose the piston arrived at the top of the cylinder, the tube is drawn up till the steam-tight parts are respectively above the parts o o (you can draw it in this new position for yourselves); then you will see that the steam can enter at the top of the cylinder, and force the piston down again, whilst the steam below is free to pass to the condenser by T, as before. When the tube is in the third position, the steam-tight parts will cover both the openings o o, and, the steam being thus prevented from entering the cylinder, the engine will be at rest. We must now tell you what the condenser is. It is merely a vessel of cold water, into which the waste steam is admitted, but this water would soon become hot, and condense no longer; there is, therefore, a pump attached to it, and worked by the engine, which draws off the water by degrees, whilst cold water is continually admitted to supply its place. There is, however, a plan by which this warm water is prevented from being wasted, and it is this: the pump which draws it off has a pipe attached to it, leading to the boiler, and just in proportion as the water in the latter is evaporated, a fresh supply of this heated water from the condenser is thrown into it, and thus the water in the boiler is not cooled, as it would be if the injected water were cold. The various other additions made to the steam engine from time to time are too numerous to be specified in this brief lecture. Their objects have chiefly been to economize fuel, equalize the working of the engine, and to secure greater power combined with greater safety. One or two of the contrivances, however, we must describe, as they are of great importance, and the engine would be very incomplete without them. The safety-valve we will explain first. An opening being made in the top of the boiler, a plug or valve is fitted to it; this plug is loaded with any weight we please; if, therefore, the pressure of the steam below the plug is so great as to overcome the pressure of these weights, the valve will be raised, and the steam will be able to escape; thus all risk of bursting the boiler is avoided.

There is but one thing to be mentioned, and that is the way in which motion is communicated to the fly-wheel, and thence to machinery. We can explain this without a diagram. You have, we dare say, often watched a knife-grinder, and perhaps examined his grinding apparatus. You observe that he puts his foot upon a treadle, from which a strap passes to a crooked part of the axis of the fly-wheel; this part is called a crank. Now there is just such a crank upon the axis of the fly-wheel of a steam engine. If, then, you imagine a rod or strap to proceed from one end of the beam to this crank, you will at once see that it will revolve as the beam goes up and down; in fact, the beam and rod only supply the place of the knife-grinder's treadle and strap. This fly-wheel is of great use; it is, as it were, a reservoir of work, for it soon attains a steady, equal motion; and if it should happen that at certain times there is less work to be done, the extra power of the engine is accumulated in, and taken up by, the fly-wheel; and the momentum it acquires also prevents the engine from stopping suddenly, and it is thus calculated to give a uniform motion to the machinery connected with it.

HOW A WOMAN LOVES!

BY MARY MAITLAND.

"You will accompany me home?" said a young man to his companion, as he threw himself wearily upon a sofa.

"No!"

The answer was in a low tone, but it was firm and decided, and the speaker showed in the troubled lines of his face, how much the pronunciation of the little word had cost him.

"No?"

Harry Grey, the first speaker, repeating the answer in a tone of profound astonishment, sat up again, and looked doubtfully at his friend.

"No? Nonsense! I will not take that for answer. You must come home with me."

"Do not urge me. I cannot tell you how much it pains me to refuse your invitation, but I cannot—I ought not to go with you."

"Why not? My mother and Kate write the most urgent invitations both in their own name and my father's, and I have set my heart upon having you at Danton this summer. You will come?" and Harry, in the urgency of his entreaty, took both the hands of his companion in his own, and looked up into his face: "You will come? Do I not owe my life to you? In that fearful steamboat accident, when stunned and wounded I was sinking a helpless, bleeding form, did not your arm rescue me, and once ashore, have you not nursed me, tended me, fed and clothed me until this day? and now, when my parents and sister long to see and bless my preserver, you coldly deny their prayer."

"My friend," and Dr. Hill looked lovingly down upon the handsome face raised to his, "I did my duty—no more. I saw you lived, though wounded, and I drew you ashore, for I was there to save all I could. When I had once saved you, was it not natural to bring you here to my house, and, finding you had lost all in the burning boat, to lend you from my own wardrobe what you required? Your kind heart exaggerates my service."

"I owe you my life."

"Well, well, so let it be. I thank God for permitting me to so expiate——"

He stopped, and with a shudder, gently put the young man from him.

"You will go with me?"

"Harry, do not urge me. I—I cannot tell you why I refuse, but if I did, you would take away your hands from mine, and look upon me with abhorrence. You would say with me, 'Never shall this man come into my peaceful home.' I cannot—I cannot go where there are tender, loving women, and noble men! I have loved you as I never thought to love any one again, and your affection is very grateful to my heart, but were I to tell you all, to make you shrink from me with hatred——"

"Never! I hate you? I, who have seen how good, how noble you are? Do not tell me your secret, but come home with me. Sorrow you may have known, sin—I am sure you do not mean that your own sin would make me hate you?"

"No, not that! My hand and heart are free from any heavy crime as your own. We are all sinful, but I—oh, why will you urge me thus?"

"Because I will have my petition granted. You shall never tell me this secret which I have seen is wearing out your life, but I implore you to come home with me. My mother, whose invalid condition keeps her confined almost entirely at home, writes with her trembling hand the letter urging you to come."

The doctor paced the room as his friend spoke, struggling with strong emotion. Suddenly he stopped.

"Do you know," he said, almost fiercely, "how you are tempting me? Do you know that for ten years I have crossed no threshold save where crime, poverty, and disease called for relief, and I could make my knowledge and purse useful? That for ten years no man's hand save your own, has clasped mine; no man's voice called me friend? Do you know how I hunger and thirst for one hour spent in a home? That the prospect you hold out is like bread to a starving man? Do you know that I was hunted from my native town like a wild beast, and should I return there to-morrow, I should be mobbed and hooted? This is all true! Now do you ask me to go home with you?"

"Look in my face," said Harry. "So, full in my eyes! now, by the love between us answer me! Were you responsible for this crime which drove you away from home. Is the sin on your head?"

"No; but——"

"Stay, I ask no more! I only repeat again, more warmly, more urgently than before, my petition. You will go home with me?"

"Yes, I will go. But remember, if you ever repent my coming, you have been warned." And as he spoke the doctor left the room.

The next day found them on their journey from S—, a small town in Indiana, to Danton, Harry Grey's home.

Egbert Hill, the physician who had saved Harry's life, was a man between thirty and forty years of age, and the most romantic school-girl would never have called him handsome. Tall and powerfully built, his face was one which showed strength of will, iron resolution, and high intellect in the broad forehead and large black eyes, while the mouth in its delicate outline and sensitive motions showed as plainly the tender loving heart in this strong frame. Every emotion was shown in that flexible mouth. The brow might frown, the eyes flash, the large features be set with feigned anger, but the quivering mouth and trembling lip betrayed the gentle pity with which every tale of sorrow, however clouded with crime, fell on that noble heart. Over all, the white forehead and large eyes, there dwelt ever the cloud of a heavy sorrow, a deep sadness that even Harry's voice was powerless to remove. No smile ever came on that beautiful mouth, no light joyousness ever came to the strong, hard features. And as his face portrayed it, so was the doctor's heart.

Speeding on before the travellers, let me show the reader the home to which they were bending their way, and the family waiting to receive them.

It was a large, handsome house, yet the trees about it grew so thick and high that it was hidden away from every point but one, where a long avenue of elms led up to the front door, and on the broad piazza, seen through this vista, the family were assembled, awaiting the travellers.

Mr. Grey, a short, fat, comfortable-looking, elderly gentleman, sat by his wife, whose small, slight figure was enveloped in a shawl on that warm June afternoon, and whose pale, delicate face told of some severe bodily suffering, while her soft dark eyes and cheerful expression spoke as plainly of the mental peace and patience. Last of the group, Kate, the only daughter, stood leaning against one of the tall pillars, looking down the avenue.

Of medium stature, Kate Grey's figure was just full enough in its outlines to escape the charge of thinness, but the graceful shoulders, the slender throat and white arms, gave promise of a splendid development when years should have added maturity to her charms. She was very young, only eighteen, and from her earliest childhood had never known one sorrow. There was a bright joyousness in her large blue eyes, in the pretty smiling mouth, and the quick, graceful movements of her slender figure. It rang out in the sweet, silvery tones of her voice, and sent back its echoes in her merry, rippling laugh. Her exquisite features were like her mother's, but no impress of pain marred their pure outlines. Life had been to her one long sunny day, and none of the depths of her character had been called forth by the searching hand of tribulation.

"They are coming! I hear wheels, and see, there is the carriage at the end of the avenue. How fast Harry drives! Here they are!"

Truly enough, there they were. Harry sprang out first, and tossing the reins to the lad who jumped down from the seat behind the open carriage, turned to assist his friend. The doctor stood beside him in an instant, and then the young man went to receive his parents' welcome. It was a hushed moment, for he was like the dead come to life again, and after a long, fervent embrace, the mother turned to the doctor. She took his large, strong hands with her thin, wasted ones, and looked up into his face. He was looking down upon her; the large black eyes were soft and tender at that instant as her own, and his lip quivered with emotion. There was a long, silent gaze, and then Mrs. Grey drew him down gently, till he dropped on one knee, and his face was level with her own. She put her lips to his forehead and kissed him with a loving pressure, but no word could she speak. The doctor received the embrace without any of the reluctance he had shown to entering into her home. His own noble heart read truly the deep, speechless gratitude that kiss betokened.

When he rose, the father poured forth his warm words of thanks and welcome. Then Kate's turn came. Until that moment the doctor had not seen her. Now, as she came to him, her lovely face lit with a glow of tender feeling, he started at her innocent, childlike beauty of face and expression.

"Let me too thank you," she said, holding out her hands, "for restoring my brother, and speak my gratitude to you, who have made this a home of thanksgiving instead of mourning. God will bless you for the deed, Dr. Hill."

To her surprise the doctor only bowed gravely in answer to her words, and seemed not to see her outstretched hands. Piqued, she turned again to her brother, who had a thousand questions to ask of the changes which had occurred in his absence of nearly a year.

Evening fell while the group sat on the porch, and the summons to tea first broke upon their converse. The bright lights in the dining-room showed Harry that the habitual gloom on his friend's face was deepened instead of dispelled, as he had hoped it would be by his intercourse with the family. The conversation between Mr. Grey and his guest was on the current topics of the day, politics, European news, the new literature, and the state of crops, and Harry was surprised to find that his recluse friend's information was up to the latest dates.

The drawing-rooms were in subdued light when they entered them after tea, and Mr. Grey's practical suggestion that to leave them so would keep out the mosquitos, prevented Harry from raising the wicks of the astral lamps. They fell into couples—Harry and his mother, Mr. Grey and the doctor; and Kate was alone. She went for a few moments out on the porch, and then, seeing all engrossed in conversation, she went softly in again.

Mr. Grey had fallen asleep, and the doctor sat silent, his head leaning against the wall. Harry was telling his mother of the doctor's untiring devotion to him in his illness, after the accident which threw them together, and the mother's eyes were fixed on the tall figure dimly visible in the shadowy light.

On the silence, broken only by the low murmur of Harry's voice, there came low, trembling notes of music. At first, soft, hardly sounding, but swelling gradually into a sweet melody, not sad, but so full of sweetness and power that the heart of the hearer almost ached in listening. Harry ceased talking, and the music rose higher as Kate became interested, lost in the ravishing sounds her own fingers drew from the grand piano. The half light and the silence lent a quieting influence to the girl's light, gay heart, and after a sweet symphony, she began to sing in a clear, rich voice, that beautiful song—

"Be kind to the loved ones at home."

The last line had scarcely left her lips, when she was startled by a deep, heavy sigh, almost a sob, at her side. She turned to see Dr. Hill.

"Pardon me," he said, quietly, "if I have startled you. Your music drew me here with as irresistible power as a magnet attracts a needle."

"You are fond of music?"

"Passionately! Years ago I cultivated the little talent I had for it; but for ten years I have neither heard music nor tried to bring it out from my piano."

"How could you give it up?"

"I gave it up at a time when all pleasure went from my life, and I became the sad— Well, well, we will talk of other things. What right have I to cloud so bright a heart as yours with my sorrowful thoughts?"

There was something in the rich tones of Doctor Hill's voice which moved Kate strangely.

"Shall I play for you again?" she asked.

"Will you? I cannot tell you how gladly I will listen!"

Two hours passed away, and the piano gave forth sweet sounds under those white taper fingers, while still, motionless as some tall statue, the doctor listened. Then Kate rose; and, after waiting for the doctor to speak, and finding he did not, she went to the sofa where her mother lay.

For a few moments there was total silence in the room, and then again music filled it; not sweet, cheerful melodies, such as Kate had brought forth from the keys; there was a strong, heavy chord, followed by a succession of other chords which pealed forth strongly, as if some gust of passion prompted the player; then came wailing passages, stirring the heart with an aching sadness. The doctor seemed pouring out some hidden agony in this wondrous music. It was an impromptu Miserere, to listen to which it was almost maddening, such power had the strong wails over the heart. Two soft, white hands fell upon the doctor's.

"O stop!" said Kate. And her voice betrayed that she was weeping. "I feel, as you play, as if some heavy grief were hanging over me."

"Heaven forbid!" said the doctor, earnestly. "I will play no more. It is the first time for ten years that my fingers have touched the keys, and I forgot that I might wound those around me. Will you forgive me, my child?"

"Nay, you take me too seriously," said Kate, whose tears were already dried. "Come to mother. She was hoping you would join our group."

It were too long a tale to tell thus minutely the course of events in the month Dr. Hill spent at Danton. As in his own home, he sought out there the poor and sick. Hardly a day passed that Kate did not hear of some generous gift, some weary night-watch in a poor hovel, some long walk to assuage suffering, performed by their guest. She marked the tender, gentle, pitying respect he showed her invalid mother; noted the high intellect his conversation betrayed, and she learned to listen for his voice and step; to feel with keen delight the grasp of his hand, and miss him languishingly in his frequent absences. Had she tried to define her own feelings, she would have failed to give them their right name. She only felt that he was noble, good, far, far above her, and that her brother's friend was always in her thoughts.

It was just one month after the doctor's arrival at Danton, when Kate, sitting in the shadow of the window curtain in the parlor, heard him come in with her brother. It was twilight, and the gentlemen did not perceive that the parlor was occupied. Harry spoke first.

"But why? Why must you leave us?"

Leave them! Kate felt a cold, sickening chill pass over her, and then for the first time the girl knew herself how she loved, almost worshipped, this man.

"I will tell you. I never thought to tell my story to a living being, but I will tell you." The doctor's voice was stern in its evident struggle against violent emotion. "Harry, I love your sister! For the first time in my life I have felt how a strong man loves. Do you smile at the idea of a sorrow, crime-stricken man loving that bright woman?—nay, child, for she is a child in her pure, fresh youth and gentleness."

"But, Egbert, my friend, why do you not tell her you love her?"

"I! I! Bind that life to mine! Cloud her sunny spirit by making her my wife! Never! Stop! do not interrupt me! I will tell you why I must tear this love from my heart; leave this happy home to return to my lonely life at S—. I will begin at the first year of my life:—

"When I was only four years old, I was sent from my own home, in the South, to Philadelphia, to my aunt's care. I did not know for many years why my mother thus banished her only child, but I found it out at last. For twenty-one years I never went home. I was educated, passed through college, studied medicine, graduated, and began to practise in Philadelphia, but I was not recalled to the South. Every summer my mother paid my aunt a short visit, and sometimes my father accompanied her; but, although she evidently loved me fondly, she resolutely resisted my entreaties to be allowed to return home. Ten years ago, in my twenty-fifth year, the summons came at last. My mother was very ill; dying, the letter said, and she sent for her child to say farewell. I had been home but a few days when I knew why my mother had banished me for so long a time; my father was a gambler, and—oh, this is hard for a son to say—a drunkard, as well. Still, in his worst moods—and they were neither few nor seldom—he was always kind to my frail, suffering mother. One evening”—the doctor shook from head to foot, like a man in an ague fit, as he continued —“one evening I went with my father to the gambling house he haunted; I went because my mother hoped I would restrain his insane passion for play, and I shared the hope. I cannot dwell on the events that followed. One of the men present charged my father with false play; high words led to blows, and—and there was murder done. He, my father, killed his opponent; struck him with a knife. We were both arrested, my father and I. I was acquitted, for there were witnesses to prove I struck no blow; but my father was condemned, and executed for murder. My mother died whilst we were in prison. I stayed with my father until the last, and then I was driven from the town. But one man there believed in my entire innocence, and that was my father's lawyer. To him alone I wrote after I left the town, telling him my assumed name; and when my aunt died, leaving me a handsome fortune, he arranged my legacy so that I received it. You should have listened to me when I refused to come here. But, Harry, do not utterly hate me.”

Before Harry had time to speak, a figure glided between him and the doctor, and Kate spoke.

“Egbert!” Two soft hands drew the doctor's head down on Kate's bosom, and she pressed her lips to his forehead.

“Kate, do you know—”

“Yes, I have heard all!”

“And you caress me—a murderer's son!”

“Hush! Let it be my task to console you for your sorrow; to atone for men's injustice; to love you! Egbert, to love you as you love me!”

Harry stole away.

It was hard to overcome Mr. Gray's opposition when he knew who it was that wooed his bright child; but Kate's love conquered all.

The heavy cloud passed from the doctor's face, and there shone forth clearly the noble heart that so earnestly wrought good works to atone for a father's sin. Kate's life had its sorrows, as all lives have in maturity; but to her husband, she turned ever, in her own troubles and in his, proving year after year how nobly, how truly a woman loves.

THERE IS SOMETHING STILL TO CHEER US.

BY W. G. MILLS.

By the pebbly shore, on the sterile rock,

Where the waves give no repose,

The velvet moss on its tender stock

In its delicate softness grows:

To cheer the wanderer in pensive mood

That sees no beauty around,

That lets his lonely thoughts intrude,

And deems not a friend can be found.

The mistletoe thrives in a lonely place

When winter his claims has laid,

And grasps the branch with a warm embrace,

Though withered and leafless made;

It tells us a tale to cheer the heart,

'And brighten our gloomiest lot:

That winter and age can beauty impart,

And there's life where we thought it not.

The ivy clings to the mouldering wall

That its friendly form receives,

And covers the ruin from us all

With its garb of verdant leaves;

Thus should we hide from the envious eye

The faults in our nature found;

And our neighbor's follies that open lie

Through the mantle of love around.

The lofty pine and the cedar, too,

As evergreens appear;

Fadeless and fresh they continue through

The mutations of the year;

And so in the changes that mark our way,

Through wealth and adversity,

Though sunshine or storm make out our day,

We should cheerful and changeless be.

Yes! as on the bleak and sterile rock

The delicate velvet-moss springs;

As the mistletoe thrives on the withered oak,

On the ruin the ivy clings;

As in the keen blasts of winter's breath,

'Mid the storms of hail and snow,

The pine and the cedar know no death,

But luxuriantly grow.

So, Heaven be praised! in our human lot,

Whatever our trials may be,

There still is some green and fertile spot,

Something grateful to feel and see:

Which in coldest hours its tendrils entwines—

The vigor of life to impart—

Round the broken arches and crumbling shrines

Of the desolate fanes of the heart.

CHAPTER VII.

SABBATH IN THE COUNTRY.

The heaven, the air, the earth, and boundless sea
Make but one temple for the Deity.—WALLER.

NINE o'clock the following morning found Mr. Ellis and his family starting on their Sabbath day's journey. It was an extremely warm September day, but the breeze from the river whose shining waters were visible through the trees, and the shaded path which they travelled, prevented them from feeling the heat very sensibly. They went at a moderate pace, befitting the holiness of the day, but, as the horses could not go abreast, there was no opportunity for conversation. The path was a crooked one, and every turn brought to their view others travelling the same narrow road; and as Edith watched them "on their winding way," she thought, if they were spending the time in serious meditation, their minds must be well prepared to enter upon the worship of God in spirit and in truth.

The air was filled with the song of birds, and their notes had never seemed to her so prolonged or so melodious, and as she listened to the sweet music, it conveyed to her mind the meaning of "linked sweetness long drawn out." She was one eminently calculated to enjoy such sights and sounds as greeted her eye and ear; for everything in Nature had a charm for her. From the tiny, half-hidden spring flower, to the majestic plants and towering trees; the timid, feeble sparrow flying low to the earth, and the bold eagle skimming the blue ether; the rocks, over which dash the roaring cataracts, and the smooth pebble, washed by the rippling stream; each read to her its own peculiar lesson, and this quiet Sabbath morning, as she rode slowly through those grand old woods, drinking in the music of birds and perfume of flowers, her heart went up to the God of Nature, and she worshipped him in that temple not made with hands, with a more appreciative sense of his might, majesty, and power than ever she had experienced while kneeling in the little chapel at home; and she wondered that any person endowed with sight and hearing could disbelieve in "God the Father Almighty."

The meeting-house was "set on a hill" in the woods, and was a rude building, with a door at each end, but without windows; there was an open space in front, and a few steps on, a temporary shelter had been erected for the accommodation of unusually large congregations in hot weather. As they approached it, Edith thought the whole place had more the appearance of a gypsy-camp than a place of worship. Horses were standing under the trees, and on the branches above them were hung different colored saddle-blankets and riding-skirts, and on the grass lolled negro men and women, dressed in gay holiday attire, and little black children, with their heads tied up in yellow bandannas, scampered about almost under the horses' feet.

Farties were approaching from every direction, and at each fresh arrival, servants recognizing their master's family, jumped from the grass and stationed themselves at the horses' heads, while gentlemen stepped from the group assembled at the door, and assisted the ladies to dismount.

Uncle Sigh, Uncle Peter, and Josh took hold of the bridles when the horses halted, and Nellie and Oak stood ready to take the riding-skirts. A gentleman standing a little apart from the group before the meeting-house wheeled suddenly and started towards our party, and before he reached them Edith recognized Mr. Irving. "What a nuisance!" she involuntarily exclaimed. Mr. Ellis caught the expression, and speaking quickly to Uncle Sigh, said, "Take Miss Mary off so that I can dismount;" but before that could be accomplished, Mr. Irving had hold of Edith's hand, and was dragging her from the saddle in the most awkward manner. There was no block to step on, and as she attempted to spring to the ground, her foot caught in her skirt, and she fell forward, and was clasped in Mr. Irving's long, thin arms; before she could recover her balance, he released her suddenly, and started back, and she fell headlong to the ground. Her feet were so entangled in her skirt that it was with difficulty she arose, even with Mr. Ellis's assistance, and then he was obliged to support her while Nellie pulled her skirt from under her feet. She could have cried with vexation, and the hot blood mounted to her face as she saw the author of the mischief walk rapidly towards the meeting-house, as if he expected chastisement if he lingered. She did not wonder at his abrupt departure, when, glancing at Mr. Ellis's face, she saw the angry flush on his brow, and the indignant flash of his eye as it followed the retreating figure of the discomfited merchant. It was no longer the calm, deliberate gentleman, with gentle, winning manners, who stood before her, but the impulsive passionate man; and as he almost hissed out "Dolt! blockhead! idiot!" she thought he displayed rather more anger than the occasion warranted, since Mr. Irving's intentions had been kind; her own resentment subsided, and she said in a pleasant tone—

"It was mostly my own fault, Mr. Ellis; you know I am not accustomed to such long skirts."

"Nor such long arms either, I imagine!" he replied, his eyes still flashing. Her face became scarlet, and noticing it, he added, quickly, "But I have not inquired if you are hurt?"

"I believe I have sustained no injury," said she, brushing some dirt from her sleeve. The words were scarcely out of her mouth before she uttered an exclamation, as if attacked by sudden pain.

"What's the matter, Miss Edith?" said Mary.

"A pain in my ankle," said she, limping, as she attempted to walk; "I must have turned it; but it's nothing of consequence, I guess;" and dropping her veil, she signified that she was ready to proceed to the church.

"You are sure it is not sprained?" said Mr. Ellis, with extreme solicitude.

"O no; the pain has gone already," she returned, smiling; and they walked on, but the compression of her lips, every time she stepped with the right foot, told that she was suffering, though she would not acknowledge that it was anything but "slight, very slight pain."

The room was filled, and services had commenced when they entered. Edith and the two girls sat down near the door, and Mr. Ellis crossed the room, and seated himself opposite to them. Benches were arranged in rows on either side of the room; the gentlemen occupying one side, and the ladies the other.

The pulpit was occupied by three ministers, who prayed and exhorted alternately, and joined in the hymns with so much energy that Edith concluded their lungs must suffer. A bucket of water stood on a low table beside the pulpit, and one of the preachers, a young man, not very prepossessing in appearance, helped himself frequently, dropping the dipper (which was made of a gourd shell; had a long handle, and a rim of silver) back into the bucket, with the utmost indifference as to whether it splashed the water on the dresses of the ladies sitting near, or not. Some of the female voices were very sweet, but others produced horrible discord, which jarred terribly on Edith's cultivated ear. All feelings of devotion had been driven from her mind by the morning's adventure, and she tried in vain to fasten her thoughts on holy subjects; but the pain in her ankle increased, and she was obliged, before the meeting closed, to loosen her gaiter, on account of the swelling. She looked around the congregation; but so many eyes were fastened on her that she turned her own towards the pulpit, where she kept them until the benediction was pronounced. The time seemed very long, and she thought the prayers, exhortations, and hymns never would come to a close. She missed the beautiful service of the Episcopal Church, but I doubt if she would have enjoyed it in that warm, crowded room, and with the throbbing pain in her foot and ankle.

At the close of the meeting she requested the girls to remain in their seats a few moments, for she thought she should certainly fall if she attempted to go out with the crowd; but she almost regretted having done so, for so many of their friends stopped to speak with them, and to inquire if their teacher was hurt when she fell from her horse. Mr. Ellis joined them as soon as possible, and, introducing "Mr. Ward," one of the preachers who had occupied the desk, he immediately inquired if she still felt the pain.

"Yes, I feel it most acutely at present," she replied, "and I fear it is more serious than I at first apprehended."

"Will you allow me to look at it? I am the surgeon on my plantation," he said, with a grave smile.

She lifted her foot without hesitation, and placed it on the bench before her. He examined it, and said, with a troubled look: "It is, indeed, an ugly sprain. Your boot must come off, and a handkerchief must be bound tightly around your foot." Taking a penknife from his pocket, he slit the gaiter down on the outside, and drew it off as gently as possible; and, though Edith did not shrink or groan, her pale face and white compressed lips betrayed how much she suffered. Mr. Ellis bound his own handkerchief tightly around the swollen member, while Martha called Oak, and desired her to bring a glass of water, and Mary stood looking on, with the most distressed face imaginable.

"Do you think you can sit on your horse?" said Mr. Ellis, taking the tumbler from Oak, and handing it to Edith.

"Yes, I think so," she answered, though her voice faltered.

At this moment Mr. Ward entered in haste. "Ellis," said he, "Irving, fortunately, has his gig here, and offers it to you, and will ride your horse home. Better take it, for Miss Stanford will never reach home on horseback with that swollen foot; my word for it, she'll faint, as sure as you're born."

"I accept it, thankfully," answered Mr. Ellis, the cloud disappearing from his brow, which had gathered there at the mention of Irving's name. "But, Mr. Ward, you will have to take charge of my daughters."

"Oh, I'll do that with pleasure," returned Mr. Ward; "we'll take the bridle path, and meet you at the bridge."

"Scarcely, I think," said Mr. Ellis, smiling, "as I'm not going that way."

"Not by the road, certainly," said Mr. Ward, in surprise; "why, it is three o'clock, man, and the sun is powerful hot; she'll faint, as sure as you're born!" This last clause was delivered in much the same tone in which he had thundered from the pulpit, "You'll die, as sure as you're born!"

Not at all disconcerted by the smiles on the faces around him, the bustling preacher caught up his saddle-bags, saying to Mr. Ellis, as he passed him: "No use arguing with you, Ellis, for you always were a stubborn boy; but, my word for it, she'll faint—" The last of the sentence was lost, as the preacher and saddle-bags disappeared out of the door.

"He seems to be an original genius," said Edith, looking after him, and laughing in spite of her suffering.

"He is, indeed," said Mr. Ellis. "But, notwithstanding his almost jovial disposition, and abrupt, unpolished manners, he is the most effective, if not the most earnest preacher on this circuit. I have seen persons drop on their knees, overcome, during one of his exhortations, who have listened with the most stoical indifference to the more studied sermons of his graver brethren; and, when stepping from the pulpit, he has stood beside them repeating the Saviour's promises of pardon and love, I have been reminded of Paul in his tempestuous journey to Rome, who, 'when all hope that they should be saved was taken away,' stood forth in the midst of his trembling companions, and said: 'I exhort you to be of good cheer; for I believe God it shall be even as it was promised.'" Mr. Ellis was slowly walking up and down before Edith, waiting for the horses to be brought to the door, and, while he spoke, his usually grave face wore an almost sad expression, as if other thoughts had been suggested to his mind; and it was even so, as Edith afterwards learned.

"De gig am ready, massa," said Uncle Peter, stepping into the meeting-house, with his hat off. "Miser Irving took your hoss, and gwined home; but Miser War kep de saddle-blanket for to make a pillar for Miss Eden's foot."

"I am obliged to Mr. Ward for his thoughtfulness," said Edith, with a grateful smile. "The blanket, with my riding-skirt, will support my foot nicely."

"Drive the gig to the door, Peter," said his master, "and tell Sigh to have Selim ready for Miss Martha. Oak will ride Miss Edith's horse, unless you wish to ride in the saddle, Mary"—turning to his daughter, who stood beside Edith.

"I would rather ride behind Matty," she answered, with a doubtful glance towards her sister.

"Indeed, Mary, it is entirely too warm! I'd as soon be a peddler at once, and carry a pack on my back! If you can't be sensible, and ride Flash, you'll have to ride behind Mr. Ward." Seeing Mary's look of distress, she turned to Edith with a merry twinkle in her eye, and added, sotto voce, "She'll faint, as sure as you're born!"

"I'll ride Flash, I reckon," said Mary to her father, seeing no alternative.

"Very well," he answered; "but mind and keep him in the path. Don't drop your bridle," said he, with a meaning smile, as he went out to the gig, which at that moment appeared before the door.

"Are you afraid to ride by yourself?" asked Edith of Mary.

"O no!" she answered, laughing, as if she thought it quite ridiculous to be afraid.

"It's just laziness, Miss Edith, and nothing else," said Martha. "Papa told her not to drop her bridle, because the last time she rode Flash she dropped it, and let him go into the woods, and when we looked around she was away off behind some trees."

"I was not lazy," Mary said, in a gentle voice, but coloring; "I only forgot where I was. I was trying to repeat some of the 'Lady of the Lake,' and shut my eyes; and before I knew it Flash was out of the path."

"Yes, and a nice 'Lady of the Lake' you'd have been if he had gone to the Branch," said Martha.

"Now, Miss Edith, we must lift you into the gig," said Mr. Ellis, coming in. "You are getting a little better color. Is your ankle easier?"

"Yes, in this position," she replied, with a distressed look, as if she dreaded to have it moved.

"I am sorry to disturb it; but trust me! I'll lift you as gently as possible. You do not look very heavy"—glancing at her slight figure, and smiling. "I think I can convey you to the gig without much difficulty." And, taking her in his strong arms, he carried her out with as much ease as if she had been a child. The color fled from her face, leaving it almost marble-white, and when he placed her on the seat of the gig, such a look of suffering was depicted there that Mary exclaimed, with the tears running down her cheeks, "Oh, papa! isn't it dreadful?" Many persons came forward with offers of assistance and expressions of sympathy, while others stood apart, watching the proceedings with interest. Poor Edith! she was not conscious of anything but the throbbing, excruciating pain in her foot and ankle, and only heard Mr. Ellis give some directions to Uncle Sigh about the young ladies' horses, and had a vague sort of feeling that he was adjusting the articles under her foot, and raising it by placing something underneath; then the top of the gig was pulled over, and Mr. Ellis seated himself beside her, and they slowly rolled away. No words were exchanged until the jolting, unsteady motion had ceased, and they were moving rapidly over a smooth road.

"How does your foot feel now?" asked Mr. Ellis.

"Somewhat easier, though still very painful," replied Edith. And then, with a faint smile, she added: "My attention is divided between my foot and head; the one seems striving to outpain the other."

"Perhaps, if you were to take off your bonnet, your head would be somewhat relieved of the pain; you have had it on since morning," said Mr. Ellis, kindly.

Edith untied the strings, and removed the heavy straw bonnet; and, with womanly thoughtfulness, her companion loosened the veil, and, throwing it over her head, said it would be a protection from the dust.

"What time is it?" asked Edith.

Looking at his watch, Mr. Ellis replied that it was four o'clock. "We shall reach home about five," said he. And then, pointing towards the west with his whip, he said: "The Bluff lies in that direction. We seem to be leaving it, but in order to reach home by this road we are obliged to go three miles in this direction; then the road forks, and brings us on to the one leading to the Bluff."

"Mr. Ward mentioned a road by the bridge. Is that a shorter route than this?" asked Edith, striving to keep up the conversation.

"Yes, and much more shady," replied Mr. Ellis, "which was probably the reason that Mr. Ward was so surprised at my not taking it; but it is hardly fit to travel in a covered vehicle, as in many places the branches hang low, and interrupt the way; and it is very rough, which is another objection, as the jolting would have been intolerable to you."

"I suppose the girls will arrive home before us," said Edith, after a pause.

"Yes; half an hour or so," returned Mr. Ellis.

"I regret this accident so much on their account; it is so unfortunate, for I suppose I'll not be able to enter the school-room for a week," she said, in a despondent tone. And then, as if a happy thought had relieved her mind of a load of anxiety, she added, with a brighter look: "But that need not prevent their studying, for I can attend to them in my room; they can bring their books there."

"As many books from the library as you please to order," said Mr. Ellis, with a pleasant smile, "but none from the school-room. You are to be my pupil for a fortnight or thereabouts, and learn resignation; I fear you are lacking in that cardinal virtue."

"A fortnight!" exclaimed Edith, in dismay. "This will certainly not confine me to my room a fortnight."

"Not necessarily to your room; you can be carried to any part of the house you choose; but I fear you will not be able to use your foot for some time, as the delay that has occurred in applying the proper remedies will undoubtedly aggravate the swelling and inflammation. 'But I exhort you to be of good cheer,'" said Mr. Ellis, turning to her with a quiet smile, as he repeated the words of Scripture which he had before quoted when speaking to Mr. Ward.

This led Edith's thoughts into another channel, and she asked if Mr. Ward intended to preach to the black people in the evening. Receiving an answer in the affirmative, she remarked: "He is certainly a very energetic preacher, and, I judge, one calculated to make an impression on the negro mind."

"Yes," answered Mr. Ellis, "he has made several converts among my people, and is always welcomed, even by the most lawless of them, and listened to with profound attention. I entertain a particular regard for him myself; not only on account of his merits as a preacher, and unblemished character as a man, but"—here he hesitated a moment, and then continued—"he was instrumental in the conversion of my wife a short time previous to her death, and administered to her the sacrament the first and only time she ever partook of it. It was the Sunday before she died," he resumed, after a moment's pause, "and just a month after her baptism by the same hand. I, being a member of the Episcopal Church, could not accompany her to the communion-table, as the Baptists are close-communicants. We both regretted it exceedingly, and, returning home, she made the remark that she should have enjoyed the sacrament more fully could we have received it together. At that moment her horse stumbled, and, being a careless rider, she slipped from the saddle, and fell to the ground, her foot remaining in the stirrup, and her head striking against a stone. Mr. Ward, who was returning with us, assisted me in raising her, and brought water from a brook near at hand, with which we bathed her head, and, after binding up the wound, which was the only external injury she received, save a slight bruise on her shoulder, she was able to sit on her horse, and proceed home. Two days after, she was taken suddenly violently ill, and died in a few hours."

This had all been said in a manner very quiet and deliberate, but there was an inexpressible sadness in his tone, and on his face there was that look of melancholy which in his gay moments Edith had noticed suddenly settle over it, chasing away the brightness which a moment before had lent an additional charm to his strikingly handsome countenance.

Edith made no remark, for, though interesting to her, she did not wish to continue a subject evidently painful to her companion. After a moment's silence, however, he continued, as if thinking aloud: "A singular coincidence!

Ten months ago to-day she met with the accident." A pause; and then, as if the events separated by an interval of ten months were associated together in his mind, he looked at Edith, and said: "But yours is slight comparatively."

"Nothing at all!" she rejoined, quickly, with a perceptible shudder, as the thought passed through her mind that it might have been fatal.

He noticed the shudder; and, divining the cause, he changed the subject by asking, "Did you enjoy the ride to church, Miss Edith?"

"Very much," she replied; "it was such a lovely morning!" Then, glancing at her foot propped up before her, she said, with a sigh: "My life is like an April day—clouds and sunshine!"

"Yes, it is so with every one," said her companion; "and it is well that we have the contrast of shade occasionally, for the sun would lose half its genial warmth, and its benign influence would not be appreciated, if we were to bask in its light continually."

"True, but I would not like a similar shadow," nodding towards her foot, "to fall across my path frequently."

"It would not be very agreeable, certainly," returned Mr. Ellis.

There was silence for some time. At length Mr. Ellis pointed toward what seemed to Edith a grove, and said, "Do you see the house yonder, through the trees? We will be there presently;" and touching the horse with his whip, they rode on a little faster.

Uncle Anthony and Sigh met the gig at the gate and followed it up the lawn. Martha, Mary, and Mr. Ward stood on the piazza, and at the sound of wheels Aunt Cilla and the other house-servants came running out, all with anxious faces; but on the old housekeeper's countenance there was a dismal, funereal expression, as if she were watching the approach of a funeral cortege.

"Leave me take her out, Massa!" she said, as soon as Mr. Ellis threw the reins to Uncle Peter. "Poor chile! Better be took right up stars and put to bed. What for you do dat any way?" she exclaimed, turning to Edith with a look of mingled sorrow and vexation.

"I'll carry Miss Edith up stairs. Is her room ready? Stand one side, Cilla."

"Yes, Mass, and a big dish ob lye to souse her foot in. De bery bes' ting in de worl' for sprain. Tried once when you's away from hum, Massa. when my ole man sprain him ankle, and was laid up for four weeks wid de 'flamation."

"I judge that Miss Stanford would be laid up fully that length of time under similar treatment," said Mr. Ward, with perfect gravity; "but I think your master will use cold water applications."

"Cole water, Miser War! Gib de chile cole, sure as you lib."

"No, Cilla, it will not give her cold. Bring up a dish of cold water and somelinen," said Mr. Ellis, lifting Edith from the gig.

He carried her up to her room, and placed her in an easy-chair beside the bed, and Martha, lifting the sprained foot gently, placed it on a pillow in another chair. The handkerchief was unbound, and after Aunt Cilla had made an awkward attempt to draw off the stocking, it had to be cut off, as the boot had been, exposing the naturally small, white foot, now inflamed and swollen out of all proportion. Mr. Ellis proceeded to examine it; then, without any remark, bathed it freely with cold water, and bandaged it up again in linen dipped in the water.

"How is your head?" he asked, kindly.

"Better, I thank you," returned Edith.

"Aunt Cilla will stay with you to-night, for the cold water must be applied frequently. You must be kept very quiet, and live on low diet for a few days."

"Will she have to take any medicine?" asked Martha, making a wry face, as if she tasted something nauseous.

"A dose of cooling medicine would benefit you," said her father, turning to Edith.

"I will take it then," she answered. And saying that he would prepare some and send it up, Mr. Ellis left the apartment.

As soon as the door fairly closed on her master, Aunt Cilla, who had been very quiet, burst forth, "Bress your heart, honey, but dis am unfortunite. And it minds me so ob missus when young massa and Miser War brought her home de day she broke her head. And den de day she died too. I tinks ob it all; ob de little dead baby dat was buried wid her, and ob her poor, pale face, and I reckon as how young massa members it too, for he looks so grave like. He was ginning to look like hisself, and now it'll all be brung so forcible fore him dat I'm afeard he'll be down at de heel agin. Well," she ejaculated, piously, "de Lor gins and de Lor takes away agin. Bress de Lor's name, I hope he'll take away young massa's gravity and disflamation fore morning."

"Is all that redness inflammation, Aunt Cilla?" asked Mary.

"Yes, honey, it am sure, and if cold water don't 'lay it, I'm afeard mortification'll come in, den de foot'll have to come off to de ankle—p'r'ops to de knee—and shouldn't be sprised, honey, if young massa had to chop off de whole leg clean up. Heard tell of such tings, honey."

"Oh, Aunt Cilla!" exclaimed Mary, with a look of compassion towards Edith.

"What's that you're saying, Aunt Cilla? Miss Edith's leg'll have to come off, will it? Now that's keeping her quiet, as papa directed, isn't it?" said Martha, entering with the medicine.

"I only 'lowed it will have to come off, honey, that's all, if mortification sot in, you know. De Lor gins and de Lor takes away, and he may take de leg, you know. Neber be sartin ob noting in dis worl', honey."

"I am certain of one thing—Papa will not allow you to stay with Miss Edith if I tell him how you talk. I think I'll tell him, any way;" and she made a movement towards the door.

"Oh, now, honey, don't go for to bodder young massa. Goodness gracious! I only 'lowed it, you know." And the old negro seemed thoroughly alarmed.

"Well, papa don't allow it; but if you won't frighten Miss Edith again, I won't go."

"I was not frightened, Matty," said Edith, smiling; and Martha closed the door which she had opened, with apparent unwillingness, however, and going up to Edith, whispered in her ear that she did not intend to tell her papa, but only wished to frighten Aunt Cilla into holding her tongue.

"I am to give you this medicine as soon as ever you are in bed," she said, with a consequential air. "Horrid, isn't it? But you know you promised papa that you'd take it;" evidently anticipating as much opposition from Edith as she generally offered herself when required to take medicine.

"Now, honey, de bed am ready. I'll lif her in, Miss Mary, and you jist hold up de chur and slide her foot off."

"Oh, Martha, dear, not so high!" exclaimed Edith, as Martha, pushing her sister aside, caught hold of the chair, and it went up suddenly, considerably above the level of the bed. At length she was established in bed, and she laid her head on her pillow with a feeling of relief and thankfulness that she would not have to be lifted to another place before morning.

"I spec as how you'll be glad ob some tea, honey, for you had no dinner. Now what'll you hab?" said Aunt Cilla. "Hot egg-bread, and corn-pone, and chicking, and——"

"Nothing but some toast and a cup of tea. You know Mr. Ellis said I must have low diet," interrupted Edith.

"Bress him heart, he knows bes', young massa does, dat's sartin; but I'm ob de 'pinion lat you'd been a heap better if your foot been ousened in lye, and a hot supper gin you to waller instead ob dat medicine. What you oring dar?" turning to Nelly, who entered with a server.

"Miss Eden's supper," answered the black girl.

"Humph! Toas' an' tea! Dat's young massa's orderin', I knows. Isn't it, now?" and Aunt Cilla peered into Nelly's face, obviously expecting her to say "no."

"To be sure it am. Who knows in dis house what to gib sick folks, 'side Massa Jacob?"

"I does; and I was jist gwine to order tea an' toas' dis bery minute," replied Aunt Cilla, with a triumphant look.

After tea, Martha and Mary asked Edith if she wished them to sit with her.

"Perhaps you are sleepy?" said Mary.

"Not sleepy, dear, but very tired," answered Edith.

"We will stay here while Aunt Cilla goes down to the quarter to preaching," said Martha. "They have blown the horn, and papa and Mr. Ward went down before we came up stairs," she added, turning to Aunt Cilla.

"Neber you mind, honey," replied the old woman, not wishing to resign her charge into other hands. "I done heard all Miser War's sermons; he'll preach to-night from de tex' 'Sarvants, obey your marsers;' haint took dat un dis long time; I knows all he's gwine to say on dat subjec', honey; stored in my mind long ago; but I reckon I'll go down and see what dat Nell's a-doing in de dining-room."

"Will one of you read me a chapter in the Bible?" asked Edith as soon as the door closed.

"Mary will, she reads best," answered Martha. And taking a small Bible from the table, she handed it to her sister, who seated herself by the window, for it was not yet dark, and opening the book at random, she commenced in a clear, sweet voice, "Let not your heart be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in me." Aunt Cilla returned before the chapter was finished, and stood in the doorway listening, with her head bent, and her eyes fixed on the floor. When Mary closed the book, she shut the door, and repeated the last part of the twenty-seventh verse, then said, "No fear in dis ole heart, Lor; I tink it hab peace, and I is willing to rise and go hence; bless de Lor's name and Miser War's teachins;," and a tear dropped from her eye, and rolled down the dark cheek of the old negro, as she proceeded to light the small astral lamp.

Kissing Edith, and bidding her good-night, the two girls went into their own room, and she was left alone with Aunt Cilla, her sprained ankle, and her thoughts. And so closed the day—her first Sunday at Beech Bluff.

THE BEREAVED MOTHER.

BY MRS. JULIA MILLS DUNN.

In a gorgeous festive room,
Fragrant with the rich perfume,
Brilliant lamps are all aglow,
Waves of music ebb and flow;
Softly falls the measured beat
Of the merry dancer's feet;
Pictures hang upon the walls
Of those courtly ancient halls,
In whose beauties, day by day,
Artists wrought their lives away;
And in robes like purest snow
Lovely forms glide to and fro.
But, apart, there standeth one
Who would all this gladness shun;
On her ear the laugh of glee
Falls like bitter mockery,
Mingled with the music's tone,
She can hear a childish moan,
Never song were half so sweet
As the patter of the feet
That one autumn morn grew still
In the shadows deep and chill,
And adown Death's solemn river
Floated out of sight forever!
Gems may glitter on her brow,
Lordly heads in homage bow,
And the artist's dreams of grace,
Wrought in beauty's form and face,
Pass before her eyes; and yet
Can a mother e'er forget
That dear face which used to rest
Close against her throbbing breast?
Where the picture that would be Half so dear to memory
As the sunny clustering curls,
And the baby teeth of pearls?
Sorrowing mother, murmur not
At the anguish of thy lot!
Far across the silent sea,
Childish hands are beck'ning thee;
She hath risen from its tide,
And she standeth glorified!
Thou shalt one day hear the words,
Sweet as song of summer birds,
Feel the baby fingers press
On thy cheek their mute caress;
See again the loving eyes
On the shores of Paradise!

ACTING CHARADE.—STRATAGEM.

STRATA-

SCENE I.—A parlor handsomely furnished.

Enter FANNIE and MATTIE.

Fannie. Oh, Mattie, what will become of me? Mr. Credulous wants me to marry him.

Mattie. The old horror? And Mr. Frank?

Fannie. Forbids him the house. O Mattie! Mattie! just think of being Mrs. Credulous! Why, my guardian has a new hobby every hour.

Mattie. Mineralogy, bugology, butterflyology—every ology under the sun. But poor Mr. Frank!

Fannie. Who studied only Fannieology. My guardian informed me this morning that he wished to improve my mind by a course of scientific study.

Mattie. Poor thing!

Fannie. And I am to commence by a course of geology. Prof. Ammonite, a gentleman from England, has sent a letter to Mr. Credulous, and is to call here to-day.

Mattie. Don't your guardian know him?

Fannie. Never saw him. Prof. Ammonite is looking for pupils in this country, and I am to be the first victim on the altar of science.

Mattie (joyfully). I've hit it! (In a low, mysterious voice.) Miss Fannie, I am—(Enter Mr. Credulous.) Mum! another time. Only, Miss Fannie, don't you be astonished at anything. (Exit Mattie.)

Mr. Credulous. Well, Fannie, my dear, are you ready for your first lesson in geology? I expect Prof. Ammonite every moment.

Fannie (sighing). I thought I had finished my studies when I left school.

Mr. Credulous (taking a stone from his pocket). Such a glorious study! Such interesting research necessary! See here, my love, what a beautiful piece of rock I have; three specimens of various strata in one piece.

Fannie (contemptuously). Strata! What do I care for strata? If your geology will discover a gold mine in the garden—

Mr. Credulous. There's no saying it will not (putting the stone in his pocket). And then (lovingly) won't its little Fannie have everything her heart can desire!

Fannie (shortly). No!

Mr. Credulous. No? What can my love want that a gold mine will not buy?

Fannie. My liberty! Can I stir hand or foot; see a friend; even converse with my maid, without being subjected to a hateful system of—

Mr. Credulous. Stop, my dear. To be sure, I won't let Mr. Frank Horton visit my lady-bird, because—Fannie. Because you are an old tyrant.

Enter MATTIE.

Mattie. Prof. Ammonite is here, sir.

Mr. Credulous. Ah! I must go to him. Fannie, my love, be ready to take your first lesson.

Fannie. I won't see him. (Exit Mr. Credulous.)

Mattie. Don't say you won't see him, miss; only don't screech when you find out it's Mr.—

Mr. Credulous (behind the scenes). This way, sir. (Enter Mr. Credulous and Frank Horton. Frank wears an old-fashioned suit of brown cloth, a heavy black beard, large spectacles, and a broad-brimmed hat.) Fannie, my love—(Fannie turns her back on Mr. Credulous and Prof. Ammonite.) My dear, let me introduce you to Prof. Ammonite, from London.

Fannie (courtesies without turning). Good-morning, sir.

Frank. Good-morning, my dear young lady.

Fannie (turning suddenly). Ah!

Mattie (aside to Fannie). Don't scream, or you will spoil all.

Mr. Credulous. What is the matter, Fannie?

Fannie. I pricked my finger with a pin. See how swollen it is.

(As Mr. Credulous looks at her finger, Frank kisses Fannie's other hand behind Mr. C.'s back.)

Mr. Credulous. I don't see the place, my dear.

Fannie. Well, never mind. It is better now.
Mr. Credulous. Then you will take a lesson in geology?

Fannie. Certainly, anything to oblige my dear guardian.

Frank. May I trouble you, sir, for pencil and paper?

Mr. Credulous. Mattie—

Fannie (hastily). I want Mattie to go to my room for a pocket handkerchief.

Mattie. Yes, Miss. (Exit Mattie.)

Mr. Credulous (pettishly). She could have brought the pencil and paper at the same time.

Fannie. Oh, if you are not willing to take that small amount of trouble for me, I decline studying.

Mr. Credulous (hastily). Oh, I'll go! I'll go!

(Exit Mr. Credulous.)

Frank. My dear Fannie!

Fannie. Dear Frank! What a capital idea!

Frank. Mattie's notion. Now, instead of listening to the lecture on geology, do you attend to my remarks in parentheses, and—and—your guardian is coming. (Enter Mr. Credulous.) The first thing to learn is the formation of the different strata of which the earth is composed.

Mr. Credulous. Capital! (Hands Frank pencil and paper.)

Frank (breaking the point of pencil). This pencil has no point. May I trouble you for a penknife?

Mr. Credulous. No point! I have just sharpened it.

Frank (showing it). You see yourself, sir.

Fannie. Do go for a knife, Mr. Credulous. I don't want to wait all day for a lesson. (Exit Mr. Credulous.)

Frank. We will meet now every day, and watch for a favorable chance to elope. Ah, Fannie, young wits will overreach an old head.

(Enter Mr. Credulous.) And, having found out how many strata there are, we will next consider of what each strata is composed. (Aside.) Fannie, strata is about the only geological term I know. (Mr. Credulous gives Frank the penknife, and then sits down to watch the lesson.

Frank and Fannie sit side by side at the table with a sheet of paper before them.) I will first sketch the plan of a mountain which, split by some great convulsion of nature, leaves exposed the different layers of strata of placiods, ganiods (let me hold your other hand under the table), and other oids of which (that's a darling) it is composed. Do you understand?

Fannie. Perfectly. Oh, geology is delightful!

Mr. Credulous. I knew you would like it!

Frank. Do not interrupt me, if you please, sir. You see, my dear young lady (very dear), according to Humboldt and Agassiz (what a dear little soft hand you've got!), these strata—I believe I mentioned strata before?

Fannie. Yes. (Don't squeeze my hand so, sir.)

Frank. You understand that when the animalculæ of the aqueous and sedimentary fossils (how that old idiot listens!)—

Mr. Credulous. Eh, I didn't catch that last sentence.

Frank. I beg you will not interrupt me, sir. I say, my dear young lady, that the contorted equalized strata of igneous laminative horizontal perpendiculars make (I'll be at the foot of the garden walk this afternoon) a lateral escarpment of geological deposits, the quaternary metamorphic tertiaries meet the serpentine mineralogical crystallines, and—and (give me a word).

Fannie. Explode.

Frank. And explode. Do you understand?

Fannie (turning her head aside to conceal a smile). Perfectly!

Mr. Credulous. It's more than I do.

Frank (to Mr. Credulous). May I trouble you for another piece of paper?

Mr. Credulous. Write on the other side of that piece.

Frank (pompously). I generally allow my pupils to frame my sketches, and write only on one side.

Mr. Credulous (rising reluctantly). You might have said you wanted two pieces when I went before. (Exit Mr. Credulous. Fannie and Frank rise and come forward.)

Frank. Did you read what I wrote on the paper?

Fannie. No; I did not think of that.

Enter Mr. Credulous, unperceived. He goes to the table, and reads the paper.

Frank. Never mind; I will fold it, and give it to you before I go. What a genius Mattie is! She told Prof. Ammonite, the real Professor, that your guardian was out of town for a week, and we have all that time to arrange our plans. (Puts his arm round Fannie.)

Mr. Credulous (furiously). What's all this? An appointment! I'm an old fool! (Fannie and Frank start away from each other, and stand still.) Signed Frank. (To Frank.) Out of my house, sir. Perhaps I am more penetrating than you imagine.

Fannie. Good-by, Frank. (Holds out her hand.)

Frank. Farewell, love. (Kisses Fannie's hand.)

Mr. Credulous. Will you go?

Frank (going). I am gone. Au revoir, Fannie—

Mr. Credulous. Stay, a moment! The next time you want to lecture on geology, I will give you a certificate that the strata most fully developed in your composition is impudence.

(Exit Frank.) [Curtain falls.]

GEM.

SCENE 2, same as SCENE 1.

Enter FANNIE.

Fannie. Two weeks to-day since I took my geology lesson, and I have not seen dear Frank since. My guardian will not allow me to stir from the house unless he accompanies me. What a nuisance it is for an old man to fall in love with a young girl! Is he in love with me, or is it the money he has taken care of for me that tempts him? Poor, dear Frank! Where can he be?

Enter Mr. CREDULOUS.

Mr. Credulous. How is my lady-bird to-day?

Fannie. Pining for liberty, as all caged birds do.

Mr. Credulous. I have promised you liberty when you listen to my suit, and become my wife.

Fannie. Liberty when you have riveted the chains that will hold me for life! Thank you! On those terms I decline my liberty.

Mr. Credulous. My angelic, fascinating—

Fannie. Flattery, sir, from a man of your age, is disgusting.

Mr. Credulous. Now, Fan, don't let's quarrel. You quarrel with me every time we meet.

Fannie. I should think that very fact would make you glad to get rid of me. A wife who quarrels every day will not make a very fascinating companion.

Mr. Credulous. Ah, my dear, I am the best judge of what I prefer for a wife. I had rather quarrel with you than caress anybody else.

Enter MATTIE.

Mattie. There's an Oriental peddler—that's what he says he is, and I suppose he knows—wants to see Mr. Credulous.

Mr. Credulous. Now, my dear, if you will give me one kiss, you may take your choice of his pack.

Mattie (to Fannie). Say yes; he must come in.

Fannie. How do I know if his pack contains anything worth that price?

Mattie. O my, miss! he's got Ingy shawls, and Chiney scarfs, and such loves of muslins!

Mr. Credulous. Show him up, Mattie. (Exit Mattie.) Nothing like finery for clearing up a woman's brow, turning frowns to smiles.

(Enter Mattie, followed by Frank. The latter wears a full Oriental dress: red trousers, slippers, blue jacket, white turban, and carries a tray of wares. His face is stained brown, and he wears a heavy black moustache and imperial.)

Frank (bowing). Most illustrious and glorious of the present generation, permit the humblest of your servants to lay at your bride's feet the offerings collected in years of travel.

(Frank kneels on one knee before Fannie, resting the tray upon his other knee. Fannie looks in his face, starts, and then bends down to the tray.)

Fannie (cheerfully). Oh, what an exquisite fan!

Mr. Credulous (aside). Just see how she alters at the very sight of the finery!

Fannie (aside to Frank). How long it is since you were here!

Frank (joyfully). Have you missed me, dearest?

Fannie. Hush! he is watching us.

Frank. Fairest of ladies, let Agib Fadladdin, who is not worthy to raise his eyes to your radiant beauty, display the gem of his humble collection, which will appear dim when compared with those lustrous orbs.

Fannie. Oh, what a dear, delightful man!

(Frank rises, places his tray on the table, and takes a small jewel box from his pocket; he opens this, and shows it to Fannie.)

Fannie. Splendid! charming!

Mr. Credulous. Allow me to see it. (Takes the box.)

Frank (aside to Fannie). Look under the pile of fans for a note.

Fannie (going to table). Mr. Credulous, I want a new fan, one of these scarfs, a shawl, a dozen pineapple handkerchiefs, this box of perfume (finds the note, and hides it in the bosom of her dress), and that jewel in your hand.

Mr. Credulous. Is that all? What is the price of this jewel?

Frank. Sir, that ring is the setting of a gem not to be purchased for less than five hundred thousand dollars—

Mr. Credulous. What?

Frank. Worthy to sparkle on this fair hand. (Takes the box from Mr. Credulous, and places the ring on Fannie's finger.)

Fannie. Beautiful! Oh, I can never take it off!

Mr. Credulous. But the price! Impossible! I am sorry to deny you—

Fannie (sobbing). After promising me my choice of the lot.

Mr. Credulous. Why, that is double the amount of your fortune!

Fannie. You may take the ring. Of course, if I want it, that is sufficient reason for declining to buy it.

Mr. Credulous. But, my dear, do be reasonable!

Fannie. I am reasonable. Take it. (Gives the ring to Mr. Credulous, and then joins Frank at the table.)

Mr. Credulous (coming forward and examining the ring). I wonder what it can be, to have such a price set upon it?

Mattie (coming to Mr. Credulous). Please, sir, let me see the gem that is worth so much.

Frank. Look over the tray, darling, and select a souvenir.

Fannie. Help me to choose.

Mr. Credulous (still turning his back to Frank and Fannie). It looks to me like a piece of agate; agate is not so rare a gem.

Frank. Let me clasp this bracelet on your arm. (Clasps the bracelet, and then embraces Fannie.)

Fannie (laying her head on Frank's breast). When shall I see you again?

Frank. Read my note, my angel, and you will see that I have completed every arrangement for our elopement. My dear little— (Kisses her.)

Mr. Credulous (turning suddenly). I don't believe this gem—Hey-dey! (Frank and Fannie bend again over the tray.) What's all this? Come here, miss! So! so! another masquerade! Leave the house, sir!

Frank. Return my ring, sir. I designed it for this lady; she will not refuse to accept it.

Fannie. Never (extends her hand).

Mr. Credulous. She sha'n't accept it!

Frank (putting the ring on Fannie's finger). Gage d'amour. Souviens toi de—

Mr. Credulous. Hold your tongue, sir! Mattie, show that impostor to the door, and, harkye, you baggage, if he ever comes inside of it again, that instant you leave.

Mattie. Game 's up! Come, Mr. Frank!

Frank (to Fannie). Cheer up, we will meet again soon! (Exit Frank and Mattie.) Fannie. Don't speak to me, sir. (Kisses the ring.) Dear, dear, Frank!

Mr. Credulous. Before my very face! Give me that ring!

Fannie. I'll part with life sooner. As a pledge of his love, it becomes indeed a priceless gem!
[Curtain falls.]

STRATAGEM.

SCENE 3, same as SCENES 1 and 2.

Enter MATTIE.

Mattie. What idiots love does make of people! Two of the prettiest plans ever invented spoiled because Mr. Frank and Miss Fannie must go to love making the minute they meet. This is the last time I shall attempt to bring them together. I consider myself mistress of stratagem, but if they will betray themselves constantly, what can I do?

Enter FANNIE.

Fannie. Is all ready, Mattie?

Mattie. Yes, Miss! Mr. Frank is in a fever of impatience to see you. Now, Miss Fannie, you are ready for him this time; you won't spoil all by letting him make love, will you?

Fannie. No, no! Hark, here comes Mr. Credulous. (Sits down in a large chair, and leans her head on her hand as if in great pain.)

Enter MR. CREDULOUS.

Mattie (smoothing Fannie's hair). That poor, dear head!

Mr. Credulous. Is your head still so bad, my dear?

Fannie. Do lower your voice. Oh, my head! (Groans.)

Mr. Credulous. I have this morning received a letter from a Dr. Fusty, who cures all diseases by mesmerism. Would you like to see him, my dear?

Fannie. No, it is of no use! I am resigned to suffering.

Mr. Credulous. But, my dear, mesmerism is now the greatest agent to relieve and prevent suffering. I have told you so for several days.

Fannie (aside). Hobbies are useful animals sometimes to those who do not ride them.

Mr. Credulous. I wish you would let me send for Dr. Fusty.

Fannie. Oh, pray do not tease me! let me die in peace!

Mr. Credulous. Die! Good gracious! don't talk so.

Fannie (sentimentally). What is an aching head to a broken heart! Can Dr. Fusty "minister to a mind diseased?"

Mr. Credulous. I dare say he can. Let me send for him.

Fannie. Leave me; I am fatigued! Oh, my head!

Mr. Credulous. Do see Dr. Fusty.

Fannie. Well, well, go for him.

Mr. Credulous. He will cure you. (Exit Mr. Credulous.)

Fannie. How charmingly that blessed old idiot walks into the trap! It was such a good idea of Frank's to write to him; that disarmed suspicion at once.

Mattie. I told him to stay in his office all the morning, and as it is so near, he will soon be here.

Fannie. I hope he won't make me laugh. Mattie, give me a footstool. So. Now give me a bottle of eau de Cologne; draw the curtains. Mattie, you are sure that there is everything I shall need in that valise.

Mattie. Yes, ma'am. And the carriage is waiting at the back gate.

Fannie. Oh, Mattie, how my heart does beat. Are my bonnet and cloak in the carriage?

Mattie. Yes, Miss. Hark, here they come!

(Fannie resumes her languishing attitude, her eyes half closed, and her hands crossed on her lap. Mattie bathes her forehead with eau de Cologne.)

Enter MR. CREDULOUS and FRANK. Frank wears a wig of long white hair, a white beard, and an old gentleman's dress. He carries an umbrella and a large book.

Mr. Credulous. Fannie, my dear, here is the doctor.

Mattie. Don't speak to her now, sir, she's just had an awful time.

Frank (sitting down beside Fannie). Ahem! Nervous! Allow me. (Feels Fannie's pulse.) All nerves, my dear sir. Your daughter, did you say?

Mr. Credulous (pettishly). My ward, sir!

Frank (laying aside his book and umbrella). My dear young lady, in order to be favorably affected by the process I propose to use in your case, you must fix your eyes upon mine, and resign yourself wholly to my will. Are you willing to do this?

Fannie (smiling.) Perfectly!

Mattie (aside to Fannie). Don't laugh! Oh, please don't!

Fannie (moaning). Oh, my head! such pain.

Frank (passing his hands over her hair). Does that relieve it?

Fannie (with a deep sigh). Wonderful! the pain leaves me.

Frank. Look into my eyes. (Fannie raises her eyes to his. As he speaks to Mr. Credulous she makes the actions he names.) You see, sir, already there is a peaceful, smiling expression in the place of the look of pain your ward wore when I came in. The head begins to droop! As I thus pass my hand over her hair, I throw, by the force of my will, a strong spell over the young lady's mind. See, her head falls back, her eyelids slowly droop, her hands fall powerless in her lap, and now—she sleeps!

Mr. Credulous. Astounding! She assures me that she has not slept for ten nights.

Frank. I can show you still more wonderful results. Your ward is now completely under my control; without me at this instant she could not live.

Fannie (in a tender, dreamy tone). Do not leave me!

Frank. You hear, sir. Now, to prove this, observe, if I remove my hand from her hair, she will become convulsed (takes away his hands.)

Fannie (trembling and panting). Ah! save me! I faint! I die!

Frank (taking her hand). I am here. See how quiet she is! (Fannie lets her hand fall on the back of the chair, as if in profound slumber.)

Mr. Credulous. I can scarcely believe my eyes. Do you think she is perfectly free from pain? (To Fannie.) Fannie, my dear.

Frank. She cannot hear you; she can hear no voice but mine. Miss Fannie!

Fannie (in a dreamy tone). I hear you.

Frank. Are you in pain?

Fannie. No, I am in a dream of delight!

Frank (to Mr. Credulous). Yet, so potent is my power that by one motion of my hand I can again bring the pain. See (makes a motion.)

Fannie (moaning). Oh, my head! Oh, my head!

Frank (smoothing her hair). I cannot bear to see her suffer! (Fannie again seems to sleep.)

Frank. Although she would not hear a cannon fired at her ears, nor heed it if the house burned down around her, you will see that she obeys my slightest word, and when I take my hand from hers, she will follow me wherever I may go. (To Fannie.) Open your eyes. (Fannie obeys every order.) Stand up! walk! sit down! close your eyes!

Mr. Credulous. Marvellous!

Frank (dropping Fannie's hand). Now she is not en rapport, as we say, with me. Take her hand yourself, and she will answer then any question you may ask her.

Mr. Credulous (taking Fannie's hand). Fannie, are you better?

Fannie. Well now, quite well!

Mr. Credulous. Do you love me, Fannie?

Fannie. With the tender regard a ward owes her guardian.

Mr. Credulous (dropping her hand). Bother!

Frank. Your movement was too sudden; see how her hand feels for yours.

Fannie (stretching out her hand). It is so dark! I am lonely!

Frank (taking her hand). I am here.

Fannie. Ah, now it is light!

Frank. Observe sir, now, as I withdraw my hand, how your ward will follow it. (To Fannie.) Open your eyes. (Frank, extending his hand towards Fannie, steps slowly backward round the room, she following him, till he gains the door—then exit, Fannie still following.)

Mr. Credulous (after a moment's pause). Why don't they come back?

Mattie. They'll be here in a minute. Oh, sir, won't it be nice to have Miss Fannie free from headache?

Mr. Credulous. I must go find them. (Exit.)

Mattie. Too soon! Can they have reached the gate? (Runs to the window.) Ah, there they are! They have reached the carriage. They are in. Hurra! That stratagem succeeded. There goes old Credulous without his hat, running after the carriage. He is too late! Ah, he is coming back! It is time for me to vanish, to get Mr. Frank's new house ready for Miss Fannie! Stay! one word (to audience) before I go. Do not blame me too hardly for cheating my master, but remember that—"All's fair in love and war."

[Curtain falls.]

THE OLD HOME.

BY E. N. H.

THE withered leaves fell thick and fast upon the wildwood path that led me to my childhood's home—the old stepping-stones, the shady trees and crystal spring were there. I find my favorite wildwood path unchanged; the water trickled down among the stones as it was wont to do of yore. On, on I pass over the old bridge and up the hill through the gate, each step bringing up vivid memories of the past. Nature is as beautiful as in my childish days, but I, alas, am changed! Years have gone by and left their traces on my brow; and now, with feeble steps and slow, onward I go to gaze upon the spot that gave me birth. No familiar faces greet me, no kind hands are stretched to welcome me. O for some quiet spot in which to weep the bitter, burning tears that well up from the fountain of an aching heart! What visions crowd upon me here! Each step I take is treading on the past. Faint shadows of loved forms glide these halls, their memory coming to me like a pleasant dream. Here, in the old kitchen, by the fireside, our joyous group were wont to gather at eventide. What pleasing memories linger here! The hours of toil and weariness have fled, and only cheerful looks and loving words are thought of now. Here, in the parlor, day after day, the Holy Word was read, and the song of thanksgiving and the voice of prayer were heard. There is our father's place, and here our mother's chair was wont to stand. Here, in years gone by, holy vows were spoken; and here, O, yes, I well remember where the sainted dead were laid, and mourners gathered round to weep and take the last sad look. And now I come, a pilgrim and alone, and find each cherished spot desecrated by strangers' tread; and I must wander forth and tread my childhood's haunts again, and breathe the pure fresh air, and drink in strength to bear the changes time has wrought. The old seat beneath the shady tree is gone; the garden spot looks wild and desolate; wild grass is tangled through the bushes, and where my flowers were wont to bloom rank onions grow. The barn is full of sweet-scented hay and clover. I open the little gate and wander on over the wide fields, and gaze upon the far-off blue hills that bound my home; there, where the shadows used to fall, they linger still, and the deep blue of the mountains mingles with the cloudy sky. Those old wood-crowned hills, how I have loved them, when they bounded in my world of hope and love; and how I love them still, and ever shall till memory fail. But where are they, the loving and beloved, that were around me then? Some, like me, are wanderers—some amid the wildwood, some on the briny deep, and in a prairie land far, far away; and some of the beloved ones sleep the sleep that knows no waking. Alone I sit in the old seat in the little meeting-house, and wander through the tall weeds that grow among the tombs—all, all is desolate. Alone, and with the dead! But even here I may not weep in peace; strange eyes must watch my bitter grief; sadly I wander on, in vain I seek one little grave to pluck a blossom there. But yet I sorrow not as those who have no hope. In the better land, in my unchanging home, I shall find my lost again. Farewell, my long-loved home, I am bidding thee a last adieu.

Yes, my heart is almost breaking,
While a last sad leave I'm taking,
How my heart with anguish swells!
While the birds are sweetly singing,
And the echoes wildly ringing
Through thy woods and sunny dells.

Where the murmuring streamlet floweth,
And the wild wind gently bloweth
Through the branches of the trees;
There, in days of youth and gladness,
Without fear of grief or sadness,
I have listened to the breeze—

Listened while it swept around me,
With a breath that ever bound me,
Still rejoicing to be glad;
Glad the future ever beameth,
With a light that brightly gleameth,
How can youth and hope be sad?

Hope, bright hope, thou hast departed,
Here I wander broken-hearted,
Sad and dreary and alone;
There is not one voice in gladness
Cometh now to break the sadness,
With the music of its tone.

Hope, with all I loved and cherished,
From thy dear old haunts has perished,
And I may not linger here—
May not stay to dream of changes
Which the true, fond heart estranges
From the friends it once held dear.

Why, then, should I linger longer?
Even though thy ties were stronger,
I must surely break the spell.
One last look, and then I leave thee;
Yes, although it deeply grieve me,
I must say a last farewell.

THE CITIES OF REFUGE.

A TALE OF JUDEA.

BY M. W. B.

CHAPTER I.

EVENING stole over the inheritance of Reuben. The parting sun had marked his retiring course by a train of glorious light bordered by gorgeous clouds, which, gradually diminishing in splendor, faded at length into the deep azure of a summer evening sky; while the brilliant stars sparkled in its serene depths, as if emulous to replace the departed glory. The balmy breeze, redolent of a thousand perfumes stolen from the flowers and fruits of that lovely region, imparted fresh vigor and energy to the languid frame enfeebled by the sultry heats of the day.

In Heshbon, "that ancient city of Heshbon," and bordering upon a portion of its wall, was situated a spacious and beautiful garden; delightful in its arrangement of refreshing shade and pleasant bowers. A fountain poured forth its abundant waters to play awhile in the air and return to its reservoir, again to rise in spreading jets, and again to return to its source. Two figures near its margin were sprinkled by its spray, and fanned by the fragrant breeze; a stately young man supported the form of a weeping girl; the scene and the hour seemed sacred to peace and happiness, but these two suffering hearts felt not its peace, thought not of its beauty; sorrow deep and engrossing had excluded all other emotions. They were betrothed lovers, and the coming week was to have witnessed their bridal, and rejoicing friends were even now preparing to grace with their presence the holy ceremony. Why, then, these bitter tears? this agonizing grief? Why does the almost fainting form of the beautiful Zillah shrink from the enfolding arms of her lover, as he seeks to sustain it? Alas! his hands have shed the blood of a brother of his tribe! He has slain a man, and the Avenger of blood is upon his path: He must fly, must relinquish hopes so precious, and all the other blessings his God has so bountifully spread around him, and seek safety in a "City of Refuge," so mercifully appointed by Jehovah to receive the unfortunate man-slayer.

"Shrink not from me thus, my beloved!" he cried in tones of the deepest anguish; "if guilty in deed, I surely was not so in intention; light of my soul, believe and trust thy Reuben; speak, and say that thou hatest him not!"

"Tell me," sobbed the wretched girl, "tell me truly, how was it that the son of the righteous Ebenezer could descend to become a criminal and a murderer?"

He started. "A murderer! Yes, the death of another is upon my soul; and thou art just, Zillah, and dost wound me righteously."

"Reuben, I meant it not; forgive me. Ah! what can I say that will not add to thy distress? Yet I would fain know the worst."

"Thou shalt know all. When Zillah consented to wed her Reuben, Abner, the son of Simeon, was displeased, for he likewise sought her for his wife, and his wrath burned fiercely against her chosen husband. Happy in the possession of her love, Reuben could well pity his disappointment, while he scorned his threats of vengeance. But, Zillah, when he assailed thy fair fame, when he dared to heap obloquy upon the name of thy father, I resented the cowardly insult, and he smote me! Yea, in the extremity of his wrath, he dared to smite me, and with my sword I pierced his craven breast. Could I have done otherwise?"

"Oh, I know not! Thou wert sorely tried; but is there no hope—may he not yet live?"

"There is no hope for him, Zillah; and I have fled hither to see thee once again, ere we part forever."

"Forever! didst thou say? And for my sake thou art thus afflicted and desolate; and I have been so unkind, so forgetful, that thy happiness as well as my own is destroyed. Oh, best beloved! what can we do in our distress? The brothers of Abner—will they avenge him? will they have no pity?"

"They are even now seeking me, and wherefore should I strive to escape their rage? Zillah loves me no longer."

"Say not so, my Reuben," and her face sought shelter on his breast. "But hasten to Bezer in the wilderness, where thou wilt be safe from their fury; let me not see thee slain, my betrothed; then would life be without value to me."

"Already are the gates watched by the kindred of Abner; only by the wall can I hope to escape from the city—and how can that be soiled?"

Zillah clasped her hands with renewed hope, as she exclaimed, "The Lord be praised for that thought! By yon lofty palm thou canst reach the top of the wall; thou wilt be saved, my beloved, and we may yet be happy. But how canst thou descend upon the other side?"

"A rope secured to the tree will aid my descent, and since thou still lovest me, Zillah, my life shall be precious in my own eyes."

The undiminished affection of his betrothed inspired the heart-stricken youth with fresh energy, and through her exertions he succeeded in effecting his escape to the suburb, without the wall of the city; and, as quickly as possible, passing through the most unfrequented streets, issued into the open country, in the quarter most remote from the road which led to Bezer; rightly believing that his enemies would watch the gate nearest to that place with the greatest vigilance. A circuitous route and a cross-road brought him to the highway leading to this place of refuge, which, in accordance with the humane law of the country, was always kept in perfect repair, and provided with every facility for assisting the unfortunate man-slayer to reach a place of safety, into which, having entered, he was relieved from farther pursuit.

The bright moonlight, while it rendered his way plainer, made it also more unsafe, as the heat of the day had delayed many wayfarers, who were now striving to accomplish their journey during the balmy coolness of the night; and Reuben was compelled to guard against the recognition of many to whom he was well known; who might have borne the tidings of his flight to the family of the hapless Abner. The bold free step exchanged for a limping gait, and the body bent almost to deformity, presented no resemblance to his own lithe and graceful form; and it was not until the shadows of the setting moon were succeeded by the darkness of night, that, freed from the apprehension of immediate danger, our fugitive quickened his pace, and resumed his upright attitude. Several hours of unceasing travel at length produced a degree of fatigue which warned him to seek for a place of rest and security during the approaching day. But whither to direct his steps? Where seek for those who would furnish him food and shelter without betraying him?

He was aware that with the morning dawn the friends of his victim would scour the country in pursuit of him; he knew, also, that with his own fleet steed under him, he could have defied their efforts to overtake him; but his sudden flight had deprived him of that advantage, and where could he dare apply for another? Worn with fatigue, and sad at heart, he seated himself upon a rock at some distance from the roadside, and soon became so wholly absorbed in reflection, that he was unconscious of the near approach of a young lad, whose light footsteps scarcely sounded on the smooth sand, until he stopped suddenly beside him, and was gazing earnestly in his face. Reuben started up on beholding him, but spake not, and the boy said, in a voice expressive of deep sympathy—

"Thou art very weary, stranger; is it not so?"

"Thou speakest truly, my good lad," Reuben replied, with a faint smile; "canst thou bring me where I may find food and rest?"

"My father's house is near, but he is in the field. My mother loves the stranger; wilt thou go to her?"

"Gladly, my kind friend; for I am sorely in need;" and they turned to commence their walk, when the lad exclaimed—

"Look! look! how yon daring riders dash down the hill; I would be sorry to place my neck in such jeopardy. They ride like madmen!"

One look served to assure Reuben that the foremost horseman was Hazael, the brother of the fallen Abner. "Come," he cried hastily, to the boy, "run with all thy speed, and I will overtake thee, tired as I am, before thou reachest thy father's house."

"We will try it," was the reply; and the race began.

The love of life was strong in the heart of the young man, and this extremity imparted strength to his limbs, and fleetness to his footsteps. The two entered the house together, and as the youth advanced to present his companion to his mother, he was surprised to hear him exclaim, as he approached her, "I implore thine aid! Hide me, if thou canst, from those who seek my life; ask what thou wilt for thy reward, for I am rich! But save me now! the pursuer is at thy door!"

Suppressing the surprise and curiosity which filled her mind, the woman gazed at him an instant in silence, then bowed her head in token of assent, and, with ready kindness motioning him to follow her, led the way to a door opening upon the corridor that surrounded the inner court; then bidding her son fasten the door, she conducted the weary stranger, thrown thus unexpectedly upon her hospitality, to the brink of a well, which occupied one corner of the court. Pointing to several steps which were arranged within its circumference, on which she was accustomed to place such food as required protection from heat, she desired him to descend and seat himself upon one of them. He obeyed mechanically, and, aided by her assiduous son, she fitted the cover to the aperture, and spreading a clean cloth over it, emptied a bag of grain upon the whole, as if for the purpose of drying it preparatory to grinding. When these arrangements were completed, she said, in a gentle voice, "Have confidence in me, son of Ebenezer, and pray to the God of thy fathers to rescue thee from this great peril. Now, my son, let us about our tasks; and remember that, in sheltering strangers, we follow the example of our father Abraham; and bethink thee also that, as he was honored by entertaining angels, so may we, perhaps, be favored by the presence of a good man. Let nothing tempt thee to betray his trust in thee." Then unfastening the door, she proceeded quietly to the performance of various household duties, while the lad, taking a suitable vessel, went out to procure water for the family use.

CHAPTER II.

It was indeed the brother of Abner whom Reuben recognized; who, fearing lest his enemy, as he considered him, should effect his escape from the city by some method unknown to himself, had left others to guard the many gates of Heshbon, while he, followed by his servant, rode through the various highways by which it was possible the unfortunate fugitive might avoid him, and thus it happened that he appeared so early near the place where the exhausted young man had thrown himself for an hour of rest. On reaching the brow of the hill, and observing two persons conversing near its foot, his anxiety to make inquiries induced him to rush headlong down the descent, regardless of all danger. But what was his surprise when they suddenly darted forward at their utmost speed, as if striving to avoid him! Could he doubt that he had found the enemy he sought? With a shout of exultation, he plunged forward as if desirous to annihilate the considerable space that intervened between them. A bend in the road behind a rising ground shut them from his sight, still he sprang onward; another turn behind a grove of trees filled with underwood, but he saw them not; yet another, and a neat and comfortable dwelling-house met his eye, and beyond it one tall figure still pressing forward as if life depended upon the effort. "The Lord hath delivered him into my hands!" he exclaimed, as he dashed after the flying figure. "Now, Abner, shall thy blood be avenged!" Suddenly the figure halts, then turns into a field, and stops before the mouth of a bubbling spring, and Hazael, maddened by disappointment and rage, is ready to destroy the object of his anger.

It is the youthful Joel whom he has thus fiercely pursued.

"Who art thou, boy?" he cried, in an infuriated tone, "and why didst thou run from me with such speed?"

"Who am I?" repeated the lad, as if astonished at the question. "I am the son of my father, if it concerns thee to know, and I ran to please myself; for why should I fly from thee? And who art thou that asketh such unseemly questions?"

"I could slay thee where thou art, son of Belial!" cried the enraged Hazael. "Tell me, without delay, where is the man I saw with thee but now."

"Thou hast no right to ask, and I answer thee not." Then, coolly placing the vessel, now filled with water, on the ground, he folded his arms, and gazed steadfastly on the face of his interrogator.

"I shall find a way to unloose thy tongue, or silence it forever." And, drawing his sword, he was rushing upon the undaunted stripling, when he was withheld by the hand of the servant, who whispered: "The brave lad fears not thy threats; perchance words of kindness may win him to answer thee."

"Speak them thyself, then," was the reply.

"My good lad," said the man, addressing Joel, "my master is in pursuit of a murderer, of a man who has killed his brother, and he believes that he saw him in thy company not far from hence. If it is so, I trust thou wilt not screen from punishment one whom the Lord hath pronounced accursed."

"Of a certainty I would not."

"Then where is he?"

"Speakest thou of the tall man who left me but a little time ago?"

"Even so."

"Thou wouldst not call him a murderer, surely."

"Dost thou know him, lad?"

"Do I know my father, peaceful and righteous as he is beloved!"

"Thy father! Where dwelleth he?"

"In yonder house. If thou wouldst see him, he is abroad in the field."

"The man we saw left thee before thou passedst the house. He must have entered it."

"My father chooses the nearest way to the fields when he goes to his labor, and this is not it. I came here for water, and my mother will think I linger long; so farewell." And he lifted his vessel to his shoulder, and turned on his way homeward.

"Not so fast, my young man!" exclaimed Hazael. "Thy words do not satisfy me. I will see thy mother and search thine house."

"That will depend upon her wish. But hasten and follow me, for I have tarried too long already."

The thoughts which occupied the mind of the mother of Joel were many and exciting, but she felt assured that, whatever might be the guilt of him whom she had secreted, one thing was indisputable—he had besought her aid, and thrown himself upon her hospitality with undoubting faith in her honor, and she was therefore bound by every holy consideration to shelter him from evil. "And then," she said, mentally, "I cannot believe he has done anything very wicked. Do I not know Reuben, the son of the noble Ebenezer, a prince of his tribe? and is he not my kinsman? Of a certainty I have a right to protect him. His enemy I know not. But Joel comes, and brings two strangers; I must finish my precautions." She then returned to the court, and removed the small mill used for grinding nearer to the well, filled it with grain, and, kneeling beside it, began turning the handle, while she chanted such portions of the Psalms of King David as she thought would convey most consolation and support to the heart of her imprisoned hearer. "Lord, how are they increased that trouble me! Many are they that rise up against me, but the Lord is my Deliverer." "I called upon Him with my voice, and He heard me out of His holy hill. I will not be afraid what man can do unto me, for Thou art"—here she was interrupted by the entrance of Joel and his companions, who now approached her.

"Thou hast tarried long, my son; I fear thy father must wait for his morning meal. What has detained thee thus long from thy duties?"

"These strangers—I know not their names—are searching for a murderer, and have mistaken me for him," Joel smilingly replied.

Sherah arose, and, saluting them courteously, said: "I marvel for whom thou couldst mistake this stripling; though of a goodly height, his years are but few in number."

"The lad speaks unwisely," replied Hazael. "I seek one whom I saw with him this morning; a man of lofty stature, who parted with him near this house."

"Didst thou not accompany thy father to the field this morning, my son?"

"Of a truth, my mother; and, as thou knowest, he is of uncommon stature. But the man is not satisfied."

"What wouldst thou have?" she asked, turning to Hazael.

"I would see thy husband, of whom thou speakest; and, with thy permission, would examine thy house."

"The early morning suiteth not best with thy purpose; yet thou hast my leave. Joel, lead this stranger through the apartments, and then hasten to call thy father from the field."

With haughty step and frowning brow, Hazael followed the receding form of the boy, while Sherah, as if to reassure her prisoner so entirely dependent upon her faithfulness, resumed her sacred song. "Put thy trust in the Lord, commit thy way unto Him, and He will bring it to pass." And she continued singing snatches of various songs composed by the pious Psalmist of Israel until the return of the other party.

"I trust thou art satisfied," she said to Hazael, as he re-entered the court.

"I am not satisfied. The son of Ebenezer is not in thy dwelling, but he may be hidden in some secret place. I would see thy husband."

"Be it so. My son, accompany this man to the presence of thy father."

"Let my servant go with him; I would stay with thee."

"And wherefore? I like not thy presence alone. I will call one of my maidens."

"Fear me not; thou art beautiful, but I would not harm thee. I seek only revenge on the slayer of my brother."

"And why shouldst thou burden thy heart with the fell passion? He must be tried by the law of Moses, and if found guilty will surely be punished, for thou knowest that the wilful murderer finds no mercy in that law."

"I cannot wait for that slow justice; I must slay him before he reaches the City of Refuge. I thirst to shed his blood with my own right hand, to pierce his heart with my own blade as he pierced the heart of my brother." And he raised his glittering weapon with an air of savage menace.

Sherah started back in indignation. "Thou art thyself a murderer at heart!" she cried. "See that thy fearful thirst be not quenched in thine own blood. Is it the noble Reuben whom thou pursuest with such bitter hate?"

"Even so."

"And why slew he thy brother?"

"It needeth not that I should tell thee, woman; let it suffice thee that his life shall answer for the deed."

The handmaiden now entered the court, and Sherah, addressing her, said: "We go into the house; finish thou the grinding, and prepare the loaf for breakfast." Then, motioning to Hazael to follow her, she led the way into the apartment they had before occupied, and almost immediately were joined by Joel and his father, accompanied by the servant.

"Thou art not summoned to thy morning meal, my husband," said the now smiling wife, "but to certify to this man that thou art not Reuben, the son of Ebenezer, of Heshbon."

Before he could reply, Hazael, advancing to the man, addressed him: "I would ask thee, Eldad—for I know thee, who thou art, and deceit dwelleth not with thee, as with the woman—I would ask thee whether thou ventest forth with thy son at early morning-tide?"

"Of a surety I did so."

"And thou wert with him at the foot of yonder hill?"

"It was even so; thou speakest truly. We had been seeking a strayed lamb, and, restoring it to its bleating mother, I bade him return to the house, and went myself to the field to my labors."

"Hast thou seen that son of Belial, Reuben, of Heshbon, this day?"

"Thy question is harshly put, Hazael; nevertheless, I will answer thee kindly. Many days have gone since I saw the princely Reuben, and methinks he is too busy with his marriage preparations to spend much time abroad; and the beautiful Zillah would claim all his leisure hours."

"She is lovely as the morning cloud!" cried Sherah.

"Ay!" muttered Hazael, gnashing his teeth, "she may weep until her beauty fades like the cloud when the sun withdraws its light, for Reuben shall return to her no more. I have vowed his death, and God so deal with me as I will keep my vow!"

"Hearken to me, son of Ocran!" replied Eldad, sternly, "thou hast intruded into the privacy of my dwelling, thou hast questioned and displeased my wife, thou hast threatened my son with death, and thou hast summoned me from my labor, and all to assure thyself that he for whose life thou thirstest is not hidden within my house; thou hast not found him, and if thou still seekest him, up and away; for he is swift of foot and has many friends, and may escape thee while thou art lingering here."

CHAPTER III.

PLACED near the table at their morning meal, in the house of Eldad, were himself and Joel, and the weary wayfarer who had experienced such signal and timely kindness from Sherah; rest, and food, and present safety had effected a very favorable change in his personal appearance, but the deep dejection of his countenance remained unaltered. When breakfast was completed, he arose to depart, saying to his generous hostess, "The blessing of the God of Israel be upon thee and upon thy house! As thou hast had compassion on the stranger and the fugitive, so may He have mercy upon thee and thine, in thine hour of greatest need." He then turned to address Eldad, but was prevented by him.

"Hear me, I pray thee, my brother! for art thou not of the same tribe, and kinsman to my wife? This is the day of preparation for the holy Sabbath; and beset, as thou knowest thy way is, by great perils, thou canst not reach Bezer at all; time would fail thee to attain a more distant place of refuge, and the sacred day would overtake thee, a wanderer on thy way. Tarry with us, and share the blessings of the hallowed hours under my roof. When a fitting time offers, I will lead thee to a place of security."

"Yea, stay," added Sherah, "and thou shalt learn that, in sheltering thee in thine hour of danger, I was but repaying a debt of kindness which my father owed to thine. Tarry then with us, for thou art most welcome."

"And if thou shouldst now depart," said Joel, archly, "I should not have power to clear myself to thee from the suspicion of falsehood which thou mightest entertain; then, for the sake of mine integrity, thou wilt consent to remain with us."

"Thy reasons are unanswerable," replied Reuben, his sad face lighting up with a smile, "more particularly thine, friend Joel, and I accept the offered hospitality with gratitude, believing thou art sincere in offering it. And now for thine explanation."

"First let me say," answered the playful boy, "that it was well for me that the madman Hazael had not asked me whether I had seen any other man than my father this morning; if he had, mine integrity would have been sorely straitened; but, happily, he forgot that question in his anger, and I was able to speak the exact truth."

"But he forgot not to ask thy father," observed Sherah.

"Very true, my mother; and as he had not seen any other man this morning, his true answer was all that was needed."

"And where didst thou meet our princely guest, my son?" inquired Eldad.

"After thou hadst left me for the field, my father, I obeyed thy command to hasten homeward; but, thinking I heard a noise in the thicket, I returned to the foot of the hill to discover the cause—and there, pale and weary, I saw him resting by the roadside. Was I wrong in offering him the comforts of thine house?"

"Nay; my blessing be on thee, my boy! The Lord loveth the stranger, and thou didst thy duty in protecting him. But why spakest thou not of this thing as we came from the field?"

"The eyes of the servant were upon me, and I could not tell thee. But is it not better that thou knewest it not? Thou hadst nought to conceal, and thy truth confirmed my words."

"Be ever thus, my son," cried the gratified parent; "be wise and prudent, but harmless as the young lamb; mayest thou also be as innocent. But thou, my Sherah, hadst thou no fears that my surprise would betray thee, when I should behold thy well so covered?"

A charming smile beamed on the face of the wife as she answered, "I was careful that thou shouldst not behold it, and therefore met thee in the house."

"What led thee to think of such a place of concealment?"

"I remembered the story of Jonathan and Ahimaaz, and was well pleased to find so good and secure a hiding-place; although I had great fears that my prisoner would grow distrustful from being confined so long."

"Thou wert very kind," said Reuben, "and thy pleasant songs refreshed my spirit, while they gave me full assurance of thy truth and piety; and I praise the Lord God of Israel that although I have sinned grievously, He has remembered mercy, and dealt so graciously with me."

The day wore away in safety for Reuben, and pleasantly to his generous friends, to whom he related the circumstances of his unfortunate rencontre with his rival; his subsequent parting with his mistress; his deep regret that a hasty blow should have been followed by consequences so dreadful; and his determination, on arriving at a place of security, to surrender himself into the hands of those appointed to judge his case, and await their decision. "If it be against me," he said, "I must die; but I will not willingly fall by the hands of an infuriated avenger."

"Thou art right, my brother; nevertheless, thou hast wrought a great evil by bringing the sin of blood-guiltiness upon the land. Be it thy care, by penitence and prayer, so to appropriate the evening sacrifice offered by our High Priest, that Jehovah may pardon thee, and make thine innocence clear in the sight of man from all intentional wickedness."

An hour before the setting sun had poured his departing beams upon the land of Israel, the family of Eldad had completed their preparations for the approach of the day so sacred in the sight of the Jews, so holy, and so blessed to the heart of the true Christian. The Sabbath began as the sun sank behind the horizon, and, previous to that moment, all the business of the week was to be either completed or laid aside. Eldad and his son repaired to the synagogue; but Sherah, assisted by her maidens, covered the table with a cloth of snowy whiteness, and placed upon it a vessel of wine, and a couple of loaves of newly baked bread, over which was spread a clean napkin; the two loaves, baked on Friday, being used in memory of the manna, which, on that day, fell in double quantities for the children of Israel. On the centre of the table stood a candlestick with seven branches, emblematical of the seven days of the week; and Sherah, on lighting the candles, uttered this prayer: "Blessed art thou, Lord God of the Universe, who hast sanctified us with Thy commandment, and commanded us to light the lights of the Sabbath."

On the return of her husband and son, Sherah welcomed them with an affectionate embrace, and the latter, after returning her caress, besought the blessing of both his parents. "Thy mother's blessing rest upon thee, my son," the fond mother replied. Then Eldad, laying his hand upon the bowed head of the youth, raised his eyes to Heaven, and prayed. "The blessing of thy father also be upon thy head, and may the God of thy fathers do unto thee as he did unto Ephraim and Manasseh." After withdrawing his hand, he bade his son bring water, which he poured upon the hands of his guest, and performing the same ablution himself, he addressed his family, "Lift up your hands in holiness to the Lord;" after which they placed themselves at the supper-table.

While Eldad was pouring out a cup of wine, he repeated from Genesis, "And on the seventh day God ended His work which He had made; and He rested on the seventh day from all His work which He had made. And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it: because that in it He had rested from all His work which God created and made." Then blessing the wine and tasting it, he distributed it to his family: the bread was consecrated and distributed in the same manner; and thanks, after supper, completed the duties of the ceremonial law for the evening.

Beautiful and affecting was this constant remembrance of their Heavenly Father, in the eyes of Reuben; and, sorrow-stricken as he was, he experienced heartfelt gratification in witnessing the lovely harmony and warmth of affection produced by it in the members of this small but happy family; and the perfect trustfulness with which each one relied upon, and responded to, the pure faith and unchanging love of the others, and he felt assured that although humble in rank, their lot was far preferable to that of thousands in the more elevated stations in life, who drank not at the fountain of true happiness—obedience to the will of the Almighty.

The holy Sabbath was observed with consistent devotion—every member of the family uniting in such duties of the synagogue as were appropriate to them. Even Reuben, secure in the sacredness of the day, ventured forth, and returned unharmed, although not unseen. Hazeel, still suspicious, had appointed one to keep watch on the habitation of Eldad, who now became aware of his retreat; but other eyes were equally vigilant, and Joel informed his father that a stranger had followed their footsteps as they returned from the second service.

At the conclusion of the evening meal, the son lighted a lamp having two wicks, which he held in his hand, while the father, taking a cup of wine in his right hand, and a box of spices in his left, uttered a short prayer; then changing the contents of his hands, he concluded the ceremonial by another prayer. The family inhaled the fragrance of the spices and drank the wine, thus intimating that the holy Sabbath was separated from all other days, and ended; this cup of wine being called Habdallah, or the cup of separation.

(Conclusion next month.)

THE ideas, as well as children of our youth, often die before us; and our minds represent to us those tombs to which we are approaching, where, though the brass and marble remain, yet the inscriptions are effaced by time, and the imagery moulders away. Pictures drawn in our minds are laid in fading colors, and, unless sometimes refreshed, vanish and disappear.

MR. AND MRS. RASHER.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MISS SLIMMENS."

CHAPTER III.

SHOPPING.

O LUD, Rasher, Fitz-Simmons and I have had such a day! Has Thomas announced dinner yet? I'm tired to death, and so hungry I can hardly wait to get rid of my wraps. Here, Rosine, take my furs and bonnet, and then descend and command Thomas to ascertain if the dinner is ready to be served. (I always love to use good language when I'm speaking to Rosine, she's such a stylish person for a maid.) If there's anything calculated to make a woman tired and hungry, it's going shopping. Fitz-Simmons and I have been shopping from morning till night, as you might say. She was glad of my carriage to get in and out of before Stewart's, and Tiffany's, and Ball & Black's, and Arnold & Constable's, etc., with Patrick in his new livery, and our coat-of-arms on the panels, and everything; and I was glad of her good taste and experience. Lal she's as familiar with camel's hair shawls as she is with her own name, and knows diamonds from paste about as well as the jewellers themselves; and as for lace, she knows every style and quality, which is all very useful to me, who don't know anything about them. The clerks all know her, and they're killingly polite to her and whoever she brings with her, for they know that, if she cannot buy much herself, she always brings rich friends along. It's so queer I can't get used to it, though it's very pleasant and agreeable to have them running out to the carriage to take our orders, and carry our parcels, and making footmen of themselves, you might say, to open our carriage door for us, and showing us the very best of everything, at the same stores where a few years ago I used to slip in so modestly to buy a plain silk or merino, and be asked whether I wanted a cheap article, and my answers hardly heard, whether I did or not. But there's dinner, and let's go down. Why am I like the soup? I don't see any resemblance. Because we're both deer to you, and both turtle, and you always like to see us both at the dinner-table? Dear me! Well, sit down.

I do admire them clerks so—some of them; they're perfect! so gentlemanly, and so well dressed! they bow so elegantly, and have their hair always cut in the very latest fashion. What's that? Pity I hadn't married one of 'em? Pshaw, Rasher! you know I think enough of you; though, I must say, it's the one trial of my life that you ain't more gentlemanly. But, if you are a plain little man, you're a good provider. I don't expect them drygoods clerks sleep with rose-colored silk curtains around their beds when they're at home, but you'd think they did, to see 'em waiting upon customers. I don't know what we should do without them. Some of those disagreeable reformers, who try to make us think everything is wrong, and rich people have no business to spend all their money on themselves, and poor women can't find enough to do if they're disposed to work, pretend to believe we ought to employ lady clerks; but I, for one, abominate 'em, and I guess the merchants know they wouldn't sell so many expensive things if it wasn't for the fascinating manner in which those young men recommend them. They're my beau ideal precisely, and I'm willing you should hear me say it. If there were only women in the stores, we would only go shopping when we had something to buy; but, as it is—Do we go when we don't want to buy? What a question, my dear! I didn't think you were so simple. Why, how much do you suppose I have spent to-day? Not twenty dollars, and I've looked at thousands of thousands of dollars' worth of lovely things. How would we spend our time, when we're bored to death for something to do, if it wasn't for going a shopping? I know lots of ladies who vow they should go insane if it wasn't for this amusement. They don't care about reading, unless there's a first-rate new novel out, and there's nothing to do from breakfast to dinner three days of the week, allowing one day for receiving calls and two for making 'em, as it's not very often we have a matinee to help us. I never used to have any difficulty about passing away the time? Will you help me to another slice of the roast turkey? Thomas, bring some ice-water. (I do wish you'd be careful what you say before the servants, especially Thomas. That fellow's the torment of my house, yet I can't get along without him. What do you suppose I heard him telling Mrs. Clarence Cornell's butler, who was over to see him last night? I happened to be at the dumb-waiter, and heard him, down in the dining-room, as plain as day. He said, if it wasn't for the extra wages, he wouldn't stay with us a month; that we was very good people, and didn't look any too close after the leavin's, but we was parvenues; he'd never lived with parvenues before! What do you see in that to laugh at? The fellow's deserving of a better place? I do believe you laugh just as heartily when the joke's against as when it's for you.) You can bring on the pudding, Thomas. (He said, also, that he'd a dozen bottles of champagne laid up for the party. I inferred it was to come off the first night we should be out late.)

Did I buy me a shawl to-day? Didn't I just say that I hadn't spent twenty dollars? I wouldn't wear a camel's hair that cost less than seven hundred. No, I didn't take any, for it's getting rather late in the season for them; but I looked at two or three hundred in the course of the day. I did intend to take a velvet cloak, but Fitz-Simmons persuaded me to wait until next week; "because," as she whispered to me just as I was going to order it sent home, "we can have the pleasure of deciding next time; there's always such a charming excitement about purchasing a velvet cloak!" Poor dear! she hasn't had that excitement for the last two years. What little money I did spend was for her. She coveted a lace-set so much, and I knew she needed it badly, and so I made her a present of it. She'll be in a good humor with me for the next month; and, to tell the truth, I like her best when she's most pleased; she has a cool kind of way of saying things to you and about you when she isn't. Why is such friendship like pork? You can answer that best yourself, my love. Because it has a marketable value? To be sure it has; she and I understood that thoroughly. As she says herself, "she is my letter of introduction; I couldn't any more get along without her than a stranger in a foreign land could without his passports." That was such a funny idea about the foreign land; she thought I didn't understand it fully, but I did. There's a mighty distance, I can tell you, between B—— Street and a three-story brick and the Avenue and a four-story brown stone; it's as far as from here to Paris, though, to be sure, a person can travel it in fifteen minutes by stage. And, for your part, you don't feel any more to home in it than you would in Paris; if you could get back to the old place, you'd be happy as a pig in clover? It's astonishing what a difference in tastes there is! Now, Fitz-Simmons, she—Blast Mrs. Fitz-Simmons? How can you be so wicked as to use such language, Rasher? You'd like to blow her up, you mean! I'll warrant you! You can't even let me have a female friend in peace. You hurt my feelings, sir, speaking in that manner of a woman who—"Ought to be barrell'd up." O horror, Mr. Rasher! barrel up my dearest friend! Nothing could have put such a savage, such a ferocious idea into your head except the business you follow. It all comes of your dealing in mess pork, I know it does. You only meant that, as she was always getting other persons into a pickle, she ought to be pickled herself? Excuse yourself for your unnatural ferocity in that way, if you please. Very well, I'll let it pass; but if she ever disappears mysteriously I shall know where she has gone to. I don't know but I shall begin to be afraid of you myself. I've always heard that butchers were cruel and hard-hearted, and, though you are not a butcher exactly, you and they have dealings together, and you may catch it of 'em. Another cup of coffee! How long will it take you to learn that it's not genteel to take more'n one cup after dinner, and that you shouldn't take cream in it? I'll let you have it, seeing we are alone; but I'd advise you to begin to practise, so as not to forget at my next dinner party.

Fitz-Simmons is so sorry I didn't get my carriage earlier in the season, as she and I could have had a splendid time showing it off in the Central Park. She's nearly crazy to get to drive out there with a new carriage, and new liveries, and coat-of-arms, and all. We're going out to-morrow, if it's fine. There'll be dozens and dozens of our friends there, and she says it'll be glorious to show 'em we can go as well as they. You know you won't be back from your warehouse in time to go; and she's promised to accompany me every time. You had thought of trying to get home to-morrow to drive out with me, as you'd like to see the improvements? Couldn't you put it off till some other day, my dear? I'd just as soon you'd go along as not—almost; but Fitz hadn't, I know. There! you needn't look mad! I don't wonder she don't take to you particularly, when you talk of treating her as if she were a—a—don't flirt your chair back in that manner, if you please. I declare, if you ain't tilting it against the wall, and putting your feet on the rungs! I've always scolded you about that, ever since the first nice set of chairs we got, after we'd been eight months to housekeeping—six mahogany ones, with black haircloth cushions. I took more comfort with those chairs than I do with all the lot we've got in our parlors now, because they were the first nice ones I'd ever had. It used to worry me so when you'd tip back in 'em and put your feet on the rungs when you was telling your stories of evenings; and I'd say, "Remember, my dear!" and you'd laugh, and say, "A man that had worked hard all day ought to take some comfort in the evening with a nice home and a nice wife in it;" but you'd take your feet down, for all. I believe you was better tempered then than you are now. You guess it's I that was better tempered? There's Thomas back again, and let's go in the library, where we can have some peace talking, without a low fellow eavesdropping every word. My! I guess I've eaten too much dinner, by the lump I feel in my stomach; but shopping always makes me dreadfully hungry; it's about as hard work as I care to do. I picked out a set of pearls to-day for Cerintha, for a Christmas present when she's home from school; and a diamond brooch and earrings for myself. Mrs. Fitz-Simmons advised me to take them. She said it was getting to be such hard times that every such thing was cheaper than usual, and it was a splendid time to buy. You guess you'll have to put a stop to all such extras for the present? Why so? It's hard times for you as well as other folks? Nonsense, Rasher! you're not going to frighten me into being economical. Folks have got to eat, if it is hard times; and as long as there's people to eat pork will sell. You see I know something about business, if I am a woman. I'm going for the things to-morrow, and you may expect they'll be sent home to-morrow night. The bill will come with them, and you'll have it to pay. You'd advise me not to order them? Seems to me that you're taking on uncommon airs to-night. You're not taking on airs, but you do not choose to be regarded as a convenient household machine out of which money can be pumped whenever wanted, and the rest of the time to be kept out of the way as much as possible? Oh! you're referring to the ride, are you? There's plenty of women ride around without their husbands at their side every instant; women that have got stylish husbands, too, of whom they might be proud. The reason why I suspected Fitz wouldn't care about your company to-morrow is that she has invited a friend of hers to go along, a very fine young man that you could have no objection to. There's room in the carriage for four? Perhaps there is, if you insist upon going along. We'll try and make room for you, if you want to go. You don't want to go? Then what have you been making all this fuss about? Men are so unreasonable! I think they were made to provoke and torment the female sex. We'd get along better if every one of them was banished to some world of their own! Only I don't know who'd settle the bills, and keep out house-breakers, and bring us our coal and kindling-wood, and keep the boys in hammers and hobby-horses; though, to be sure, the children then would all be little girls, and wouldn't want anything but dolls, which we could make for them. What's that? I've forgotten those delightful clerks! How could I get along without them? It's very true it would be rather melancholy work, shopping and giving parties, and all that; but we wouldn't have to be bothered with husbands, which would be a privilege worth making some sacrifices for, and—la! there's the Schottish and the Lancers; we'd have to dispense with those sweet dances, which would be a great disappointment to the girls, just as they are ready to come out. I'd be willing there should be a few men in the world, if they were all what they ought to be. Why am I worse than my own wish? Dear me! I can't guess, and I don't want to. But why am I, my love? Because that was a rash wish, but I am a Rasher! Oh, I'm not going to be coaxed into a good humor by a vulgar conundrum. You think yourself so very witty, just let me return the compliment. What would the women do if the men were all banished to another sphere? Try to go after them? No, that's not it. What is it, then? Well, I don't know myself; but I thought I'd pay you back in your own coin, you're always so dreadfully funny.

What are you leaning your head down on that piano cover for? It aches, and you were wishing Felicia was at home to play for you? She's a splendid pefessor they say, better than Cerintha. I'm glad she's got something to set her off, and help her make a good match, for she's not near so pretty as her sister—she's dumpy, like you. Good gracious, Rasher, how you startled me! What did you thump your fist down in that style for? If you'd only remember that ladies have nerves, you'd be more agreeable. You were thinking of your children—wondering if they would have to come home, learn such trash, and live such lives as we are living? As if there could be any better way of living! Why, we live nearly as well as the Cornells, and my girls will be envied by the most of their acquaintances. Thinking of their moral and spiritual lives? If you mean, as the father of a family, to insinuate there's anything immoral about this house, speak out plainly, and you'll hurt my feelings less; while, as for spiritual, you get beyond my comprehension there. I'm a consistent member of a highly respectable church; I had my children baptized in their infancy; and I presume the girls will be confirmed in their mother's church; of their own accord, after they've had a season or two of gayety, which it is very natural they should desire. Now, sir, I want you to explain yourself, and if you've any charges to make, make 'em. This is the first time I've seen tears on your cheeks since we buried little Timothy, and if you've any good cause for 'em, let me know. You did not intend anything so serious as I inferred, but you do not like the frivolity, the want of real happiness, the attempt to show off—. There! there! you needn't go any farther. If that's all you've got on your mind, you may keep it there. It's infringing on the privileges of our sex for a man to be giving curtain lectures; and if you ain't curtain-lecturing exactly, you're meddling with the affairs of the house, which if you don't quit, you'll see me down to the warehouse some day, carrying on your business for you. My girls are girls for any mother to be proud of—graceful, stylish, educated—up to the ropes in good society, and capable of setting an example to you and me both; and what you find to cry about on their account is a mystery to me. And now, I'm going to the opera to-night; if you want to go along, you may. You guess you'll step over to Brown's and spend the evening? I think it's a very good idea; you hav'n't been there for some time now. Give my love to Mrs. Brown, and if she asks why I hav'n't been there for so long, tell her I've been extremely busy—"shopping and riding with more fashionable friends"—but am going to come soon and take tea with her. You can't see what there is in the opera?

Neither can I, so far as the music is concerned, but I can see a good deal through my opera-glass that's interesting to me; and it's an excellent place to wear handsome things. When Fitz is in my box, as she usually is, we have such pleasant chats with the young men, between acts; and there is no better place to display jewels and mantles and dress bonnets; besides, it won't do not to be there. I don't understand the music, but I pretend to, and when young Grimace says "divine!" "superb!" I say, "it is indeed perfectly refugent!" or cast up my eyes, sigh, and say nothing, which is much more effective. When Fitz-Simmons leans forward and holds her breath, I do the same. I dare say, none of our set knows but what I am enraptured, when I'm dying with impatience to have Pattie done with her screaming, so that I can finish the sweet conversation I was having with our friends before she began. But la! I hear the carriage coming to the door, and I've got my dress to change yet. Good-night, my dear, take care of yourself; I suppose Mrs. Brown will treat you to some ginger-nuts and bottled cider. You'll be home and asleep before I get back. If you're tired, you'd better take the stage down as far as B— Street. Good-night.

CHAPTER IV.

THE DRIVE.

DID I enjoy my ride this afternoon? Oh, immensely! It's so fortunate you weren't along, Rasher, for I hadn't much more'n driven around for Fitz and her friend, before we saw Grimace sauntering along the avenue, as if he didn't know what to do with himself, and so we picked him up and took him along, and he was so delighted with the chance, it would have been a pity not to have given it to him. He isn't able to keep even a single horse to ride out on, though he hires one from Disbon occasionally, and it was a real treat to him to show himself off in such an elegant establishment as ours. Of course, as you own an establishment, you can go wherever you please, and it wouldn't have been such a treat to you. You don't see as you can? Well, who prevents? I'm sure you can have the carriage whenever I'm not using it. Don't you ride down to your place of business in it every once and awhile? It was such an Injun-summer kind of day, everybody was taking advantage of it; I don't suppose we shall have another such a day this season. The next time I go to the Central Park I presume I shall go upon skates—after I get there, I mean. You'd advise me not to try skates at my time of life? And why not, I'd like to know! You are afraid of the consequences of a fall to a woman weighing nearly two hundred? Pshaw! I don't weigh an ounce over an hundred and seventy-five, and if I go upon parlor-skates there'll be no danger of my falling. Fitz can cut figures on the ice, she's so expert. What kind of a figure do you think I'd cut?—the figure of a pig on the ice? This isn't the first time, Rasher, you've compared your wife to those vile animals in whom you deal. A man with one particle of refined feeling in his breast would never be guilty of so indelicate an allusion. It's well I'm as large as I am, and able to take my own part, for a man who can say such things wouldn't hesitate to whip his wife, if he was big enough. But you ain't, my love, and you know it. You're under my thumb pretty well, and if you don't behave yourself I'll allow you less privileges than you have now. You sha'n't come into the room at all when I've company, and you'll have to go up a story higher to sleep; it's ridiculous to think of you sleeping under a silk counterpane. What's that? I've got a sty coming on my eye! I haven't either—I never had one in my life. My eyes are red, riding in the wind to-day. The next thing in order you'll be accusing me of having four feet, and being a biped and done with it.

I don't know when I've enjoyed myself so well as I did to-day. My hat was as handsome as any I saw, and my cloak was splendid. I went out this morning and got the velvet I was speaking of. Our carriage is very well calculated to show off our dress. Next year I mean to have one made so that people can see to the best advantage all I have on, down to my gaiters, with a fender round it to keep off the mud; it will be so pleasant to ride around, like a queen on a throne, without mussing up your skirts any, and very beneficial to the health. My health is not so good as it might be; I have a pain in my stomach after eating turtle-soup, or ducks with dressing; probably, next summer, I shall have to ride a great deal for my health. I intend to take our establishment to Newport. And, oh, dear me, Rasher, don't you think you'll be able to afford a set of gold-mounted harness by that time? I saw a set to-day—it was splendid! and I felt so provoked at our plain silver mountings. I think it's almost the height of bliss to recline in a luxurious carriage, with your best things on, and drive slowly around and around the Drive, nodding to your friends as you pass 'em, and scrutinizing them at your ease. I never expected to arrive at such an earthly Paradise when I married you, Rasher. You've worked hard enough to bring it about, and think I ought to show a little gratitude, instead of trying to crush you out of existence, as it were! I have never tried to crush you out of existence, my dear. If you'd do as I've asked you to so often, I should bring you forward all I could. All I want is for you to wear kid gloves, and not put your hands in your pockets, nor talk about your business, nor slap folks on the shoulder when you're talking to 'em, and not talk so much in company, and leave off them horrid flowered vests, and learn a few French phrases, and keep quiet, and dress in black. Now, what are you smiling about? You were thinking, if you should do all that, I'd be guilty of bigamy? How so? Because you wouldn't be the man I married any more?

You aren't putting your hat on to go anywhere, are you? Going to your club! Rasher! have you joined a club? Didn't you always promise me you would never do it as long as you had a wife and children? You might as well have none! It's very bad and unreasonable for you to fling out in that way because I occasionally go out evenings, when you stay to home of your own choice. It will be very uncomfortable coming back from parties and places, and finding you not back from your club yet, and having to be disturbed by your coming in after I've retired; and that's the way it will be if you belong to one of those horrid things. You'll get to card-playing and telling your never-ending stories till after midnight. I pity the club that you'll belong to; obliged to listen to your stale jokes and tedious anecdotes, and perhaps having you play practical jokes at their expense; and it'll cost enough to get me them diamonds. There! I guess that's them now; and if you don't take them and pay for them, I shall be so mortified I shall never want to go to that store again. "A consummation most devoutly to be wished?" There they are, sure enough! just look at them, my love—beauties! It would be disgraceful to send 'em back, and the messenger's waiting for your check. You guess you'll give him a check? Oh, my dear, don't keep me in such suspense; say yes or no. There, that's a good little man! I knew you would! Come, hang up your hat again, and sit here in my boudoir. I don't expect any company to-night, and we'll have a real old-fashioned chat together. See this lovely Egyptian vase that I brought come yesterday. It looks to you like an ugly earthen jug? That's because you don't appreciate it. Our tastes require cultivation, Mr. Critic Aster says, and it's true. Now, I didn't see to like Sultana Sauce with my roast beef, and I do since I've cultivated a taste for it. By the way, what was you quoting to Critic Aster the other night, with such a grand flourish, that made Mrs. Cornell and others laugh at me? He was saying something to you about the divine mission of the writer and poet, or some such highfalutin' I didn't entirely understand, and you—"Told him I considered that the pen was mightier than the sword;" and, while he was bowing and smiling his acknowledgment of the compliment, I added, 'The pig-pen, I mean, of course, sir, to which I owe all of my prosperity.' " He'll never come here again, Mr. Rasher, after such an avowal as that, and I was just priding myself upon having induced him to come to my house; he's quite the fashion, and I was tickled to death to get him, and you've went and gone and ruined everything, as usual. It's up-hill business getting into the best society when one of the team is pulling back with all his might.

LOLA LEIGH.

BY EDWARD ESTANG.

LOLA LEIGH lived on the river,
Close upon the river edge;
There the cottage of her father
Stood behind an orange hedge.
Her eye was bright with joyous lustre,
And she sang from morn till night;
Never did I pass that cottage
But I heard her with delight.
Never did she have a lover;
Never did she seem to care
Whether there was one to woo her,
And her happiness to share.
But when once I stole beneath
The orange trees that grew close by,
I saw her stop a moment singing,
Look up to God, and sweetly sigh!

Ah, that sigh was not of sorrow,
No regret did it bespeak;
Not a tear-drop drew a line
Of care across her lovely cheek—
But her voice again so sweetly
Rang out clearly in the air,
And I ever shall remember
What the words of her song were:

"Lovely, lovely orange tree,
Oft I've sat beneath thy shade,
And have eaten of thy bearings—
Precious fruit which God hath made;

My delight has always been
To wander here among thy boughs;
Thou hast heard my prayers to Heaven,
Thou hast witnessed all my vows.

"Lovely, lovely orange tree,
Thou hast been my sole delight;
Not a day since God did make me,
Have I passed without thy sight:
Now, my lovely orange tree,
I will never, never leave thee
Till my father with the angels
Up in Heaven shall receive me!"

Such a song sang Lola Leigh
As I beneath the orange laid,
And I never will forget it—
Sang so sweet the lovely maid.
But when next I wandered thither,
Lola's voice I did not hear;
God had called her up to heaven—
But the orange trees were there!

NOT LOST.

BY CLARA AUGUSTA.

You call her lost, and say that nevermore
Her gentle presence can be found us here;
You think that one shut in by heaven's bright door
Would never wish to leave that harbor dear;
But while I wept last night, my dripping eyes
Glanced upward through the gloom of leaden bars,
And then I saw that on the soft, pale skies,
Another star shone 'mid the host of stars.

And still I missed her—missed her happy voice,
Her quiet voice that I had loved so well;
I said, "How can my lonely heart rejoice
When she has gone so far away to dwell?"

And then, while anguish paled my faithless brow,
And doubt crept in to anchor in my breast,
A blessed zephyr, like her voice so low,
Breathed musically from out the fragrant West.

A little comfort came—I'd felt her breath,
Not cold and icy, as when last she kissed
Me, with her lips pressed close by tyrant Death,
And her blue eyes curtained with heavy mist.
But yet I called God stern in his fixed law,
And thought he was too cold to merit love;
I said, "His mercy hides itself in awe"—
And blamed the King enthroned o'er realms above.

Then, wandering in my garden's linden walks,
Down by the fountain hushed in the still hill,
Remembering all the tender twilight talks
I'd had with her now lying dead and chill—
I found upon a vine a single rose
I'd never seen on that green bush before,
Its petals white as the white cheeks of those Who've folded up their hands to toil no more.

O star! and breath of wind! and balmy flower!
Sweet comforters! she loved ye—so may I;
And when the memories of my great grief lower,
I'll look from earth up to the starry sky—
To see her spirit shining sweetly down,
To catch her breath in breezes on my brow,
And see, in roses, emblems of the crown
Which rests upon her saintly forehead now.

TWELFTH-NIGHT.

BY FRANZ FRANCO.

GENTEELY descended and connected, wealthy, talented, and accomplished, of genial disposition, just returned from a five years' residence in Paris, a bachelor of thirty-five, of course Frank Allen was extensively "cultivated" by his friends and acquaintances generally. He was eccentric, whimsical very—well, that only made him more attractive; gave proof of an original genius. Your common geniuses may indeed affect oddity, but it is never labyrinthine. One glance gives you the clue, and they can never again surprise you, for you know all the crooks and turns, all the ins and outs of their affectation; indeed, by this you know that it is an affectation. Oddity is always native; it can never be naturalized. But, as we were saying, or rather intended to say, Frank Allen's oddity was innate. His popularity had been vastly increased of late by the applause which had accrued to him as the profit of a course of lectures on "France and her Emperor." 'As this was a private affair, the audience being composed of the select circle of friends to whom he chose to present tickets, of course it was also a very genteel affair. Each one present, being pleased to be thus distinguished from the common outside multitude, was in the best of humor, and inclined to do full honor to the intellectual entertainment provided for them, which, to do it justice, was really worthy of great commendation, though it might fairly be a question if they would have discerned its merits so readily had they been of the excluded crowd, and allowed to read a report of it at their own quiet firesides; of course "delivery is a great deal!" (We hope, reader, you will infer we were there!)

Mrs. St. Simon gave her usual Twelfth-night party on the evening succeeding the last of the lectures. These parties were always nice easy affairs, very select and very social. All of the lower rooms were thrown open to the guests, who, collected together in circles as their tastes inclined, could find seats enough to enjoy a pleasant time comfortably. Frank Allen gracefully bestowed himself in an arm-chair which occupied the centre of the library, the group around him being composed of his most ardent admirers, the litterati and literaculi of the assembly, and perhaps we should add, as a separate class, some very pretty and very marriageable young ladies, whose intellectual proclivities were rapidly developing under the anxious chaperonship of their worthy mammas. We would not be understood as saying that all the intellect gathered under Mrs. St. Simon's roof was inclosed within the four walls of the library, or that all within that inclosure were constitutionally inclined to brain fever, for to either assertion many exceptions might be made; we only intended the penultimate remark as a general one.

This explained, we may proceed to say that the allusion was naturally made to the lecture of the preceding evening, and finding it, apparently, a very interesting subject to the company, Frank Allen was led to speak, somewhat at length, of beautiful France, ending with the remark: "But now I have come home to live and am looking round for a wife; so, young ladies, if you deem me an exemplary young man, worth patronizing, I commend myself to your good graces!" And he finished with a graceful bow to the ladies addressed, some of whom blushed, others smiled frankly, two or three were very busy with their bouquets, and one or two looked decidedly cross!

"Well," said the father of three daughters, "you must indeed be hard to please, if the spring finds you 'fancy free.'"

"The lady I shall choose," said Allen, with an air half-serious, half-gay, "must answer three several tests; and in this age, such ladies must be very rare;" and he rose to examine a painting. A half hour later, a hand was laid upon his shoulder, rather roughly, inasmuch as it served to turn him almost half-way round, and blunt Captain Summers exclaimed—

"Frank, lad, what on earth induced you to declare you were looking for a wife? Don't you know you have drawn down upon yourself the fire of all the designing mammas and daughters, and frightened away all the modest, worthy girls, with the fear that they may be thought designing?"

"Don't fear for me," replied Allen, gayly; "I had a design in what I said. Only please don't dislocate my arm, for I have not yet got a wife to make it pleasant to be disabled."

"Had a design in it, hey?" and the old gentleman stroked his beard in evident perplexity.

"Oh, Mr. Allen, I want to know if it is true, such a funny thing as I heard you said," exclaimed Fanny Ellison, breaking in upon the dialogue.

"What did you hear I said?"

"Why that you were looking for a wife who must pass three tests, and that all the girls in the library had better try for you. Pity I hadn't been there!" and the little lady pouted.

"All right except the advice, Miss Ellison," said Allen, laughing. "I simply intended to commend myself to the attention of young ladies in general, if they thought me a desirable article of household furniture."

"Ah, indeed," said the lady, with the most provoking sauciness in the toss of her pretty head; "and what day do you appoint to decide your selection, and offer your services to the fortunate one?"

"Oh, I don't know; say this day six months," said Allen, carelessly.

"Now, don't you imagine," resumed the lady, "that you are the only one watching and testing." Don't think you have said anything original to-night. You gentlemen study us, but don't forget, in your self-conceit, that we also study you, and are not more easily pleased than you are. Why, I myself have some tests which a gentleman must pass who would win my promise to 'love, honor, and obey.'"

"And pray what may they be?" asked Allen, quickly.

"Why, the first is, that he must first have been refused by at least twenty-five other ladies."

Allen looked at her in surprise.

"Yes," she continued, "I should learn from that that he did not lack courage or perseverance; but, above all, I should have some hope he would have lost some of his self-conceit, and really be quite endurable, for you must allow that, as a class, men are fearfully self-conceited."

"You want a meek man whom you can keep under a little wholesome restraint, I suppose?"

"No," said Fanny, with a quick gleam in her eye, and a very decided tone; "my husband—if ever I can have one—must be able to command me; not because I fear him, but because I love and respect him; and, indeed, this is my second test."

"And your third?" asked Allen, amused.

"Beg your pardon, sir, but I shall expect a return of confidence; I have told you two tests when you asked me, and now, of course, expect to hear two of your tests;" and again the lady smiled an arch, provoking, little smile.

Allen bit his lips in vexation. He had walked right into the trap the artful little lady had prepared for him, and how was he to escape?

"But if I divulge my secret, I put the ladies upon their guard," pleaded Allen.

"Oh, but I promise not to tell any one."

"Suppose I should wish to try my 'tests' upon you; 'forewarned, forearmed,' you know," said Allen, with a forced laugh.

"Me! O dear, that's no use. I warn you I am entirely out of the question."

"Are you engaged?" asked Allen, quickly.

"Saucy!" pouted the lady.

"I beg pardon," said Allen, with a quick flush, for he had spoken upon the impulse of the moment.

The lady bowed, but waited, toying with her fan.

"Confess now that you have been commissioned to extort from me this secret."

"Confess now that you have been most unjustly suspicious," said the lady.

"Is it so?"

"The last, not the first."

"Why, then, do you ask?"

"From my own curiosity to watch the game, and to teach you not to ask questions of others which you are unwilling to have returned upon yourself."

Again Allen bit his lip, though the lady's bright eyes were bent upon his face.

"Ask something else, and release me from the obligation to tell you this."

"I will," said Fanny, with a bewitching smile. "You shall have your choice between telling me this, and informing me of the fact within twenty-four hours after you have offered your services to your captivator, to which bit of information you will please add the lady's name;" and the lady gave her fan the "merry flutter" described by Addison.

"Miss Ellison, there is a call for you at the piano," said a gentleman, approaching, and offering his arm.

"The first or the last?" said she to Allen, as she accepted it.

"The last, if it must be," was his reply, as she retreated.

"Very well, indeed," said Frank Allen to himself, tossing his things right and left, as every man thinks he has a right to do in his own room; "only that teasing little witch, Fanny Ellison—what in the world induced her to play me such a neat little trick? Well, she was merciful enough to let me off at last, for she is too ladylike to hold me to such a promise as that." And, five minutes after this, Frank Allen came as near snoring as a gentleman ever comes. He did not tell his dreams the next morning, so of course we cannot give them.

"Wonder what they can be, Carrie?" said Mrs. Locke to her daughter.

"What what can be, mamma?" asked Carrie, though knowing very well that mamma's thoughts and her own were running in very nearly the same direction.

"Why, those three tests of Mr. Allen's?"

"It's very evident what one of them must be," answered Carrie; "he said such ladies must be rare in these days, or something like it. Now the age is notorious for extravagance, so of course the lady must be economical."

In consequence of this belief, perhaps, it was that Carrie was resolute in her opinion that the dress mamma pronounced very suitable for Mrs. St. Simon's Twelfth-night party would be equally suitable for the next party to which she received a card of invitation, and that to support the justness of this conclusion against mamma's vigorous protestations, she sought the aid of Mr. Allen's eloquence—that gentleman's call happening to interrupt the dispute. Mamma was forced to hear Carrie's wise economy highly commended, but she was not forced to hear that gentleman's exclamation as he closed the street-door—"Saved Locke one good bill, at least; but, Miss Carrie, you have missed your reckoning this time!" A very commonplace little story, this last, the reader will say. Alas! dear reader, that it is so commonplace.

Frank Allen's next call was at Kittie Littleton's; but when ushered into the drawing-room, he found Fanny Ellison was there to keep him company in waiting for Miss Kittie's appearance. It was—well, not very long before Kittie came, looking so sweet and rosy that it did one good to look at her. She had evidently been busy at work, for carelessly thrown around her neck was a skein of basting cotton. Noticing it, Fanny hoped she was not interrupting her.

"O dear, no," Kittie said; "she was only trying to cut herself a morning-dress. She never had tried before, and if Fanny had any bright ideas in her head on the subject, wouldn't she be good enough to impart them?"

Fanny declared she never had thought of cutting her own dresses, and had no idea on the subject.

"And what is your idea in turning dress-maker, Miss Littleton?" asked Allen.

"My idea? Why, I happened to take up a paper the other day that had a distressing long article upon 'Ladies' Extravagance.' Of course it wasn't true, but I began to think whether I had been very extravagant, and where I could retrench. One must have judiciously about so many gloves and kerchiefs, and many yards of lace and ribbon, in a year, you know; and I could not think of a single cent could save, till I thought of this dress; so I began to cut it this morning."

"And how are you succeeding?" asked Fanny.

"Oh, indifferently well," said Kittie; "I have only run up the breadths yet. Why don't you try, Fanny?"

"Oh, Annie Heywood can suit me better than I can suit myself, and she needs the work, and I would rather have the time 'to improve my mind.' That's the phrase, is it not?"

"Well," said Kittie, laughing good-naturedly, "you improve your mind, and I will improve in dressmaking. If you should ever be poor, suppose you could teach, or write a book for living; but not having brains enough for either, I will learn to cut dresses à la mode; that is, I don't get discouraged."

"And give your customers equal parts of drapery and French?" asked Allen.

"Yes," said Kittie, "if I find that fills the money-drawer."

"And you, Miss Ellison—are you going to teach young ladies to talk French, or write books?"

"Not the first, certainly," said Fanny; "I like French well enough to read or study, but I do not like this mongrel, part French and part English, and often bad grammar at that!"

"Is that the reason you never use French phrases?" asked Kittie.

"Yes, as I said, I want one language or the other. An American among Americans, why should I speak French—especially as it must be with an accent that would shock a Frenchman?"

"Why, to prove you have had a fashionable education, and would have made a pretty good monkey, if you had happened to be one, certainly," said Kittie, laughing.

"You read French?" asked Allen.

"O yes, I like to read it, except in stories, part English and part French. But I suppose these ideas do not please you, Mr. Allen, after your long residence in beautiful France."

"Now why could you not have said 'Belle France?'" asked Kittie.

"Young ladies, you know, always claim the right to say what they please," said Allen.

with a graceful bow to each of the ladies, indicating that this was a sufficient answer to both of their questions.

"But," he added, rising to go, "I have been waiting for a chance to offer my services to Miss Ellison on her shopping expedition, for I see she has her shopping-bag upon her arm."

"And I have been waiting," said Fanny, laughing, but not rising, "to have a little private talk with Kittie before I go."

So Allen departed alone.

Lena Athling was Fanny Ellison's most intimate friend; and so it happened, very naturally, then, on a certain Thursday morning, all of the signs predicted a drenching rain within an hour or two, that Fanny should send a very urgent invitation to her to come to "pass the storm" with her. Lena came. The storm did not pass over till Friday, and it had been arranged that the visit should not terminate till Saturday. Various interruptions had prevented any very lengthy confidential chats between them during the day, and Lena's constitutional sleepiness, during the sleepy hours, had before proved to Fanny that it was altogether too hard work to talk and keep her friend awake at the same time. But now a long winter evening was before them, and, as they drew around the glowing grate in Fanny's room, they promised themselves a nice, cozy chat, free from interruption. It was opened by Lena's exclaiming—

"What do you think of Frank Allen, Fanny?"

"Well, I have not made up my mind yet. Some things about him I like much, but, confidentially, Lena, I do suspect he has some other despicable qualities."

"What, for instance?"

"The first thing I think of is——"

A knock at the door, and Biddy announces, "Please, ma'am, Mr. Allen is in the drawing-room, and wishes to see Miss Athling and Miss Ellison."

To paint the disappointment of the friends could not require the pencil of Salvator Rosa, but it would require more words than we have to spare; so we shall only record Lena's exclamation, "How did he know I was here?" as, in no very happy mood, they went to receive their visitor.

"How did you know I was here?" asked Lena, as she took possession of a fauteuil.

"Calling at your father's, I was told you were here; and, as I intended to call here to-morrow evening, I thought I would condense two pleasures into one. I hope I have not disturbed your plans for the evening?"

"But, indeed you have," said Lena; "we had just sat down for a little quiet scandal. I had just asked Fanny what she thought of Mr. Allen, and she had just reached the intensely interesting part which must have followed 'I think,' when you were announced. You ought to be intensely agreeable, this evening, to pay for the nice bit of dissection you have caused me to lose."

"Dear me, how unfortunate!" said Allen. "Pray, can you tell me whether the opinion was going to be favorable, or otherwise?"

"I don't know anything about it," said Lena; "but I doubt not she was going to say, at the very least, that you were a great calumniator of the world of females."

"How so?"

"Why, you know you said, the other evening, that ladies, qualified to be Mrs. Allen, must be very rare."

"Have a little mercy, Lena," said Fanny, laughing; "six months from Twelfth-night he makes his selection. Perhaps we may have a half hour's amusement in studying the peculiarities of this rare woman."

"Six months?" asked Allen, in surprise.

"Yes," answered Fanny, "you gave that time."

"I forgot it, but I will try to meet the appointment; and, by the way, I have met a lady who has passed one of the tests. Somebody says this public announcement of my wants and intentions will frighten from me all but scheming ladies. What do you think?"

"I think it was undoubtedly a gentleman who said it," replied Fanny; "and it is only another instance of manly self-conceit. You all think you are great bargains, anxiously sought for by all marriageable ladies; whereas, the truth is, masculine schemers matrimonial are as ten to one of the like class of our sex. If ever I feel like pardoning a certain coquette who has cruelly wronged a friend of mine, it is when I think how much good she has done by lessening somewhat the pride of some of her too confident admirers. The innocent must sometimes suffer in the punishment of the guilty."

"My dear Miss Ellison, spare your eloquence, I entreat you," interrupted Allen, laughing. "How I do pity the poor fellow who is doomed to pass your tests!"

Of course Fanny made a suitable reply, but we have put on record all of the conversation which it pleases us to make public. We hasten now to report the decision. It was generally understood among Frank Allen's acquaintances that six months from Twelfth-night the decision was to be made. At first, this caused him some uneasiness; but, gradually becoming better satisfied with "the course of human events" in his own case, he had, upon being sorely pressed, declared, a week before the appointed day, that he was now ready to fulfil the promise so carelessly given, so far as it depended upon him. Expectation was upon the tiptoe. None could guess who the lady could be; for, if a particular attention was accorded to one, it was sure to be speedily equalled by some attention to another. Expectation, however, demanded that he should select from among eight of his acquaintances, of whom we have mentioned only four; though candor compels us to allow that our own favoritism, not Mr. Allen's, has drawn the distinction. Among Mr. Allen's gentlemen friends, quite a number of bets were taken upon the chances of these ladies—those who missed their guess being pledged to unite in giving the bride a handsome silver service. Mrs. St. Simons issued cards, for the evening succeeding the eventful day, to all the guests of her Twelfth-night party, with "malice prepense" many said, thinking that the secret might then be discovered.

On the appointed day Mr. Allen called on each of the eight ladies, but the public were unable to decide if to any of them he breathed the important subject. We will tell the reader, however, that his last call was upon Fanny Ellison; and, not to obtrude ourselves too soon, will begin reporting the following, probably in reply to something we have lost:—

"You will remember, Mr. Allen, that I also had my tests; let me see if you can pass them. The first was, you were to have been refused by twenty-five other ladies."

"Surely you are not serious?"

"Indeed, then, I am." And Fanny did not look at all as if she were fibbing. It required some time to convince him that she was really in earnest, and then he was forced to confess that no lady had ever refused him.

"Suffer me to undeceive you," said Fanny, opening an escritoire, and taking therefrom a package of letters. Allen started in surprise, but the lady, unheeding, opened a note and read: "Mr. Allen invited me to attend the concert this evening, but I was obliged to refuse him, being previously engaged." Folding the note again, she remarked: "I have proof of twenty-five similar refusals. You have passed that test, but, had you been critical in your examination of my remark, you would not thus have understood it; but the thoughts of you men are always upon matrimony, and you judge others by yourselves."

Mr. Allen smiled. Evidently Fanny would take her own time to answer his question, and her own way also.

"My second test," continued Fanny, "is the power to command my obedience; and the third, proof that you can keep a secret. Neither has been proved; but," here the lady blushed, "you may tell your friends you have not been refused, and I will consider myself bound to fulfil any expectation such a statement may cause, on these conditions: Within six months you are to pass my second test, and, during that time, no one is to suspect, through word or act of yours, our present relations; and your three tests must not be disclosed."

To this Allen agreed, adding: "I now fulfil the promise to inform you within twenty-four hours after my decision should be declared. I am conditionally engaged to Miss Fanny Ellison."

I presume, reader, there was some more nonsense uttered; but as they alone are responsible for it, let it pass. Allen faithfully kept his promise; and the next year Mrs. St. Simon omitted her usual Twelfth-night party to attend the reception of Mrs. Frank Allen; then, and not till then, did Mr. Allen make known his three tests or requirements: "A common sense and true dignity, which would not be embarrassed by the knowledge that he sought a wife; a sympathy with his great dislike of French phrases in English conversation; and, not least, the good sense to appreciate his good qualities sufficiently to accept his preference."

BEAUTIFUL THINGS.—Beautiful things are suggestive of a purer and higher life, and fill us with a mingled love and fear. They have a graciousness that wins us, and an excellence to which we involuntarily do reverence. If you are poor, yet pure and modestly aspiring, keep a vase of flowers on your table, and they will help to maintain your dignity, and secure for you consideration and delicacy of behavior.

INDUSTRY.—If industry is no more than habit it is at least an excellent one. "If you ask me which is the real hereditary sin of human nature, do you imagine I shall answer, pride or luxury, or ambition, or egotism? No; I shall say indolence. Who conquers indolence will conquer all the rest." Indeed, all good principles must stagnate without mental activity.

LESSONS IN MOSS PAINTING.

BY C. E.

AFTER the picture is sketched, and all the outlines plainly drawn, procure a small quantity of light blue paint; it can be procured at any paint-shop already prepared for use. With a fine brush put the paint where the sky is to be; put it on smoothly, then set it away where no dust can settle on it, and let it remain until it is dry. The upper part of the sky should be darker in color than the lower. If clouds are made, procure tubes of flake white, Naples yellow, vermilion, and ivory black. Light fleecy clouds are made by working in Naples yellow tipped with white. Dark clouds are made by mixing a small quantity of black and white, and, after making them the right shape, tip the edges with Naples yellow. To make a sunset scene, put blue upon the upper part of the sky, and Chinese vermilion, Naples yellow and white, mixed, upon the lower part; then with a brush blend the lower and upper paint together until you can scarcely tell where the blue leaves off and the red commences. A sunset scene is more difficult, and requires more patience, but is beautiful when nicely done.

There are also two other ways of making the sky. One is to procure a sheet of marble-board and glue it to book-board, and then make the sky with colored crayons, after sketching the picture as before directed. Or, paste Bristol board or thick drawing paper upon the book-board and paint with water-colors. Those that understand painting in water-colors, or with crayons, will perhaps find this the easiest manner of making the sky, and it looks nearly as well as when done with oil paints.

WATER.—The water should be made to look as though it reflected what was above it. For large rivers, oceans, or lakes, paint with the same colors that are used for the sky. For a pond, or stagnant pool of water, the colors should be made darker with ivory black, except where small patches of sunshine are represented, when a little Naples yellow may be added. Such small bodies of water should be shaded around the edges with dark green, made of yellow ochre and black. Ripples and waves are made by small streaks of white. The under color should be dry before any of the shadows are added.

Nature should be studied in this matter, and almost every one has noticed that where water is shaded by trees and bushes, it looks almost black, and where the shadow is from a building or boat, it partakes in a great measure the same color of the object which makes the shadow.

The sky and water are the most difficult parts of a moss picture; when these are satisfactorily painted, the rest will be easily accomplished.

MOUNTAINS.—Procure a quantity of fine sand of several different shades. Take out all small stones, bits of wood, or other impurities; this can be done by sifting it through a wire-sieve, taking care to keep the different colors separate. Bluish gray sand is best for the mountains, dark reddish brown for rocks, and a lighter color, more of yellow tint, for roads. Take a small brush and put a thin coat of glue (Spalding's prepared) on the surface where you wish mountains, roads, rocks, and small places that are intended for the beach of the ocean, etc. Be careful, in putting on the glue, to keep the outlines true. Take the sand and cover thickly the places that are covered with glue. Be careful and select the lightest colored sand for the most distant mountains, using darker colors on the foreground. Put the picture aside until the glue has sufficient time to dry, when the loose particles of sand can be shaken off. Mountains look well with the tops made of a lighter colored sand than that used for the base; but care must be taken in mixing it, so that there shall be no distinct dividing line between the light and dark sand. Some would, perhaps, prefer to paint the mountains. If painted, they should be a very bright, grayish purple.

CASTLES, ETC.—All buildings, such as castles, ruins, windmills, bridges, huts, and houses should be made of bark.

To procure the bark, go into the forest and find a birch-tree; one that has been dead a short time is best. Take a knife and peel off as large pieces as possible. Birch bark is the best, but elm bark will do, if it can be procured of the right thickness. The birch bark should be of a rich, dark reddish brown on the inside. After procuring your bark and scraping off all moss, rotten wood, and other imperfections, cut it with the scissors to the shape you have planned for your castle. Each different or separate part of the castle should be formed of separate pieces of bark. Much taste can be displayed in arranging the different shades of the bark, fitting the light and dark together in such a manner that a part of the building looks as though it stood in the sunshine, while the rest lay in the shadow.

After the bark is cut and prepared, place it between two smooth boards, and put weights upon it until perfectly flat and smooth. Then put glue upon the outside (light colored side), place the different pieces where they belong, and put a weight upon them until they are dry. After the bark is nicely glued, paint the windows and doors with ivory black.

If a person can use paints well, the castle may be shaded with burnt umber and raw sienna. These directions are for bridges and buildings of all kinds.

BODIES OF TREES.—Take a piece of old rope (new rope will not do, being too light colored) and thoroughly untwist it; saturate it well with glue, press out all the superfluous moisture, and then place it upon the bodies of the trees already marked. The strands can be divided at the top to form limbs. If the rope is carefully untwisted, it will be easy to place it in the right position. Care should be taken that the bodies of trees are not drawn too straight, as that gives a stiff, awkward look to the whole picture.

Another method is to procure branches of hemlock, strip off the leaves, and glue them on for the bodies; or take elm bark and form the body of the tree with the fibres, nicely glued. The picture must now remain undisturbed until the glue is dry.

HOPES.

BY E. CONWELL SMITH.

ALL day hath my soul been filling
With musical echoes of thought;
I would they had lingered forever,
Such beautiful fancies they wrought.
All day, for the shadowy future,
I've braided bright garlands of hope;
All day I've been gathering roses,
To brighten life's snow-covered slope.

I gathered the bright buds that faded
In sorrow's weird shadows away,
And woke them to life by the magic
That breathe: from Hope's beautiful ray;
I gathered the tears that were trembling
In Memory's mystical cup,
And twined them in Hope's blessed sunlight,
Whose radiance swallowed them up.

I've woven a mantle of gladness,
And hidden my heart in its fold,
Yet still I go mournfully backward
To paths I have trodden of old.
I knelt at the shrine of the buried,
And saw their sweet faces again;
My burden of sorrow was lightened,
Hope bore away half of its pain.

Oh, life hath such beautiful treasures,
Such jewels of light and of love;
And hearts that have grown faint and weary
May hope for their resting above.

ESTHER THORNE.

BY MRS. DUNLAP.

ESTHER THORNE knew little of the gayety and freedom of childhood. She was the only daughter of a family of five children, but, instead of being on that account more petted than she otherwise would have been, it only seemed to make her more the slave of her bustling mother, and noisy, tyrannical brothers. Had there been two girls, their united wills would have made a stand to resist the encroachments made on their rights by their selfish and unthinking relatives; but poor Esther toiled and suffered alone. Her father was a stern man, who seldom noticed his children except to command them; and, although Esther loved him tenderly, yet her fear of him caused her almost to shrink from his presence. Her mother was a busy housewife, entirely occupied with providing for the temporal wants of her family. This world satisfied her, and after she had accomplished what she called a good day's work, she knew no unsatisfied want, such as a mind unfed brings to its possessor. The only talent she valued was the talent for labor; and she mourned unceasingly over Esther's strong taste for reading, as she was convinced it would only render her worthless if persevered in. What could such a woman know of the quiet yet intellectual Esther, whose love for reading seemed ever unsatisfied? Mrs. Thorne, although she had great pride in her boisterous sons, and a certain maternal feeling for Esther, yet never seemed to think she needed rest or play, and was constantly hurrying her from one task to another from morning till night.

With an active, eager, and naturally firm mind, forced into such uncongenial ways, serious evils followed to Esther's disposition. So strong had been the hand of parental authority over her, that her native traits of character had never shown themselves. She had a will strong even to stubbornness; it had never yet been roused to activity, but it caused her by degrees to neglect her tasks, if not closely watched, and steal away to indulge herself in her favorite occupation. The chidings of her mother, too, at her persistence in what she called Esther's idle ways, came at last to be sullenly taken as a matter of course.

As Esther had few books of her own, she borrowed, and read indiscriminately everything that could be found in her circle of acquaintance; and among these there were, unfortunately, many romances of the old style, and as Esther was too young to see the absurdity of many of these tales of devotion, she drank them all in as truth. She began by admiring the heroines, but ended by making herself one, and by the aid of fancy placing herself in their positions.

Her natural reserve and lack of intimate friends of her own age strengthened this tendency so much, that she soon acquired the habit of living in a world of her own that she created in her own thoughts. In this world no one ever chided her, and there was no labor; all was made up of just such love and kindness as her heart yearned for. Gradually her thoughts took one form. She was some day to meet, and that in no ordinary manner, the hero of her dreams, who was to know her as she fancied she knew herself, and who would at once remove her from her uncongenial home to one of his own, where, in the sunshine of his affections, her chilled heart would expand, and life henceforth would be one long day of happiness. Then she was to have leisure to cultivate her taste for study, and when the temptations to wrong-doing were removed, she was to be so good!

This hero, Esther ever thought of as one far exceeding in beauty and excellence any person she had ever seen; and she never once thought of the improbability of such a person, if he even existed, fancying such a shy, homely person as herself. It made such an agreeable variety in her toilsome way of life to build these air-castles while doing the daily work she so much detested, that Esther never stopped to question whether it were a profitable kind of employment or not.

Thus passed year after year of Esther's life until she reached the age of fifteen, when a change took place in her circumstances. Her mother suddenly died, and a sister of Mr. Thorne came to preside over his household; who, being a woman of intelligence, at once understood enough of Esther's mind to sympathize with her, and it was through her influence that Mr. Thorne was induced to send her away to school. Here her zeal and perseverance were such, that she soon stood among the best pupils, and she found herself quite unexpectedly the object of both admiration and envy ; and if some egotism mingled with the natural pride she felt at her progress, what wonder was it ?

But the neglects of her early years, that Esther had so keenly felt, had left too deep an impression on her sensitive nature to be easily erased ; and Esther, though very much liked, still had no intimate friend, and remained plain and unattractive. Knowing herself to be gifted in mind, she gradually came to despise the little arts of dress that would have rendered her plainness less conspicuous. Her lack of knowledge of the world also caused her to think herself better than those who had fewer gifts of mind. Her habit of living in dreamland had become fixed. She was satisfied that no common husband could make her happy ; and as years passed on after her return home, and she saw one after another of her young acquaintances marry and seem happy and contented, Esther smiled with contempt at their commonplace ideas of life.

But at last Esther loved, and, as many another woman has done before, she invested the object of her choice with all the qualities which her ideal lover possessed. What she wished to see in him, with the self-deception of inexperienced love, she saw. To uninterested observers, John Fielding was merely a sensible, good man, but by no means brilliant, and who despised romance or rather sentiment with all his heart. He was quite elated at his success in winning the fastidious Miss Thorne, and if he differed from her frankly expressed thoughts of what married life should be, he did not think it necessary to tell her so ; and so Esther married, firmly believing that she could now rest in the love her strong heart desired.

But, alas for Esther, she had fixed her hopes on an unstable foundation. Her complete isolation in her early years from those of her own age had not taught her how nearly alike are the feelings of every woman's heart. She thought herself alone in her longing for a more perfect union of sentiment than is usually found in married life, nor did she know how many a woman must see the gilded visions of girlhood fade away, and stern reality fill up the picture. Her observation of the world, after she reached the years of womanhood, had failed to correct her falsely conceived ideas of life, and consequently, after a few months, when Esther began to find that her husband was merely an ordinary mortal, and prized her as much for her housekeeping qualities as for her gifts of mind, that he loved his own will better than he did hers, and did not anticipate what would give her pleasure, as he did in the days of his wooing, her heart sunk back in dark disappointment, and she almost forgot the worth of his real manly qualities, and ceased to prize, as she should, his genuine affection, because his actions did not shadow it forth as her exacting disposition required. When she found that she had not known him wholly from the first, she charged him with the deception she had practised on herself.

Had Mr. Fielding died after Esther had learned to love him, and before her ideas had been rudely swept away, she would have mourned for him faithfully all her life, but she could not see him as he really was, and adapt herself to the change. To those who do not know how much a woman's life is of the affections this story will have no meaning, for outwardly Esther had everything to make her happy—a home of comfort and taste, and a husband who supplied her wants cheerfully, as far as he knew them, but who had not the gift to understand a woman as morbidly sensitive as Esther.

If he had known all the circumstances which had conspired to form and strengthen her habits of thought, he might have reasoned her into a healthier tone of mind ; but he looked at things at an entirely different stand-point from Esther's. His business cares engrossed his mind, and, happy himself, he could not see why Esther was not so too ; he did not trouble himself about the matter at all, but went his way indifferent to what he called Esther's fancies, while she returned to her old habits of reserve, thinking herself the most miserable of women.

Although she had now plenty of books and leisure to pursue her favorite studies, she was too sick at heart to take pleasure in them. If Esther's trouble was fanciful, it was at least founded upon the natural feeling of every woman's heart to be loved and cherished.

Thus passed away several years, spent by Esther in sullenly struggling with her discontent, and not even could the children that came to her chase away the dark cloud from her mind.

But all truly noble minds have a self-righting power which will sooner or later develop ; and Esther was too good and true to remain ever a prey to evil thoughts. She began to see at last that the world was better as it was than it would be if every person could live for his or her own selfish happiness. She began to have a solid respect for her husband, that he could make himself an honorable name among men, instead of being satisfied with living on the smiles of the woman he loved, as she had once wished. She began to feel that she had a work to do herself, and, if her early neglect and its consequences had unfitted her to fill her station properly, that she must now make herself competent for it. By degrees the labor required of her in superintending her household, which she had from the first performed because she despised slackness, assumed a dignity in her eyes.

As Esther felt a new spirit animate her, she resolved valiantly to throw off the morbid state of mind which had so long possessed her; to strangle any heartaches she might feel for lack of being appreciated; and to find in doing her duty her highest pleasure. The struggle it had cost her to reach this point had been O how severe! but when she had reached it she felt that she had gained a victory.

Esther had just begun to find what great aids self-knowledge and self-reliance are to tranquillity when another change came, but not to her. Her husband, who had always been a prosperous business man, met with several heavy losses, some of them being particularly aggravating, being the result of misplaced confidence in professed friends.

No man, however firm he may be, no matter how much he may profess to the contrary, is above the want of sympathy at times, and how natural and manlike it was in Mr. Fielding to turn to Esther for comfort in his troubles, confident of her being ready to give it, as if he had not turned a deaf ear to her whenever he had chosen!

And Esther, true wife that she was, did not fail him, but soothed him to the best of her ability; and, as he had the utmost confidence in her discretion, it was a great relief to his feelings to rehearse to her his sources of irritation. But there was one thing about Esther, that he now began to perceive for the first time, that quite disconcerted him. Although she studied his wishes in every respect as usual, and sympathized with him whenever he opened his heart to her, yet she seemed to take his confidence and friendliness as coolly as if it were no longer necessary to her enjoyment. Now that it was gone, he missed and yearned for the old passionate warmth with which she used to greet him. The thought of her becoming indifferent to him he had once deemed impossible; but now, as he watched her day by day and saw that her calm manner was real, not assumed out of resentment, his heart felt many a pang keener than it had ever known before. In truth, Esther had lavished her affection on him with such prodigality that the fountain of her heart was dry, and though her mind was active as ever, feeling seemed dead. If ever it should revive again depended on whether her husband should take the right means or not.

Happily for them both, Mr. Fielding was a man of warm heart as well as good sense, whose knowledge of woman was an undeveloped sense, as yet. His misunderstanding of Esther had not been so much a wilful disregard of her feelings as an ignorance of the workings of a sensitive heart. Now that he was tried, he found himself as weak as he had once thought her. But he did not stop to mourn over what he feared to be the loss of her love; earnestly yet tenderly he strove to win it back. He no longer thought it a stain on his manhood to manifest his feelings by little kindly acts, and he found to his astonishment that women prize these small attentions more than they do important benefits. With all his care and tenderness, it took him a long time to win Esther from her indifference, but when he did he prized her love as his most precious treasure.

It was a true and generous affection that grew out of the wreck of their former selfish regard for each other. Gradually they grew to be more alike in their tastes; Mr. Fielding lost some of his worldliness, and came to take pleasure in Esther's intellectual pursuits, and Esther learned, not only to love more wisely, but to set a proper value on the homely virtue of industry.

Now, in the enjoyment of the first substantial happiness she has ever known, Esther looks back on the past with a thoughtful eye, and strives so to understand and educate her own daughters that they may avoid her mistakes.

NOT ALL A WAIF.

BY W. S. GAFFNEY.

*Here all life's dreams are only quenched in sadness,
And hearts so formed for bliss are still unblest.*

THE calm, sweet, and beautiful face of a little innocent child always seems to us like the vision of an angel. Faces wreathed in rosy smiles, eyes beaming with the halcyon rays of youth, and hearts beating with the buoyancy of juvenescent expectation are truly a picture to dwell upon with emotions of heartfelt felicity. The day-god rises in regal splendor, auspicious of hope and happiness, and joy and hope buoy up the heart of truth and innocence. There is also an Eden brightness in every eye that goes to the heart; a sweetness

Now here and now there, giving warmth as it flies
From the lips to the cheeks, and the cheeks to the eyes!

How beautiful is the infant smile of innocence! How beautiful is the Eden-tinted bud, seated upon the knee of her who bore it, and who loves it with all the tenderness of a mother's best affection! How beautiful is the cherub in the cradle! How beautiful is the guileless sports of innocence, like a lamb in the Saviour's bosom! Beautiful is an infant, any and everywhere. Beautiful in life; ay, beautiful in death! Innocence is beauty, and O that the loveliness of Eden-tinted buds might never come in contact with the nettles of this earth! O that the unconscious bliss of innocence might never be roused by the lyre of sin and defilement! Sweet is the sleep of innocence, and O that the windows of the soul might never ope to the reality of incarnate things, or the heart ever weep for the beauty of lost innocence! Alas, then, for the slaughter of the innocents!

Being apprised of the important charge that you have, parents, in the person of your offspring, do you cherish them in accordance with their excelsior worth! Ah, we fear not.

Many a sweet lip is kissed as it says "good-by," and many a love tear moistens the mother's eye as she bestows a heartfelt "God bless you!" upon her precious blossom, and sends it upon its mission to school. But does it ever occur to the mother's mind that she is at the same time sending her blossom into the poisonous atmosphere of death? O let us not thus slaughter the innocents who surround us, and for whose welfare parents are irrevocably responsible! Let us not prison them too closely in the school-room, nor, while providing for their mental culture, neglect their physical wants. Let them breathe the free atmosphere of heaven—the pure ether of life—and suffer them to romp and skip untrammelled among the beauties of nature, those beauties which, transient as they are, would seem to be their existing counterparts. Let us not slaughter the innocents in the school-room nor under the roofs of their own youthful homes. Death will come soon enough—alas! too soon in his advent into the bosom of many a happy home.

I know not of anything more delightful to witness than the full and joyous expression of conscious happiness; that pure, unclouded ray of light which seems to emanate from the soul, and which beams glowingly and tenderly in faith; like the rainbow on the cloud, it seems to seal the promise of future happiness. But, alas! the "garland will fade, and so will the smile."

'Tis well that "coming events [do not always] cast their shadows before;" and 'tis well that mankind are not permitted to lift the veil of destiny and prognosticate the future—to know the day when the fiat of death may go forth, and the thunderbolts of misfortune fall from the hands of the destroying angel upon the fair brow of blooming innocence. To part with them under any circumstances is full of bitterness; but 'tis well that an Almighty Father has shielded the fate of bereavement from the foresight of mortals. When the day of trial does come, and the bud of promise is torn from the parent stem, meet your fate with a religious submission, for know that

"To bear is to conquer our fate."

Life is uncertain—death is sure—immortality is the reward. Parting must certainly come; and will not be less painful in its consummation, whether the severing come in the next hour, or whether it be delayed until years shall have measured out their lengthened existence. True is it that

"Man was made to mourn," and women also; and, oh! while we beseech you not to slaughter the innocents, do not rebel should an All-Wise and All-Merciful Father summon them into his presence for some good reason. Mothers of angels! give not way to despair. Love's bright, fair, most brilliant gems, though veiled from your eyes by the "valley of the shadow of death," are yet safe beyond the reach of blight and mildew. They are perennial flowers in a garden of everlasting innocence.

Let not the great citadel of the soul be shrouded with despondency, but let the spirit of Christianity console the dispensation of Providence in all bereavements.

"Behind the cloud the starlight lurks;
Through showers the sunbeams fall;
For God, who loveth all His works,
Has left His hope with all."

And while we have the pledges of love—the innocent heirs of a felicitous immortality in our midst—let us do our duty by them to the best of our ability; and, above all, let us not become accessory in the "slaughter of the innocents."

Nothing is ever well done in a small household if the master and mistress are ignorant of the mode in which it should be done.

NOVELTIES FOR MARCH.

JUVENILE FASHIONS.

Fig. 1.

Fig. 1.—Christening robe, en tablier (apron fashion); the front breadth is trimmed across with alternate groups of fine tucks, and a quilled or fluted cambric ruffle, with a needle-worked scallop. The tunic has a trimming of the same, and forms revers each side of the waist. Sleeves to correspond. Many prefer inserting to alternate with the tucks, as it is less trouble in ironing.

Fig. 2.—Embroidered cambric dress for a child approaching short clothes; the sleeves are in a puff; the round yoke is covered by an embroidered bertha.

Fig. 3.—Dress of Chambray cambric, any pretty solid color. The skirt has two groups of plain bands, set on with a colored cord, the same color but a darker shade, and these bands have needle-worked scallops of the same. Straight waist, in flat plaits.

Fig. 4.—Poplin dress, with a peasant chemisette of cambric; the dress trimmed with a ribbon ruche.

Fig. 5.—A very serviceable apron pattern, in fine bird's-eye, with worked cambric ruffles, or simple edging.

THE GARIBALDI SUIT.

IMPERIAL BASQUINE FOR A LADY.

This garment, for winter, is made of stout cloth or velvet; for summer, thin cloth or silk. When made of cloth it has a pretty binding or narrow velvet turned over the edge; when silk, it is trimmed with guipure and has velvet buttons.

The skirt of the side-piece of the back laps over on the skirt of the back, so as to form a plait like that seen in men's coats. At regular intervals, large buttons like the trimming fasten the two skirts together. The sides remain open, but require a trimming similar to that of the back.

In front, the skirt laps over on the side-piece and offers the same repetition of trimming as the skirt of the back.

No. 1. Back. Half a yard in length and width to be added to the pattern.

No. 2. Side-piece of back. Add 10 inches in length and 12 in breadth.

No. 3. Front. Add 17 inches in length, 26 inches in width. It is fastened by large buttons.

No. 4. Side-piece of front. Add 8 inches in length, and 26 inches in width.

No. 5. Under side of sleeve.

No. 6. Upper side of sleeve. It is to be trimmed like the skirt.

WHAT-NOT.—BRAIDED IN A NEW STYLE.

Materials.—A piece of fine green cloth, stamped according to the engraving, for the back and front of the What-not; one piece of gold-colored Russia silk braid, one piece of crimson purse silk, four yards cord (gold and green), and four tassels to match.

THERE are two novelties in this pretty what-not: one is the shape, which is extremely elegant; the other is the mode of braiding, which is done, not by taking the stitches through the soutache, but across it at regular distances, with silk of a contrasting color. It is thus possible to harmonize three colors in the same article; and, indeed, the work quite loses the appearances of ordinary braiding. The ends of the braid must be drawn through to the wrong side of the cloth as usual.

It is afterwards to be made up, over stout card-board, and lined with crimson or gold-colored silk. There is a plain piece at each end, the back and front being about two inches apart. The lining should be set on in plaits here and there. The bottom has a layer of wadding under the silk, and the edges are finished with silk cord. One pair of tassels hang from the cord by which it is suspended; the other two are placed at the corners in front.

The colors selected should be such as will suit the room. Brown cloth with gold-colored braid will always look well, whether crossed with green, crimson, scarlet, or blue.

This style of braiding may be employed for any other purpose with excellent effect.

A NETTED D'OYLEY.

Materials.—Cotton, No. 12; steel mesh, No. 12.

BEGIN with one stitch, and increase every row till you have forty-six stitches. Net one row without any increase, and then reverse it, and decrease it by taking two together at the end of the row. Before darning the pattern, let the square be washed and stiffened.

For the Border: With a flat mesh the following size :

net three into every one ; then, with a smaller round mesh, net two rows all round. They should be darned with knitting cotton, No. 20, and care taken to fill the holes well in, as they wash much better.

BRIDAL PINCUSHION.

THE materials of which the bridal pincushion is formed must be either white satin or white watered silk, and two sorts of small beads. Commence by cutting a strip of card-board two inches wide and fifteen inches long ; form this into a ring, and cover it with the satin well stretched. Then take some of the fine wire used for making artificial flowers, and some small beads, and thread a sufficient length to form a loop or leaf. Fasten this down at its stalk end with a few stitches, and thread a second loop of the different beads as much smaller as will allow of its being placed within the first, so as to form a double loop. Continue this in the way shown in the engraving, until a sufficient length is done for one-quarter of the circle, which must have had a mark placed on each of its quarters before commencing the bead-work. Having completed the four divisions of the wreath, make the four flowers, and attach them in their respective places. A row of larger beads may or may not be carried through the centre of this leaf-work, according to taste; but if the stitches which fasten down the wire should happen to show, it will be an advantage to insert them. This being done, a round cushion of white calico or linen must be made to fit the interior of the circle, and raised up in the inside, and a round of card-board sewn in for the bottom. All this being done, another round of card-board must be taken for the stand, sufficiently large for the pincushion to be placed in the centre, and leave two inches clear, all round, on which a similar row of leaves and flowers is to be worked; after which it is to be lined and have short loops of beads carried all round its edge, as a border, one overlapping the other. The cushion must then be placed in the exact middle of the mat, and strongly tied down by means of a mattress-needle brought through from underneath, looped through a bead-flower previously prepared, returned down again through the cushion, and the two ends finally tied together. The beads employed may be white, both opaque and transparent, pearl, gold, silver, or steel; and with any combination of these a most elegant article may be produced, well worthy of its name of the "Bridal Pincushion."

BRAIDED SLIPPER.

Materials.—Velvet or cloth, with gold, silver, or Russian silk braid.

This design, though simple, will be found very effective. The slipper may be marked either in the French style (the fronts and sides separate), or joined at the heel.

It would be extremely pretty worked in chain-stitch, with shaded silk, and with an outline of gold thread.

SPECTACLE CASE.

This little article is to be worked on fine silk canvas with floss silks in tent-stitch. This will prevent the necessity of filling in the ground, and it also leaves the design more distinct when it is worked. The centre cross is in three colors, a little star in the middle is four white stitches with one gray in the centre. Round it there are eight stitches in rich dark crimson; the four straight lines in the middle of the cross are in lighter crimson; round these four lines the cross is enlarged by two rows of bright blue stitches, in two shades. The six little stars around are in two shades of crimson. The remainder of the scroll pattern round the cross is in grays, shaded with black, the lightest parts being worked in white. The little pattern which is carried round the edge is in alternate blue and scarlet, with the rows nearest the edge in black. This will be found, when worked, a pretty effective arrangement of colors. When the two sides are completed, they must be lined with crimson silk, and joined together afterwards. The stitches are to be hid with a row of small beads, either white, steel, or gold. The case is closed at the bottom and left open at the top.

LUTE PINCUSHION.

THIS little article is made in the following simple way: Cut two pieces of card-board to the shape given, cover them with colored velvet or satin, lay a small spot of black velvet on the one intended for the front, and fasten it down with a few stitches in silk. Then take some fine gold thread, and make the long stitches to represent the strings of the lute; sew the two pieces together, attach a bow to the end, stitch a row of pins all round, and the little article will be completed.

KNITTED ARTIFICIAL FLOWERS.

WHITE GARDEN LILY.

Six petals, six stamens, one pistil, are required to form each flower; two knitting-needles, No. 19, and a skein of superfine white Shetland wool.

Cast on four stitches.

1st row.—Slip one, purl two, knit one.

2d.—Make one, purl one, knit two, purl one.

3d.—Make one, knit one, purl two, knit two.

4th.—Make one, purl two, knit two, purl two.

5th.—Make one, knit two, purl two, knit two, purl one.

6th.—Make one, knit one, purl two, knit two, purl two, knit one.

7th.—Make one, purl one, knit two, and purl two alternately to the end of the row.

8th.—Make one, knit two, purl two alternately to the end of row.

9th.—Make one, purl two, knit two to end of row; knit last stitch plain.

LUTE PINCUSHION.

10th.—Make one, purl two, knit two to end of row; purl the last stitch.

11th.—Make one, knit one, knit and purl two alternately to the end of row.

You will now have fourteen inches, making seven ribs; continue these seven ribs until you have knitted a length of three inches from the beginning of the work. Break off the wool leaving a bit long enough to thread a rug needle with; with this needle take up seven stitches which you must fasten off; then the other seven, and fasten in the same way, which com-letes one petal. Take a piece of fine wire sufficiently long to leave a small bit at the end for stalk, and sew it neatly round the edge of the petal with white wool, which will make it in form.

Pistil.—Cut a length of wire of about eight inches, fold a bit of green Berlin wool in six, and split in two another bit of the same wool, place this lengthwise with the other wool, and place the wire across the wool, fold the wire down, and twist it as tightly as possible, thus enclosing the wool; turn down the shortest end of the split wool, and twist the longest round the wire, so as to cover them evenly; fasten the wool with a slip-knot at the end of the stem. Cut off a part of the green wool at the top, so as to leave merely a neat little tuft of wool at the end of the wire.

Stamens are made in the same way as the pistil, merely using yellow Berlin wool instead of green, and covering the stem with white instead of green. Place one stamen with every petal, twisting the wires of both together. The pistil is to be placed in the centre of the flowers when made up. Sew the petals together, leaving them open about an inch at the top, as neatly as possible, and draw them close at the bottom, twisting the stems together.

Buds.—Several buds are required; the large ones are of a very pale shade of green, the smaller ones of rather deeper color. They look best in double knitting, and should be done in different sizes from twelve to twenty stitches. Knit about an inch of these different widths, and open them like a little bag. Take a piece of coarse wire, double some common wool about the thickness of your finger, put it across the wire, which must be folded down and twisted very tight; put this wool into the little bag, and gather the stitches of the bud at the top, catching the wire with your needle to fasten it.

This will form the shape of the bud; fasten the stitches also at the bottom, and cover the stem with green wool split in two.

Leaves.—Different shades and sizes are required. Begin them all at the top, casting on four stitches; they look best in double knitting, without putting the wool twice round the needle; increase one stitch every second or third row, till you have eight stitches for the smallest, and sixteen for the largest size. Continue to knit without increase, till the leaf is the required length. The longest should be about a finger length, the smaller in proportion. The longest must be placed at the bottom of the stem when making up.

To finish a leaf, pull your needle out, and thread a rug needle with the wool, and pass it through the stitches so, as to form a little bag, into which you must insert a bit of double wire; catch this at the top or sides to fix it, and it will keep the leaf in shape. Draw the wool tight on while the stitches are threaded, and twist the wool at bottom round the little stem.

The next operation consists in mounting the branch. Begin at the top with the smallest bud, round the stem of which some green wire must be twisted. Fix it at the top of a piece of bonnet wire, the length required for the long stem; continue to twist the wool round, and thus fasten the second bud, and the rest in the same way, at very small intervals. The flowers are fastened in a similar manner, according to taste, adding the leaves as needed.

Six buds, three flowers, and eight or ten leaves, form a beautiful branch.

Although the petals of the lily can be made up with the wool as it is, they look much better if, after being knitted, they are washed with a little blue in the water, and quickly dried, before the wire is put round them.

SOUPS.

A COMMON camp-kettle will be found an excellent utensil for making soup, as the lid is heavy, and will keep in the steam. An earthen pipkin or jar, if of a long and narrow make, widening a little in the centre, is, perhaps, one of the best vessels for soups, and universally used by foreign cooks, who insist "that it renders the gravy more clear and limpid, and extracts more flavor from the meat than when made in tin or copper."

WHITE SOUP—Take a good knuckle of veal or two or three short shanks; boil it in four quarts of water about six hours, with some whole white pepper, a little mace, six, two onions, and a small piece of lean ham; strain it, and when cold take off all the fat and sediment, beat up six yolks of eggs, and mix them with a pint of cream; then pour the boiling soup upon it. Boil the cream before putting it in the soup.

VEAL SOUP—Skin four pounds of a knuckle of veal; wash it and cut it small; put it into a stewpan with two gallons of water; when it boils skim it, and let it simmer till reduced to two quarts; strain and season with white pepper, salt, a little mace, a dessertspoonful of lemon-juice, and thicken it with a large tablespoonful of flour, kneaded with an ounce of butter.

CHICKEN SOUP—Season two quarts of strong veal broth with two onions, a bunch of parsley, salt, and pepper; strain it, and have ready a chicken, cut in joints and skinned, put it in the broth with a tablespoonful of curry powder; boil the chickens till quite tender. A little before serving add the juice of a lemon and a teaspoonful of boiling cream. Serve boiled rice to eat with this soup. Always boil cream before putting it in soup or gravy.

HARICOT SOUP—Cut some mutton cutlets from the neck; wash and fry them of a light brown; stew in brown gravy soup till tender. Have ready some carrots, turnips, celery, and onions; fry them in butter for some time, and clear the soup from the fat; then add the vegetables, color it, and thicken it with butter and flour; season, and add to it a little port wine and catsup. If the gravy be ready, the soup will require no more time to prepare than may be necessary to render the chops and vegetables tender, and is an excellent family dish. It is wished to be made more highly flavored, put in a little curry powder.

SOUP FOR AN INVALID—Cut in small pieces one pound of beef or mutton, or part of both, boil it gently in two quarts of water; take off the scum, and when reduced to a pint strain it. Season with a little salt, and take a teaspoonful at a time.

CHICKEN SOUP—Cut up a large fowl, and boil it well in milk and water, thicken with cream, butter, and flour. Add vegetables of different kinds cut in small pieces, such as potatoes, turnips, the heart of cabbage, one or two onions, celery, etc., with thyme, parsley, Cayenne, black pepper, and mace. Boil all together, and just before you dish it add wine, or a little lemon-juice, and salt to your taste.

SHIRAZ OF BEEF SOUP—Put on the shin at 7 o'clock in the morning to boil, at 9 o'clock add the vegetables; take a large head of cabbage cut fine, twelve carrots cut small, five or six turnips, two or three potatoes, two onions roasted in hot ashes, and, if tomatoes are in season, add two or three. Put in thyme, parsley, black pepper, salt, allspice, and a little mace.

When you serve take out the meat first, and, with a skimmer, take from the bottom the thick part of the vegetables; mash them to a pulp, and pour on them the more liquid part. Serve the meat separately in a dish. This soup is excellent the second day, if kept quite sweet. Some people add mushrooms, parsnips, etc.

PEPPER-POT—Stew gently in four quarts of water till reduced to three, three pounds of beef, half a pound of lean ham, a bunch of dried thyme, two onions, two large potatoes pared and sliced; then strain it through a colander, and add a large fowl, cut into joints and skinned, half a pound of pickled pork, sliced, the meat of one lobster, minced, and some small suet dumplings the size of a walnut. When the fowl is well boiled, add half a peck of spinach that has been boiled and rubbed through a colander; season with salt and Cayenne. It is very good without the lean ham and fowl.

PORTABLE SOUP—Put on, in four gallons of water, ten pounds of a shin of beef, free from fat and skin, six pounds of a knuckle of veal, and two fowls; break the bones, and cut the meat into small pieces; season with one ounce of whole black pepper, quarter of an ounce of Jamaica pepper, and the same of mace; cover the pot very closely, and let it simmer for twelve or fourteen hours, and then strain it. The following day take off the fat, and clear the jelly from any sediment adhering to it; boil it gently upon a stove without covering the saucepan, and stir it frequently till it thickens to a strong glue. Pour it into broad tin pans, and put it in a cool oven. When it will take the impression of a knife, score it in equal squares, and hang it in a south window, or near a stove. When dry, break it at the scores. Wrap it in paper, and put it closely up in boxes. There should always be a large supply of this soup, as with it and catsup no one will ever be at a loss for dressed dishes and soups.

MACARONI SOUPS—Take a quart of gravy soup, break two ounces of Naples macaroni into pieces of little more than an inch long, putting them, by degrees, into a small portion of the boiling soup, to prevent them from sticking together, and let them boil until quite tender, but not soft or pulpy; from fifteen to twenty minutes if quite fresh, but nearly half an hour if at all stale. Vermicelli is used in the same manner. They will improve the consistence of the soup if the quantity above stated be added; but it is useless, and does not look well, to see, as at some tables, only a few strings of it floating in the tureen.

GREEN PEAS SOUP may be made with or without meat. For the former, boil three pints of peas, with mint, in spring water; rub them through a sieve, put to them three quarts of brown gravy soup, and boil together; then add about half a pint of whole boiled peas; season, and if not green enough add spinach juice. Or, if the gravy be not made, boil with the first peas a ham bone, or veal, or beef bones, and trimmings to make the stock.

To make this soup without meat, put the peas, with some butter, two onions, seasoning, and a pint of water, into a stewpan. Stew till the peas can be passed through a sieve, which being done, add to the liquor and pulp more water, half a pint of young peas, a few fine lettuce-leaves, and some mint, shred finely; stew all together till soft. Thicken with butter and flour, if requisite.

In either of the above cases the pea shells, if very young, may be boiled and pulped with the first parcel of peas.

MISCELLANEOUS COOKING.

BOILED LEG OF LAMB—should look as white as possible. Choose a ewe leg, as there is more fat on it; saw off the knuckle, trim off the flap and the thick skin on the back of it, soak it in warm water for three hours, then boil it gently (time according to size); pour a little white sauce over it. The loin may be fried in steaks and served round, garnished with dried or fried parsley; spinach or sea-kale to be eaten with it. Or it may be served with parsley and butter, or with oyster-sauce.

QUARTERS OF LAMB ROASTED. Fore Quarter.—Cut off the scrag one joint from the shoulder; saw off the chine-bone, and also the bone of the breast, and joint it thoroughly; crack the ribs in the middle; cut off the thick skin which covers the lower part of the breast, and break the bone of the shoulder to allow of the knuckle twisting round, and secure it in its place with a skewer from beneath the breast right up the knuckle. Put two large skewers at the thin end; pass the spit between the skewers and the ribs through the thick part at the shoulder; paper it, having a double thickness over the thin end. When the quarter is roasted whole, the shoulder should be raised either at table or when dished.

The hind quarter is sometimes roasted, and served with mint-sauce. It may also be larded, covered with oiled paper, and when more than half done the paper to be withdrawn, the meat basted with oil or yolk of egg, and slightly covered with crumbs of bread; then put closer to the fire to give it a fine brown. When served, it is sprinkled with the juice of a lemon.

The quarter of eight to ten pounds weight will take two and a quarter to two and a half hours in dressing, as it ought to be always well done. The fore quarter will require from three-quarters to one hour less.

FILLET OF VEAL ROASTED.—Take a leg of veal, cut off the knuckle sufficiently above the joint to make a handsome fillet. Take out the bone, fill up the space with stuffing, and also put a good layer under the fat. Truss it of a good shape by drawing the fat round, and tie it up with a tape. Paper it, put it a good distance from the fire, as the meat is very solid, and must be so thoroughly done as not to leave the least appearance of red gravy; serve it with melted butter poured over, and gravy round. Ham or bacon should be served with it, and fresh cucumbers if in season.

FILLET OF VEAL BOILED.—Choose a small delicate fillet for this purpose; prepare as for roasting, or stuff it with an oyster forcemeat; after having washed it thoroughly, cover it with milk and water in equal quantities, and let it boil very gently three and a half or four hours, keeping it carefully skimmed. Send it to table with a rich white sauce, or, if stuffed with oysters, a tureen of oyster-sauce; garnish with stewed celery and slices of bacon. A boiled tongue should be served with it.

SWEETBREADS.—For every mode of dressing, sweetbreads should be prepared by blanching, or rather par-boiling them. They should be larded and braised; and, being of themselves rather insipid, they will be improved by a relishing sauce, and by a large quantity of herbs in the braise. Slices of lemon put upon the sweetbreads while braising will heighten the flavor and keep them white, which is very desirable when sent to table with white sauce. Stuffed with oysters, they make a very good vol au vent.

CALVES' FEET STEWED.—When properly cleaned, rub the feet over with pepper, a very little salt, and mace; cut them into moderately-sized pieces, and put them into a stewpan, with a little shallot and a beefsteak, also cut into pieces. Cover all with cold water, and let them simmer together for three hours. When quite tender, take them off the fire; strain the gravy through a sieve. The next day, when cold, take off all the fat; boil a small quantity of saffron in cream, and a little Cayenne pepper; mix it with the gravy, and warm the whole without boiling; one foot and one pound of steak will make a dish.

SCALLOPS OF COLD VEAL.—Mince the meat extremely small, and set it over the fire with a scrape of nutmeg, a little pepper and salt, and a little cream, for a few minutes; then put it into the scallop-shells, and cover them with crumbs of bread, over which put some bits of butter, and brown them before the fire.

Either veal or chicken looks and eats well prepared in this way, and lightly covered with crumbs of bread fried; or these may be put on in little heaps.

SPARERIE OF PORK should be basted with a very little butter and a little flour, and then sprinkled with dried sage crumbled. Serve apple-sauce in a boat.

INVALID DIET.

IN COOKING FOOD, &c., FOR THE INVALID great art is required, because the palate is morbidly acute, or disinclined to strong flavors of any kind. Thus it often happens, that seasoning which is relished in a state of health is loathed under disease; and the cook who is not aware of this fact will be almost sure to displease her employers. Hence it is that the nurse who understands the kind of cookery which is fitted for the sick will generally succeed better than the most finished cook, because she knows by experience that all rich flavors are sure to turn the stomachs of her charge. Chicken is for this reason so generally liked by the sick, because its flavor is mild, while the dark and high-flavored meat of game or ducks would be turned out of the room as soon as submitted to the nose, without even having the honor of a taste. Fat should be most carefully avoided in all animal-broths, such as mutton-broth or beef-tea; onions, garlic, and other herbs, except, perhaps, parsley, are also objectionable in the sick-room; and even the faintest flavor of the first in bread sauce will seldom be tolerated. Pepper may be used to some extent when not forbidden, and also salt, but beyond these seasonings it is seldom safe to venture far. Cloves and cinnamon, as well as nutmeg, are liked by some and disliked by others, as also are the flavors of caraway and allspice. Lemon-peel gives a clean flavor, as does orange-peel, and may generally be used for the purpose of giving a slight taste to sweets, or puddings; but even of these a smaller quantity than usual will suffice. With regard to adding wine in making jellies, it must always be ascertained whether it is forbidden, for in many cases jelly without wine would be advantageous, while the addition would be altogether wrong. The following list of receipts comprises those which are peculiarly applicable to the invalid:—

BEEF-TEA.—Take one pound of lean beef, pick all the fat off; cut it into small pieces the size of the end of the thumb, and score it still further to let out the gravy put it in an enamelled saucepan with a quart of water two cloves, eight to twelve peppercorns, and half a tea-spoonful of salt. Simmer for three or four hours, and skim it as long as either scum or fat rises, or else curdles. In cases of extreme debility, one pound and a

If of beef may be used. Before serving, absorb every bubble of fat with silver paper.

Tea-Mode (very grateful in convalescence, when there is no tendency to diarrhoea). Put into a preserving jar alternate layers of beef, cut into small pieces, and cold turnips; when the jar is filled, place it in a water-bath or slow oven, and let it remain for two or three days; then drain off all the tea, using a little pressure to assist the operation, and let it stand till cold, when the fat may be taken off, or if wanted directly, it may be removed while hot with silver paper.

SOUP FOR INVALIDS.—Take six pounds of shin of beef, 4 pounds of any white meat, seasoned, and an onion, sliced; put it in a stone jar, and tie down with bladder; let it boil twelve hours in a large saucepan of water, then strain it off. A tea or tablespoonful is enough for an invalid, if taken several times during the day. (It is well to know, that what remains after the soup has been strained makes excellent common stock with additional water.)

STRONG MEAT JELLY FOR WEAK PERSONS.—Take about 10 pounds of lean beef, cut in pieces, and a hock of pork about the same weight, and a knuckle of veal of eight or ten pounds, a small quantity of salt and mace, without any other spice; cover it with water and stew seven hours. Strain, and when cold take off the fat; mix it with whites of eggs, and pass it through a jelly-bag. The produce of jelly from the above proportions should be about five quarts; to be taken warm or cold, as best suits the patient.

TEAKETTLE BROTH.—Cut some small squares of crumb of bread into a broth basin, and some finely-chopped parsley, with enough of salt to flavor it; pour over it some boiling water, softening the whole with a spoonful or two of cream or milk. Some invalids like the flavor of mint, and peas when in season; and if this can be allowed by the medical man, the water used must be a few young peas, or pea-pods, and a leaf of mint added in it, before pouring it over the bread; without this addition, it is often much liked by invalids, as being free from grease, and so clean-tasting. A little clear gravy from under the dripping-pan may sometimes be added with advantage. Pepper may be used or omitted, according to the palate or the nature of the illness.

GRAVY-BREAD FOR INVALIDS.—Cut deeply into a joint of beef, or leg of mutton, while roasting; fill the opening with a thick slice of crumb of bread, and leave it there for half an hour, or till completely saturated with the gravy; then sprinkle upon it a little salt, with or without pepper, as is recommended, and serve hot.

TOAST SANDWICHES FOR INVALIDS.—Toast carefully a very thin slice of bread; cut off the crust; spread two slices of thin bread and butter, also cutting away the crust, seasoning each with a very little made-mustard and a sprinkle of salt; lay the toast in the middle, serving it as a sandwich.

JELLY OR BLANCMANGE FOR INVALIDS.—Take the bones of a knuckle of veal, well scrape all the meat from them, and stew them four or five hours in two quarts of water; when it is cold, skim it clear from all fat and sediment; melt it, and flavor with homemade wine, and a little lemon-peel. If for blanchmange, the stock must be still more reduced, to bear the addition of some milk, flavored with laurel leaf and lemon-peel; the addition of a little wine or brandy will, of course, improve it.

SOOTHING NOURISHMENT IN CONSUMPTION.—Beat up a tablespoonful of oatmeal and a tablespoonful of honey, with the yolk of an egg; pour upon it a pint of boiling water; then boil all together for a few minutes.

THE TOILET.

ARRANGEMENT OF THE HAIR.

In the arrangement of the hair the greatest regard ought to be paid to the style of the features as well as to the general appearance of the wearer. It is thus only that we can hope to avoid such errors of taste as we frequently see committed by those who, regardless of the fitness of a particular mode of arrangement, to which they may have taken a fancy, to their own style of countenance, adopt it at once without due consideration. The mode which they admire may perhaps have been adapted by the dictates of the nicest taste to the features of the wearer, while to their own it is completely unsuited; but, pleased with its effect in those in whom they admire it, and yet ignorant of the source of the charm, they blindly adopt it, and, instead of rendering themselves more attractive, they become merely ridiculous.

When the features are large, or strongly marked, the hair should be arranged in masses, in large curls, or well-defined bows, so as to harmonize with the general cast of the countenance. If, on the contrary, the features are small and delicate, the greatest care should be taken not to render too striking the contrast between them and the magnitude of the headdress. Small and delicately formed curls or ringlets, braids, or light and airy bows are the most pleasing varieties for this style.

The features of the greater number of young ladies, however, cannot be classed under either of these extremes. When such is the case, the fancy of the individual is, of course, allowed greater latitude, but ought to be no less subject to the dictates of taste.

There are what may be called four distinct styles of arrangement, under one or other of which the various modes of dressing the hair may be classed: in bows, in braids, in twists, or in curls. To the latter class may be also referred ringlets, since they are only a modification to suit the features of particular individuals.

Bows will be found particularly suitable where the face is round, as they tend to lengthen the countenance, and make its peculiarities less apparent. The longer they can be made without extravagance, the more pleasing will be the effect. If, on the contrary, the countenance is narrow and lengthened, low, swelling bows should be adopted.

In arranging bows care should be taken to avoid an exact uniformity on each side. Such an arrangement gives an air of stiffness, from which it is at all times well to be free.

To braids the above observations are, in general, equally applicable.

Curls, no less than bows, require to be carefully adapted in size to the features. If the face is long and deficient in breadth, the great mass should be made to cluster near the temples, and fall gracefully over the cheek, taking care, however, not to conceal the latter, and thus render the length still more apparent. From the ease with which curls are adapted to every style of feature—and there are few indeed to which they are not becoming and from the facility which they afford to display a beauty or conceal a defect, this has always been a favorite style of arrangement.

Ringlets, as has already been remarked, are merely a modification of curls. They require, however, to be more cautiously adopted, as, though extremely fascinating when suited to the style of the wearer, they give an air of ridicule to one to which they are unsuited.

MISCELLANEOUS.

PASTE FOR SHARPENING RAZORS.—Oxide of tin levigated, vulgarly termed prepared putty, one ounce, saturated solution of oxalic acid, a sufficient quantity to form a paste. This composition is to be rubbed over the top of the strap, and, when dry, a little water may be added. The oxalic acid having a great attachment for iron, a little friction with this powder gives a fine edge to the razor.

MODERN ETIQUETTE requires that a guest should always pay the first compliments to the lady of the house. Formerly it was the custom for the mistress of the mansion to occupy some place at the furthest point from the entrance of the apartment, and this obliged the visitor either to violate the law of politeness by speaking to many mutual friends on the way towards her, or else to pass them with apparent coldness; and to reconcile these differences it is now the fashion for the lady to occupy some place near the door, when the visitor may be at once received, and relieved from the difficulty which has given rise to the arrangement.

HOW TO KEEP THEM.—A few days more, and furs will be superfluous. Then comes the process of so putting them away that moths shall not invade them. The same thing is necessary to protect woollens, the moth being no respecter of anything in the line. The best way to insure immunity from destruction is to pack all in a trunk or box lined with brown Holland, first sprinkling them liberally with black pepper. This is better even than camphor, for dealers in furs are often victimized by entomological pests, though their goods be saturated by this powerful odor. Before packing away furs they should be well beaten, to dislodge any larvæ that, despite the most scrupulous care, may be deposited in them. The superiority of pepper to camphor as a preservative to furs consists in the fact that, while larvæ will incubate among camphor, there is something in the aroma of pepper which destroys them in embryo.

TO CLEAN WHITEWASH BRUSHES.—Wash off, with cold water, the lime from the bristles of the brush, and scrub well with a hard scrubbing-brush the part where the bristles are fixed into the wood. This should be done at once, as soon as the whitewashing for that day is finished. It is far better than to let them soak all night.

PASTE FOR CLEANING KNIVES.—Make a mixture, one part emery, and three parts crocus martis, in very fine powder. Mix them to a thick paste, with a little lard or sweet oil. Have your knife-board covered with a thick buff-leather. Spread this paste on your leather to about the thickness of a quarter-dollar. Rub your knives in it, and it will make them much sharper and brighter, and will wear them out less than the common method of cleaning with brickdust on a bare board.

TO EXTRACT OIL FROM THE FLOOR OR HEARTH.—Mix together two heaped tablespoonfuls of powdered fullers' earth, one large tablespoonful of potash or pearlash, and one large tablespoonful of soft soap. Add sufficient boiling water to make it into a thick paste. Spread it hot on the oil spot with a broad flat stick; let it remain an hour or two. Then brush it off, and renew the application. When the grease has disappeared, scrub the place with soap and water.

This mixture is equally good for boards, stone, or marble.

TO COLOR ALUM CRYSTALS.—In making these crystals, the coloring should be added to the solution of alum in proportion to the shade which it is desired to produce. Coke, with a piece of lead attached to it, in order to make it sink in the solution, is the best substance for a nucleus; or, if a smooth surface be used, it will be necessary to wind it round with cotton or worsted, otherwise no crystals will adhere to it. Yellow, muriate of iron; blue, solution of indigo in sulphuric acid; pale blue, equal parts of alum and blue vitriol; crimson, infusion of madder and cochineal; black, japan ink thickened with gum; green, equal parts of alum and blue vitriol, with a few drops of muriate of iron; milk-white, a crystal of alum held over a glass containing ammonia, the vapor of which precipitates the alumina on the surface.

TO PRESERVE FRUITS OR FLOWERS THE WHOLE YEAR WITHOUT SPOILING.—Mix 1 lb. of nitre with 2 lbs. of bold ammoniac and 3 lbs. of clean common sand; then, in dry weather, take fruit of any sorts which is not fully ripe, allowing the stalks to remain, and put them one by one into an open glass until it is quite full; cover the glass with oiled cloth closely tied down. Put the glass three or four inches down in the earth, in a dry cellar, and surround it on all sides to the depth of three or four inches with the above mixture. The fruit will thus be preserved quite fresh all the year round.

CONTRIBUTED RECEIPTS.

I HAVE seen a great many valuable receipts in your Book, and thinking you would not object to eating a nice DOUGHNUT, send the following receipt, which is considered very good:—

Two cups of sugar, three eggs, one cup of sweet cream, two teaspoonfuls cream of tartar, one of soda, one of salt, one nutmeg. Mix the sugar with the flour, and the cream with the egg. Roll out hard and fry.

RICE MERINGUE.—Boil half a cup of rice in a quart of milk for three hours, that it may be quite thick; sweeten to your taste, and let it cool; separate the whites and yolks of four eggs; beat the yolks with the rice and milk, and put them into a pudding dish; then beat the whites very lightly and add fine sugar to thicken like icing, and pour over the other. Let it bake a light brown. To be eaten with cream.

MERINGUE PUDDING.—One pint of stale bread crumbs, one quart of milk, the yolks of four eggs beaten lightly, a small cup of white sugar, the grated rind of a small lemon, and a piece of butter the size of an egg. Mix all well together and bake it. When cool, spread it well with acid preserves or jelly. Beat the whites of the eggs stiff with five tablespoonfuls of sifted sugar, and the juice of a lemon. Spread it over the top, and put it into the oven to brown quickly. To be eaten with cream.

RICH SWEETMEAT GINGERBREAD NUTS.—Put a pound of good treacle into a basin, and pour over it a quart of a pound of clarified butter, or fresh butter melted, as not to oil, and one pound of coarse brown sugar. Stir the whole well. While mixing, add an ounce each of candied orange-peel and candied angelica, and a quarter of an ounce of candied lemon-peel, cut into very minute pieces, but not bruised or pounded, with half an ounce of pounded coriander seeds, and half an ounce of caraway seeds. Having mixed them thoroughly together, break in an egg, and work the whole up with as much flour as may be necessary to form a fine paste, which is to be made into nuts of any size. Put on the bare tin plate and set in a rather brisk oven.

ART IN AMERICA.

The fine arts are to a nation what blossoms are to a tree—at once an ornament and a promise. The fruit which follows them is to be looked for in great thoughts and noble deeds, such as have made the republics of Greece, Italy, and Batavia illustrious. There are few cheering signs of the progress of our people than the rapid growth and diffusion of the love of art among them. The tendency of art is to refine and ennoble; to the mind above the materialism of common work-life, and to urge it to higher aims than those which mere love of wealth or of ease could inspire. If the love of art is not in itself to be ranked with the very best of motives, it is at least among the most hopeful of character. Foreigners are apt to call us a mere money-loving and money-making people; but we fancy that the most prejudiced critic among them would be somewhat staggered in his opinion on learning that an institution like the Cosmopolitan Art Association had, in the first six years of its existence (as we gather from the last number of its valuable Art Journal), obtained an aggregate of more than one hundred and fifty thousand subscribers. Here are half a million of dollars from this single source devoted wholly to the fine arts, and to literature as subsidiary to them. Add to this vast amount expended every year by private purchasers, and the almost incredible sums which are collected by exhibitions of single works or of art collections in all our principal cities and towns, and we shall be able to see that the taste for art in America is becoming a national trait, which those who speculate on the future of our country must take into account.

Among the most recent evidences of this taste we may mention the fine building which has lately been erected in New York, known as the "Institute of Fine Arts," in the collections which it contains. If we are not utterly mistaken, we may discern in these the germ of a future American National Gallery of Art, destined, in its site, to rival the most celebrated collections of Europe. The edifice itself, an elegant structure of white marble, towering above the other buildings on Broadway, attracts the eye by its architectural beauty, which renders it a striking ornament of that busy, commercial thoroughfare. It symbolizes, perhaps well enough, the position which art itself holds in this country—just conspicuous and important enough to attract notice, and to begin to occupy some of the ground which has heretofore been devoted entirely to the claims of hard money-making business. What is especially noteworthy is that this stately and substantial structure is not the work of a numerous or wealthy association, but is due entirely to the enlightened liberality and taste of a single patron of art, H. W. Derby, Esq., the sole proprietor as well of the building as of one of the collections which it holds—the well-known Dusseldorf Gallery.

Entering the building and ascending the spacious stairway, we find ourselves in presence of this fine collection, occupying a long and spacious hall, lighted from above, and kept constantly at an equable and pleasant temperature. A large number—sometimes there, promenading slowly or lounging at ease on the seats, and conversing in hushed tones while they examine the treasures of art on the walls before them. Such collections, of course, attract only the more refined of the sight-seeing class, and the influence of the place is at once visible in the quiet and well-bred demeanor of the visitors. It is satisfactory to know that their number is quite sufficient to afford an adequate return for the large amount invested in the building and its contents.

About the Dusseldorf Gallery we need only say that the remarkable school of painters who, during the present century, have promised to make Dusseldorf and Munich the rivals of Florence and Venice in the roll of art glories are represented here by some of their most characteristic and attractive works. That these painters are, as a school, at the head of modern art, however high single names in France, England, and America may be allowed to stand, will not be doubted by any one who has visited the collection. It comprises pictures of every class and tone, the devotional, the historical, the domestic, the humorous—landscape, portraiture, still life, allegory; and all in the best style of the several artists. The first sight of this splendid gallery is an era in the life of every lover of painting.

Two other galleries, adjoining this, are occupied by a no less striking and remarkable collection of a different class—the "Jarves Collection" of Old Masters. Mr. Jarves, a gentleman of Boston, whose name will be familiar to our readers as that of the author of several esteemed works of travel and on art, has been fortunate enough, during a residence of eight years in Florence, to bring together a collection which, in its peculiar character as illustrating the rise and progress of Italian art, is believed to be unique. Certainly nothing approaching to it in value has ever before been seen on this side of the Atlantic. Of its claims on our admiration we may judge from the fact that a correspondent writing from Florence concerning it, two years ago, remarked that even in that city, the principal treasury of art, there were only three great public galleries superior in interest to that of Mr. Jarves. The student may here trace the whole progress of Italian painting, from its first germs in the childish simplicity and rudeness of Latin and Byzantine art in the twelfth century, down to the transcendent glories of the world-renowned masters, Raphael, Michael Angelo, and even Leonardo da Vinci himself, of whose wonderful genius Mr. Jarves has been fortunate enough to secure a specimen which would alone suffice to make his collection famous.

As a guide to the art student, and as a further evidence of the increasing taste for art in our country, we would refer to Mr. Jarves's lately published work, to which he has given the modest title of "Art Studies."* Mr. Jarves's former publication, "Art Hints," a philosophical and suggestive work, was noticed some years ago in our pages. In his new volume he has given the fruit of his matured study and experience in a most agreeable and instructive form, combining a history of Italian painting from the earliest times, with biographies of the principal artists, description of their works, and careful analysis of their respective styles. The whole work is imbued with deep feeling, and informed with the result of profound and conscientious thought. A more interesting or useful book could not be put into the hands of a student of art. With its aid, combined with a study of the paintings in Mr. Jarves's collection at the Institute, any one may qualify himself to appreciate and enjoy the treasures of art contained in the galleries and public edifices of Italy, which, without such assistance and preparation, will be to the traveller little better than a book in a foreign tongue. To many readers this work of Mr. Jarves will be like a revelation of a new world of intellectual and imaginative beauty.

It is only just to the publishers to say that the external appearance of the book is as attractive as its contents. It is a superb volume, elegantly printed and bound, and illustrated with fifteen copper-plate engravings, comprising representations of forty-three distinct pictures or portions of pictures by old masters, all taken from the original paintings in Mr. Jarves's collection, and drawn and engraved expressly for this work by Vincenzo Stanghi, a pupil of Raphael Morghen. It is evident that no pains have been spared either by the author or the publishers to make the work valuable and complete, and we may venture to predict that it will be hereafter the standard authority on the subject of Italian art.

In reviewing this book of Mr. Jarves and his Collection, we are led to inquire what is to be the future of art, especially in our own country. The difference between medieval and modern art is great and striking. The pictures of the old masters were, with few exceptions, of a religious character. The painter regarded himself as a preacher to the eye. His works, intended mostly for religious edifices, were almost all of a purely devotional type, and were restricted within a narrow range of mystical or "pietistic" subjects. The Saviour, the Virgin, the apostles and martyrs, and the hierarchy of angels, reappear in almost every painting of the Middle Ages. The same incidents, the same conventional figures, differing only in details and in the peculiarities impressed upon them by the artist's genius, everywhere recur. A solemn, devout spirit—the spirit of simple faith and adoration—pervades them all.

Such a phase of art was needed to lift the minds of the people, in that unlearned age, out of the slough of material debasement in which paganism had left them. In our day the necessity has passed away, and this type of art has disappeared almost entirely. A few imitators have sought to revive it, and successfully enough, as far as mere artistic talent can go, but the inspiring spirit is felt to be wanting in their works. Modern art has taken almost exclusively what is called a naturalistic direction. The study and reproduction of nature is its especial characteristic. It delights in landscape, in sea pictures, in still life, in domestic scenes, and reaches its highest pitch in great battle-pieces or historic paintings. It is multifarious in its objects, overflowing with artistic power, but in everything merely material. The spiritual element seems almost to have died out of art.

Is this to be the end? We cannot think it. We remark that republics in former ages have been essentially and peculiarly religious communities, and we believe our own country is not to be an exception in this respect. But the religion of our day has assumed—as well in Catholic as in Protestant countries—a new form, or rather a new mode of manifestation. The period of contemplative, passive, adoring faith is past. Religion now manifests itself in its practical form. It searches out and relieves the poor, clothes the naked, feeds the hungry, visits the widow and fatherless in affliction, brings cheer to the convict in his cell, nurses the pest-stricken patient in the hospital and the wounded soldier on his pallet, redeems the outcast, carries the gospel to the heathen, and braves every form of suffering and danger while obeying in active, practical effort the great commandment to "love one another."

Who does not see that to the artists who shall sympathize with this phase of Christian life a vast field of religious art will be opened? An inexhaustible store of subjects of every variety, sweet, touching, sublime, or awful, will offer themselves, and at the same time will not forbid, but will rather invite, the use of all the resources which modern art has gained by its careful study of nature.

In this new form of Christian art, we may add, woman will take a new place, different from that which she has held in the art of bygone times. The sensual painters of Greece made her the plaything of man's fancy; the ascetic painters of Italy made her a divinity. Hereafter we believe, she will appear as the central and attractive figure in those great paintings in which the future Masters will delineate the deeds of charity, of pious heroism and patient self-sacrifice in which Woman has ever found her highest mission, and in which art is hereafter to find its noblest development.

MISSIONARY (OR MINISTERING) WOMEN OF ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

"The woman is appointed for the physical civilization of communities. She is to guide the house, whether small or great." So says a popular writer who has had much experience in the great work of charity, which is now advancing to promote the true civilization of doing good to all and injury to none.

The women of England are before us in the field, for the reason that this ministry of good works is their most needed. Where one-fifth of all who die—as now in London—die in the prisons, poorhouses, or hospitals we know that there ignorance, vice, and poverty must be the lot of hundreds of thousands.* But the charitable work of home has not hindered these benevolent ladies from helping the miserable heathen women of India. We have before us the report of the "Society for Promoting Female Education in the East," of which society the Marchioness of Cholmondeley is president, and find it has been in operation since 1834, and that in the first twenty-three years it raised $231,295 in cash, and sent abroad work for sale to the amount of $102,555, making a total of $334,480 contributed for teaching and helping heathen women. This society has bestowed help on schools belonging to all the great Protestant missions in India, and has sent forth ninety-one European teachers.

"The Society's female teachers, European and native, are engaged in conducting or assisting in boarding and vernacular day schools, and Bible and sewing classes for native women, whom they also visit in their own dwellings as access may be obtained. In addition to these, upwards of one hundred and forty girls' schools in various parts of the East are in connection with the society, and receive such aid from time to time as can be afforded them."

* Read the "Missing Link," and learn what degradation and woe women suffer in London.

Mrs. Ellen B. Mason, who has already established a most successful American Mission School for the Karen girls, as we have shown in our last two numbers, is now nearly ready to leave our land on her return voyage to her home in Burmah, where she hopes soon to open another school which will be an honor to the Christian women of America, and a blessing, an inestimable blessing to the heathen women of that dark land. Is not this the true work of woman, this teaching, helping, civilizing her own sex? It is a work that men cannot do, if they could, it must be done or the world will never be made the abode of peace and joy, of righteousness and love.

In testimony of the benefits which the English Ladies' Society has conferred on India, an eminent British resident in the East, a member of the Church Missionary Committee, writes: "Every year's experience strengthens my conviction of the importance of female education in this land. So long as mothers and sisters are left in their wretched ignorance, our mission work is, comparatively speaking, like writing in the sand."

WOMEN'S UNION SOCIETY OF AMERICA FOR HEATHEN WOMEN.

In our last number we appealed to our friends of the Lady's Book to help Mrs. Mason in her Bible mission to the women of Tounghoo. The following names and donations are the beginning; next month we hope a larger list will be sent us:—

BOOKS FOR FAMILY READING. CHEAP LITERATURE.

Good literature instructs the young, embellishes the mature mind, and is a great solace and resource for the invalid and the aged. Even the most busy among our active population, pressed by the cares of daily life, and conscientiously devoted to securing the comforts of the household, as good people should do, may yet find brief moments in their hurried day for the pleasure and improvement to be gained from books.

How important that these books should be of the kind that elevate thought, strengthen honest purpose, give nourishment to the mind, and leave on the heart the impression that truth, integrity, and honor are essential to happiness! If this can be done, then would not the privilege of cheap literature, which is in our country so abundant, prove an invaluable blessing?

THE WAVERLEY NOVELS are among the few works of fiction which best fulfil all these conditions. Sir Walter Scott's works have now stood the test of time. They are lost none of their interest for the second generation of readers. The humor, pathos, close observance of human nature, and fine picturesque fancy of the author are unsurpassed, and make these novels always new and charming. Then the historical characters are a mine of information for the student of history. In the delineation of Elizabeth, James I., and Louis XI., Sir Walter Scott has stamped these sovereigns, like Daguerreotypes, so to speak, on the pages of his works, till they stand out in actual life as no historian has made them appear. The novelist, by grasping the sketches of many authentic compilers, and animating the whole by the light of his own wonderful genius, has, apparently, made these and other historical personages live and move before the reader. Then the purity of thought, the high tone of patriotism, the excellent style, where bombast and slang (those pests of the sensation school of novel writers) are never found, make these works of fiction fitted for the family reading where books should be a help in educating the young as well as cheerful friends and wise guides for older readers. We are, therefore, very glad to inform our friends, who wish to buy books worth keeping as well as reading, and add the best works of imagination to their libraries, that a complete set of "The Waverley Novels"* are now to be obtained as cheap literature: all the novels of Scott, in five large octavo volumes, with a portrait and engraved title-page for each volume, neatly bound, may be purchased for the very low price of FIVE DOLLARS.

LIFE IN THE OLD WORLD; OR, TWO YEARS IN SWITZERLAND AND ITALY. By Frederika Bremer. Translated by Mary Howitt—is another work, new and very interesting, that we commend for home reading. The sketch of the Waldenses is a marvellous tale (see Vol. I., page 405 to 448), so well told that we feel the truth of Christian heroism to be not only "stranger than fiction," but as far above the heroic of worldly ambition as heaven is above earth. This work is in two large duodecimo volumes (good print) of near 1000 pages. Price $2.50. Published by T. B. Peterson & Co., Philadelphia.

PLACES OF EDUCATION FOR YOUNG LADIES.

Ontario Female Seminary, Canandaigua, N. Y. We have the Thirty-fifth Annual Report (1860) before us. This institution differs in some respects from the usual arrangements. There are three principals (or associated instructors), and an assistant principal; also four professors, gentlemen, and six teachers, ladies. The pupils numbered last year about 170. The Trustees say of this school:—

"Its history, from the beginning to the present hour, gives it a prominent place among the female seminaries of our land, especially for domestic and religious influences, which are imperatively demanded in the education of woman. It is understood that some 300 pupils have graduated here, and more than 3000 have been instructed in the higher English and classical studies."

Brownsville College for Young Ladies, Brownsville, Mississippi. This institution was founded last year: Rev. B. H. Capers, D. D., President and Professor of Languages and Belles Lettres. The Faculty comprises four gentlemen and one lady.

Dr. Capers has had much experience in teaching, and this, as we judge from his excellent inaugural address, has made him wise to discern the right way. He says:—

"The secret of scholastic training for the sex does not consist in a variety of superficial pursuits, and the multiplication of text-books, but in a careful and persevering attention to the most important accomplishments and studies calculated to improve the manners, enlarge the faculties, and purify the affections. There should not be less study imposed upon pupils, but fewer books, and a more intimate acquaintance with their contents."

High Point Female School, High Point, North Carolina. S. Launder, A. M., Principal, assisted by three ladies. The prominent arrangement in this institution is that of Loan Pupils.

"A limited number of worthy poor young ladies will be admitted as pupils on the following terms: They pay all their expenses but Tuition, every season in advance; and at the end of the session give their individual notes, without security, for their tuition in whatever branches they may have pursued."

Oakland Female Institute, Norristown, Penna. Principal, Rev. J. Grier Ralston; Vice-Principal, Mrs. Mary A. Ralston, assisted by eight ladies and four gentlemen in the various departments. There is also a "General Business Superintendent," John K. Ralston, Esq., which should prove beneficial to such establishments. Number of scholars for 1860, 122. The examining committee give an excellent report of this school.

Female Collegiate Institute of the University of the Pacific, Santa Clara, California. The Board of Instruction consists of Rev. George S. Philips, A. M., Principal, Professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy, Mrs. Elizabeth Philips, Governess and Teacher of Botany and Domestic Economy, with four ladies and five gentlemen (two of whom are clergymen) assistants. The pupils for 1860 numbered 66. The course of study arranged for this new institution is liberal, and we are told that "the one RULE of the Institute will be the Rule of Right."

MISS S. J. HALE'S BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES, 1826 Rittenhouse Square, Philadelphia.

This school is designed to give a thorough and liberal English education, to furnish the best facilities for acquiring the French language, and the best instruction in music and the other accomplishments. An accomplished French teacher resides in the family, and also an excellent teacher of music, who gives her personal attention to pupils while practising. The moral training and the health and physical development of the scholars are carefully attended to.

We have a number of MSS. on hand that will be reported next month. Our correspondents must have patience; it is not an easy task to examine all the articles sent us. Remember that a stamp must be sent if a reply is wanted; or send an envelope, directed and stamped, and an answer will be certain.

Health Department.

BY JNO. STAINBACK WILSON, M. D.

CONVULSIONS OF CHILDREN TEETHING.—Convulsions are better known among the people as "fits." In the present mode of dosing with opiates and astringents, and of excessive stuffings with meats, grease, and pastries, convulsions are quite a frequent complication of teething. And of all the disorders of infancy, these are, perhaps, the most formidable in appearance, and the most heart-rending to a mother. The symptoms of convulsions are so manifest as to require but little description. Every mother who has seen her darling writhing under a fit, with body stiff and immovable; with twitching muscles, clenched hands, glaring eyes, labored breathing, livid face, and distorted features, has the horrid picture indelibly engraved on her memory, and she can recognize the approach of the dreaded disorder on the occurrence of the slightest premonitions, such as starting in sleep, rolling of the eyeballs, and jerking of the muscles of the fingers and mouth.

The causes of convulsions in children are numerous and various; but at present we confine ourself to the convulsions resulting from the irritation of teething. But cutting teeth alone would rarely if ever cause the disorder. As before intimated, it is generally brought on by suddenly checking the diarrhoea of teething by the use of opiates and astringents, and by adding to the existing excitement of the system by giving children gross, stimulating food. For the proper diet for teething children, and for some remarks on the dangers of drugging with opiates and astringents, we refer to a previous article. Besides the remedies already indicated, as appropriate in all cases of teething, the special domestic treatment of the convulsions of teething should consist in the use of the warm bath and cold affusions to the head.

As soon as a child has the slightest symptom of an approaching fit, the whole body should be immersed in milk-warm water, and at the same time cold water should be freely poured upon the head, while the latter is turned over the edge of the bathing vessel. The little patient should remain in the bath until the system is thoroughly relaxed, which will be manifested by some paleness about the face, perspiration, a languid expression of the eyes, and a disposition to sleep. These effects having been seen, the patient should be taken out of the bath, quickly dried, and placed in bed, or in the nurse's arms; and a thin cloth wet in cold water should be laid on the head and changed every two or three minutes. It is best in these cases to put no clothing on the child except a gown or wrapper, so that it may be readily undressed and placed again in the bath; and this should be done on the occurrence of the slightest symptoms of another attack of spasms. The water should always be kept ready on hand, so that there may be no delay in preparing the bath.

This simple treatment with a properly regulated diet, will be sufficient in most cases of the convulsions of teething. Should other remedies be required, they should be administered under the advice of a physician. Cutting the gums, and other special remedies before prescribed, should not be neglected.

PRESCRIPTION FOR THE CHRONIC DIARRHŒA OF TEETHING.—While we are opposed to the use of active drugs in domestic practice, and while drugs of any kind will rarely be necessary in the diarrhœa of teething, if the directions before given are strictly followed, yet we can confidently recommend the following recipe in chronic and obstinate cases. According to our experience it is a most efficient compound, and it may be safely used in domestic practice: Take calomel, two grains; Dover's powder, two grains; powdered ginger, twenty grains; prepared chalk, thirty grains. Mix well, and divide into twelve powders. Give one every two, three, or four hours, regulating the frequency of the dose according to the condition of the bowels, and continuing the medicine until the discharges become natural and healthy. This preparation does not check the bowels suddenly, but gradually changes the secretions to a healthy condition. The proportion of opium to each powder is quite homœopathic, being only one-sixtieth of a grain, while there is only one-sixth of a grain of the other active ingredient—calomel.

We have tested the above prescription in many cases, and we rarely find it necessary to resort to anything else, with due attention to diet, clothing, and bathing.

ASSOCIATIONS FOR THE DIFFUSION OF SANITARY KNOWLEDGE.—We notice with much pleasure that "there has been recently formed in London a 'Ladies' National Association for the Diffusion of Sanitary Knowledge,' many of the members of which are among the most distinguished and noble ladies of England." We also learn from the same source (Lady's Book for November) that "the principal object of the Association is the preservation of the lives and health of women and children, by diffusing a knowledge of the laws of health in regard to air, food, and clothing;" and we are told, moreover, that the Association "have distributed not less than forty thousand copies of tracts giving plain instructions upon these subjects."

To say that we are pleased at this movement fails, greatly fails, to express our feelings; we are more than pleased, we are delighted. Next to religion (and very intimately associated with it, as we shall show at some future time), the most important concern of life is health. The blessings of health are to be attained by the diffusion of sound hygienic knowledge among the people, and in this way only; and this knowledge is to be dispensed mainly through the instrumentality of woman, by the influence of her example, and by the circulation of books and tracts on physiology and hygiene in her social intercourse. But, to do the work efficiently, her efforts must not be isolated, casual, occasional, and dependent on mere convenience and conventionality; they must be organized, united, certain, constant, vigorous, untiring, "in season and out of season."

We trust, then, that the good example of the ladies of England will be imitated by the women of America, and that "Ladies' Associations for the Diffusion of Sanitary Knowledge" will spring up all over this country, so much blessed in many respects, but so grievously cursed with disease and death from ignorance of the laws of health. With a climate as congenial as any perhaps on earth, in a country where the necessities of life are produced in abundance, with institutions eminently adapted to physical as well as intellectual development, with a constant influx of new and foreign material intermingling and intermarrying with our population, refreshing the streams of life, and tending to prevent those hereditary diseases which spring from marriages of consanguinity, yet, with all these advantages, the American people—the women, we mean—are the most weakly, sickly people of the civilized world. The causes of this are to be found mainly in our absurd fashions of dress, in the excessive consumption of gross food, in the neglect of physical education in early life, in the extravagant use of drugs, in that feverish anxiety in the pursuit of wealth and honor which causes a neglect of necessary relaxation, and, in short, by general "fast living," which is only another expression for the violation of every law of our physical and mental constitution.

FROM T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

LIFE IN THE OLD WORLD: or, Two Years in Switzerland and Italy. By Frederika Bremer, author of "The Father and Daughter," "The Neighbors," "Homes in the New World," etc. etc. Translated by Mary Howitt. In two volumes. Though passing through a frequently travelled and almost as frequently described region of country, Miss Bremer, with her own charming simplicity, has imparted a freshness to her descriptions, and enlivened them by incidents and reflections. The account of her journeyings is given in epistolary form, and the occurrences of each day are related with diary-like precision. Price $2 50.

THE PICKWICK PAPERS. By Charles Dickens ("Boz"). Household Edition. In two volumes. The Messrs. Peterson seem never wearied of issuing in new forms the works of this popular author. This fact alone is evidence of the success they meet with for each successive edition. The volumes before us are printed and bound in their best and neatest manner, with finely illustrated title-pages. Price $2 50.

FROM J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

PLANTS OF THE HOLY LAND, with their Fruits and Flowers. Beautifully Illustrated by Original Drawings, Colored from Nature. By Rev Henry S. Osborn, author of "Palestine, Past and Present." A peculiar interest will attach itself to this book among the religious community, as the plants therein described are those mentioned in the Scriptures, while the author has given them, besides the names they now bear, those by which they are there known. Many of these plants are represented by delicate colored plates, and the botanist and florist will find that the book contains much valuable general information. It is handsomely bound in green and gold, and will make an appropriate addition to the centre-table. Price $3 50.

From CHARLES DESILVER, Philadelphia:—

CHINA AND JAPAN: Being a Narrative of the Cruise of the U. S. Steam Frigate Powhatan, in the Years 1857, '58, '59, and '60. Including an Account of the Japanese Embassy to the United States. Illustrated with Life Portraits of the Ambassadors and their Principal Officials. By Lieut. James D. Johnston, U. S. N., late executive officer of the Powhatan. Any book that furnishes information concerning these countries at the present time, when the public mind is being excited in regard to them, will be most heartily welcomed by all. No one has yet forgotten the furor which the Japanese Embassy caused in this country not a year ago, and in this book we find a detailed account of their visit. The volume possesses not merely narrative and descriptive interest, but the knowledge which may be gathered from it concerning commerce and international politics cannot be too highly valued. Price $1 50.

SOYER'S STANDARD COOKERY FOR THE PEOPLE; Embracing an Entirely New System of Plain Cookery and Domestic Economy. By Alexis Soyer, author of the "Modern Housewife," etc. Price 38 cents

STANDARD HANDBOOK OF HOUSEHOLD ECONOMY FOR THE PEOPLE; Comprising Plain Directions for the Management of a Family, Servants, Lying-in Room, Nursery, Sick-Room, Flower-Garden, Kitchen-Garden, and Household Pets; and also for the Preparation and Administration of Remedies for Disease. By M. Guillaume St. Jean. Price 38 cents.

NEW STANDARD LETTER-WRITER FOR THE PEOPLE; Containing Copious and Accurate Directions for Conducting Epistolary Correspondence; with Numerous Specimens of Letters, adapted to every Age and Situation in Life, and to numerous Business Pursuits; many of which are printed in the Characters ordinarily used in Writing; and an Appendix comprising Forms for Wills, Petitions, Bills, Receipts, Bills of Exchange, Drafts, Promissory Notes, etc. etc. By J. W. O'Neill. Price 38 cents.

These three books are calculated, both by their contents and their inexpensive binding, which allows them to be offered at a price within the reach of all, to be received with popular favor.

From SMITH, ENGLISH, & Co., 23 North Sixth Street, Philadelphia:—

CHRISTIAN SONGS, Translations, and other Poems. By the Rev. James Gilborne Lyons, LL.D. A portion of these poems are already familiar to the public, and have received its unbounded approval. The miscellaneous poems and translations which are added to the "Christian Songs" will stand equally well the test of criticism.

From JAMES CHALLEN & SON, Philadelphia:—

THE LITTLE PILGRIMS IN THE HOLY LAND. By Rev. Henry S. Osborn, author of "Palestine, Past and Present," and "Fruits and Flowers of the Holy Land." We can do no better, in speaking of this book, than to quote the author's own words in a prefatory address which he makes his young friends: "I have written with a desire to improve as well as to please you. You will, therefore, have to work a little, as well as play; but if you read until you have completed the book, you will not only know more of the pleasures and trials, the joys and disappointments, which attend upon a journey through that country of which the Bible speaks, but you will know more of the cities and ruins, and understand better what you have read and have been taught in the Scriptures."

THE PHYSICAL AND MORAL ASPECTS OF GEOLOGY; Containing the Leading Facts and Principles of the Science, and a Discussion of the Great Moral Questions growing out of Modern Geological Discoveries. By Wm. J. Barber, A. M., M. D., Principal of M. F. Institute, Senatobia, Mississippi. This book will be gratefully received by a large class of people who, being unable in their own minds to reconcile the teachings of geology with those of the Bible, have been forced to reject that science as a false one, dangerous to the interests of Christianity. This book treats of the subject in all its bearings in a most able and learned manner, and proves conclusively that the Scriptures are not inimical to it.

DRIFT WOOD on the Sea of Life. By Willie Ware. A heterogeneous collection of short articles, prose and poetical, many of which have already appeared in papers and magazines of the day. They all possess tolerable, and some more than ordinary, merit. It is just the book with which to while away a listless hour.

From WM. S. & ALFRED MARTIEN, Philadelphia:—

WORKING AND WAITING: or, Patience in Well-Doing. By Mrs. Carey Brock, authoress of "Children at Home," etc. A very pleasant and instructive story for the young, especially for boys, showing the advantages of "patient continuance in well-doing." The moral is enforced so agreeably, the story is so lively and full of interest, that we can cheerfully recommend it as one of the books that will fulfil the double purpose of instructing and amusing.

CHARLES NORWOOD: or, Erring and Repenting. By Catharine M. Trowbridge, authoress of "Dick and his friend Fidus," etc. The evils of disobedience and wilfulness which this story is meant to illustrate, are well delineated and exposed. Independently of its high moral influence the book is exceedingly interesting.

From FISHER & BROTHER, Philadelphia:—

HOME AND SCHOOL PRIMER Edited and illustrated by A. Whitehill. With five hundred wood-cuts.

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

COINS, MEDALS, AND SEALS, Ancient and Modern. Illustrated and Described. With a Sketch of the History of Coins and Coinage, Instructions for Young Collectors, Tables of Comparative Rarity, Price Lists of English and American Coins, Medals, and Tokens, etc. etc. Edited by W. C. Prime, author of "Boat Life in Egypt and Nubia," "Tent Life in the Holy Land," etc. A fine, elegantly printed book, which, we are told, is intended to give, in a cheap form, information which new collectors could not otherwise obtain, except at very great expense. Price $2 50.

STUDIES FROM LIFE. By the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "A Life for a Life," "The Head of the Family," etc. Here we have a collection of sketches, disseriations, essays, etc. on various subjects written in the clear, forceful style, and pervaded by the healthful tone that characterizes the productions of their well-known author. The book is filled with sense, sentiment, and humor, varied by an occasional touch of satire. Price 75 cents.

THE CHILDREN'S PICTURE FABLE-BOOK, Containing one hundred and sixty Fables. With sixty illustrations by Harrison Weir. The tales of this book are short, and each conveys a sound moral. Its illustrations are more than usually fine and spirited. The youngest child may find amusement in it, while many an older person will glance through its pages with pleasure. Price $1 00.

THE CHILDREN'S PICTURE-BOOK OF BIRDS. Illustrated with sixty-one engravings by W. Harvey. This book will prove a source of never-ending entertainment to the children, awakening in them a desire to pursue the study of ornithology and natural history generally. The engravings give representations of hundreds of different birds. Price $1 00.

STORIES OF RAINBOW AND LUCKY. Up the River. By Jacob Abbott. The concluding volume of the series of Rainbow and Lucky Stories, concerning which we need only say it will prove as entertaining as its predecessors. Price 50 cents.

THE ODYSSEY OF HOMER, With the Hymns, Epigrams, and Battle of the Frogs and Mice. Literally Translated, with explanatory Notes, by Theodore Alois Buckley, B. A., of Christ Church. This "translation of the Odyssey has been executed on the same plan as that of the Iliad, to which it forms the companion volume. The hymns and minor poems are now for the first time literally translated, completing all that has been attributed to Homer." Price 75 cents.

HERODOTUS. Recensuit Josephus Williams Blakesley, S.T.B. Coll. ss. Trin. Apud Cantabr. quondam Socius. In two volumes. These volumes belong to the library of Greek and Latin Texts which is being issued by the house of the Messrs. Harper. Price 90 cents.

From RUDD & CARLETON, New York, through SAMUEL HAZARD, JR., Philadelphia:—

FROM HAY-TIME TO HOPPING. By the author of "Our Farm of Four Acres." This is essentially a book descriptive of English rural life, and the style of the narrative possesses that freshness and simplicity appropriate to its subject. The book is redolent, we might almost say, of the perfume of new-mown hay, and richly-laden hop-vines. Price $1 00.

From TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston, through S. HAZARD, JR., Philadelphia:—

REMINISCENCES OF SCOTTISH LIFE AND CHARACTER. By E. B. Ramsay, M. A., LL. D., F. R. S. E., Dean of Edinburgh. A book filled with entertaining descriptions and amusing anecdotes, illustrative of the peculiar traits of the Scottish people. There are few persons who do not feel an interest in the land of Scott and Burns, which has clustered around it so many associations, both historical and traditional. Price $1 00.

POEMS. By Rose Terry. This volume is composed of poems, which, for their simplicity, grace, and beauty, will win hosts of earnest admirers. We consider it far above the average of books of its class. Price 75 cents.

THE HEROES OF EUROPE: A Biographical Outline of European History, from A. D. 700 to A. D. 1700. By Henry G. Hewlett. The biographies in this volume are written in most excellent style, and, though brief, convey vividly to the reader the more striking and important events in the lives of those whom they commemorate. In addition to its merits as a book of biographies, the work will be found to comprehend a succinct history of Europe, from the time of Charles Martel to the days of the Great Condo.

BONNIE SCOTLAND. Tales of her History, Heroes, and Poets. By Grace Greenwood. With illustrations. The first thing the reader finds upon opening this book is the story of Tam O'Shanter rendered in prose, while there immediately follows a short sketch of the life of Robert Burns. Sir William Wallace, Rob Roy, Mary Queen of Scots, and other persons of equal interest in the romance of history find their places here. Price 75 cents.

BRUN: The Grand Bear Hunt. By Captain Mayne Reid, author of "The Boy Hunters," "The Young Voyageurs," "Odd People," etc. We have already noticed approvingly several books by this author, and it seems hardly necessary for us to repeat the praise which we must bestow unreservedly on all his productions. There is not a boy possessed of boyish tastes and instincts but would declare that this story "exactly suited" him. Price 75 cents.

THE SEVEN LITTLE SISTERS who Live on the Round Ball that Floats in the Air. With illustrations. A charming little book, describing, in allegorical form, and in a manner easily understood by the youngest child, the various races of men. Price 63 cents.

HYMNS OF THE AGES. Second Series. Being Selections from Withers, Crashaw, Southwell, Habington, and other Sources. A beautiful collection of religious poems, selected mostly from standard English authors, which will certainly find a welcome from all who appreciate true poetry and ennobling sentiment. It is a book suited to all circumstances and places, and to persons of every religious belief. Price $1 00.

THE CONDUCT OF LIFE. By R. W. Emerson. This elegantly printed volume contains nine of Emerson's finest and most finished essays, viz: I. Fate; II. Power; III. Wealth; IV. Culture; V. Behavior; VI. Worship; VII. Considerations by the Way; VIII. Beauty; IX. Illusions. Price $1 00.

From RUSSELL & JONES, Charleston, S. C., through J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

AREYTOS; or, Songs and Ballads of the South. With other Poems. By W. Gilmore Sims, Esq., author of "The Yemassee," "The Partisan," "The Forayers," etc. The lyre of Mr. Sims is one whose tones must always command approval. Classical without coldness, the poetic utterances in this present volume are such as will add to their author's already high reputation.

From J. E. TILTON & Co., Boston:—

THE PRINTER BOY; or, How Ben Franklin made his Mark. An Example for Youth. By William M. Thayer, author of "The Bobbin Boy," "Tales from the Bible," etc. One of those pleasant stories for youth, which, while it amuses, seeks also to inspire its readers with a desire to emulate the hero in his efforts to become good and great. Price 75 cents.

From T. O. P. BURNHAM, Boston, through J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

WHAT WE EAT: An Account of the most common Adulterations of Food and Drink. With simple Tests by which Many of Them may be Detected. By Thomas H. Hoskins, M. D. A book, the perusal of which will startle many a reader, when he learns what villainous compounds he consumes in the shape of food and drink ; and which, while it reveals the frauds, points out, in many cases, the means of detecting and providing against them.

CORRESPONDENCE OF FRAULEIN GUNDERODE AND BETTINE VON ARNIM. "To those who have eyes to see and hearts to understand the deep leadings of the two characters, these pages present a treasury of sweetest satisfactions, of lively suggestions ; to the obtuse, the vulgar, and the frivolous they will seem sheer folly, the cobweb tissues of a misled fancy, the bubbles on waters yet undrained." This is said of this correspondence in the translator's preface, and we are willing to admit that it may be true in a degree ; yet, in our own opinion, these letters, which may have proved exceedingly interesting to the writers, will hardly be found so by the world at large. A book written in the form of epistles is, as a general thing, the dullest of all books. There are many beauties, both of fancy and sentiment, within its pages, but to our mind the book partakes to such a degree of the heaviness and tediousness of style which is the characteristic of a certain class of German literature, that we fear most American readers will find it a wearisome task to search for them. Others, however, upon reading it, may differ from us in opinion.

From MARIE LOUISE HANKINS & Co., New York :—
WOMEN OF NEW YORK. Written and illustrated by Marie Louise Hankins, editress of the "Pictorial Family Newspaper," and authoress of "Human Life," "The Bankrupt's Wife," "The Needle Woman," etc. etc. Marie Louise Hankins, the editress of a popular literary paper in New York city, has just issued a book from her own publication office, written and illustrated by herself, which is, as she herself says, either remarkable or odd in every feature. We cannot claim any remarkable degree of literary merit for it, yet this could hardly be expected when we are told that in six weeks from the day she began to write it an edition of ten thousand copies were printed and bound complete, and during this short time she had her paper to conduct and many other things to attend to. Nevertheless the sketches are well drawn, and hold up to view the follies, vices, and vanities of various classes of women in New York, and the book will find a multitude of readers. Price $1.

From CASSELL, POTTER, & GALPIN, New York :—
CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY BIBLE. We have received seven additional Parts of this work, beginning with Part 16. We again call the attention of our readers to it, and recommend them to supply themselves with the parts as fast as issued. Price 15 cents per part.
CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF ENGLAND. The Text, to the Reign of Edward the First, by J. F. Smith, and from that Period by William Howitt. Six more parts, including Part 11 of this history, have been sent us. They embrace the period from the time of the Crusades up to the Wars of the Roses. Part 11 completes the first volume of the history. Published semi-monthly at 15 cents per part.

CASSELL'S POPULAR NATURAL HISTORY. From Part 15 to Part 21, inclusive. The natural historian will find this work a treasure indeed. The illustrations are most profuse, and the descriptions enter into the greatest minuteness, which will render it, when completed, one of the most valuable publications of its kind. Published semi-monthly at 15 cents per part.

From ROBERT CARTER & BROTHERS, New York, through MARTIN & BROTHER, Philadelphia :—

WIN AND WEAR. A very interesting and touching story of a boy determined from the first start in life to receive nothing unless he had first won it by his own labor. It is a book calculated to do much good to the young.

PRIDE AND HIS PRISONERS. By A. L. O. E., authoress of "Idols in the Heart," etc. It is enough to say of this beautiful little story that it is well worth the pen of the graceful and accomplished writer, whose name is on its title-page. Not only the young, but those of any age might read it with profit and interest.

From M. W. DODD, New York, through C. S. LUTHER, 1334 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia :—

GLENARVAN ; or, Holidays at the Cottage. We regret that we have received this and so many other entertaining children's books at too late a date to recommend them in time for the holiday sales. But such a book will not come amiss to the young people at any time of the year.

From the LONDON publisher, through A. BROWN & Co., Boston :—

THIRTEEN PORTRAITS AND MEMOIRS from the Drawing-Room Portrait Gallery of Eminent Personages. We have received Parts 1, 2, and 3 of this most invaluable work. Each part contains thirteen fine large steel engravings of individuals who are leading characters in the politics, religion, and literature of England. Among the number are the portraits of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Earl of Carlisle, K. G., Rev. John Cumming, D. D., Cardinal Wiseman, Lord Brougham, the Prince Consort, Lord Palmerston, Lord John Russell, Charles Dickens, and Miss Amy Sedgwick. These parts can be obtained for 5s., English money, each ; or, in advance, with The Illustrated News of the World, a fine, large, neatly printed, and ably conducted paper, for thirteen weeks from the date of subscription, for 7s. 11d., English currency.

From JAMES MUNROE & Co., Boston.

THE REAL AND THE BEAU-IDEAL. By the author of "Visiting my Relations." A little work, written in a thoughtful and somewhat discursive style. The main purpose of which is to show how much more it conduces to our happiness to receive things as they are and "make the best of them," in our daily household experience, than to reject all that does not reach our expectations, and weary ourselves with desires for an unattainable earthly perfection, in our surroundings.

A HAND-BOOK OF EXERCISES AND READING-LESSONS FOR BEGINNERS IN LATIN ; Progressively Illustrated by Grammatical References. By James Morris Whiton, Rector of the Hopkins Grammar School in New Haven. This will be a very useful work to those whose aim it is to acquire a thorough and accurate knowledge of Latin. We commend it to the notice of teachers and students.

READINGS FOR YOUNG MEN, MERCHANTS, AND MEN OF BUSINESS. Reprinted from the London Edition. A book full of valuable counsels and suggestions to business men, brought forward in a striking and at-active form. It will make a useful part of the library of every merchant.

A HISTORY OF THE CEMETERY OF MOUNT AUBURN. By Jacob Bigelow, President of the Corporation. His volume will possess a peculiar interest to those whose relatives and friends repose in that beautiful and consecrated spot, or to strangers who wish to know something of a place so celebrated.

THE LIFE OF JOSEPH GARIBALDI, the Liberator of Italy. Complete up to the withdrawal of Garibaldi to his island home, after the Neapolitan Campaign, 1860. By O. J. Victor. Our thanks are due Mr. Victor for a copy of this work, which we have received from him. The attention which the events of the past year or two have attracted towards Italy is centred in a peculiar degree in General Garibaldi, as the prime mover in the revolution in that country. Whatever relates to this man will be read by all, whether their sympathies be with or against him. Price $1.00.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

GODEY FOR MARCH, 1861.—"Suffer little children to come unto me." Another splendid plate, remarkable for the beauty of the subject and the fineness of the execution. "Christ Blessing Little Children" is probably the most expensive plate we have ever published, and needs no description from us. It is a subject that commands itself to everybody.

Spring! Spring! A spring fashion-plate, in-door and out-door dresses, spring bonnets, and a large plate of spring dresses. Our subscribers cannot say of us that we do not remember when the seasons roll round. Six figures in this colored fashion-plate against those of two in the others. Why, the engraving and colors of those four extra figures would almost be capital enough for a smaller magazine.

The extension-plate of spring fashions, we want it understood, is entirely a separate plate, and does not interfere with our usual variety. We give the same twelve full page plates in front of the Book in addition to this. We have not robbed Peter to pay Paul.

We illustrate in this number "Lessons in Moss Painting," and very pretty the picture thus made must look. We shall soon commence "Pebble Work." For novelties of every kind you must see Godey. Our "Novelties for March" is very full this month. This number bounds with engravings. See the illustrations of Miss Frost's Chorus of "Stratagem."

DISCOUNT AND PREMIUM.—We return our thanks to those who have had some consideration for us in these times of heavy discount. Many have remitted us current funds; others have bought drafts and paid the premium, which is but trifling when divided among many; others, we are sorry to say, have allowed the whole of the discount to fall upon us, thereby totally destroying all profit on the clubs they have sent. They would buy drafts, charging us with the whole of the premium they paid; and others would send money that we had to sell here at from twelve to fifteen per cent. discount. We have now hundreds of dollars on hand that we are holding, hoping, as Micawber did, that "something will turn up" to lessen the discount. We would ask, is this exactly fair?

A RULE THAT DOES NOT WORK BOTH WAYS.—If a person sends us money and it does not come to hand, we are politely asked to lose it. If a subscriber does not receive a number we are asked to supply it. Here is what we will not do: at the end of the year, we are informed by a subscriber that certain numbers are missing, and that we have not sent them. This is very easy to say, but in many instances this is the case: numbers are lent, and not returned; and when the numbers are gathered up at the end of the year for binding, these numbers are missing. The publisher is then informed that he did not send them. Now let it be distinctly understood that we send no missing numbers that are not asked for at the time; for instance, if the August number comes to hand and July did not, then is the time to ask for it. We are not going to be accountable for numbers lost by lending.

We publish the following as an evidence of the popularity of the Lady's Book. Advertisements we do not want:—

L. A. GODEY, ESQ.: DEAR SIR—Your Book must be a medium of advertising far superior to many other journals. A friend of mine advertised in several of the best papers of the day, and received not a single answer. You inserted a notice in your Book twice, and she received twelve applications in answer; the first coming in three days after the first one was out. The fact speaks for itself, and all who want success should seek your columns. Yours respectfully, A SUBSCRIBER.

"GODEY" AND "HARPER."—How often must we state that these two magazines are only sent when $4 50 is received? Harper's Magazine is not in any other club of ours.

Our California friend—had better stick to the steamers in sending their remittances. We have lost several sums sent to us from California by the overland mail.

SOMETHING ABOUT OUR NEEDLES.

IOWA.

L. A. GODEY: DEAR SIR—My wife is sick in bed, and of course all rips, tears, and buttons to be sewed have to be done by myself; to-night I was trying to sew up some rents in my out-door gloves, and I broke all the needles given me; at last a young lady gave me one of your needles—it was nothing to sew with it compared to the rest. Now, sir, I want you to send me a case of your needles: two papers that will carry linen sewing-thread, and two papers, assorted sizes, all to be of sharps; then I can mend my own gloves, and if they turn out as good as the one I have used to-night, Godey will hear from me when they are gone; inclosed please find nine red stamps. Yours truly, J. R.

GOOD NEWS FOR THE PUBLIC.—Boardman & Gray's celebrated Piano manufactory in Albany, N. Y., that was burnt out several months since, is now in full operation. They have made many improvements in their mechanical department—new scales and patterns. Like everything American, a fire purifies and suggests new ideas. They still continue to furnish the Young America Piano for $150, and School Piano for $125.

INDIANA.—What is the matter in this State, that so many remittances by mail are lost?

OUR MUSICAL COLUMN.

Opera and Concert.—Despite the political and financial troubles which, up to this writing, have disarranged all the usual plans of social and public enjoyment, our metropolis has not been without its accustomed musical recreation. At our peerless Academy the associated artists of the Opera, Colson, Brignoli, Susini, and Ferri, have won golden opinions, if not dollars, and have been successful in every way but the one of putting money into their treasury. Yet even this is a happy result to them in view of the enormous losses which they and every other Opera company have made in New York and elsewhere the past season. In our sister city the whole Ullman combination has been broken up, and the manager ruined. Philadelphia can always make a better showing than this. The Germania Orchestra rehearsals, which are quite a Saturday afternoon institution, are conducted with vigor, as are also the soirees of M. Bonewitz, at which Mme. Johannsen assists. At the Foyer of the Academy Messrs. Wolfsohn and Thomas's classical reunions have been very successful.

Richardson's New Method.—"The New Modern School for the Piano Forte," by Nathan Richardson, published by Russell & Tolman, Boston, is the very best piano instructor now before the public, and has received testimonials from hundreds of our best artists and professors, including Thalberg, Alf. Jaell, Dreyschock, Otto Dresel, and others, men who do not lend their names to every book before the public. The work is commended to teachers and pupils, young and old, and especially to those who have acquired a faulty habit of playing. It is progressive in its character: it leads the learner step by step from the simplest to the most elaborate pieces; and both teacher and pupil may feel every confidence that no instruction book has ever been offered to the public which contains so many qualifications for their approval. Size quarto, pp. 200. Price $2 50. We will mail it, post free, to any address on receipt of price.

New Sheet Music.—The new publications of Mr. J. H. Hidley, Albany, comprise, How Sad the Moments are, by Bassford, 25 cents; The Summer Brook, by Laurence, 25 cents; He Sleeps beneath the Heather, Montignani, 25 cents; Inspirer and Hearer of Prayer, hymn, by Morgan, 25 cents; The Grave of Old Grimes, Holloway, 25 cents; Fandango, Spanish dance, by Karl Merz, 35 cents; La Fleur Favorite, quadrille, by Fradel, 35 cents; Bergeronette Galop, by Fradel, 25 cents; Polka Sentimentale, by Liebich, 25 cents; and Schrieber's Band Drum Polka, a capital composition, 25 cents.

The new pieces from Messrs. Russell & Tolman's establishment, Boston, include Lost Lizzie, by Edward Clark, 25 cents; List thee, dearest, and Uriella, by H. P. Danks, each 25 cents; O who would look sad, and The Yankee Girl, by Partridge, each 25 cents; Mary Wayne, ballad, Jodie's Prayer, and Don't shut out the Moonbeams, Mother, by Hess, each 25 cents; Teach me thy Ways, a beautiful sacred quartette, suitable for church choirs or parlor singing, with organ and piano accompaniment, 30 cents; Little Charlie went a Fishing, with pictorial title, 30 cents; Zouave, mazourka brillante, by Kingsley, 25 cents; Golden Galop, Fernald, 25 cents; and Silver Star Polka, by Clarke, 25 cents.

We can forward any of the above pieces on receipt of price in stamps. To all who order $2 00 worth of music we can send gratis a copy of the new and popular ballad, Poor Ben the Piper.

J. STARR HOLLOWAY.

The Ladies' Manual of Fancy Work, by Mrs. Pullen. Price $1 25.

OUR DOUBLE-EXTENSION FASHION-PLATES.—It would take a book larger than any one of our monthly numbers to contain the favorable notices from the press, and the many letters we receive concerning them. They seem to have taken the public by surprise, and not only the public but our contemporaries. They never even dreamed that such a thing could be done; and while they were thinking over the matter Godey did it, and a great success it has been. Nothing in England, France, or America has ever approached these fashions, and the Lady's Book now bears the supremacy in these plates. Compare our five, six, and seven figure-fashions with the two (!) of other magazines.

LET it be distinctly understood that we have no agents for whose acts we are responsible, and we are only accountable to those who remit directly to us. We have no agents that solicit subscribers. Money must be sent to the publisher, L. A. Godey, Philadelphia.

THE FLOWER GARDEN.

We again greet the readers of the Lady's Book upon the approach of spring, and, whilst thanking them for their generous patronage, would remind them that now is the time to make their preparation for the garden—the taste for gardening and the love for flowers have become so universal, and are withal such an evidence of refinement and cultivated taste, that no lady would willingly be deprived of the pleasure of surrounding herself with them, where they can be placed within the reach of her means or opportunity to obtain them. It affords us much pleasure to know that our efforts have been appreciated; during the past year our labors have been lightened by the receipt of very many kind and unsolicited letters of commendation, and we take the liberty of presenting extracts from a few of them, which will convince the most sceptical that there is no difficulty (when properly packed) of conveying plants by express to great distances with safety.

GREENVILLE, S. C., March 9, 1860.

The box of plants arrived safely, and, although seven days on the road, they looked fresh and beautiful.

JACKSON, Tenn., May 16, 1860.

The roses you sent me are splendid; a great many persons have been to see them; by next fall I hope to set up quite a large list to send on for flowers and seeds too.

HOLLY SPRINGS, Miss., April 8, 1860.

I, several days since, received the package you sent, and was highly gratified to learn that you had filled the order entirely to my satisfaction.

LA GRANGE, Mo., March 21, 1860.

The box of plants, &c. which you sent me per express arrived last night, and opened in splendid order. The fuchsias and heliotropes especially were beautiful; the right, fresh green of their foliage was not damaged by spot, and every leaf appeared perfect.

FORT KEARNEY, N. T., May 2, 1860.

I have to-day received the box of plants you sent me, and am glad to be able to inform you that most of them are in very fine order. I consider the experiment successful.

We have letters of similar import from nearly every state in the Union.

By referring to the March number, 1860, of the Lady's Book, page 280, under the head of "The Flower Garden," will be found select lists of Roses, Geraniums, Fuchsias, Verbenas, &c. We are still prepared to furnish the same assortment, with the substitution of many newer and finer varieties. Among the novelties for 1861, we offer the following:—

NEW SEEDLING VERBENAS, as a great improvement on all other varieties, for their brilliancy of color, large size of truss, prominent centres and eyes, remarkably vigorous growth, and free-blooming qualities, fully maintained during the excessive heat and drought of last summer. No. 1. Louisa, lilac shaded with crimson, large white eye; 2. Mrs. Haderman, rosy scarlet, large white eye; 3. Mrs. Mayrant, deep claret, fine white eye; 4. Barbaldi, salmon red, large white eye; 5. Mrs. H. Ingersoll, dark indigo blue, white eye; 6. Mauve, purplish blue, lemon eye; 7. Solferino, rosy carmine, lemon eye; 8. Vivid, brilliant scarlet, clear white eye; 9. Souvenir, Jeo. C. Thorburn, deep glossy puce, with a distinct square white centre; 10. Richard Feters, clear purple, white eye; 11. Col. Messerschert, dark red, with a black ring round a light centre; 12. Magenta, dark violet crimson, white eye; 13. President, rosy crimson, large purple centre. Price, 50 cents each, or the collection of thirteen for $3 00; two collections for $5 00.

Also the following six NEW STRIPED PETUNIAS, single flowers, vigorous habit, and brilliant colors: Forget-me-not, Standard, Gem, Union, Conqueror, Novelty.

Among the DOUBLE PETUNIAS the following three are the best for size and beauty: Mad. Mielles, pure white; Wm. Robinson, rose, shaded with light blue; Versha-feltii, bluish lilac. Price, 25 cents each, or $2 00 for the nine varieties.

FUCHSIAS, with double corollas, are also among the recent introductions. We offer the following three splendid varieties: Sir Colin Campbell, Cheiranthiflora plena, Augusta Geraert. Among the single ones, Catharine Hayes, La Crinoline, and Wiltshire Lass are pre-eminent. The set of six are offered for $2 00.

LANTANAS are beautiful shrubby plants, with verbenalike flowers, bloom constantly, and are well adapted for bedding out, as they stand the heat and drought of summer remarkably well; the following six varieties are recommended: Alba grandiflora, white yellow centre; Comptess de Morny, yellow, shaded with rose; Grand Sultan, orange scarlet; Lutea superba, large pale yellow; Flava Lilacina, buff shaded with lilac; Crocea superba, bright orange. 25 cents each, or the set for $1 00.

PENSTEMONS are also worthy the attention of amateurs; they are hardy in the Southern States; the flowers are bell-shaped; colors scarlet, purple, blue, &c. We offer six new varieties for $1 50.

PLANTS IN COLLECTIONS.

As an inducement for purchasers, we offer the following choice assortment of seventy-five plants (invariably our own selection), including packing, for $10 00:—

12 Roses, ever-blooming varieties, distinct and beautiful.

12 Verbenas, choice; but not the new seedlings.

6 Geraniums, assorted colors, for bedding out.

3 Heliotropium, free-blooming varieties.

6 Phlox, hardy perennial varieties.

6 Petunias, double and single varieties.

6 Fuchsias, the best single varieties.

12 Bedding Plants, assorted varieties.

6 Dahlias, fine double varieties.

6 Bulbous Roots, including Tuberose, Gladiolus, &c.

FLOWER SEEDS BY MAIL.

A flower-garden is still imperfect without a judicious selection of plants raised from seed. Indeed, such varieties as Phlox Drummondii, with its brilliant hues the splendid varieties of German Asters, fragrant Stocks Mignonette, Pinks, Sweet Alyssum, with many others, are indispensable in making up a bouquet during the summer months; and those out of the reach of express lines can still gratify their taste for flowers, by the cultivation from seed of many truly beautiful plants at a very small expense. The following assortments, made up of the most desirable and free-blooming varieties, will be forwarded post-paid. (Except to California, Oregon, or the British Provinces).

Correspondents will please observe to write their signatures distinctly, and give the full post-office address; letters are frequently received without address, and in some instances even without a signature; also state the number of the assortment desired.

Annuals are plants which arrive at perfection and die off the first year; biennials, such as last two seasons; perennials, such as exist from year to year. Many of the biennial and perennial varieties will bloom the first year if sown early.

No. 1. Twenty choice annuals, free bloomers, for $1 00.

No. 2. Twenty choice biennial and perennial varieties, for $1 00.

No. 3. Twelve new and rare varieties, for $1 00.

No. 4. Twenty varieties green-house plants, for $2 00.

No. 5. One hundred varieties, including many rare sorts, $5 00.

The above assortments are invariably our own selection; when selected from catalogue, a liberal allowance will be made where a quantity is ordered. Catalogues will be forwarded by inclosing a postage stamp.

PENNA.

L. A. GODEY, ESQ.: DEAR SIR—A stranger to you personally, yet an old time-admirer of your taste in all literary matters, dating from the sunny days of childhood, when Godey was my mother's special favorite, I cannot forbear inclosing to you the notice I have given in our paper of this week (a copy of which has been forwarded to your office), and to wish you continued prosperity, a merry Christmas, and a glad New Year.

R.

LADY'S BOOK.—As we dreamily looked on the cheerful glow which radiated in sparkles of fire from out the coals of anthracite, last evening, the strange query was inwardly propounded, if genial, faultless Godey should ever be arraigned before any tribunal (which the bright eyes and loving hearts of his thousands of fair admirers forefend!) and was to demand his trial by his peers in literature, he would be acquitted, because the world could not fill the jury panel with his equals. Always in advance of every other competitor in catering to the refined and appreciative taste of his readers, the ambition of his life seems concentrated in the successful effort of making each number of its magazine superior to its predecessors in both reading matter and illustrations; as the January number for 1861 most triumphantly proves; as it is superior to any one ever issued by its honored publishers. We do not notice particular articles, for the reason that all are meritorious and interesting; and then, too, one year's subscription is only $3.

WE ask attention to the advertisement of Messrs. T. B. Peterson & Brothers on the cover of this number; Fredrika Bremer's new work, and "Five Languages without a Master." French, German, Spanish, Latin, and Italian without a Master. This is a most invaluable work, and the price only $1 25. With this book and careful study, any one may master these languages. Miss Bremer's work is $2 50, 2 vols. They will send either book, postage free, on receipt of the price.

PATTERNS FOR INFANTS' DRESSES, OR INFANTS' WARDROBES.—Our fashion editor has supplied a great many wardrobes for infants lately, and in every case has given great satisfaction. She has facilities for furnishing these articles better and cheaper than any other person. The vast influence that her connection with the Lady's Book gives her induces importers and others to submit to her their earliest fashions. To those who cannot afford the articles, made-up paper patterns can be sent, which will be fac-similes of the originals. We cannot publish the prices, as the postage varies according to the size of the articles ordered, and that we have to pay in advance. For particulars, address Fashion Editor (not Mrs. Hale), care of L. A. Godey, Philadelphia. All other patterns furnished as usual.

DODGE.—We do not mean to dodge the question, but the inimitable Ossian E. Dodge, late of Cleveland, Ohio, has started on a concerting tour, and we commend him to our brethren of the press wherever he goes. Dodge is a genius; he can entertain a company alone, a whole evening, with his stories and songs. Read the following from the Cleveland Review:—

"This gentleman, who is perhaps as extensively known as any man in America, is about resuming his labors in the concert field. Mr. Dodge has done business in this city during the past five years of over one hundred thousand dollars, and as he wins the applause of the musical public as singer, so has he won the profound esteem of all with whom he has transacted business.

"He enters the concert field next Monday, there to remain probably a year, and possibly two or three years, making this city his headquarters, and giving concerts in this and adjoining States. So popular is his name in the concert field, and so sure is he of drawing full houses, that we understand he has been offered a regular salary (secured) of ten thousand dollars a year for two years; but the offer has been refused, Mr. Dodge preferring to be his own master and to control his own movements.

"We unite with the business men of Cleveland in wishing the most unbounded success to Ossian E. Dodge."

HAIR DYE IN FOUR DIFFERENT COLORS.—The most perfect article of this kind, manufactured by the celebrated Berger, of Paris, is now for sale in this city by Fouladoux, in Chestnut Street above Fourth. It will color the hair black, brown, light brown, or of a very light almost flaxen color. There is no deception in this, for we have seen the article tried, and pronounce it, without any exception, the very best hair dye we have ever seen. Those who order will please specify what kind they want—as one case only contains one particular dye. In addition to the above, Mr. Fouladoux manufactures wigs and fronts, and furnishes every article in the hair line.

A NEW YORK publisher, in his advertisement, says: "This is the first time that Gilbert, foremost of English book illustrators, has contributed original drawings to an American publication." This is quite a mistake; the celebrated John Gilbert, of London, has contributed several original designs for the Lady's Book, and we have in our possession the original drawings. This is modest on the part of the New York publisher. Here is another instance we received from a New York house: an annual purporting to be original in every respect; but we happen to have in our possession, a book published by Tilt, of London, in 1834, which is the original of this "original" work—the same plates and the same reading.

WE publish the inclosed, not vouching for it. We object, as a general thing, to publishing medical receipts, but are willing to aid in giving any relief in this terrible disease:—

CURE FOR LOCKJAW.—We have noticed lately, says the Lancaster Gazette, accounts of a number of deaths by this disease, which induces us to republish a positive preventive and remedy for this disease. It is the simple application of beef's gall to the wound. Besides its antispasmodic properties, the gall draws from the wound any particles of wood, glass, iron, or other substances that may cause irritation, when other applications have failed.

commence and practice upon. If our young pupils have any difficulty in cutting out by the eye, without drawing, they can procure a sheet of tracing paper, by placing this upon the object and going over the outline with a soft black-lead pencil, then reversing the tracing and placing the pencil lines upon the paper you wish to cut out, and going over the back of the same lines with a sharp-pointed pencil, the outline of the pattern will be clearly marked out. But it is much better to attempt and cut out the subject without drawing at all, as practising both the eye and the hand at the same time.

Take a piece of thin writing paper, and fold it four or five times; double the same again and cut out the half (Fig. 2). When opened out they will make Fig. 3, and, by cutting out two sets of four or five each, and fixing the hands together with a little gum, they can be made to form the circle as in Fig. 1.

REGISTERED LETTERS AND SECRET IN MAILING.—The editor of the Cosmopolitan Art Journal is rather more severe than we are upon these two subjects. Hear him. —

"HOW TO REMIT.—Single subscribers can remit us by letter, in current funds, or in stamps. Inclose the money securely, and never register the letter nor advise any post-office official that there is money in it. Our losses through the mail are very serious, and are greatly enhanced by the mistake subscribers make in letting any one know the letter which has money in it. Registering letters is simply a trick of the law-makers to advise thieving officials which letters to take. Where several subscriptions are remitted, it is best to procure a draft, if possible. If this is not convenient, send a good, bankable bill for the amount, making up the odd change in stamps."

We have two instances to relate that are somewhat piquant. A gentleman sent us two remittances from Arkansas, neither registered; both came to hand. The third he registered, that never was received. A gentleman in Michigan advised that by same mail he sent a registered letter containing $15. The letter making the announcement was received, the other did not come to hand until some twenty days after. The only wonder in this case is that it was received. It bore the post-mark of the office where he mailed seventeen days after his letter of announcement was mailed. If a registered letter addressed to us is lost, we take no further trouble in the matter.

MADAME CLEMENT'S FRENCH AND ENGLISH PROTESTANT FAMILY SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES, Beverly, New Jersey; fourteen miles from Philadelphia; accessible several times daily by cars and steamboats. The Eighth Session will commence February 5th, 1861. The number of pupils is limited, and the instruction is thorough in every department. The recitations and study-hours are confined to the day, the evenings being devoted to recreation, reading, sewing, music, etc. The pupils enjoy great facilities for the acquisition of the French language; they hear it spoken constantly, and are required to converse in it themselves. Teachers wishing to perfect themselves in French and Drawing are received for any length of time, and on moderate terms. Terms, $250 per annum.

L. A. GODEY: DEAR SIR—I have been taking your excellent magazine four years, and have been both profited and entertained; I find it far superior to anything of the kind in circulation, and I wonder how any lady can do without it. It should have a place in every family. I don't think I could do without it at all. I always have a feast on the fifteenth of each month (a feast of splendid reading matter and rich engravings). Feeling a lively interest in the circulation of the same, I have succeeded in getting up a club without any trouble or inconvenience at all. I just mentioned it to some of my friends as I chanced to meet them, and they paid me the amount. I shall at all times exert the little influence I possess in behalf of your work. So, hoping you may never grow older, and wishing you a prosperous year and a good season, I remain a devoted friend of the only Lady's Book in America. MRS. J. M.

SHORT HAIR FOR LADIES.

I know, Mr. Godey, to an absolute certainty, from reason and experience, that short hair would be a great comfort and convenience, and a real blessing to mankind everywhere. Any intelligent lady or gentleman must admit that it is a great tax upon us to have much hair to be done up and arranged every day, and sometimes often, for a common lifetime—amounting to any thousand times—just to suit a foolish fashion, and cause our mothers and grandmothers did before us. We have not submitted and will not submit to this convenience, yet women have to. Long hair, to the sick and afflicted women everywhere over the world, is a solely a burden, and to all others it is a great and useless inconvenience. And where is the 'glory' of all its fair length, so much talked about, when done up in knots in the back of the head? It is nonsense to talk its length as its chief element of beauty when that quality is forever concealed from human gaze, as it is in the done-up style, which makes it to all intents and purposes even shorter than the men's. Where, then, is its glory? Are these knots of hair on the back of our heads very handsome?—this round, knotted, imprisoned mass which gives us a conception of anything else except the length of a lady's hair? Must we sacrifice the health of the hair, its freedom, its flowing nature, the comfort of the wearer, the natural shape of the head, and all things so, for the sake of the length of the hair, which, after all, does not get to be seen in the done-up style; not even as much as in the flowing short style. Let me briefly show in contrast the points of difference between short hair and done-up hair. When the hair is cut to a convenient length in the neck we have the freedom of the hair, its health, the comfort of the wearer, its downward flowing nature, which poets so much admire, and which is the natural condition of the hair, and we have the natural shape of the head, always beautiful; the undergrowth of hair behind, at the junction of the head and neck, is concealed; besides, the hair, when cut evenly around the neck, forms a most beautiful silken border, and the color of the hair in contrast with the whiteness of the neck forms one of the most brilliant, beautiful, and angelic contrasts in the world. Then we have a greater show of the length of the hair. Now, contrast all these points of beauty with the entire lack of the same in the done-up hair, and then let any one decide which style is the most beautiful. And how grandly flowing hair for women corresponds with, and how symbolical of her gentle, flowing nature! Now, Mr. Godey, I submit the points I have made in favor of the convenience, comfort, and beauty of short hair for woman—which are but a few things that can be said in its favor—whether the blessings that would flow from it would not justify considerable effort on our part to change public sentiment in its favor? I have every reason to believe, from those whom I have talked with, that there are thousands in our land who would adopt short hair at once were they not over-awed by adverse public opinion. But they think, like thousands of others, that they might almost 'as well be out of the world as out of the fashion.' Mr. Godey, I know you have the interest and welfare of woman-kind at heart, and now will you aid me a little with your advice, counsel, and instructions in my efforts to change public sentiment in favor of the benefits, comforts, and blessings that short hair would give to woman-kind everywhere? Please answer soon, if it suits your convenience and pleasure, and instruct me how I can best deal with this subject to insure success."

HAIR ORNAMENTS.—Ladies wishing hair made into bracelets, pins (which are very beautiful), necklaces, or ear-rings, can be accommodated by our Fashion Editor. A very large number of orders have recently been filled, and the articles have given great satisfaction.

We give the prices at which we will send these beautiful articles:—

- Breastpins, from $4 to $12.
- Ear-rings, from $4.50 to $10.
- Bracelets, from $3 to $15.
- Rings, from $1.50 to $3.
- Necklaces, from $6 to $15.
- Fob-chains, from $6 to $12.
- The Charms of Faith, Hope, and Charity, $4.50.
- Hair Studs from $5.50 to $11 the set.
- Sleeve Buttons from $6.50 to $11 the set.

THE better and fairer portion of human kind will be gratified to know that a preparation has been discovered which renders crinoline incombustible. Experiments were tried at a scientific meeting in Edinburgh which satisfactorily demonstrated the fact that a crinoline dress, after being steeped in a solution of sulphuret of ammonia, refused to ignite, the only effect of fire being to char it. Ammonia is a very cheap commodity, and ladies of all ranks and degrees can render themselves incombustible at very trifling expense. But, though crinoline thus prepared may not itself burn, we fear it will still possess the property of kindling as many flames as ever.

PHILADELPHIA AGENCY.

No order attended to unless the cash accompanies it.

All persons requiring answers by mail must send a post-office stamp; and for all articles that are to be sent by mail, stamps must be sent to pay return postage.

Be particular, when writing, to mention the town, county, and State you reside in. Nothing can be made out of post-marks.

Chemistry for the Young.

LESSON XVIII.

Sulphur and Phosphorus.

MATERIALS AND TESTS REQUIRED.

379 SULPHUR: Florence flask and spirit-lamp; copper filings, clippings, or turnings; large iron wire; fragments of lead; test-tubes and a tobacco-pipe; liquor potassæ; solution of oxide of lead in liquor potassæ; charcoal powder; Epsom salt; Glauber's salt; oil of vitriol; nitrate of baryta; materials for generating chlorine, etc.

380 The element sulphur, or brimstone, is so familiar to us that any description of its common or physical qualities would be unnecessary. It occurs largely as a mineral constituent, especially in volcanic countries, but it is also an element in perhaps all animals, and many plants. All the botanical natural order Crucifera, for instance, to which belong cress, cabbage, and mustard, contain notable amount of sulphur; and the proverbially disgusting odor of cabbage-water depends on the evolution of hydrosulphuric acid, that gaseous substance which chemists employ as a test for calcigenous metals.

381. Put some fragments of roll brimstone, or powdered sulphur, into a Florence flask, and apply the heat of a spirit-lamp flame until the sulphur fuses. Pour a little of this fused sulphur into cold water. Continue to apply heat to the remaining sulphur until the fused result turns dark in color, and remark that when this point has been attained, although the material has been considerably hotter than before, it becomes solid, and the Florence flask may be inverted without permitting any sulphur to run out. Still continuing to apply heat, the dark and solid mass will liquefy again, and the result be now thrown into cold water, a very strange phenomenon will be noticed. The sulphur, when cooled, instead of returning at once to its former yellow, brittle condition, will have assumed the appearance of India-rubber, and may be pulled out into long strings. In this state sulphur may be advantageously employed for taking casts of medals; which casts, when rubbed over with bronze powder, assume a very pleasing appearance. This experiment sufficiently indicates that sulphur is insoluble in water, a circumstance which we shall hereafter take advantage of in the analysis of gunpowder.

382. Boil a little powdered sulphur with liquor potassæ in a test-tube, and observe the solution which results. Neutralize the solution with an acid—say the acetic acid—and remark that the sulphur is deposited, and may be collected on a filter.

383. Set fire to a little brimstone—say the end of a brimstone match, and recognize the odor evolved; it is the odor of sulphurous acid. Wherever sulphur is burned in the atmospheric air or in oxygen, as we have already burned it (360), this compound sulphurous acid results. Hold a red rose moistened with water over some burning sulphur, and remark the bleaching which takes place. This bleaching quality renders sulphurous acid of great use in many of the arts. Straw bonnets, for instance, are bleached by means of sulphurous acid. Sulphur unites with oxygen in seven proportions, constituting seven acids, but the following are the chief:—

Hyposulphurous acid, forming salts termed hyposulphites.

Sulphurous acid, forming salts termed sulphites.

Hyposulphuric acid, forming salts termed hyposulphates.

Sulphuric acid (oil of vitriol), forming salts termed sulphates.

384. Mix some fragments of copper wire or copper filings with about an equal weight of sulphur; put the mixture into a test-tube, and, applying the heat of a spirit-lamp flame, remark the combination which results. Direct union of the metal ensues, and the resulting compound is termed sulphuretted or sulphide of copper.

385. Heat a small bar or large wire of iron to whiteness, and immediately bring it into contact with sulphur. Union of the two bodies will result, and sulphuretted iron will be formed. This is the compound which has been employed for the purpose of generating hydrosulphuric acid, by the addition of sulphuric acid and water (125).

386. Mix some fragments of lead with sulphur, put the mixture into a test-tube or the bowl of a tobacco-pipe, and apply heat; if to the tube, a spirit-lamp flame will be efficient; if to the tobacco-pipe, use the heat of a fire. Again, in this instance, direct combination will result, and sulphuret or sulphide of lead will be formed. Do not confound the expressions sulphide and sulphite; the difference between them will be understood by reference to paragraph 383.

Centre-Table Gossip.

HOME HAPPY.

"DEAR me, how this room smells of smoke! Poh! How can you endure it, Sarah?"

"Oh, it's only a souvenir of 'Tom's crowd;' you know he brings home his friends, instead of lounging around bar-rooms with them."

"But it will ruin these curtains." And Aunt Charity looked as if she thought her sister-in-law's wits slightly astay in permitting such destruction.

"It will cost less to get another set than it would to mend Tom's morals, if they were ruined instead of the curtains."

"You don't mean to say that all those young men who were here last night come and go over your velvet stair carpet?"

"As often as they choose; they are all gentlemen, and, I suppose, use the door-mat. I don't know what you would say to having had one or two sleep here with Tom while we were in the country last year, and taking a fancy to lunch on short-cake and broiled ham at one o'clock at night, going down to the kitchen, and cooking for themselves."

Aunt Charity subsided for the present, dumb with the audacity of the measure alluded to. Not having children of her own, she could not enter into Mrs. Smith's satisfaction at having so affectionate, so true-hearted and honest a son, who, unscrupulous as his aunt might consider him, was never ashamed or afraid to speak of his companions or his midnight doings.

"Wood! What are they carrying off kindlings for?" said the worthy spinster, an hour or two later, observing the movements of two of the younger branches of the family. "They are carrying kindlings into the stable, Sarah; a very dangerous proceeding."

"It is not used as a stable now; you know we have given up our carriage since the city railroads were introduced, and Mr. Smith has given the boys the loft for a play-room. They have a stove there now, and Willy takes the responsibility of the fire."

"If they were my boys, I should be after them pretty often, and see what they were about."

"But we always know; they always report their proceedings at tea. They have a carpenter's bench and tools."

"Cut their hands off some day; lame them for life," Interrupted Aunt Charity.

"But just now their passion is for chemical experiments. They are studying chemistry at school, and half a dozen little chaps come here regularly and work with them. Sometimes we don't get a glimpse of them in play hours for a week, and it saves my time and temper, to say nothing of always knowing where they are."

Their conservative relative listened in horror, and gazed at the stable roof as if she expected to witness an immediate explosion.

This is no fancy picture, but a true example of the wise indulgence which has trained the pleasantest family of boys we have ever seen into intelligent, affectionate, pure-minded, home-loving sons and brothers. And, following this, we indorse most heartily another word of good advice for fathers in this instance:—

My friends, do you want to make home delightful to the young folks? Then don't come creeping from your business with all the day's cares and trials hanging like forty millstones about your neck. Leave them in their proper place. Come smiling to your fireside, as if you expected to enjoy yourself, and wanted the rest of the folks to do the same thing. If a pleasant circumstance has come under your observation, keep it for discussion at your fireside; if a smile-waking thought has occurred to you, divide it with the home circle. Don't shrug up your shoulders and draw down your mouth if a few young people "happen in" to see your juveniles. Don't complain about the noise they make. You were young yourself once, and if you go to work to help them have a good time, our word for it, the noise will soon cease to annoy you. The world has a very rigidizing influence on its disciples, and if you don't take the evenings to unbend in, you will become an absolute automaton. Forget, once in awhile, that life is not all sunshine; forget your cares, and they will diminish in proportion. There never was a day so dark but that a happy home evening could gild its shadows. Make your fireside something for all to look forward to, and think about; make it a resting-place, and you may depend upon it life will be a pleasant affair to you.

MUSICAL ITEMS OF GENERAL INTEREST.

THE best parlor music for amateurs at the present is known as "the future school," which indicates that the taste which cultivates and enjoys it has gone beyond the popular range. For those who have not yet known much of it we promise more than one delightful evening in the perusal of Miss Brewster's "Compensation," and a shadowing of good things to come when we announce a new volume from her pen; "Compensation" being the most artistic book, not only of the season, but, in its peculiar range, unsurpassed by any American publication. Chopin is the hero of all musical young ladies, and we have known of a musical evening being arranged in Charleston, S. C., at the house of an eminent pianist, in which the music mentioned in "Compensation" made up the programme.

Richard Wagner, the head of the school of the "future music," who is best known by his opera of Pannhauser, has completed a new opera called Tristan und Isolde, and the score is now published. For the performance of this opera are required two soprano voices, four tenors, two baritones, and one bass. The choruses are for male voices only; a point in the execution.

The new opera by Balfe is founded on the story of the Bravo of Venice, which gives fine scope for scenic and musical effect.

Among other musical works now going through the press in Germany, we may mention Rubenstein's grand oratorio, Paradise Lost, and Joachim's new violin concerto, and a serenade for full orchestra, by Johannes Brahms.

The Messiah has recently been given in England. Madame Catherine Hayes, who sang the soprano parts, gave "Rejoice greatly" with all the brilliancy and joyous expression which that beautiful air demands. Madame Laura Baxter imparted deep feeling to her execution of the pathetic air, "He was despised and rejected;" and her fine contralto voice was heard to great advantage in "O Thou that tellest." The bass music was assigned to Mr. Weiss, who, it is needless to say, gave it in admirable style. The chorus, "For unto us," and the "Hallelujah" went off very effectively.

Meyerbeer's Parden de Ploermel has lately been given in Paris, and the canzonetta which he wrote when in London, for Madame Nantier-Didiee, has been introduced in the second act.

NOTES AND QUERIES.

1. The Original of Da Vinci's "Last Supper."—Every one is familiar with this celebrated picture, from casts and engravings. A description of the original as it appears at the present time may have general interest. It is greatly injured by time, and is gradually fading away. As a fresco, it has less hope of preservation than if it had been on canvas.

"The whole impression of this visit was subdued and mournful. It was much such as one would have in the room with the mortal remains of some noble and distinguished man soon to be seen on earth no more. That a great religious picture of the greatest painter and one of the greatest men who ever lived should perish from the earth seems a solemn and mournful thought. One sees the exquisite finish of Leonardo in those small paintings of his which are scattered through different galleries; but here was the picture which united a sublime breadth and largeness of design to the nicest delicacy of execution; which united the graces of color and drawing to the highest expression of noble and religious sentiment, and it is fading from the earth, and soon to be seen no more! No representation in existence in the least gives an idea of its higher attributes of expression. From engravings we may have an idea of the fineness of the general design, the perspective, the general arrangement of light and shade, the noble variety of heads, each so well individualized; but that central figure, on which we are told Leonardo pondered so long, and which he touched with so reverent a hand, because his conceptions were so intense with religious awe, that will never be seen when the little that remains of this noble fresco is faded."

2. To Preserve the Eggs of Birds.—Nothing further is necessary than clearing out the contents from a small hole made near one end; the mouth being applied to a still smaller hole near the opposite end, a very weak solution of corrosive sublimate (a rank poison) in spirits of wine may then be sucked up into the egg, by putting its end into it, shaken about inside, and then blown out again; this, though not indispensable, is a preservation against insects. The object of making the holes not quite at the extremities of the egg is that they may be turned downwards out of sight as the egg lies in the cabinet. They should, of course, be made in one line.

Or: The first consideration should be to get them cleaned of their contents; this may be effected with the eggs of the larger birds by making a hole at one side large enough to admit a quill, and shaking out the contents; they should then be well washed with a solution of camphor (not too strong, or it will make them very brittle by destroying the tenacity of the pellicle which lines the inside), and when dry fasten with gum, either singly or in pairs, to a piece of card-board. This method not only gives great facility for handling them and writing the name under each, but, by concealing the hole made for the purpose of cleaning them, allows them to retain the appearance they had when first taken from the nests. As the colors of many of them are very perishable, it will be necessary, in order to preserve them, to give them a light coating of varnish, and the best for this purpose is isinglass dissolved in gin.

3. Destruction of Red Ants.—A simple remedy. Some one, writing to a popular country paper, gives the following simple directions:—

"A neighbor of mine, in whose word I can place the utmost confidence, says: 'Take spirits of camphor, and sop it on the shelf, making a perfect ring, and place the ants inside of the ring, and none of them can get out alive; it is sure death.' He has tried it. Those out of the ring will leave in the first train."

Fashions.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

HAVING had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editors of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Spring and autumn bonnets, materials for dresses, jewelry, envelops, hair-work, worsteds, children's wardrobes, mantillas, and mantelets, will be chosen with a view to economy, as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godey, Esq.

No order will be attended to unless the money is first received. Neither the Editor nor Publisher will be accountable for losses that may occur in remitting.

Instructions to be as minute as is possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice. Dress goods from Levy's or Evans & Co.'s; cloaks, mantillas, or talmas, from Brodie's, 51 Canal Street, New York; bonnets from T. White & Co.'s; jewelry from Warden's or Caldwell's, Philadelphia.

When goods are ordered, the fashions that prevail here govern the purchase; therefore, no articles will be taken back. When the goods are sent, the transaction must be considered final.

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL FASHION-PLATE FOR MARCH.

Fig. 1.—Dinner-dress of pearl-colored poult de soie, trimmed with lilac silk and quillings of narrow ribbon. The over-skirt is gored, of one piece with the body, slashed at the side, and caught together by bands of lilac silk, and finished with three tassels. The underskirt is full and not gored. The cap is trimmed with ribbon and flowers to match the dress.

Fig. 2.—Child's dress of Solferino silk, flounced up to the waist; low neck and short sleeves. Garibaldi coat of light silk, finished with pinked ruffles. Hat of white straw, trimmed with black velvet and a long white ostrich plume.

Fig. 3.—Black moiré walking-dress, with deep puffing on the skirt. The body is composed of velvet and moiré; the lower part, both back and front, being of velvet, trimmed with puffings. Sleeves flowing, and trimmed with mauve puffings. Straw bonnet, bound with gold color, and trimmed with a gold-colored net, with cord and tassels; strings and cape of Solferino ribbon.

Fig. 4.—Rich promenade dress of green silk, with black velvet stripes made perfectly plain. Bonnet of white silk, covered with black lace, with a bunch of black flowers, having gold centres at the side, a black and white ruche inside; gold color strings.

Fig. 5.—Dress of tan-colored silk, trimmed with flounces of the same, and bands of Marguerite silk edged with black lace, having at intervals petites of black gimp, body trimmed en bretelle; sleeves puffed, and quite small at the wrist. Ceinture or girdle of wide tan-colored ribbon, with lace inserted at the ends, and trimmed with fringe. The headdress is a net of Marguerite chenille, with two large tassels at the side.

Fig. 6.—Evening-dress of white muslin, puffed half way up the skirt, and a short tunic of rows of puffs and inserting edged with lace. Plain corsage, pointed behind and before, and laced up the back. The bertha is formed of folds of illusion in the Savigné style, and trimmed with a fall of point appliqué lace. The undersleeve is of muslin puffed, and quite short; over this is a dem angel sleeve of illusion, edged with lace. Coiffure of green velvet, with gold pendants.

DESCRIPTION OF SPRING FASHIONS.

Fig. 1.—A Magenta-colored silk, with tunic skirt, trimmed with one flounce. The skirt does not meet in front, in order to show the front breadths of the lower skirt, which are trimmed, en tablier, with three flounces each five inches in width, and headed with a quilling of black velvet, having a gold braid sewed in the centre of it. The waist is trimmed with a bertha of one flounce, and the belt is black and gold, with a heavy gold clasp. Bonnet of pansy-colored silk, trimmed with mauve satin buttons and gold cord.

Fig. 2.—Dress of Marguerite silk, made perfectly plain. Mantle of rich thread lace, trimmed at the bottom with a looped fringe, and finished at the neck with a very rechappee hood. Bonnet of straw, trimmed with light green velvet, lace, and Narcissus, with black hearts. The inside trimming is a thick roll of green velvet, a small bunch of flowers on the right side, and short lace tabs.

Fig. 3.—A brown spring silk, with six flounces bound with brown velvet. Mantle of same material as the dress, trimmed with a wide puffing, flounces, bows, and velvet. Bonnet of pink silk, drawn and trimmed with ruchings of illusion.

Fig. 4.—Dress of rich mauve silk, with black velvet stripes. Circassian pardessus of black reps silk, trimmed with wide black velvet, having on each edge a thick cording of white silk. Bonnet of white velvet, lined with Solferino silk, and trimmed with flowers of the same tint.

SPRING BONNETS.

(See engravings, pages 196, 197.)

Fig. 1.—A Neapolitan braid, gray and white, trimmed with Solferino and gray ribbon drawn into rosettes on one side, with straw centres, which give them much the appearance of poppies; a long loop of ribbon, and two straw tassels complete the trimming of the left side, and on the other side the ribbon is drawn down perfectly plain. The cape and front of the bonnet are finished with a puffing of Solferino crape. The inside trimming consists of a band and tabs of illusion.

Fig. 2.—An English chip bonnet, with pansy-colored velvet cape. On the right side of the bonnet are two bows of pansy ribbon worked with gold stars, and on the other a large bunch of scarlet flowers. The inside trimming is of ribbon and flowers.

Fig. 3.—Fine split straw, with dark crown, trimmed with a sapphire blue ribbon, and a white ribbon. On the right side of the bonnet is a large water-lily, with buds and leaves. The inside trimming is a roll of sapphire blue velvet, black tabs, and a small lily on one side.

Fig. 4.—A Tuscan braid, trimmed on one side with white ribbon bound with black velvet, and black lace rosettes with jet centres; and on the left side are handsome jet tassels fixed by medallions of white gimp. The inside trimming is a puffing of white illusion, and large black rosettes, with jet pendants. This is a beautiful style of bonnet for light mourning.

CHITCHAT UPON NEW YORK AND PHILADELPHIA FASHIONS, FOR MARCH.

THE season is unusually late in opening, owing to the financial embarrassments of midwinter, the time when most of our large importing houses are usually beginning to receive their goods. Large orders for expensive novelties were countermanded, others were delayed, and we are now seeing the effect of these things.

There is one department of dress goods in which, it is sadly true, there is always a certain demand. Death does not delay his work for any commercial crisis; and perhaps the earliest orders that reached Philadelphia were intended for the Maison de Doud of Besson & Son, 981 Chestnut Street. This well-known house keeps steadily on its way; and since their removal to the elegantly neat place of business now occupied by them, its excellent light, so necessary in the selection of black goods, proves that theirs are always reliable. A "good black" is always the first thing to be considered in the choice of mourning. If it be rusty or gray, no matter how costly the material, the effect is shabby. For deep black, the material most in vogue for summer wear, will be barige grenadine, a less costly article than the real grenadine; for though of much the same tissue, it is of mixed wool and silk, while the other is all silk. It will range from 50 cents to $1 a yard in price. Real grenadine, always in vogue, may be had, according to quality, from 75 cents to $1 50. A very serviceable article, that will be in general wear the present season for house dresses, in plain black, is the old favorite Balzerine, which is afforded as low as 18 cents a yard. There are also Tomatan's and crape bariges from 31 to 62½ cents. There is a disposition towards making up English crape over black silk—the dress and mantle alike—for best wear. It is truly elegant, but expensive, though certainly the most suitable material together with grenadine, for evening wear.

We have now come to second mourning goods, in which there are both novelty and variety; and though they are "only calicos," we must admire, in passing, the neat and varied designs of Hoyle's prints, in purple, mauve, and gray, upon a black or white ground.

Barige Anglaise is still expected to be the popular fabric for street dress in the summer heats, both in and out of mourning—large importations have been made. At Besson's we find some entirely new designs in black and purple, gray and white, white and lilac, etc., distinguished by the dotted, striped, and chinée grounds, and a set figure printed upon the material; as, for instance, a mauve pansy without leaves, on a black ground.

In foulards, this point of set figures is still more noticeable; as, for instance, a purple pansy, or a white Marguerite on a black ground.

Where there are two colors combined the figure is called Cammaïeny; when it is woven to stand out like embroidery, it is known as broché or Jacquard.

In travelling dress goods, which are also serviceable for general spring wear, as well as the foulards, there is the Syria poplin, the India glacée, gray Valenciennes at 62½ cents, and black and white Cruvellis at 37½ cents, a large variety. These will be worn much the same by people in or out of mourning.

In first mourning, black crape collars and cuffs on grenadine or crape sleeves will still continue to be worn. The English fashion of adding a gold thread to the appliqué pattern in crape, may find favor in New York, and at the South, but scarcely in neat, plain Philadelphia, where mourning usually is mourning, and not a mass of crape bows, bugles, and tinsel. There is the usual variety of white tarleton collars and cuffs in folds and piping; but the novelty of the season is a laced appliqué, the figure being traced in a satin stitch with embroidery silk, which gives it a pretty effect. The lappel style is still in favor, though many prefer the round collar, with a small point behind, coming straight across in front to meet the brooch, extremely narrow and very neat.

In the foulards for ordinary wear, the same styles are shown in colors upon a mode, or dark, plain ground. Pansies, clusters of berries, fruit, as the cherry, the plum, are among the newest designs; following the Jacquard figures on the silks, and rep goods of the past winter. These same designs will also be reproduced upon the barège Anglais, the Valenciennes, and other thin wool, or silk and wool tissues. So of the light spring silks—but of these next month.

The shape of bonnets is much less of a poke than last year; flatter on top, and more open at the ears. A drawn lining for straws of crape, silk, or satin, with the edge projecting a little to form a tiny ruff of the material, when seen from the outside. The tendency is to discard blonde ruches altogether for bands, rolls, and plaitings of ribbon, plain blonde, and flowers. There is a great variety of braids, mixtures of gray and brown orin prevailing, and some delicately-fine Dunstables and split French straws; chip is also seen with rice straw. Leghorns are the only straw bonnets seen on the street, as yet.

Puffed sleeves, whether in a straight graduation from the shoulder to the wrist, or two above the elbow terminating in a tight sleeve below, will be worn for the plainer materials, early silks, etc.; the black velvet point, or bodice-girdle as it might be described, is suitable for the same materials. It is a very favorite style, nearly superseding the broad scarf-girdles.

Madame Demorest, at 473 Broadway, has a dressmaking department in the charge of an unusually obliging and competent lady; a great convenience to her numerous customers in patterns and crinoline. Wedding or travelling outfits, mourning orders, etc. receive prompt attention. We have seen a travelling outfit undertaken in a two days' notice, and thoroughly well executed, arranged from the ever fresh and artistic styles of the Moniteur, La Mode, and other reliable Parisian authorities.

Cotton Balmoral petticoats, in the same neat, light colors that have distinguished those in wool, silk and wool, etc. the past winter, will be found a most serviceable article for spring wear, or for travelling through the season. They are much lighter, and of course cooler than those our readers are generally familiar with. They are also suitable as an underskirt for equestrians. We close with some sensible suggestions as to costume, from a contemporary we should be glad to credit, with the good sense of the advice to ladies who ride, very suitable for this season of the year. In our next we shall have fuller descriptions of bonnets by Mrs. Scofield and others, Brodie's Spring wraps, etc. etc. As to riding dress—

"To begin at the top, the present style of round brimmed straw or beaver Spanish hats (not wide brimmed flaps), so fashionable for young ladies' travelling headgear, is an admirable riding-hat. It would be best to leave off the lace and head-frill usually worn, as this might dash about the eyes and obstruct the sight in case of a flurry. Plumes could be added with charming effect. Dress the hair low back, and if gathered in a net, according to the present style, so much the better. It is always annoying to have their hair get loose and go flying about while on a lively ride, unless it is dressed on purpose to float at will. The underclothes have much to do with the grace of a riding costume. Hoops and all other devices for making the dress stand out, must be positively dispensed with; and all starchy goods, either for underskirts or outside habit. It does not alarm us nor shock us to see the flutter of a white petticoat or an embroidered skirt, but when such things make a show on the field, it is a sure sign that the lady is not dressed right.

"A sleeved chemise of light flannel stuff, a single short petticoat of the same, trousers to match the outside habit, rather full and gathered at the ankle in an elastic band, and buttoned about the side at the waist, is a bill of under-costume that sits well and tells no tales, while the horse is showing his best paces. Gaiters or morocco boots with heels, and long stockings, of course, will complete the footgear.

"The habit may be of soft cloth, merino, or velvet, according to the taste and convenience of the wearer, but never of any stiff or starchy material that will flap about and float up to expose the under garments. Besides, all grace is marred by the action of a habit that will balloon about, and fill and flap like a foresail. Let the habit come well up and plain about the throat, the sleeves close at the wrist, the skirt no more than half a yard longer than a walking-dress, and if for riding upon a low horse, one-third of a yard extra, is long enough.

"It is neither safe nor elegant to see an over long skirt flapping about the horse's legs, or dragging up dirt or mud. The jacket may be made separate from the skirt if desired, but where the habit is made whole there is less danger of its getting out of fix, and when once buttoned up in front, the lady may feel safe that she is dressed, and not likely to be surprised by having her garments parting company just at a time when she needs her hands to take care of her horse. A few bars and buttons upon the bosom of the jacket, and a narrow linen collar are about all that are desirable in the way of further ornament. Add to the above a pair of gauntlets."

SPRING FASHIONS FOR 1861.

THE ANDALUSIAN.

[From the establishment of G. BRODIE, 51 Canal Street, New York. Drawn by L. T. VOIGT, from actual articles of costume.]

We take pleasure in offering this beautiful style to our lady friends for a spring garment. There are certain peculiarities to which we call attention.

For those who prefer the pelisse of a marked style, the border is not of the same color as that of the body of the garment, but is of white purple, etc.; the black lace which edges it lies over this lighter color, thus showing its pattern, etc., much more strongly than if falling over a black ground. A line of this lighter-colored silk is left also uncovered, as a heading or relief to the lace.

Till earth gives up her dead.

It is enough—my changeful life
Has this one thing secure,
This precious grave; a child in heaven,
A child forever pure.
My child is safe, forever safe;
And I must patient be,
Until I, too, look through the veil,

INFANT'S EMBROIDERED SHOE.

Materials.—White French merino or cashmere; and either white silk, or purple, green, and brown silk.

We give the two parts of which the entire shoe is composed, and the design may be either worked entirely in white silk or in the appropriate colors. If the latter, the veinings of the leaves must be in a darker shade of green than the leaf itself. The upper petals of the flowers are worked in French knots; the scrolls in point de chaînette; the calyx of the buds in pale green; the buds in purple silk.

To make-up these shoes, quilt some finest of twill-muslin, with flannels for the lining; binding this lining and the outer part together with a piping-cord, covered with white silk. The soles of these very small shoes are usually also made of merino, quilted; but they may, if preferred, be cork-soles, bound with white ribbon.

ROMANCE AT CENTRE HARBOR.

"PEACE," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER I.

"I BELIEVE I will walk up to the hotel, Anna."

And the gentleman tossed a brace of valises and a shawl upon the three great travelling-trunks the driver had strapped behind the yellow stage-coach, and addressed the little delicate lady he had assisted to the inside.

"No, Charles, I want you to get in and arrange my cushions."

The voice was very thin and querulous, and the pretty face of the speaker wore a listless, languid air; for Mrs. Charles Lushington was, or fancied herself, an invalid. Moreover, Mrs. Charles Lushington was troubled with "her spine" and "her nerves;" and her physician had advised the healthy, inland retreat of Centre Harbor—cool, bracing, mountain air, agreeable company, and moderate exercise. "Don't take your servant along with you. Learn to depend upon yourself!" he had advised (for Dr. Plaintalk was an old and privileged practitioner); and so the little invalid lady had set about learning that hardest task, self-reliance, and actually meant to lace her own gaiters, pick up her own handkerchiefs, and braid her own abundant hair. But then, Doctor Plaintalk hadn't forbidden her taking along her cushions with her; and, if the Abigail was left behind, the downy silk pillows that had accompanied her last year to Nahant were not, and hence the querulous request, "Charles, I want you to get in and arrange my cushions!"

"But Bella or Mollie here, they will do that," good-naturedly ventured Charles Lushington; but there was a little knotting of the invalid's brows—"Oh, ho! husband can do better than anybody, can he? Well, then, look out for your crinoline, girls!" and he sprang into the coach beside his wife, while the two "girls" on the opposite seat, Bella Lushington and Mary Risley, united their efforts with his for the comfortable adjustment of pillows and travelling shawls about the little lady. Finally, after a satisfactory arrangement of everything, the steps were put up, the door swung to, the driver mounted to his box, and the wheels of the stage-coach revolved rapidly through the soft, turfy soil, a luxury to the riders fresh from the rattling pavements of the dusty city.

The little groups of people who had come down to the landing to witness the arrivals by the steamer Dover began to disperse; passengers and their baggage were transferred to the coaches in waiting, which now wound away, filled with ladies and children generally, while the gentlemen preferred to walk up the turf-bordered, pleasant road leading up to the Senter House, nestled down amid its cool greenery; and again the steamer, which had rounded up to the wharf-landing with short, hurried breathings of her engines, swung about, and with monitory shrieks of her whistle, and great gusts of smoke from her black pipes, stood backward over the noble lake, whose waters laughed and glittered brightly in the July sun, a dimpled mirror set in its heavy frame of evergreens and purple mountain shadows—"The Smile of the Great Spirit," Winnipiseogee.

"I hope this air from the hills won't prove too bracing?" and Mrs. Charles Lushington shivered slightly and drew farther into her corner of the carriage.

"Too bracing? No, indeed! it's glorious! life-inspiring!" and Mr. L. gulped a great breath of the breeze redolent of freshness and clover blooms. "What would we give down in State Street or in Chester Square for pure oxygen like this? Why, Anna, we shall have your cheeks crimson as the wild roses here at the roadside in a month. And, for myself, this looks like old Berkshire country—that magnificent belt of hills yonder. I feel at home among the hills again." You would have known, by his kindling, earnest eyes, if not by the deep tones of his manly voice, that Charles Lushington felt at home anywhere near the great, throbbing heart of Nature. "But, Bella, Mollie, what are you thinking of, girls? A penny for your thoughts, Cousin Mollie!"

"Oh, I am wondering how we shall enjoy ourselves here at Centre Harbor," exclaimed the smallest, the rosiest, and the merry, piquant-looking girl of some eighteen summers or thereabouts, who sat opposite, and whose dancing blue eyes had been bent on the view without the coach-windows; "I have heard Susie Ashleigh tell so much of her vacation here last summer, that I am prepared for any amount of enjoyment. They will join us here very soon—the Ashleighs. Had a letter from Susie, written at Concord, yesterday, just as I had finished packing."

"Which will materially increase your enjoyment, I suppose—particularly if Edward happens to accompany them—hey, Mollie?" replied Mr. Lushington, mischievously.

"Oh, nonsense, Cousin Charles; as if I cared particularly for Ned Ashleigh!" Why did little Mollie Risley blush then, I wonder? "Oh, what a delightful little village this is!" and Mollie changed the subject, talking volubly. "How neat the white houses look! and the Senter House—that's it, I suppose? How cool it will be, with all those trees about it, and that long piazza! And that must be Red Hill over there!" pointing to the bold, rugged height beyond the verge of the town. "Susie says they make up parties frequently to ride up there on ponies."

"That horrid hill! How tedious! I should die, I am sure!" shuddered the invalid lady from her cushions.

"O no, we'll have you going up Red Hill yet, Anna," laughed Charles. "You forget what a good rider you were once, before our marriage."

"But I could not even sit a horse now. I'm sure I'm not to blame for my poor back and these nervous sensations. You talk as though

I were an Amazon, or ought to be. You're always contradicting me, Charles!" There was considerable asperity in Mrs. Charles Lushington's tones for an invalid.

"Do I, my dear? Unintentionally, then," replied the young husband, over whose forehead passed a slight contraction as of mental pain. "But, Bella, sister," addressing the slender, elegant girl, whose beautiful gray eyes had not been withdrawn from the landscape which came in glimpses with the turnings of the coach—the blue, flashing lake winding its bright lengths through the southern view, the little hamlet of Centre Harbor nestling in its circular amphitheatre among the hill country, and the dark lines of forest skirting the bases of the hills and stretching their cool depths into the distance—"how do you think you shall like this? better than Newport or Nahant, hey?"

"Infinitely better, I think, brother," was Miss Lushington's quiet reply, without withdrawing her gaze from the landscape.

"Is that true? Then, mayhap this sister of mine will meet her 'fate' here, as Mollie suggested last night!" laughed Charles. "Or is it, Bella, as Mollie added, by way of qualifying her remark, I suppose, that you've set your ideal so high no mortal man can attain it?"

"Bears, as I live! those black creatures I see through the fence of that inclosure! The same Sue Ashleigh told us about! They used to offer them candies, and make them stand on their hind legs and 'speak' for them, as your great Bruno will, Charles!"

This was not Miss Isabel Lushington's reply to her brother's query by any manner of means—I question if she scarce heard it, with her gaze on distant Red Hill rising out of its serried rampart of dark firs and pines at its foot; but it was Mollie Risley's ejaculation, glancing over at the little circular inclosure on the side of the road opposite the Senter House at which the coach now drew up—the inclosure between whose fence palisades was seen a glimpse of two great specimens of the race bruin gravely dragging to and fro the length of their chains, attached to the trunk of the tree. "Oh, I must run right over there and see them! real New Hampshire bears!" and Mollie gathered up the skirts of her travelling-dress and jumped to the piazza.

"Stop a moment, madcap!" laughed Mr. Lushington; "time enough after rest and dinner to have a talk with the bears, and the 'elephant,' too—for of course there's one here, as at every place of resort. Come, all of you; sit down in the cool parlor here while I engage our rooms."

But Mollie was away, bent upon taking "the largest license," like all emancipated city girls do, across the road to the precincts where the two animals were keeping up their restless march; and, after a very edifying conversation, sustained principally on the part of the interlocutor, and a generous disposal of candies, was back again at the Seuter House by the time Mr. Lushington had engaged rooms for his party, and the porter was carrying their luggage above stairs.

"I like this," said Isabel Lushington quietly, and walking the length of the long, middle parlor of the Seuter House, quite regardless of the gaze through the piazza windows from the boarders who had been drawn out, as was their custom, to scan the arrivals by every trip of the steamers—"I like this, Anna; so cool, so sequestered, and homelike; and the view from these windows facing the lake! That water—so beautiful now through the flickering screen of these trees—what must it be by moonlight?"

"You shall have a chance to judge this evening, Bella," said Mr. Lushington, entering the parlor. "But come, now, our rooms are ready. Lean on me, Anna; only up one flight. And here comes Mollie, fresh from Bearville!"—as the merry-faced girl made her appearance. "Come; we all need the half hour's rest before dinner."

There was the customary scrutiny of the hotel books after the disappearance of the new arrivals above stairs, and a lingering over the names—

"Mr. and Mrs. Charles Lushington, Boston, Mass."

"Miss Lushington, and Miss Risley, Boston, Mass."

And the usual comments by the gentlemen lounging through the great airy hall where the office was kept, awaiting the sound of the dinner gong.

"Pretty girl; lively, too; that one who came in last," said one. "Stylish looking! Did you notice those new travelling capes?" This, you may be sure, was a lady's remark. "One of the ladies is an invalid, I judge; her husband took a pillow from the coach." "But 'pon my word that was an elegant girl; the tall one, who went into the parlor." This last commendatory notice of our friend Bella was uttered in a thick, throaty voice, that proclaimed its owner fond of good meats and old wine; that voice the property of the slightly obese, very rubicund-visaged, Mr. Alphonse De Lara, who, with his elder sister and dowager mother, were from the West.

Now it so chanced that at dinner in the cool dining-room the seats of the new arrivals were apportioned nearly opposite those of the Western gentleman and his party, which arrangement greatly facilitated the opportunity for admiring gazes from the gentleman himself, as well as afforded a new target for the colloquial abilities of Miss Mollie.

"Charles, there must be your 'elephant;,' the gentleman opposite, a little way down the table," she mischievously whispered. "Those ladies address him as 'Phon;,' that Begum does, with the elegant silk and the diamonds; and the young lady in the grenadine (splendid dress!) calls him 'Phonny.' Queer pet name for an elephant, Charles!"

Mr. Lushington smiled and coughed.

"Slightly struck with the charms of the new arrivals, I think; he casts frequent glances this way," he replied, in the same undertone.

"O no! not me, but Bella! See, now. Open-mouthed admiration!" And Mollie bent her laughing face over the bill of fare. "A slice of roast beef, and tomato sauce, if you please." This was to Charles, who awaited her orders to the attentive waiter: "Charley, I always thought the elephant was a graminivorous animal; but this seems to add the carnivorous and the omnivorous also," continued Mollie, presently, with a side glance at the unconscious object of her remarks, who, despite his evident admiration of the elegant stranger over opposite (who was too well-bred to seem to notice his rudeness), managed to quite monopolize the services of one waiter at his elbow in bringing roasts, boiled mutton, salad, macaroni, and other "concomitants." "Astonishing! I've no faith in your ability to keep a menagerie, Charley." Bella Lushington smiled a little as Mollie's whispered conversation reached her, for her cousin was between her brother and herself, while Mrs. L. was on her husband's right. "Now I like the bears better," went on the gay girl, in an ordinary conversational tone, and quite as much at ease as at her own table. "They're real clever, I assure you, Cousin Charles! I had quite a chat with them over there. Didn't stand on ceremony; introduced myself. Said 'they'd like to shake hands with me;,' actually would have put their paws through their cage, only the restrictions of bear etiquette wouldn't allow. 'Would return my early call, only just at present they are living in rather a retired way.' Left your compliments, Miss Bella Lushington, in the shape of a paper of candy. Told them you'd call the first opportunity, Cousin Bella"—looking direct at the gentleman opposite, who, in turn, was regarding Miss Lushington. "There, Charley, did you see him look up when I spoke Bella's name?" she whispered. "Did it purposely. Smitten; no doubt of it! The romance is begun already. Bella is certainly destined to meet her fate here at Centre Harbor. But revenons à moutons, as my French teacher would say. Our friend has returned to his. Actually that's the third mutton he's ordered. How I pity that waiter, Charley!"

CHAPTER II.

MOLLIE RISLEY was in raptures the next day. The Ashleighs—Mr. and Mrs. Ashleigh and Susie—arrived early, by the first trip of the little Lady of the Lake. They had come by the way of the Weiss, touching at Meredith village, and Susie was full of the lovely sail across the lake and among the green islands, with that cloudless, blue July sky above them.

"Oh, I'm so delighted!" she said, busy at unpacking, while Mollie sat in her room; "delighted at being here at dear old Centre Harbor again! Positively, Red Hill looked like the face of an old friend welcoming me. I watched his honest bald head from the deck of the boat. And the bears—I wanted to go straight over and hug them! There's a lot of candy I laid in for 'em"—tossing out several papers from her trunk to the carpet. "But, oh, Mollie, you ought to have spent a week in Concord during the session! It's a nice, quiet old town, with wide, shady streets and old houses, and the State House looks as square and 'set' as the Granite State people. Not very quiet during Legislature, though. Such crowds of strangers—men, mostly! Why, ladies were nowhere, nobodies then! We had been stopping at the 'Eagle,' but papa said we should enjoy ourselves better out of the crowd, and we went to board with a nice family just on the edge of the town. Such rides as we had! to Boscawen, to Hopkinton, and all the old country towns about. And, oh, Mollie, over to Canterbury, to visit the Shakers, that queer, strange people! You ought to go through their families, and see them in their meeting-houses during Sunday worship, looking like so many automatons. Such faces! vacant, expressionless for the most part, though I noticed some young girls with the loveliest complexions, and eyes like blue violets. We dined there; had the nicest dinner, and pure blackberry wine. They make cunning little things—boxes; here's one I bought, cut from an orange-peel. Curious, isn't it? There, I believe my dresses are all out. What shall I wear to dinner? This jacket?"—laying it out on the bed. "Who is there here? Nobody we know yet, I suppose! There'll be some in August; the Bakers and Stephensens are coming from Boston, you know. I shouldn't wonder if Ned got up by Saturday; father wrote he'd better be here. He's obliged to leave us next week. I hope Ned'll come, don't you?"

Mollie only blushed. The tongue so usually voluble always maintained strictest silence whenever Mr. Edward Ashleigh's name was spoken.

"Oh, here's my riding-dress!" went on Susie. "We must have some excursions up Red Hill. Where's Bella? Not home from her walk yet? Oh, here she is!"—as the door opened, and Miss Lushington appeared with the fruit of her stroll up the country road—a bouquet of green leaves and wild flowers; and hasty and hearty greetings followed.

"Oh, I have some news, Sue!" exclaimed Mollie, presently. "Bella's made a conquest; the first day, too! Actually, a gentleman was so overpowered and stricken as to lose his appetite—ask Bella. 'Mr. Alphonse De Lara.' Impressive name, isn't it? A Western man. We all got acquainted last evening in the parlor. Had a dance. The gentleman has a very slight and graceful form. There's Mamma De Lara, too; wears magnificent dresses and jewelry. And Miss Celeste, thin, sallow, and with the blackest eyes! But 'Phonny,' though—now I like him; and if 'tweren't out of regard to Bella's dignity would cut her out. He's real clever, 'Phonny' is, what Mrs. Partington calls 'obese,' not particularly disagreeable, very expressive eyes, a trifle light, that's all; and don't weigh more than one hundred and ninety. But you and I don't want to rival Bella, Sue. Say, Bella, did Phonny help you gather these flowers this morning?"

"Maggie!" said Miss Lushington, going on in her little task of weaving a wreath from the green oak leaves. "When is your brother coming, Susie? Soon, I hope, or this idler here will tease the rest of us to death."

Mollie hastily retreated from the contest. "Vanquisher!" laughed Susie. "Oh, Ned'll be up here soon. Papa's got to get back to business, he says. A month is an age for him; three weeks at Concord, and one here."

"Charles is beginning to talk about business, too, already," said Bella. "Why, when he was a boy he used to delight in getting away into the country or at the sea-side in summer; now the business habit is second nature. I suppose, though, if I were a man, I should experience the same sort of uneasiness at 'lounging,' as men call it. But it must be time to dress for dinner. I am going into Anna's room to help her braid her hair."

"Anna is looking nicely," said Susie Ashleigh.

"She is better, I think," replied Bella, as she went out.

"As well as you or I, Sue; that is, if she only thought so!" said Mollie, a little impulsively. "I declare, I've no patience, and I wonder Bella and Charles don't get worn out. It's 'Charles, lift me up,' and 'Charles, fix this pillow,' and 'Anna, I never can braid my hair!' O dear, I've too little charity, I suppose, Sue; but I can't help feeling so."

"I've often thought—and mother says so, too—that a little more reliance on herself and her own strength would be better for Mrs. Lushington. But then she doesn't think so, I suppose. Bella knows it, of course, too."

"Of course she does, Sue. But then she has such a lofty way with her, and only says, 'It's Anna's weakness—we must pity her!' As for Charley, he's so good and tender-hearted, that I believe, if Anna said he must carry her to the Equator, he'd do it. But I know he'd be happier and enjoy life better if 'twere n't for Anna's 'nerves' and 'cushions.' I'm going to flatter Anna up—tell her she's looking rosy, and is strong enough to ride up Red Hill before we leave Centre Harbor; see if I don't! If Bella ever gets married, Anna'll have to come out of her whims. As it is, she's just like a spoiled child, and relies entirely on her; and Bella is so much of herself that she never seems to mind it. Anna's doctor advised her not to bring her maid up here with her, but to wait upon herself; and you see how she does it—Bella's in there helping her dress for dinner now."

"Yes, if Bella should marry, it would be different. Who is this admirer of hers?" asked Susie.

"Oh, he'll do to plague her about—only that! I know Bella too well. Rich, I've no doubt; but if he had the wealth of the Great Mogul, and only cared for dogs and horses, and his dinners, Bella's eyes would be as high above him as Red Hill is above Centre Harbor. Charley says she had two such offers last summer at Nahant, and she refused them. Don't blame her—I hate a golden calf myself!" and Mollie's laugh rang out merrily. "'Phonny' is too lumpish and dumpish—those two words describe him exactly, Sue. I have named him 'the elephant.' But I must run and get ready for dinner."

"Capital news, girls!" said Mr. Lushington, coming into the dining-hall from the post-office, where the Southern mail had been brought up by the noon arrival of the Dover, "a letter from Ned Ashleigh to his family, saying he'll be up here the last of the week; is getting lonesome at Boston without some of them there, hey, Mollie? Also, a letter for myself, forwarded by my partner, from an old college friend I hav'n't seen these seven years—Hart Gilbert. He's been cruising all over the world—Hart always had a taste for roving—and has just got in by one of the government vessels. He'd sought me out in Boston—we were the firmest friends of yore—and, finding I'd gone into the country, writes that, 'having no particular home to go to—Hart's an orphan, I believe, few relatives—he'll hunt me out up in New Hampshire, spend a week or so here, and then go on to the White Mountains.' I like that; it seems like the old college days again. A thorough gentleman, Anna; I know you'll like Hart, and Bella, too."

"No word for me?" exclaimed Mollie, ruefully.

"Certainly not, Miss Acquisitiveness. It was the contents of the first letter that related to you, not the last. I don't intend my friend Hartley Gilbert a target for Miss Mollie Risley's jests, ridicule, or shafts of coquetry."

"Oh, mercy me!" and Mollie put up both of her hands deprecatingly; "The Most Worshipful Mister Hartley Gilbert, fresh from—where'd you say he'd been roving, Mr. Lushington?"

"Latest, in South America, he writes me."

"The Most Worshipful Mister Hartley Gilbert, fresh from Patagonia! And I not allowed a chance arrow at the rare 'arrival!' I will, though—I declare, I will, Charley! So I warn you! If I can make friends of two black bears, I shall dare approach into the presence of this new importation. Suppose he's disagreeable and homely, though! In that case, I shall turn him over to Bella!"

A little laugh circled among the listeners to the gay girl's lively sallies.

"Thanks; I'll endeavor to prove grateful for small favors," rejoined Bella, quietly.

None laughed more loudly this time than Mr. Alphonse de Lara. But there was an undercurrent of uneasiness beneath it. I doubt if even Mr. De Lara with his jewelled repeater, his superfine broadcloth, his dogs and horses, was so obtuse that he had no reason to regard the coming of this lauded friend of the elegant Miss Lushington's brother without a secret feeling of uneasiness.

"Is Mr. Gilbert disagreeable and homely, though, Cousin Charles?"

"On the contrary, very gentlemanly and remarkably handsome, Mollie. At least, he was such seven years ago in college, and these intervening years of travel must have improved him," replied Charles, gravely.

"I retire in despair. I feel overpowered—actually overwhelmed. A 'travelled man!' I might talk at him, but not with him! I resign him to Bella. What day does the distinguished arrive, Charley?"

"Don't specify. 'Some day this week—the last of the week,' he writes."

"What a pity he can't be here to ascend Red Hill with us day after to-morrow! I might fascinate him; I'm going to ride that little dappled pony, and everybody acknowledges my fine equestrienne abilities—don't they, Bella?"

CHAPTER III.

"ISABEL LUSHINGTON, June 25th, 1860."

That was the name, written in clear, elegant characters on a fly-leaf of a volume of Tennyson's "Idyls of the King," which was taken from the pier-table in the middle parlor of the Seuter House, and upon which a pair of dark hazel eyes rested approvingly, noting the exquisite, graceful curve of the letters—a chirography, which, if there be any truth in affirming (as many do) that one's character may be judged by their handwriting, denoted that the writer of that name on the fly-leaf must also be elegant, graceful, and symmetrical in mental and moral beauty.

"Here's the party from Red Hill!" broke in a man's voice from the piazza, and the gentleman laid down the book which had been taken up carelessly to while away the loneliness of the first weary hour among strangers, and from the window intently began a scrutiny of the merry cavalcade of ladies and gentlemen—some riding the ponies, and others in the large wagon drawn by four noble horses—all dismounting at the piazza.

"That's Charley! I should know his ringing laugh. He looks older, though!" soliloquized the gentleman. "Ladies with him! his wife, I suppose, that tall, elegant one, with the brown hat. Charley always had an eye for beauty. Will wait till they've gone up stairs, then send up to his room. But no; here he comes! Charley!" and a hand was stretched from the open window.

"Hart Gilbert!" and for once Bella and Mollie were deserted, and Lushington made but two or three steps to the hall, where he was met by his friend, and the twain re-entered the parlor with hands clasped in token of the friendship seven long years had not severed. A long talk followed, broken only by the blast of the dinner gong. The gentlemen started up; again Gilbert laid down the book which unconsciously he had taken up from the table by the window where they had seated themselves. "I noticed a name in it—'Isabel Lushington.' Your wife, I suppose, Charley?"

"No, that's Bella's, my sister. My wife is up stairs. Something of an invalid, I am sorry to say. You never knew her—Anna Underwood, a Springfield lady. Don't remember Bella, I suppose? a mere child when you and I were in college."

"Yes, I do, though; a slender, quiet little thing—pretty, too—I used to play with that summer I spent vacation at your home. Fifteen or sixteen now, I suppose. She was pretty, I remember."

"Nineteen, Hart; Bella was always slender—small of her age. You shall judge for yourself if she has outgrown her beauty." (Charles Lushington was proud of his sister.) "Here come the ladies. I will let you take them into dinner, while I run up stairs a moment and brush the dust off. Anna, Mrs. Lushington, my friend, Mr. Gilbert, who arrived this forenoon while we were absent. My sister, and cousin, Miss Risley, Hart. There, girls, take good care of him! I'll be down presently!" And while Charles darted off, the party entered the dining-room.

"And so you like Centre Harbor better than the seaside, Miss Lushington?"

"I do, certainly; it is so different here. True, one misses the bustle of a seaside sojourn, the excitement of the 'hops' in the great saloon, the surf-bathing, the roar of the tumbling breakers, and the calm and rest of the long, sandy beaches; but I think I am more than repaid by this quiet communion with Nature—the daily view of this lovely sheet of water, the nearness of this hill country which seems the portal to the mountains beyond, and the exceeding beauty of the purple lights and shadows. I cannot conceive of a more beautiful sight than the Ossipee range presented as we came up over the lake, enshrouded in its blue and purple mist; and the other day we were out sailing on this northeastern shore—a clear, bright morning—and beheld the summit of Mount Washington gleaming in faint, pearly light on the horizon. It was a beautiful and poetic conceit of the Indians who christened this lake, ‘The Smile of the Great Spirit.’ See, it seems to laugh and smile upon us now in the moonlight!”

“Then get your bonnet and shawl, and let us walk down thither.”

The speakers were Hartley Gilbert and Isabel Lushington, sitting on the piazza of the Seuter House in the moonlight evening, and a little apart from the various groups tempted there by the beauty of the night; while through the open windows, from the lighted parlor, came the sound of merry voices, and the music of the piano.

Though Mr. Gilbert had already prolonged the contemplated one week of his stay to three, and made now no mention of his departure, it was scarcely evident that Miss Lushington had aught to do with it. On the contrary, he had laughed and jested with the lively Mollie, read by the hour to the invalid wife of his friend, went trouting up on Squam Lake with Charley, and never interfered with Mr. De Lara whenever that gentleman took Isabel out for a row on the lake or a ride into the country; but, for all that, in the two or three quiet talks he had had with the lady, the gaze which followed every movement of her slender, elegant form, and the face, whose calm, stately beauty he was sometimes detected “studying,” there might have been a faint glimpse of something reserved beneath Hartley Gilbert’s apparent unimpressibility. This evening’s conversation between the two “happened so,” Mollie Risley said. “She took upon herself the trouble of arranging it. She and Sue Ashleigh had challenged Mr. De Lara and Ned to a game of euchre; by a slight manœuvre she had coaxed Miss De Lara into taking her hand; then comfortably installed Mrs. Ashleigh and a gray-headed old gentleman in a corner at a game of chess;” Charley had sufficient employment in adjusting Anna’s pillows and foot-cushion in another corner; and then Mollie seated herself on the music-stool and played snatches of old tunes, quite regardless of Mr. De Lara’s reiterated invitation to “oblige him by taking his hand,” protesting his ignorance of the game, and nestling uneasily as fragments of Gilbert’s and Bella’s conversation floated through the windows. “No; for her part, she knew better,” she said, afterward, “than to let De Lara get free, and go lounging out on the piazza to break up that conversation! It wasn’t often stately Bella got her tongue unloosed, and when she did she ought to be allowed the opportunity.” And so “she just let Mr. De Lara remain, and talk of ‘bowers,’ and ‘passing;’ though she’d no doubt but he would have preferred ‘passing’ out on the piazza.”

And so Bella reappeared from her room with her shawl and Mariposa, and the twain crossed the road before the Seuter House, and, entering the garden, walked slowly down the terraced gravel walk leading to the moonlit lake.

“They will hardly miss us,” said Gilbert, as they paused and seated themselves in the rude arbor near the water. “And, to my mind, out of doors on such a night as this is far preferable to a lighted parlor. Three weeks, is it, since I came to Centre Harbor? and I ought to be moving northward, for I am a true rover, Miss Lushington. I wish your party were going on to the mountains.”

“I should like it very much, but Charles is beginning to talk of return now, and we should hardly like to go without him; Anna’s health would not admit of it.”

“I regret that Mrs. Lushington is such an invalid,” said Gilbert. “It was news to me that Charles had committed matrimony during my sojournings, and thus left his old friend and chum behind. While I have been roaming the world—the ‘rolling stone’ of the proverb—your brother has been building himself a home. Do you know to what I liken a man’s home, Miss Lushington?”

“My imagination would hardly render the interpretation,” replied Isabel.

“Well, then, it is the anchor to the drifting ship, the harbor of rest to the wave-buffed vessel. I suppose every man ought to have a home. Charles must be very happy in his. He has one of those deep, earnest natures so fitted for domestic happiness.”

Bella’s red lips were firmly compressed for a moment, for she thought, almost with bitterness, of the shoals of selfishness—Anna’s selfishness and inanity—upon which the barque of her brother’s domestic felicity was daily grating.

“I suppose, to you, Miss Lushington, situated in a happy home, this may sound somewhat strangely, to hear me talk thus; but, though I have long been a wanderer, I have looked forward, as all wanderers do, to gain the port at last where the ship shall lie with idle sails, and rove the seas no more. If I had known a home, I think I should have been less roving; but the memory of that sanctuary of my boyhood is dim as a half forgotten dream. I am an orphan; I scarce remember my parents. I would give all this world holds to know how it seems to own a mother's love and care!"

There were tears in Bella's calm gray eyes. She did not speak then; but presently, when calmer, she said: "It is almost like death to lose one's mother. We know something of this, Charles and I; it is now five years since ours was taken. My home with Charles is pleasant, happy, but it is not like that under the home roof."

"Then we can sympathize with each other, Miss Isabel!" The words were few, but their tone was everything. At that moment the hearts of those two were very near each other; near as two human hearts could be that beat with the same throbbing sympathies and impulses. Had Bella looked upon him then, his fine, muscular figure, his well-set head, features full of character, firm lips, now mobile with suppressed feeling, she would have confessed that, both physically and intellectually, here was quite realized her ideal of a strong, noble, earnest man, fitted to be her guide and rest. Certainly, as his eyes rested appreciatingly on the beautiful picture in the moonlight; her elegant slender figure in its drooping attitude of thought, the white hands folded over her lap, the bands of dark hair parted smoothly from her low brow, the downcast eyes, the sweep of the jetty fringes over the oval cheeks, and the curve of the small, sensitive mouth, certainly Hartley Gilbert did confess, inly—"calm, quiet, lovely, thinking more than she speaks, yet eloquent with feeling when she talks, my ideal of a lovable woman!" And, mayhap, if silence had continued longer, he would have grown emboldened to lift one of those little white hands, and utter something about congeniality and homes no longer divided; but just then by chance (or was it mischance?) Bella found the silence irksome, and, lifting her eyes upon the lake, made some remark concerning the beauty of the silvery sheet, and the deep shadows the distant hills flung down into its depths.

"Yes, this is a magnificent sheet of water, a beautiful inland sea, whose peer cannot be found anywhere on the travelled globe. Our tourists make a great mistake who go abroad to find beauties when they neglect their own and native ones. Europe holds no water that can compare with this. Chillon, Lucerne, Como, Loch Leven dwarf into insignificance of size beside it, and certainly are no more beautiful. Such splendid views as are obtained here! that of the opening of the scene at Alton Bay struck me as being particularly fine. I wonder Church or some of our great American landscape painters don't paint this. You have seen his pictures, Miss Isabel?"

"Yes, his 'Niagara;' and last winter, in Boston, his 'Heart of the Andes.' I was a daily frequenter of the Athenæum while the latter was there on exhibition. You have seen that, Mr. Gilbert, and the original of the painting, I presume, many times, in South America?"

"Never the painting, but the hoary heads of the noble range have often greeted my vision when looking up from the tropic wildernesses below. 'The Heart of the Andes'—there is, in reality, no heart to the mighty chain stretching from the Caribbean to the dreary Horn; but I suppose the artist's conception is a combination of various points of rare grandeur and beauty. Tell me something of the painting, Miss Isabel."

"Oh, I cannot give you my impressions, or any idea of them! At first sight I was disappointed in the size of the painting; I had expected something larger, grander, more impressive. But that soon passed; the painting grew upon me. I could not take it all into the mind at once; I studied it. The blue depths of the tropic sky grew deeper; the piles and piles of distant mountains loomed up more grandly, their snowy caps buried in the clouds, and at their bases knelt the blue and purple hills, undulating masses of misty shape. At once I was taken into the heart of the scene. I heard the music of that flashing waterfall, foamy cold from the snows of Chimborazo. I felt the hush of that deep tropical forest; I breathed the air dank with the luxuries of vegetation; I reclined on rich banks of velvet moss, and long, trailing parasite vines waved against my face; I touched the cool, graceful brake leaves bending over the water's edge; I heard the throatings of gorgeous flame-winged birds, poising on flowers blooming on pensile stems; and I knelt with the pilgrims beside the lonely wayside cross. I could have gazed there for hours. The transition was painful, from that southern sky, and mountains, forest, and sparkling waterfall, back to the snow on Beacon Street again. But all this rhapsodizing must be very amusing to you, Mr. Gilbert!"

"It is not a rhapsody, but the natural criticism of an enthusiastic lover of the beautiful and sublime in nature," he replied. "Your descriptions are perfect word paintings. You have an artist soul. You should paint, Miss Isabel."

"If I were an artist, I should sketch animate nature, portraits," said Isabel.

"And I should like to be a sitter," rejoined Gilbert, laughing. "I should prolong my sittings most immoderately; unless, indeed, a certain friend of the fair artist's up at the house yonder should interpose the act of ejectionment." He studied Bella's face in the moonlight.

"A certain friend? I do not understand you, Mr. Gilbert!" Bella's words were cold as the snows of the Andes' peaks whereof she had been discoursing. That was an unlucky remark of yours, Hartley Gilbert!

"What, not the gentleman whom we left at his unwilling (I doubt not) game in the parlor? the devoted cavalier sergente of Miss Lushington? Ladies' memories are treacherous. I should like to see a portrait of Mr. De Lara designed by your fingers. I dare say you could recall his features."

"I can give you one with my tongue, or, rather, I borrow it from Cousin Mollie, acknowledging the sense of its fitness. She has placed him in a niche of her mental picture gallery as the golden calf." It was not like Bella Lushington to repeat anything of this kind; ridicule was not her forte; but, somehow, Mr. Gilbert's words nettled and stung her.

"Miss Lushington is sarcastic on her admirers. It were hardly safe to enter the lists, were one disposed to, lest one should find himself set up for some similar caricature."

That was another unlucky speech, Mr. Gilbert. Sarcasm and a running fire of repartee do not suit either you or Miss Lushington. Sincerity is the only metal which will pass current between you now. With lively Mollie Risley, it would be different; but Bella is another personage—a little stately, very dignified, and rarely conversational as she has been with you to-night. And now, by that unfortunate allusion to Mr. De Lara as a lover, you have shut the door of her confidence, which was opening to you, and made her chilling and stately again. "What does he want?" she asked herself. "Is it a ruse to ascertain if I am heart-free? I will show him how little I care for him, or for anybody!" and so, from a desire to show how careless she was of his regard, she overstept the bounds, and grew very distant and cold. "Mr. Gilbert need have no fear of my fitting any character to him!"

The tone more than the words made Hartley feel uncomfortable; cool, measured, and sarcastic, as though he had seldom entered her thoughts. It were something to know she thought of him, even to ridicule him; better that than to occupy no place in her heart. As for Bella, she could have cried with vexation. His jesting words at first had jarred on her; gone, in a few moments, all their confidence. Reader, you may have known how some such chance happening, foolish in itself, but mighty in its results, has Sundered two nearly-met hearts widely as the antipodes. As I said, Bella could have cried with vexation and wounded feeling; but she did not—she only arose and drew her shawl about her as if she would have returned to the house.

"You are shivering, Miss Lushington. The air strikes chill from the lake. Pardon me; I should have known better than to keep you sitting here so long."

Without another word the twain retraced their steps to the Seuter House. If Gilbert would have spoken as they gained the piazza, there was no opportunity; for the game at euchre was long since finished, and the players promenading there—Mr. De Lara ready to engage the attention of Miss Lushington on her return. But Bella manifested no disposition to converse beyond monosyllables; and shortly went up to her room. And Gilbert remarked casually to Charles Lushington, as they were about separating for the night, that, in a few more days, "by Friday, at farthest"—it was then Tuesday—"he must be moving on his journey to the northward."

"I declare! I believe they quarrelled last night, for Bella was cross as a bear, and more on her dignity than ever, after we went up stairs! Catch me ever managing interviews and conversations between any two silly creatures again, Charley! There's no gratitude in anybody! And here's Gilbert going off Friday, when he knew we'd set that day for a grand excursion up Red Hill. He sha'n't do it, Charley Lushington! I'll tease him myself to stay, and he can't resist me!"

CHAPTER IV.

FRIDAY came, and with it the excursion to Red Hill. Through much persuasion from Mollie Risley and others of the party, excepting Bella, who still kept up her cold hauteur, Mr. Gilbert had been induced to postpone his departure until the following Monday, and join the excursionists. Little, laughing Mollie! I dare affirm that thoughts of her never troubled Hartley beyond their daily pleasant interviews; but the pale, calm face of Isabel Lushington would, singularly, follow him everywhere. "I will leave Monday," he soliloquized, after rendering an affirmative answer to Mollie's request. "This will never do! It's a dainty dream, but a chateau d'Espagne which hardly stands during the uprearing. Ah, well! Hart Gilbert, you're not the first who has seen his day-dreams fade under his eyes. You must leave Centre Harbor, and resign the field to Mr. Alphonse De Lara. And yet, can it be possible that this elegant girl can lower her proud gaze to look on him? Can it be that, with all her grace, her rich nature, her womanly beauty, she has a heart of ice? But that's nothing to you, Hart Gilbert, since it is evident she shuns you and treats you cavalierly as the merest acquaintance! You must go away from here. This excursion over, you must leave Centre Harbor, and try and forget her!"

The party had set out for Red Hill. It was a calm, warm day in early August. The sky was veiled with a gauze of light, fleecy clouds, tempering the otherwise hot beams of the sun; the cool dews yet sparkled on the brake and sweet fern leaves as they wound along the green bordered country road; and from the thick forests of fir and hemlock came the jubilant song of birds. There was a freshness in the morning atmosphere which exhilarated the riders, and the laugh and light badinage passed freely from lip to lip. Mr. Lushington's request, combined with Mollie's teasings, had persuaded Anna into joining the party in the long wagon, though she protested "she could never ascend the Hill, but would remain at the base and await their return." Even a faint smile was brought to the invalid's lips, and she forgot for a season her nervousness and querulousness in the general enjoyment. The gentlemen, mostly, rode the horses on which they were to make the ascent; and one or two lads were mounted on the ponies for the ladies' use. A stupid man, once aroused, is said to prove the most jealous; but, on this occasion, Mr. De Lara could not have desired a more perfect state of frigidity than existed between Miss Lushington and his formerly dreaded rival; therefore he was quite at his ease, and taxed his colloquial abilities to the utmost for the entertainment of the fair lady in question. As for Mollie, she divided her jests and attention between Mr. Gilbert and Ned Ashleigh.

As the road wound upward from the base of the Hill, the beautiful panorama below began gradually to unfold itself; and, presently, as the party came to a halt and the ladies alighted from the wagon and mounted their ponies, and the cavalcade again began the steeper ascent to the summit, the view became momentarily more beautiful. Gaining the summit, they dismounted, and paused to rest and enjoy the magnificent scene which was spread below. Southward lay the noble lake studded with its manifold islands—a silver shield flecked with emerald gems; on its winding banks, nestling amid forests of green like birds' nests in the wood, sat Wolfborough, Meredith, Laconia, and Lake Village, and nearer, its white houses looking no larger than dove-cotes, lay the hamlet they had just left, Centre Harbor. On the Winnipiseogee, puffing its way up to the landing with faint threads of smoke cleaving the blue summer sky, they saw the little Lady of the Lake, scarcely larger to their vision than a cockle-shell on the waves. To the southeastward lay the silvery Ossipee Lake among its purple range of mountains; and nearer, close below, like a little oval mirror set in a heavy frame of dark evergreens, flashed bright, beautiful Squam. Farther in the southern distance rose the Gunstock range, and the rugged hills of Tuftonborough like the impregnable walls of a gigantic fortress.

"A goodly scene—the noble Winnipiseogee winding its bright length southward, and to the north the sentinel mountains. I like this. Yon scene of beauty is the gentle prelude to a grand oratorio; this lake region serves as the vestibule to the mountain palaces beyond." Hartley Gilbert said this with kindling eye and deep-toned voice, for he was not looking upon the scene alone. "You feel the inspiration of the view, Miss Lushington?"

Unconsciously Bella had moved aside from the party and paused near the spot where he was standing. And, unconsciously she forgot her stateliness, and smiled, and answered, "It is a scene to become a part of one's life henceforth, Mr. Gilbert."

"Are not the mountains, waves, and skies a part Of me, and of my soul, as I of them?"

quoted Gilbert. "Excuse me, Miss Lushington, but "I live not in myself, but I become Portion of that around me; and to me

High mountains are a feeling, but the hum
Of human cities torture."

Pardon my rhapsodizing from a poet whose love of Nature I can fully appreciate," he continued; "it is a habit I have acquired—that of thus talking to myself. But I shall not soon forget this day's scene, its influences, nor with whom I shared it. I shall long remember this visit to Centre Harbor, and the pleasant acquaintances—I hope I may say friends, Miss Lushington—I made here.”

Bella did not reply; she had no words. Yet often silence is more expressive than language. I doubt not but that Mr. Gilbert found hers so, for it gave him an opportunity to study the expression of her downcast, pensive countenance, from which its late expression of hauteur had vanished. But just then, by a contretemps, lively Mollie Risley approached, saying, gayly: “Why, Mr. Gilbert, I’m astonished! Monopolizing Bella, to the great chagrin of poor Mr. De Lara. See how lonely and disconsolate he looks, standing there with only the congenial communion of that Canadian pony he rode up! Actually, I believe he’s pouring forth his grief into his ear, à la Sancho Panza embracing his donkey!”

“A little sorrow would not materially injure the gentleman’s physique, if he so took it to heart as to pine over it,” said Gilbert, smiling, and looking to where the plethoric gentleman stood leaning quite thoughtfully against his pony.

“Ah, some people have a way of settling these things rather summarily; pistols and Bowie knives, you know!” retorted Mollie, archly, shaking her finger at the twain. “I give you fair warning of the consequences. But Ned and Sue are calling me to go hunt up geological specimens. Ned says he shouldn’t wonder if we could find crystal quartz down among those rocks yonder.”

“Well, what say you, Miss Lushington?” exclaimed Gilbert, as Mollie bounded away. “Shall I restore you to your disconsolate admirer, whose grief Miss Risley has so pathetically described?”

“Mollie possesses a very vivid imagination, not only seeing ‘sermons in stones, and books in running brooks,’ but lovers in every chance gentleman acquaintance.” Bella’s reply was given in her usual imperturbable tone; but Hartley Gilbert was secretly pleased to think he detected an uneasy, vexed air in her manner. It annoyed her to be teased concerning Mr. De Lara, then?

An hour later beheld the party descending Red Hill. Slowly and with care the ponies trod their way down the slippery paths over the loose stones, Mollie laughing and boasting of the sure-footedness of her little dappled pony, really a beautiful and intelligent creature. Bella rode a small sorrel horse, who, during the ascent, had shown a disposition to stumble, and, when about remounting for the descent, Gilbert had urged her to exchange with him for the safer animal he rode. But when did not young ladies manifest a spirit of perversity? Bella Lushington was no exception to the rule; and so she persisted that her horse was perfectly sure-footed, laughed at Gilbert’s fears as he assisted her to the saddle, and even dashed forward at a little more rapid pace than the sober step a prudent pony would warrant.

“Let me, at least, guide your horse by the bridle rein,” said Mr. Gilbert. But “No,” again. “It would frighten the animal. Safer alone,” Bella urged. And, as she was really a fearless rider, and sat her horse with great ease, he resigned the rein to her hand, only adding, “Keep a tight rein in the steepest places.”

“Oh, I never was thrown in my life,” said Bella. “I am not in the least afraid.” And away, at that unsafe trot, down the slippery, stony path went the brave rider.

But alas for boasting! The proverb, “Pride always goeth before a fall,” met with a literal interpretation. Scarce twenty rods had Miss Lushington advanced down the declivity of Red Hill when her horse’s fore feet slipped among the loose stones; and, after ineffectual efforts to recover himself, he stumbled and fell, precipitating his rider over his head into the rocky, rugged path.

“Bella! dear Bella! Good Heavens, is she killed?”

The ejaculation was not her brother’s, neither Mr. De Lara’s, though the former had sprung from his horse before the unwieldy De Lara could swing himself from his stirrups; but it was Mr. Hartley Gilbert’s, who was at her side with one bound, even before the stumbled animal had recovered his footing and stood quietly grazing the short grass by the edge of the path. And the ejaculation was not uttered loudly, but in a deep, concentrated voice, which only reached the ear of the girl he lifted from the rocky pathway and seated on a granite boulder close by. “Good Heavens!” he added. “Your head not a foot from this rock! And if you had struck it!” I do not know which shuddered most then, Gilbert or Bella, as he bent over her, essaying with trembling fingers to untie the strings of the brown straw hat, which had been thrust over her face. “Oh, if you had only let me hold the bridle rein!”

“I know it; you knew better than I. I should have allowed you to guide me. I am not hurt; only this bruise on my hand; believe me, Mr. Gilbert.” There was no stateliness, no coldness in Isabel Lushington’s words then, and it was wonderful, the crimson flush that broke over her face, and the light that sparkled in her eyes ere she grew pale again, and the dark fringes swept her oval cheeks.

"Thank God! Only let me guide your steps in the future, dear Bella, and I am content!" It was no wonder Gilbert's fingers trembled so, untying the hat strings.

"Why, Bella, sister," laughed Charles Lushington, though his voice was husky and tears stood in his eyes, "who'd have thought of your performing a vaulting feat after that fashion?"

"Oh, dear Bella, are you hurt?" And "How fortunate!" And "What a providential escape!" These and other exclamations burst simultaneously from every lip. "'Tis a vicious beast, and ought to be shot, Miss Lushington!" exclaimed Mr. De Lara, coming up rapidly as his plethoric habit would allow. "Yes, he ought to be shot, Miss Lushington!" (Mollie said afterwards "she didn't know which Mr. De Lara meant this time, the pony or Hartley Gilbert;" for certainly any but amiable looks were bestowed on the latter, who still retained his seat by Bella on the granite boulder, fanning her with the brim of her straw hat.)

A quarter of an hour after, the cavalcade again wound their way carefully down Red Hill, each rider noting the fore feet of their pony among the loose boulders. Even Mollie was silent; but (as she averred to Sue Ashleigh afterwards) "she was busy looking at Mr. De Lara, whose eyes looked like two great green gooseberries, swollen with envy and jealousy, watching Hartley Gilbert, who had lifted Bella to his own horse, and walked beside her down the hill, with his hand guiding the bridle rein."

"Bella, you did not give me my answer on Red Hill," whispered Gilbert, as he lifted her from the wagon to the piazza of the Seuter House. But I suppose he read it in the rapid and blushing glance she gave him ere her drooping eyelashes swept her burning cheeks.

At the dinner-table Miss Lushington's fall and miraculous preservation from injury were the theme of general comment; yet all agreed she had never looked more cheerful or happy.

"You don't say so, Hart! The man of all the world I should be proud to call brother!" exclaimed Charles Lushington, that afternoon, as the twain walked together up the cool, green read above the Seuter House. "'My consent' Why, my dear fellow, how could you doubt it?" And he shook Gilbert's hand warmly. "Bella, the shy puss! she never breathed me a word of it. When did it happen?"

"Oh, we've known it scarce six hours ourselves. First found it out on Red Hill, this forenoon," replied Gilbert, with a smile.

"Oh ho, that fall was it! Thought you were a mighty long time untying Bella's hat strings. But you may have her. God bless her! God bless you both! Hart, Bella's been a good sister, and she'll make a good wife!"

There were the usual comments when the engagement became known; for, strange to relate, Hartley Gilbert decided not to go on to the White Mountains without Bella's promise to accompany him. Mollie Risley "had foreseen it all along," she said. The Ashleighs were delighted. Even Mrs. Charles Lushington, who at first said, in querulous tones, "She didn't see what Bella need go marry for! She should miss her so! Just as likely as not, she never'd have any health afterward!" even the nervous invalid at last "didn't know but 'twas all right; Bella perhaps would be happier." There was but one of the party at the Seuter House—and he Mr. Alphonse De Lara—who did not quite manifest pleasure at the information; but this gentleman (I am compelled to record, as a correct and faithful historian), from his first meditations of pistols and Bowie knives, and his characteristic exclamation of "He ought to be shot," finally returned to swallowing the bitter pill of disappointment with the good roasts, savory mutton chops, salad, and macaroni of mine host of the Seuter House.

But Bella cared very little for objections or approval now; it was all one to her. She seemed a changed being; her lofty dignity tempered to a sweet, womanly submission. "Hart Gilbert had cast a spell over her; actually tamed her!" Mollie Risley said. "It was better sport to watch them now than the pet bears. They lived on sweets all the time. For her part, she intended to come into New Hampshire again next summer, and see if she couldn't meet her 'fate'; if she couldn't have her share in some nice romance here at Centre Harbor!"

DEEDS are greater than words. Deeds have such a life, mute but undeniable, and grow as living trees and fruit-trees do; they people the vacuity of time, and make it green and worthy. Why should the oak prove logically that it ought to grow, and will grow? Plant it, try it; what gifts of diligent judicious assimilation and secretion it has, of progress and resistance, of force to grow, will then declare themselves.

DOMESTIC MANAGEMENT.

No laws can be laid down, no general rule for guidance can be given for domestic management, inasmuch as particular households require particular service; the same as in sickness, the medicine which cures one will be totally inactive on another patient. To take advice from those who are termed "good managers," is an act of feebleness, as too frequently it leads to gossip and tattle, which must, in the end, break asunder the strongest cords of mutual love in husband and wife. In fact, neither from parents nor friends should advice be sought. In the fearfulness to do wrong—in the strong reverence of a husband's love—in the solicitude to do right—in the full and perfect faith that God's strength will be given at all times, if asked for—a young wife will have the fullest assurance of her future. However imperfect, uncertain, or limited her means—however peculiar her husband's temper—however unskilled or untried the machinery of help with which she is daily to work out her sum of happiness—her own duties must never be neglected. The nicely-cooked and varied meal; the cleanliness and quickness of its serving; the presiding cheerfulness, yet quiet and undemonstrative; the sweetness and cleanliness of a home, of which every part must be visited daily; the methodical arrangement of the household work; the courteous receiving of visitors; and the storing the mind with matter for conversation, will make the longest day pass swiftly, bringing round the happy hour of the husband's return home, where he finds

"Something than beauty dearer—

Truth, goodness, honor, harmony, and love;

Where unweakened sense, and amiable grace,

And lively sweetness dwell enraptured."

It is in the first year of married life that a woman's real education begins. Girlhood's teaching may have laid the foundations of intellectual taste and mental resource—happy if it is so; here is a well-spring of enjoyment which neither trouble, nor sickness, nor sorrow, can ever obliterate: which nothing but crime can subvert, or turn into a curse; or, unhappily, an education may have been imparted which has only given grace and accomplishments, and left the spark of divine nature untouched. Here, here, will be the trial; can dancing, music, or dress, soothe one real pain, chase one real trouble, or give one particle of sound advice? Summoned suddenly into life's warfare without defence, without the armor of faith, and without moral courage, what wonder is it so many battles are lost, so much ruin strewn over the plains and hills of the marriage territory? Such education is like building the superstructure of a house on some inflated substance, instead of on a solid foundation; it is like heaping precious jewels and ivory caskets upon a mound of dry bones; they may cover unsightliness till a need arises, and then all is hollow, no single stone can be taken therefrom for any useful purpose.

Then, now in the first years of married life, while love is still blind, or mindful only to pass over a deficiency; now, while the husband is "Only weak

Against the charm of beauty's powerful glance," strain every nerve, use constant prayer for strength and power to become really a helpmeet, really a companion, really a helper-on, really a guardian angel in human guise to husband and children, showing the path to God's rest in heaven.

Milton, in his "Paradise Lost," has given such a perfect picture of woman in her earthly and angelic nature, that one cannot but feel that, however unhappy and wretched he was in his first marriage, from uncongeniality of temper and unsympathizing influences, yet, in his second marriage, of alas! too brief a duration, his portrait of Eve was no illusory one, but drawn from the life; but it was Eve before the fall. As to her personal charms, he says, on Adam's first seeing her—

"Grace was in all her steps, Heaven in her eye,

In every gesture, dignity and love.

When I approach

Her loveliness, so absolute she seems,
And in herself complete so well to know
Her own, that what she wills to do or say
Seems wisest, virtuousest, discreetest, best.

Authority and reason on her wait,
As one intended first, not after made
Occasionally; and, to consummate all,
Greatness of mind and nobleness their seat
Build in her loveliest, and create an awe
About her, as a guard angelic placed."

This tribute is paid to her loveliness, and no niggard of praise is he to her mental and moral worth :—

"Neither her outside form'd so fair, nor aught

So much delights me, as those graceful acts,
Those thousand decencies that daily flow
From all her words and actions mixed with love,
And sweet compliance, which declare unfeigned
Union of mind, or in us both one soul."

This is Adam's description to the angel, of his bride in the first bloom of wedded love; and the following describes so well the housewifely, graceful retirement of Eve, upon observing Adam's studious thought in conversing with Raphael :—

"With lowliness majestic from her seat

Rose and went forth, among her fruits and flowers,
To visit how they prospered, bud and bloom,
Her nursery; they at her coming sprung,
And, touch'd by her fair tendance, gladlier grew;
Yet went she not, as not with such discourse
Delighted, or not capable her ear
Of what was high; such pleasure she reserved,
Adam relating, she sole auditress;
Her husband the relator she preferred,
Before the angel"

Somewhat different this from the fussiness of modern housewives, or at least of very many.

Fussiness is almost worse than the let alone system; to a quiet, tender-nerved man, it is almost death; to a fussy, irritable man, who likes to fuss over everything himself, a wife who is always in a bustle is like giving an additional impetus to an express train in full motion; there can be but one result, confusion and destruction.

A powerful attraction to a home is the cultivation of a spirit of neatness and elegance throughout all its arrangements. The eye scarcely ever wearies of a beautiful prospect or a pleasing picture. The aspect of a home should resemble the latter; it should tell its own tale; its atmosphere should breathe of comfort, and its quiet, simple ornamentation delight the eye. There is a brightness about a well-kept home which neither wealth nor magnificence can impart, unaccompanied by taste. To keep best rooms, or best of anything, to be used only for visitors' accommodation, is not the wisest policy for a wife to adopt; on the contrary, company rooms contrast too greatly with daily living rooms, and suggest unpleasant comparisons. Neatness and elegance should go hand in hand; one cannot exist without the other; but it must be neatness far removed from formality, and elegance independent of costliness or profusion. Every article should appear as if intended for use, and every right article in its right place; the very chairs and tables should be suggestive of comfort, not arranged with stiff precision, but in such a way that the attractive portions of a room shall be visible to their occupants. Sofa and chair tidies should be tacked on, otherwise they look like dirty rags crumpled into the corners. Sofa pillows should be frequently shaken, so as not to give the impression of their having done duty as a bed. The chimney or other ornamental glass must look bright, never with dull mist or smoke obscuring its surface; all corners of the room be kept scrupulously clean; the hearthrug shaken and daily brushed; the fireplace bright and flashing hither and thither its sparkling scintillations, as though it were animated by a spirit of welcome and cheeriness.

All sitting-room stoves or grates should have as much bright steel as is possible about them, but all of a plain kind; knobs and ornamental work are difficult to clean, while the plain-polished surface is easier to keep bright than anything else; and, avoiding black lead and labor, if the steel is rubbed every day with wash-leather on which very fine brick-dust has been rubbed, nothing more is required; but this must not for a day be omitted. Flowers—Nature's jewels—should in the summer be scattered as liberally as means and circumstances will permit; but these require an artistic arrangement to satisfy the eye, and as they lend a charm to the veriest hovel, so in a refined home their beauty and fragrance are enhanced by a graceful grouping. Some persons gather a handful of flowers, and arrange them as if for a bouquet—that is, all the heads are brought to one level and the stems cut to an exact length, then tied round and stuck in some unsuitable shaped vase. Nature certainly never suggested this. Take any plant in flower, and observe how gracefully the buds and the bloom spring from the leaves; such sprays, placed in a flower vase which spreads at the top, will fall into a natural position. Then shorter full-blown flowers may be placed to hide the stems of the former, and at once is formed a group of floral treasures worthy of permanent endurance in a painting. Many such pictures should be sprinkled about. Wicker baskets having saucers filled with water, alabaster vases containing wide-mouthed bottles of water, a small bowl filled with water, and all other available receptacles can be brought into requisition for the radiant gems of all seasons. Pansies, scarlet geraniums, and mignonette, placed in China breakfast-saucers, filled with water, and literally stuck with short-stemmed flowers, as pins in a cushion, will bloom and gladden the eye, without requiring more than a weekly change.

Home should gladden the eye, cheer the heart, and satisfy the mind; therefore, all that can add to its decoration, enhance its comfort, or bring serenity to the thoughts should be lavished with no niggard hand. The expenditure of thought, time, and trouble may be great at first, but recompense will surely come in that greatest of all blessings to a young wife—the husband's undivided and soulfelt love; such love as Milton describes that of Adam for Eve, when it rested with him to choose eternal life without or death with her:—

"Yet loss of thee

Would never from my heart: no, no! I feel
The link of Nature draw me; flesh of flesh,
Bone of my bone thou art, and from thy state Mine never shall be parted, bliss or woe."

STUDIO PICTURES.

BY JESSIE GARLAND.

"Is mademoiselle weary?"

I look up as if just awakened from a dream, to find the eyes of the artist losing their look of half-reproof, and lighting up with one of pleasure, as they pass from my almost bare canvas to the bewildering picture that rests on the easel of my neighbor. With the delight of a true connoisseur he gazes on the beauty so rapidly growing, and lavishes praises on the hand whose pencil can make a "living picture," and passes on to other pupils. I turn to my easel with a sigh, and another voice asks, "Are you tired, Allie?" and I look up again, but meet no answering glance, for the eyes of him who sits beside me have not turned from their work, and every touch of his pencil adds new beauty to what is already so beautiful.

"No, no, Cousin Walter, I am not tired, but I do not believe I will ever touch a brush again. Oh, would that I could paint like that!" and I droop my head despondingly, and the tears will come to my eyes; but—"Courage, courage, ma cousine, love can do anything. You love beauty, and you cannot help making it. It is in your heart, and will come out. Remember 'Fairy Dell,' and do not despair," are the words that come in a cheery tone to my ear, and with the lagging blood now rushing through my veins, I turn to my neglected canvas.

Oh, how much I had lived during the hours I had passed in that studio, receiving instruction from one of the many eminent artists our city afforded! From my childhood, a visit to a picture-gallery was the greatest treat any one could offer me, and as I advanced in years, the absorbing love for painting was the foundation of an affection for my Cousin Walter that grew to be stronger than that I bore my doting father. When I was sixteen that father passed away from earth, leaving me, his only child, to the care of a half-brother, the father of Walter, and from that time we had never been separated twenty-four hours. I loved my Uncle Emmings because he was my father's brother and Walter's father, and my Aunt Emmings because she was Walter's mother; but Walter—at his very feet I laid my heart. My father's sudden death stunned me, and it was with the unexpressed belief that employment of some engrossing nature was necessary to my health, that Walter had proposed my taking painting lessons. It was something I had never attempted, for, as I had often gazed spell-bound on the work of some master-hand, the conviction that I could never attain such perfection would force itself upon my mind, and I knew I would be satisfied with nothing short of it. I said so to Walter, and told him I should be miserable if I attempted it and failed; but he only said "try," and so an easel was placed beside his, in the studio of Monsieur D'Albert, and I commenced to live. It was fascination. Sometimes I would work for hours with scarce a thought of what was passing around me, revelling in the work of my own creation. Again, if my eye chanced to fall on some conception more beautiful than my own, my pencil would fall to the floor, and my heart droop with despair until Walter's encouraging words would give me new life. "Fairy Dell" was my last piece, and had taken a premium, and it was now hanging in the gallery with the crown of roses depending from its crimson cord. I know not how long I had worked when Walter suddenly spoke—"See, Allie! they're inspecting your picture. Did you ever see any creature so lovely? She looks as if she might be an inhabitant of Fairy Dell itself."

I looked and saw two ladies—one a pale, delicate woman in widow's weeds, the other I cannot describe, but she was the realization of my dream of a houri. I looked upon her, and why was it that my heart felt as if a knife had entered its very depths? The unveiled-to-come will make it known. Monsieur D'Albert was talking with them, and after a few moments they slowly approached, looking at the other pictures which, like mine, had taken prizes. Finally M. D'Albert's voice came distinctly to our ears—"I regret very much, madame, to refuse mademoiselle, but it would be impossible to paint a picture in that time with the other engagements already on my hands."

The elder lady's face and voice expressed disappointment as she said, "Well, then, Eva, we must try some one else, for you have no time to lose."

Walter had sat silently gazing on the face of the young girl, and now, as they approached the door, he started up, and the next moment stood before them.

"Are the services of an artist needed?" he asked, abruptly.

M. D'Albert's face brightened as he replied, "Yes, Monsieur Emmings. Do you know any one whom you can recommend?" And then to the lady, "If Monsieur Emmings recommends a painter, you need not fear to employ him."

Walter bowed as his name was pronounced, and the lady in black responded to it; the young girl quietly seated herself upon a divan.

"I know of no one except myself," said Walter, "but would offer my own services."

Monsieur D'Albert looked round, and in his surprise forgot himself, and spoke out in plain English, "I did not know you painted for money, Mr. Emmings!"

"Neither do I," said Walter, haughtily turning from him; then, with a low bow to the lady, "but if you will trust my skill, I shall be very happy to oblige you, madame."

The lady extended her hand—"I have heard your name before, Mr. Emmings; your father was one of my husband's friends before we left your city"—her voice faltered as she involuntarily glanced at her sable dress—"and I hesitate only because I fear to inconvenience you."

Walter protested that it would be only a pleasure, and in half an hour the arrangement was complete.

Mrs. Herbert was a widow, and but recently returned to her native city. Eva was the oldest of three children, and was going in a few weeks to visit some relations in a distant State, to be absent during the winter. They were gone, and Walter came back to his seat, took up his pencil, and for the next hour my eye followed every movement of his hand. His very being seemed overflowing with beauty. I looked, and almost forgot that life is not all beauty and happiness. At last a long, deep sigh, and he pushes back his chair, looks at his watch, and says, "Come, Allie, let us go home; are you not hungry?" and he takes his hat just as M. D'Albert comes up, and words fail to express his admiration; but Walter turns on his heel, and I hear him say, "There is nothing else beautiful since I have seen her."

I dreamed once that I was wandering through an almost impenetrable forest in the darkness of a tempestuous night, when a kind hand led me up the marble steps, and through the wide door of a palace into the light and warmth of a gorgeous room, where all was beauty and magnificence. A delicate perfume as of the breath of spring flowers, and low, soft, birdlike notes of music filled the air. The light of many lamps was softened to moonlight radiance, and I sank amid the cushions of the chair to which the same kind hand led me, with a dreamy feeling of perfect content. I possessed one priceless jewel that I had preserved through danger and storm, and I reached forth my hand to give this to the one that had guided me, when suddenly the moonlight radiance brightened, and from each shaded lamp shot up lurid tongues of flame, that rose higher and higher, until the massive roof was one living flame of fire. The hand had vanished; my jewel—ah, where was it? With a shriek of terror and an effort to rise, I awoke, just as the door burst open and strong arms bore me from my chamber, where the flames were in very truth careering wildly over and around me.

Why do I think of this dream this morning as I walk home silently by Walter's side? Alas! alas! did not his hand lead me from the gloom and darkness of sorrow, and make my life beautiful and happy? Had I not yielded my heart, the one priceless jewel that I possessed, to his keeping? And now the gorgeous castle in which I was sinking to repose had crumbled to ashes, and my heart had been left in the flames, but, thanks to our Father, it was not to perish there. I had awakened to the reality that with my whole heart I loved my Cousin Walter; and, while I knew that he loved me, I knew that it was only as he would love a dear cousin or sister. That night there was a long and terrible struggle, but the spirit sought strength from above, and it rose purified from the fiery trial; and, before the new day was born, the green-eyed monster fled, and the gentle sleep-angel waved his white wings over my bed.

I often wondered why Walter never spoke to me of Eva Herbert. Weeks passed, and I had not been to M. D'Albert's studio. Walter would take his hat, and "I have another engagement to-day, Allie, and cannot go with you," would be his simple remark, as he would leave the breakfast-room. I would not go alone, and avoided society as much as possible, but was gaining strength daily; and I knew that the victory was mine, when one day Walter approached and stood beside me as we were alone in the parlor. He placed his hand on my head, as he said, in a voice low and trembling with deep emotion, "Will you not wish me joy, little sister?" There was no need to ask him for what, and the words came from heart as well as lips as I replied, "I do, dear Walter, with my whole heart!"

He stooped and pressed a kiss upon my brow, and then he told me of his love for Eva Herbert; said that her bewildering beauty had at first fascinated him, but that the beauties of mind and heart had won his love. That day her picture was finished, and the next week she would leave for the visit to her friends, but not to spend the winter, as had been anticipated. O no, he could not live without her that long, and she had promised that when the snow of winter began to melt she would give herself to his guidance for the balance of her life journey.

She went. Walter again went with me to the studio, and we painted side by side as we did in the days before he saw Eva Herbert. Weeks passed, and at last came the one that would bring her home. Walter grew too impatient to paint, and he wandered about the gallery seeking to while away the tardy moments. The day came, and, ah, how joyously he said "Good-by, little sister," as he looked back, going down the steps, and saw my face at the window! I still sat there when he came in; and, sinking down beside me, he laid his head in my lap, while great sobs came from his bosom. Oh, it was a terrible sight! the strong man deprived of his strength. I bent my face down to his. "What is it, dear Walter? Has Ev—" He sprang up suddenly. "Come, Allie, come with me, sister, and see my broken lily. You know how I love her; come and tell her that no misfortune, however bitter, can ever drive her from my heart." I went with him, without asking what this great misfortune was that could so unman a proud nature. Walter led the way to a small sitting-room tastefully furnished, evidently the one they had occupied while he was painting her portrait, for the picture, in all its fresh loveliness, still stood on the easel unframed. Mrs. Herbert, whose white face was convulsed with agony, sat on a sofa supporting the slight form of her daughter in her arms. Walter almost dragged me across the room, and, throwing himself on his knees, he caught Eva's small hand and placed it in mine. "Tell her. Ah, Allie, my soul-sister, you know what I want; tell her."

I was bewildered. In his great grief, Walter had forgotten that I knew nothing, and now I turned to Mrs. Herbert. "What is it, dear lady? My cousin is distracted with grief, and has told me nothing."

The words came from the white lips of the mother like ice-drops: "She is blind!"

That was all I knew then; but weeks after, when the mother could speak calmly of it, she told me that it was hereditary, and that one or two of her family had, like Eva, been stricken blind suddenly; without warning of premonitory symptoms, the light had gone out, and their lives wrapped in deep darkness. Now I thought only of Walter, and oh, there was no selfishness in my heart then, as I put my arms about his neck! "Poor Walter! poor brother!" And he bent his head to my shoulder, while tears that were an honor to his manhood gave some relief to his tortured heart. Then again came the pleading cry, "Tell her, tell her, my sister, what I want!"

Ah! I knew now what he wanted; and (thank God, no demon stood beside me then), with all the earnestness in my heart, I besought her to give him the privilege of guiding her darkened footsteps through life. She mournfully shook her head, but said nothing. I urged that it was his right, and asked her, if he had been thus stricken, if she would have deserted him, and her answer was to stretch forth her hand towards him. At last, her mother spoke: "Yes, Eva, my darling, it is right, and it must be so." She lifted her head suddenly from her mother's bosom, and for a moment a look of pain rested on her face, but it passed away, and a smile of heavenly joy came in its place, as she held out her arms. "Oh, Walter, my soul blesses you!" And he gathered her to his bosom with low murmured words of passionate love.

Not many days after, a minister performed a solemn ceremony, and the blind girl became a bride. Then we went to Europe—we, for Walter had said I must go, and I would not refuse; went to consult the best oculists, to find if there was any foundation for the hope that was fluttering in our hearts. The man of science wore an impassive face as he made the examination; but when it was over, and he turned to where Walter sat, no words were needed to drive that fluttering hope from our hearts forever. There was no word spoken, but Eva's ear caught the sigh that burst from her husband's heart as he bent his head down upon the hand clasped in his. She passed the other caressingly over his hair, and said, tremulously: "Poor Walter! I knew it would be thus, and now your bright manhood will be burdened with a blind wife!" A shadow darkened her fair brow as the last words were spoken with a sudden sharpness; but Walter rose up, wound his arm around her, and drew her head upon his bosom. "No, no, not that, dear one. I only grieve that you are to be shut out from this world, that is beautiful notwithstanding its many sorrows; but I would grieve more were I not permitted to guide you through the darkness."

"Then I am content," she whispered. And the shadow passed away, and a sweet smile wreathed her lips.

And so we went back to our home, and the days of another twelvemonth came and went, and then Eva pressed but one kiss on the angel brow of her baby girl when a bright-winged messenger came to guide her through the dark valley to the eternal city beyond. And she went unmurmuringly, saying: "My Father knoweth best, and I will know her when she comes to me, be it in baby form, in lovely maidenhood, or with wrinkled brow."

Again I painted, but not in M. D'Albert's studio; I had one of my own. For weeks past, one picture had engrossed my whole attention, and no eye but my own had yet looked upon it. It was the little two-year-old Eva and her guardian angel. Far away in the cleft of rose-hued clouds the dark eyes of the child rested wonderingly on a crown to which the white finger of the angel pointed, and the angel's face was that of the beautiful blind mother ere the light had been quenched in the clear blue eyes. It was my chef d'œuvre, and how could it be otherwise when my heart was in every touch the pencil made? The picture was finished, and I stood looking at it and—yes, and admiring it, when a hand touched my shoulder, and I looked round and found Walter standing at my side.

"Said I not truly, dear Allie? Has not my prophecy been fulfilled? There can be nothing more beautiful." And his eye rested on the picture.

"But it is only a copy, Cousin Walter."

"The figures are copies, I admit; but they are perfect copies, and the design is your own, and in it lies the chief beauty. O how gladly would I cherish the thought that my angel Eva is the guardian spirit of our child!"

I moved quietly to a window seat, and sat thinking of that day, in another studio, when I had first looked on the beauty of Eva Herbert.

"Allie." Walter is again standing by my side; and, as I look up, I feel the blood mounting to my brow, for there is that in his glance that I never saw there before when his eye rested on my face. "Allie, what would you think of one who would ask you to give a fair crystal goblet, filled with pure, sweet wine, in exchange for one seared and unsightly, and with only bitter dregs at the bottom?"

I looked wonderingly in his face. "What do you mean, Walter?"

He bends down his head until his lips touch my brow, and then he answers me: "This is what I mean: before I ever saw Eva I loved you; but it was as a dear cousin, to whose happiness I found I could contribute. To her was given the best of my life, and now I offer you a heart from which the freshness has departed, and ask in return one that is wreathed with vernal flowers and overflowing with beauty."

Gushing tears, tears of joy, are filling my eyes, for I know full well that his heart can never grow old, as I answer: "Your simile is not good, dear Walter, for you are better for having loved her."

Again his head is bent down, and this time the kiss is upon my lips. "And will you, too, bless my life with your love?"

And I answer him, honestly: "Before you ever saw Eva I loved you, I thought I had driven that love from my heart, but I find it has only been slumbering there, and will be easily awakened."

So, dear reader, the priceless gem has been recovered from the ruins where it has so long been hidden, and now rests securely in a structure whose fair proportions will be ever growing more beautiful until it stands perfect beside the tree of life.

KNOWLEDGE may slumber in the memory, but it never dies; it is like the dormouse in the ivied tower, that sleeps while winter lasts, but awakes with the warm breath of spring.

THE CITIES OF REFUGE.

A TALE OF JUDEA.

BY M. W. E.

CHAPTER IV.

WHEN all was completed that pertained to the ceremonial law of the Sabbath, Eldad addressed his attentive guest—

"Son of Ebenezer, let me not seem ungracious in thy sight, if I bid thee depart; yet not alone, I will go with thee, and we will set our faces towards the river Jordan, for thine enemy is even now at the gate."

"How knowest thou this, my friend?"

"The eyes of my son are open when his father's friends are in danger, and they have seen his secret path."

"How then can we escape his watchful vengeance?"

"The tiger must be snared. Joel will clothe himself in thine outer garment, if it please thee, and haste with all speed along the road that leadeth to Ramoth in Gilead; the man may think thou art flying thither, and peradventure, may follow him. If so, we can depart unseen by him, and when we have crossed the river, our course can be decided upon, as shall best suit thy safety."

"Thou art wise in counsel, Eldad, and I yield myself to thy guidance;" so saying, Reuben, divesting himself of his costly garment, exchanged it for the coarser one of his youthful friend, who gladly assumed his; and imitating, as far as possible, the lofty bearing of the son of Ebenezer, Joel departed upon his mission. The ruse was skilfully executed, and succeeded, and the two travellers, taking a kind leave of Sherah, set forward on their journey, and arrived at the river they sought, unmolested. But an unexpected difficulty awaited them there: the stream, swollen by the "latter rains," had become so broad, deep, and rapid, that the fords were impassable, and no one could be found willing to risk his life in an attempt to cross the turbulent waters.

"We must change our course to the north-east, my brother," said Eldad; "it will lead us to the hill-country of Gad; and perchance we may find entrance into Ramoth."

"But should Hazael be there?" suggested the weary Reuben.

"Then thou must press onward to Golan, in Manasseh; he will not seek thee there; he will return to Bezer to find thee."

"Thou hast acted a brother's part, Eldad, and very pleasant is thy company to me, but I would not that thou shouldst forsake thy family longer for my sake; return to thy home, I pray thee, and trouble thyself no more with my fate."

"Not so, Reuben; thou art wayworn and sad, and canst not venture to ask for food; thou wouldst perish in thy helplessness. And Sherah would reproach me for my selfishness," he added, smiling.

And so they travelled on, until morning light showed them a charming grove, whose closely woven boughs and luxuriant foliage offered them both rest and security; and there, seating themselves on the trunk of a fallen tree, they looked forth upon the lovely scenery around them. Fertile meadows, whose verdant treasure bent before the morning breeze; fields, yellow with grain, almost ripened for the harvest; hill-sides alive with skipping flocks; and herds scampering in wild glee, or gravely chewing the cud as they reposed their huge limbs within the grateful shade of the sycamore or mulberry—all presented a scene of simple and beautiful nature, too attractive to remain unnoticed.

"Truly, the Lord is good to Israel!" exclaimed Eldad, as he gazed in admiration on the fair landscape. "How certainly has the blessing of Moses, the man of God's love, descended upon us! 'Let Reuben live—and not die, and let not his men be few,' were his words of prophecy; and lo! our inheritance filled with great cities, and our cities crowded with inhabitants. And Gad, likewise, 'dwelleth as a lion among us;' and 'the thousands of Manasseh' through the cities of his possession. Seest thou yon lofty mountain in the distance, my brother?"

"I see it distinctly."

"That is Mount Gilead, and beyond it lies Ramoth, thy place of refuge. But thou art faint and hungry, and we will see what my provident Sherah hath made ready for our need." Then, opening a small sack which each had alternately borne, he took from it a small cup, some cakes of bread, and a quantity of prepared meat. A short search discovered a fine spring of cool water, and, after supplicating a blessing on the food, both travellers partook of it freely, and were refreshed.

"How skilfully, and with what matchless beauty the various shades of verdure are intermingled among the stately trees of Mount Gilead!" exclaimed Reuben, now for the first time alive to the lovely view. "Behold the tall cedar mingling its dark branches with the bright green of the sycamore, and again contrasting its lofty spire with the rounded top of the mulberry; and clusters of lofty palms nearer to us, how they spread their huge leaves, as if anxious to be first in offering their refreshing shade to the way-worn!"

"Yea, our fathers were wise in choosing this goodly land for our inheritance; it is, in truth, fruitful in pasture for flocks and herds; even our own lovely plains do not excel the hill-country of Gad in beauty, and wonderfully did Jehovah display his power in delivering it into the hands of his chosen people while he dispossessed its former owners, the Amorites."

"The Amorites were a very great and powerful nation," remarked Reuben. "Thinkest thou it was right thus to dispossess them?"

"Of a surety. Was it not a punishment for their own inhospitable folly? Had Sihon, their king, complied with the request of Moses, and suffered him to lead his people through the land, he would have been unmolested, and even benefited, for the children of Israel would have repaid them for all kindness; but he refused this reasonable request, and the Lord delivered him and his country into the hands of the children of Reuben, and Gad, and Manasseh."

"Was it not strange that the tribe of Manasseh should have divided itself, only one-half of it, as thou knowest, dwelling on this side of Jordan?"

"The land could not support the whole of the three tribes, and the other half of Manasseh found its possession on the other side of the river. The Prince of Reuben took the regal city of Heshbon, where thy noble father dwelt; and Gad, when he had slain Og, the giant King of Bashan, lived in that monarch's palace. Machir, the brave son of Manasseh, conquered the remainder of the Amorites, and made Gilead his habitation."

"In verity, Eldad, I have sometimes thought that it savored of cruelty to destroy the inhabitants with such total extirpation."

"I wonder not at thy thoughts; yet, when thou rememberest that the Lord had delayed their punishment forty years 'after their iniquities were full,' and still they repented not, thou wilt perceive that our fathers were but instruments in His hands to punish a wicked and idol-serving nation; and also that, when at any time our people had pity and spared them, they became 'thorns in their sides,' or snares in their path, to lead them to sin."

"Thou sayest truly, Eldad. May Jehovah give us strength to resist their enticements, for many are yet among us; and may we never forfeit this glorious inheritance by our own folly!"

"Amen!" responded Eldad, and both travellers sank into silence and deep meditation.

We trace not their route farther; suffice it that they found repose and safety from the fervors of the noontide heat in the sheltering glades of the forest, and as day declined resumed their journey. Late at night they arrived at the abode of an acquaintance of Eldad, who received them courteously, and freely ministered to their necessities; nevertheless, the latter thought it best to conceal from him the name of his companion, and merely presented him as one who, in common with himself, needed his hospitality.

"Why travellest thou on foot, Eldad, thou and thy companion?" inquired the host; "thou hast mules in abundance, and art rich in worldly goods."

"It suiteth my present business better to walk than to mount a stubborn mule, friend Nathan. I go to Ramoth, which, as thou art aware, lieth but on the other side of the mountain."

"To Ramoth? Thou wilt find that place in great commotion, or rather a part of it. Knowest thou Reuben, the son of Ebenezer, of Heshbon?"

"Yea; he is my kinsman. What wouldst thou say of him?"

"Thy kinsman, Eldad! Ay, thou art of Reuben, as I remember, and can, peradventure, tell me whether the tidings be true that has fallen upon our ears?"

"Say on, speak thy tidings. Yet stay; come aside with me," he added, in a low voice; "I would not that a stranger should hear aught against the house of my kinsman."

Nathan led the way into another apartment, and then informed his guest that for a day or two past, armed horsemen had beset every avenue leading into Ramoth, for the purpose of seizing the young man, who, it was reported, had slain Abner, the son of Simeon, in a quarrel; that Hazael raved like one possessed with a devil, and had taken a solemn oath that his enemy, as he termed him, should never reach a City of Refuge alive.

Eldad smiled, in scorn, while he replied: "Thou sayest it is now some days since the death of Abner. Thinkest thou that the manslayer has not ere this found safety at Bezer, a place so near to Heshbon? The wilderness could well conceal him from his pursuers while fleeing thither."

"At Bezer! Then will Hazael go mad with disappointment. Thinkest thou that he has yet reached the city?"

"How can I say? Peradventure accidents may have detained him; but if, as thou sayest, he could not enter Ramoth, of a certainty he must flee either to Bezer or Golan, for the river is a flood, and he cannot strive against the 'swellings of Jordan.'"

"Verily, Eldad, thou speakest wisely; and if Reuben were not of thy kindred, I would show to Hazael where to seek him."

"How canst thou show to him what thou knowest not thyself?"

"It matters not. I will send him to Bezer; better that he should know the truth than wander up and down the highways like a demoniac, as he now wandereth."

"And when goest thou to Ramoth, on thine errand, Nathan?"

"With the morning's dawn. We will rest until then, for thou and thy friend seem weary."

"He is far more weary than I, and, I fear me, will not keep pace with us in our early walk. Why should he not await our return hither? What thinkest thou?"

"That it would be well. I must make no tarrying there, and perchance may bring Hazael with me when I return, for he is the son of my father's sister, and my house is on the way to Bezer."

"I knew not that he was of thy kindred, Nathan, as Reuben is of mine; yet let not strife come between us. Thou hast received me kindly, and ministered to my wants as a brother, and I thank thee. A time may come when I can return thy hospitality."

"So be it." And the customary salutation sealed the compact.

Yet was Eldad in great perplexity, for he distrusted the faithfulness of Nathan, and feared his penetration; but he could only repeat to Reuben the conversation between the host and himself, and leave the result to his own decision. Reuben's decision was quickly made. "Thou hast said to Nathan, and truly, that I am footsore and weary; I will, therefore, abide here to-night, and when thou art on the way to Ramoth will seek the northern side of the wilderness that clothes the mountain like a garment, and there conceal myself until thou comest to meet me or perchance I gain admittance to the city without thee."

"It is well. I will but learn where the madman Hazael is, and straightway join thee on the northern side of Gilead, for I desire not to meet that evil man."

On the following morning, after the departure of his friend, Reuben continued for some time alone, and long and fervent were his prayers to the Great Jehovah for pardon and direction. "Deliver me from blood-guiltiness, O Lord God of my fathers! and be Thou my Refuge from the malice of mine enemies!" Such was the burden of his petition, the utterance of a heart bowed down with sorrow. Then, on taking leave of the wife of Nathan, and assuring her that he felt quite able to resume his journey to Ramoth, he expressed his grateful thanks for her kindness, and departed; pursuing the highroad that led to that city while he could be observed from the house, and leaving it when a turn in the road enabled him to escape observation and seek the calm glades and shadowy woods of Mount Gilead.

For several hours our lonely wanderer pursued his devious way; now winding around, now forcing his path through the thick underwood, and now loitering in the green openings of the forest, until he arrived on the northern side of the mountain, the side on which his friend had appointed to meet him; and there, finding a spring which poured its pure and abundant waters into the channel of a small rivulet, he threw himself on the mossy turf beside and was soon absorbed in deep and sad retrospection.

A slight but peculiar sound arrested his attention; he gazed attentively around to discover the cause, but, seeing nothing unusual, he relapsed into a reverie, and was again aroused by what was now a heavy groan. To hear the cry of distress and to fly to its relief were simultaneous with Reuben, and he at once hastened to the spot from whence the sounds proceeded; but a sight met his view which almost compelled him to retreat from its vicinity. Stretched upon the grass, apparently in the last agonies of death, lay a man clothed in coarse garments, emaciated to a skeleton, and covered with the foul and loathsome ulcers of leprosy. The command of the law—to shun all contact with an unclean object—was instinctively imperative in the mind of the Hebrew youth, but the distress of the wretched object before him drove all other considerations from his thoughts, and the feeble but agonized cry for water was irresistible. The small vessel he had brought with him was instantly thrust into the fountain, and, regardless of everything save the sufferings of a fellow-creature, he raised the disfigured head from the earth, and bathed the parched lips with the cooling drops until life was sufficiently vigorous to enable the poor being to swallow, and then a copious draught restored him to animation. Gratitude beamed in his eyes as he strove to utter his thanks. "Blessed be thou of the Lord God, and blessed be Jehovah, who hath put it into thine heart to minister to my distress, in spite of the defilement of my disease. Who art thou who hast thus proved thyself pitying and courageous?"

"I am Reuben, the son of Ebenezer, of Heshbon."

"Ah, I remember thee now. Knowest thou me?"

"Alas! have I ever known thee?"

"Thou mayst well ask the question; yet, loathsome as I now must be in thine eyes, I am Benoni, of Manasseh, and the sister of thy Zillah was once my betrothed wife."

"God of my fathers, Thou art wonderful in Thy ways!" exclaimed the astonished Reuben. "And thou art Benoni, son of the mighty Abdon, alone in this wilderness—to die!"

"Even so. Thus willeth the Lord of Hosts, whose ways are indeed past finding out. 'Lover and friend hath He put far from me, and He hath made me an abomination unto them.' Thou knowest why I am here?"

"I know that the law of Moses condemns the unhappy leper to live apart in his uncleanness; but it commands no such entire solitude, no such utter destitution."

"And what better can await the miserable being thus excluded from all the sweet sympathies of home and kindred? Forbidden to seek communion with the loved ones for whom his desolate heart is yearning, he can find no refuge from the tortures of disappointed hope, and must fly to utter solitude to conceal his agony. Reuben, thou knowest that my station was among the great ones of my tribe; thou knowest that wealth, with all its blessings, was an inmate of my dwelling; thou knowest that, wretched and repulsive as I now am, I was once of a goodly presence." He ceased speaking, from exhaustion, and Reuben replied:—

"Well do I know all this, and that not one of the nobles of Manasseh could excel Benoni in any graceful accomplishment befitting a son of Israel."

The unhappy man uttered a deep sigh, and continued: "Knowing these things, thou wilt not wonder that Basmath, the daughter of Machir, listened with a willing ear to the voice of my passion, and that our kindred sanctified our betrothal by their approval. Benoni, the only and beloved son of his father, in whom his brightest hopes were centred, was made the idol of his father's house; and, in the midst of this prosperity, while every heart responded to the music of happiness, the fearful punishment came, and the idol was overthrown. On discovering the first symptoms of leprosy, I flew to the priest for advice; I submitted to every requirement of the law concerning it; I offered sin-offerings, and fasted, and prayed, and besought the Lord to have mercy upon me: but He heard me not; his ears were deaf to my cries, O Reuben! and I was pronounced incurable. I fled—"

"Thy fate is truly bitter, son of Abdon," replied the sympathizing listener. "But why soughtest thou the inheritance of another tribe? Thine own would have supplied the comforts thou requirest with more certainty."

"Yea, thou sayest truly; but I was estranged from my kinsmen, separated from the beloved of my soul, and driven from the society of my fellow-men, excepting such as were loathsome as myself, and I sought a place where no eye could mark my wretchedness; no tongue recall the memory of the lost Benoni. In this wilderness I have since dwelt, watching the dreadful progress of my disease, not daring by my own hand to die, yet longing for the time when it shall please the Most High to end my punishment, and release me from my fearful burden. This morning I wandered towards Ramoth, and heard strange tidings concerning Hazael, of Heshbon."

"Ha! sawest thou the man?"

"Nay, I saw him not; and on my return my overtaken strength failed me before I could reach my tent, or even the spring of water which bubbles near it, and I fell fainting on the turf. How long I was senseless I know not; thou must have heard my reviving groan, and thine unshrinking kindness blessed me with the refreshing draught for which I had so long languished. May the Lord God bless thee for it!"

"Thy gratitude far exceeds the service, my poor Benoni."

"Think not so, Reuben. It is sweet to taste once more the tender sympathies of my kind; and thy pity falls like a healing balm upon my torn heart: but I may not trespass too far upon thy charity—another draught from the same cool spring, and thou must go thy way onward; the clean may not dwell with the unclean."

"Truly, the law is very plain, my friend; but I am already defiled, and can therefore aid thee without increasing the evil. When evening cometh, I can bathe in yonder brook and be clean; suffer me then to stay with you, while it is in my power to serve you."

Sweet tears—the tears of gratitude, overflowed the eyes of the hapless Benoni; and his desolate heart was soothed by the gentle sympathy and tender care of his new-found friend. When he was sufficiently recovered to be able to walk, Reuben accompanied him to the tent in which he had taken up his abode, and soon had the satisfaction of seeing him sink into a profound slumber, as he rested upon his bed of leaves.

CHAPTER V.

MIDNIGHT had passed, and evening was drawing near, ere our wanderer heard the signal which was to announce the approach of Eldad; then, as a cordial greeting passed between them, Reuben said—

"Thou comest not with the smiling face of a successful messenger, my brother; what hath chanced to displease thee?"

"Naught to displease, yet much to annoy me for thy sake," was the reply.

"Sawest thou mine enemy at Ramoth?"

"Nay, I saw him not; neither know I where he is to be found. Nathan, our host, was seeking him when I left the city." He paused, and then added, "I think Hazael hath left Ramoth. The judges and elders who sat at the gate, know naught of him since morning-tide. Art thou willing to venture thy safety by taking the road to the city? All seems quiet and safe, and the law forbids any man to lie in wait for thee."

"Yea, Eldad, I will go; the fear of death hath passed away; my life is in the keeping of Jehovah; and if He will that I perish, let me perish."

"God forbid that I should urge thee into peril, my friend; rather let us remain here, until we learn with more assurance the movements of Hazael."

"Say no more, Eldad, I pray thee: I have already tarried too long, and kept thee from thy family and home. May the Lord bless thee for thy self-denying kindness, and repay thee fourfold. And now, if thou art not too weary, let us press onward."

After proceeding for some distance along the southern declivity of Mount Gilead, they descended into the highway, which extended its long and unobstructed line up to the wide ever-opened gates of Ramoth. All was tranquil—a few travellers were passing to and fro, each "on his own purposes intent," and no one seeming to notice particularly our silent wayfarers. Already they were near the gate, within which was safety for Reuben, when the ears of the watchful Eldad were assailed by sounds that filled him with alarm.

"Hearest thou that tumult, Reuben? and lo!" he continued, as he gazed anxiously through the wide portals, "thine enemy cometh upon thee like a whirlwind of the desert—bend thy tall figure to the blast, and turn aside: perchance he will not see thee as he rushes past."

"Nay, nay, Eldad, the lion hath already crouched too long; let him face the whirlwind, and bravely meet the fate that befalleth him;" and he strode desperately forward, followed by several persons who were hastening to ascertain the cause of such an uproar in the street of the city.

Two horsemen, the one armed with a spear in his hand, and a sword by his side; the other, apparently an attendant, and likewise armed, were careering through the street at such speed as to endanger the lives of all who were so unfortunate as to encounter them; while the ear was shocked by the curses and threats which issued from the lips of the foremost rider. It is Hazael—he rushes through the arch of the gate, and, as the terrified people fly from before him on every side, his eye falls upon the stately form of Reuben, as, calm and unflinching, he still presses forward to the portal. Surprise seemed at first to paralyze the frame of Hazael—for an instant he stops, then raising his spear, darts it with all his strength at his victim; but a strong and rapid hand had snatched Reuben from the deadly peril, and the fatal weapon passes on to transfix another to the earth. It quivers in the heart of Benoni, the leper. The tender care of Reuben had awakened sentiments of affection in his breast, which had induced him to follow the footsteps of his preserver, and he had thus repaid his debt of gratitude, and found the death he had so long and earnestly desired. Before either Reuben or Hazael had recovered from the consternation occasioned by this unexpected catastrophe, the former found himself safe within the sheltering walls of Ramoth Gilead.

REUBEN to ZILLAH.

Beloved, that thou hast not, ere this, received a written testimony to the faithfulness of thy betrothed husband, is not that he loves thee less, but that his love is too great to afflict thee with uncertain tidings; but now that all uncertainty is removed, the judges having examined his case in all its circumstances, and pronounced him free from the stain of murder, and guilty of manslaughter; his heart is wearied with longings for the society of Zillah, and he writes to plead for great favors from her affection.

Thou knowest, light of my life, that in obedience to the command of our great lawgiver, the manslayer who has fled to a City of Refuge, although cleared from the guilt of a greater and inexpiable sin, must still abide in that city until the death of the presiding High Priest; and thus be separated from his kindred and friends, and an exile from his home, for a time to which he can affix no limits, because he cannot foresee the event which will release him from his punishment; therefore, only the death of our good and venerable Zadok can restore me to the inheritance of my fathers; and I must fain believe that my Zillah will not compel me to wish that so sad an event may be hastened, in order to complete my happiness.

Shall I say to my beloved that I have provided my house, and "hired me men-servants and women-servants," and only await the performance of promises she has made to me, to be as blessed, as, thus situated, I can hope to be? Do I ask too great a sacrifice? Can Zillah relinquish her kindred and her father's house for the home of her husband in the inheritance of Gad?

I send this missive by the hands of those who will do thy bidding, and escort thee in all honor to Ramoth; at its gate thy happy Reuben will await thee.

And now that the first desire of my soul hath been expressed to thee, I will relate to thee somewhat of the events that followed my entrance into this place.

Thou hast heard of the great danger I encountered from the spear of the unhappy Hazael; and if the kind and watchful Eldad had not forced me aside from its course, I must have been slain instead of the afflicted Benoni. How strongly were the words of our holy Psalmist illustrated by the fate of Hazael: "His violent dealings have returned upon his own head!" Before he had time to recover from his consternation at the issue of his rashness, and disappointment at my escape, he was in the hands of the authorities, and borne away to answer for his offence.

Zillah, although the venom of the serpent was in his heart, I cannot but pity him for the pangs his conscience will inflict upon him—bodily evils cannot compare with them in intensity, so fatal are the consequences of unrestrained passions. How happy the exchange of worlds for the poor leper whom his weapon released from such indescribable suffering! The hand of the Most Merciful directed the spear, and, I believe, only to repay him with eternal happiness for all the misery he experienced on earth.

In the street of Ramoth, I saw amidst the crowd the man Nathan speaking to Eldad, and I heard him say—

"This, then, is Reuben, the slayer of my kinsman; and thou didst lead him to my house?"

"Even so, Nathan; but, as I told thee this morning, I knew not that Abner was of thy family. Thou gavest him food and shelter for the night, and I thank thee for them. Thou knowest whether more is due thee?"

"What meanest thou?"

"Spakest thou with Hazael to-day, Nathan?"

"Nay; I spake only with his man-servant."

"To whom thou saidst that Reuben was at thy house?"

"How could I know that?"

"Thou deceivest me not, Nathan; I feared thy treachery, and suspected thy business at Ramoth; yet I thought, 'peradventure I wrong him, he may be faithful;' behold the consequences of thy treachery—revenge has been defeated, and Hazael has become a transgressor."

The wrath of Nathan was great, but it availed him not.

To the brotherly love of Eldad, under the Lord, I owe my life, my present comfort, everything; and shall we not together strive to repay his untiring friendship, my cherished one?

Another incident has occurred here since my arrival, which has filled my heart with pity for the criminal, and thankfulness for my own happier lot. Yesterday, while passing down a street, I observed a crowd assembled, and was attracted by curiosity to join it. On inquiring the cause of the assemblage, I learned that a murderer who had fled hither for refuge, had been arrested by the elders of the city where he had dwelt, in order that they might deliver him into the hands of the Avenger. It appeared that the body of a man had been found lying dead in a field of Gad, near Jabesh-Gilead; and the elders of that city, anxious to clear it from the crime of blood guiltiness which might be imputed to it, from the circumstance of its being the place nearest to the body, obtained a young heifer which they led to a valley near at hand, and there cut off its head as a sacrifice of expiation. Then washing their hands over the body, they said, "Our hands have not shed this blood, neither have our eyes seen it: be merciful, O Lord! unto Thy people Israel whom Thou hast redeemed, and lay not innocent blood to their charge."

Strict search was then made for the guilty person, and at last it was discovered that he was from Mahanaim; had long been at enmity with the Gileadite, and had slain him to gratify his revengeful spirit. Like myself, he fled here to escape; but there was no safety for the wilful murderer, and he was given up to his enemy. Blessed be Jehovah, that my fate was not like his.

Deem it not strange that I repeat this tale of woe to thee, O Zillah! my soul, filled with gratitude for my own escape, cannot withhold its emotions from thee; and thou, beloved of my heart, wilt share them; thou and thy Reuben will together lift up their songs of thankfulness and praise to the Lord God of our fathers for the preservation vouchsafed him; and thou wilt hasten thy journey, that we may the sooner unite in these proofs of our gratitude.

THINE OWN REUBEN.

Joy and rejoicing gladdened the dwelling of Reuben; for Zillah, loving and trusting, had granted his petition, and had come to throw light and beauty across his path, so long darkened by the shadows of grief and remorse. Magnificent preparations for the nuptials awaited her arrival: within the stately hall in which the holy ceremony was to be performed, was erected a splendid canopy of crimson velvet, rich with tasteful ornaments of gold and precious stones, and under this the lovely bride, closely veiled, was placed by her two attendants. A married pair always performed this duty; and Eldad and Sherah were chosen by Zillah, as most deserving the honor attached to its fulfilment. Opposite the bride, and under the canopy, stood the happy bridegroom, his fine face radiant with happiness, although he strove in vain to obtain a glimpse of the veiled features of his beloved.

The Rabbi commenced the ceremony by taking a glass of wine in his hand and pronouncing a devout benediction: "Blessed art Thou, O Lord our God, King of the Universe! who hast sanctified us with Thy commandments, and hast forbidden us the commission of sin, and hast permitted us marriage by means of the canopy and wedlock. Blessed art Thou, O Lord, who sanctifiest Israel." The couple then tasted the wine; after which, Reuben encircled her finger with the fateful ring; saying, as he did so, "Behold! thou art wedded to me with this ring, according to the law of Moses and Israel." The marriage contract was then read aloud, and the Rabbi took a second glass of wine, and after repeating seven different benedictions over it, presented it to the bride and bridegroom to drink: the empty glass was then laid upon the floor, and Reuben stamped it in pieces, as emblematical of the frailty of human life. Then were heard the voices of congratulations from the numerous friends of the wedded pair, and when these had ceased, the light figure of the youthful Joel might be seen, threading the mazes of the crowd to solicit alms for the benefit of the poor, that the hearts of the sick and destitute might participate in the rejoicings of the happy couple.

For seven days the sounds of gladness and mirth echoed through the halls of the princely Reuben; the feast and the song were there; music floated round, filling the air with melody, and the cheeks of the dark-eyed daughters of Gad bloomed with the excitement of many pleasures. Zillah, beautiful in her happy love, gave loose to her innocent joyousness. "Come thou with me, my Reuben!" she cried, placing her little hand upon his arm; "I would fain wander in the garden at this sweet hour of twilight. Hearest thou the bird of song, our own loved nightingale? How loudly he pours forth his song, as if to summon us to his lonely presence!"

"I love the nightingale's song, my Zillah, and the twilight hour is very pleasant; but when thou art near me I see only thee."

"Thy words are dear to my heart as the fragrance of the rose to the little bird that rests within the flower, yet I fear me thou art but a flatterer, dearest."

"Wherefore dost thou doubt me, love?"

"I sometimes fear thou art not quite happy, Reuben."

"And why should such thoughts enter thy mind? Beholdest thou aught in me to justify them?"

"Thou smilest with thy friends, my Reuben, and thine eye beameth with affection for thy Zillah; and yet the watchfulness of love can at times discern sadness in thy glance and sorrow in thy voice. Let thy wife share thy affliction, my husband. Shouldst thou mourn and I not weep with thee?"

"It is from no new cause, my love; thou knowest but too well its unhappy source!"

"The death of Abner?" asked Zillah, in tones of deep sympathy."

"Even that," he replied, sighing.

"Yet the judges and elders of Ramoth pronounced thee excusable, inasmuch as thou hadst great provocation; they have acquitted thee of all intentional crime. And hast thou not offered abundantly all that the law requires in expiation?"

"True, most true, beloved; but, although the sin may be expiated by the blood of the sacrifices, and my soul cleansed from the foul stain, what shall wash away the remembrance of it from my mind? What shall release me from the awful certainty that I have deprived a brother of the life which I cannot restore to him? that I have forced him unprepared into the dread presence of the Lord God of Israel, who hath said that, 'although abundant in goodness and truth, He will by no means clear the guilty.'"

"Thou art unhappy, then, O Reuben, and thy Zillah—"

"Must suffer no painful suspicion to wound her peace," he replied. "I am truly happy," he added, tenderly, "in my home, in my station among the princes of the tribes, in my family, and, above all, in the priceless treasure of my wife; and if this single drop of bitterness put there by my own hand remain in my cup, shall I not drink it? shall I not pray that it may purify and ennoble my heart, and render me more anxious to merit the great blessings the Eternal hath heaped upon me! Shall I not strive by a life of forbearance and righteousness to atone for the evil I have done? And wilt thou not strengthen and assist this holy purpose, my Zillah?"

Tears filled the eyes of the gentle bride, and fell upon the hand of the husband as, in the fervor of speechless reverence and love, she pressed it to her lips, and held it to her throbbing heart.

HAPPY WOMEN.

A HAPPY woman! Is not she the very sparkle and sunshine of life? A woman who is happy because she can't help it, whose smiles even the coldest sprinkling of misfortune cannot dampen. Men make a terrible mistake when they marry for beauty, for talent, or for style; the sweetest wives are those who possess the magic secret of being contented under any circumstances. Rich or poor, high or low, it makes no difference; the bright little fountain of life bubbles up just as musically in their hearts. Do they live in a log-cabin, the fire-light that leaps up on its humble hearth becomes brighter than the gilded chandeliers in an Aladdin palace! Do they eat brown bread or drink cold water from the well, it affords them more solid satisfaction than the millionaire's pate de feis gras and iced champagne. Nothing ever goes wrong with them; no trouble is so serious for them, no calamity so dark and deep, that the sunlight of their smiles will not "make the best of it." Was ever the stream of life so dark and unpropitious that the sunshine of a happy face falling across its turbid tide would not awaken an answering gleam? Why, these joyous tempered people don't know half the good they do. No matter how cross and crabbed you felt, Mr. Grumbler—no matter if your brain is packed full of meditations on "afflicting dispensations," and your stomach with medicines, pills, and tonics, just set one of these cheery little women talking to you, and we are not afraid to venture anything that she can cure you. The long-drawn lines about the mouth will relax, the cloud of settled gloom will vanish nobody knows when, and the first you know you will be laughing. Why? That is another thing; we can no more tell you why, than we can tell you why you smile involuntarily to listen to the first bluebird of the season among the maple blossoms, or to meet a lot of yellow-eyed dandelions in the crack of a city paving-stone. We only know that it is so.

O these happy women! how often their slender shoulders bear the weight of burdens that would smite men to the ground! How we look forward through the weary day to their fireside smiles! How often their cheerful eyes see couleur de rose where we only behold charged clouds! No one knows, no one ever will know until the day of judgment, how much we owe to these helpful, hopeful, uncomplaining women.

APPEARANCES seldom ought to determine our judgment. When the honor, probity, or reputation of some one is the matter in question, it ought not to be pronounced without a thorough investigation of the subject; and in that case, suspicions are never certainties.

THOUGHTS SUGGESTED BY "MEMOIRS OF THOMAS HOOD."

BY DOROTHEA.

"We live in deeds, not words." This may be true of the majority of mankind, especially true in an age of politeness, when art is more powerful than nature, when words are dropped carefully as stepping-stones to personal popularity, or favor, or power; still, there are those whose words gush from their hearts, throbbing and sighing with their secret joys and griefs. These are they who move the world; their deeds become facts with us; we possess them in completion, we may proclaim their glory, we may participate in their effects, but not in their accomplishment. Words sink into the heart like raindrops, moistening and soothing, or like seeds which germinate into a larger growth. They are suggestions, inspirations. Who has not some talisman, word, or phrase on which hang clusters of good deeds? some witchery of speech which slants like a laughing sunbeam through the dust of life? Luminous words spring from a luminous heart, a heart which finds sunshine in dark places, which has "silver linings" for every cloud, a heart which has never learned to stifle its sweet influences, which in its own sorest need has a gem of consolation for its neighbors.

That Hood was blessed with such a disposition (as every reader of his works was convinced), the record of his private, inner life has confirmed. We turn from what he has done to what he was, and find the man nobler than his work. His life was as harmonious as his verses; the chord which in other lives sends forth jarring, fretful sounds, in him breathed only sadder strains of music. We come to him in sorrow, to have fragrant oil poured into the worn grooves of life; we come to him in weariness, for a heart-easing laugh, and though the sun still rises on our busy, plodding life, the bubbles of laughter blown from our brain, at his will, make all labor seem airy. What a gleaming wit was his! not scathing like Swift's, or piercing like Sidney Smith's, but a genial, rippling humor which enshrined every object in crystal. Always racked but never soured by pain, he was one of the choice spirits purified by fire, and brought into closest sympathy with all earth's suffering ones. In all his mirth, we catch an undertone of sadness, swelling at times into the most passionate pathos, as in his "Song of the Shirt." Few have ever come near that need which prays,

"But for one short hour!
A respite, however brief!
No blessed leisure for love or hope,
But only time for grief!"

How many hearts stifled for utterance found themselves pictured there? realized in their hopelessness a sympathy which had never before come to them save in dreams?

So lifelike is the agony that we shrink from it as from Rubens' suffering Magdalen; we cannot persuade ourselves that the one is a mere poem, as we cannot that the other is a picture; both seem like a vital presence.

What an exquisite charity runs through his life, which only his own words can express, as he had given to all dear ones, and all suffering ones. "Half" his "powers to eke their living out." Perhaps in the home relations of father and husband there were never more tenderness, love, and fidelity. What a rebuke to the prevailing gibes on marriage and domestic love is found in that beautiful union through which he and his wife seemed to mould each other out of all the dross of this world into harmony and perfectness. We turn from them, feeling that there are dearer treasures than gold, and that household gods are not childish phantoms. Literature, fame, honor were his; yet he suffered no rivals on her throne, and her lifelong devotion was well repaid by those touching words which bring the quick tear to every reader. "I was never anything, dearest, till I knew you, and I have been a better, happier, and more prosperous man ever since. Whatever befalls me, the wife of my bosom will have this acknowledgment of her tenderness, worth, excellence, all that is wifely or womanly from my pen."

Such words! Are they not worth volumes on the whole duty of husbands and wives? They bear the very fragrance of Paradise.

Truly he was one who thought of

"What we daily see
About our hearths—angels that are to be,
Or may be if they will; and we prepare
Their souls, and ours, to meet in happy air
A child, a friend, a wife, whose soft heart sings
In unison with ours, breeding its future wings."

We find in him that rare union of a fancy which caricatures even the misfortunes of life, with a provident care and lofty honor in the details of every-day business, and a Christianity not prone to words, but all-pervading and vital, a ray of the divine love, which he dispensed freely as God doth his sunlight. In all his suffering he was so far removed from pity, so self-sustained, that we have no tears for him, but rather join with him in weeping for others; but when he dies, then we murmur—

"He had kept

The whiteness of his soul, and thus men o'er him wept."

THE PICTURE ON THE WALL.

BY MRS. ANNA H. DORSEY.

THERE hangs a picture on my wall,
The picture of a face long dead,
That erst on me its brightness shed—
A fair young face with thoughtful brow,
And neck and arms like Alpine snow

When rosy sunsets on it fall.

And I sat alone at eventide—

When twilight gathers o'er the scene,
And thinner grows the veil between
Our yearnings and the quiet dead—
Until I hear soft footfalls tread

In measured cadence near my side.

And by the shadowy fitful light,
I see a flash of dimpled hauds,
And hair that falls in golden strands
Around fair temples veined with blue—
And eyes like violets wet with dew

Beam softly tender on my sight;

Then, when all thrilled with glad surprise

I watch the vision dawning there,

She issues from the silent air,

The smile upon her brow and lips

Undimmed by all that cold eclipse

That veiled the glory of her eyes.

Fain would I have my birdie stay!

But when, with rapture half-suppress,

I seek to lure her to my breast,

By fondly whispering o'er and o'er

The pet names that on earth she bore,

The angel vision fades away.

Then sad o'er memory's tear-washed strand

My thoughts five weary years retrace

To scenes that death can ne'er efface—

My darling's every look and tone,

Her sweet caress when day was done,

The soft clasp of her little hand.

Her questions quaint, the old-fashioned words

When of the better land we'd talk,

Its hills of light where angels walk—

Her glee, when through the window pane

The sunshine, like a golden rain,

Came with the song of summer birds!

O busy, pattering little feet!

That ever echoed on my ear

Like music tripping through the air!

O fondling arms and warm caress!
O bright head nestling on my breast,
In earnest converse low and sweet!

Her garments treasured through these years,
Her toys oft sprinkled with my tears;
Her empty pillow, and her books
So often coned with patient looks,
And a soft tress of golden hair:
And here, more tear-stained than the rest,
The little shoes she used to wear,
Laid off—for aye—with tender care,
As when some pilgrim leaves on shore
His shoon to ford some dark stream o'er,
To seek a clime more pure and blest.

These, with the picture hanging there,
And visions by my deep love stirred,
Are all that's left me of my bird;
All of her earthly part, I mean,
For well I know that, though unseen
By me, she lives in realms more fair,
Where God's eternal sunshine glows,
Stirring deep music in each soul,
Which forth ecstatic anthems roll.
Her shining feet those pastures tread
Where the dear Jesus's lambs are fed,
And where His little ones repose.

There, oft beside the golden sea
That laves serene that morning shore—
Her forehead bright with heavenly lore—
Her form to fair proportions grown—
She, with her angel-raiment on,
Lingers and fondly waits for me.
Birdie, I come! my weary feet,
By God's calm angel gently led,
Nearer death's silent river tread;
While far away o'er the misty tide
I see morn flash from the other side,
Where thou waitest with welcome sweet.

A SIMILE.

BY Z. Z.

DEEP in the shade a little brook
Goes rippling on its way;
A fair-haired child in a mossy nook
Is close by its side at play;

A little fleet of acorn cups
She launches on the tide,
And claps her hand in childish glee,
As swiftly on they glide.

A little way, and mossy stones
The babbling brook divide;
Those tiny barks unconscious sail
Without a hand to guide.

They strike the rocks—rebound—and then,
All trembling from the shock,
Some slowly glide adown the stream,
Some sink beside the rock!

Just so our plans are mimic barks
Upon life's stormy sea,
And all who 'scape the treacherous rocks
Are help'd, O God, by Thee.

AUNT SOPHIE'S VISITS.—NO. IX.

BY LUCY N. GODFREY.

"DEAR me, I am so tired!" gasped Gertie Stewart, as she threw herself upon the sofa in her mother's back parlor, without removing hat or shawl.

"But where have you left your Aunt Sophie?" asked her mother.

"Oh, she has gone up to her room. I do believe she is made of cast-iron. It is five blessed hours since she has had a chance to sit down, except in the omnibus, and just now she absolutely ran up that long flight of stairs, congratulating herself that there was time for a bath before dinner. O dear! It is enough to fatigue one to think of it." And Gertie lay wearily upon the cushions, with closed eyes, until her father's entrance partially aroused her.

"What is the trouble?" said Mr. Stewart, anxiously, as his daughter languidly raised her eyelids, and met his questioning glance.

"Nothing, only Gertie is over weary," said her mother. "But there goes the dinner-bell."

"Oh, please, mother, do have my dinner brought to me, for I am half famished, and I am sure I cannot sit up to eat."

"I guess you can try, if you are not too tired to be hungry," replied her father. "But how is this?" he continued, as Mrs. Laselle appeared, looking fresh and rosy. "I thought Sophie was going with you."

"And what makes you think I have not been all over the city?" said Mrs. Laselle. "You will find that I have collected an immense number of questions to ask you concerning things we have seen."

"But here is Gertie wearied to death, she says, and you as fresh as in the morning. Are you so much the stronger?"

"Hardly so," said Aunt Sophie, smiling. "I think Gertie will find that she is a long way from death by weariness, while I acknowledge that I am considerably tired."

"Well," said Gertie, as she slowly untied her bonnet, "I believe that Aunt Sophie moves through this world with less friction than other people. I am sure she has led me such a chase this forenoon as I never had before, and all the while no one could have suspected from her appearance that she was in any way hurried."

"I was in no haste," replied Mrs. Laselle:

"if I had been, we should probably have accomplished much less; but I am sorry, if I led you to overtax your strength, which I supposed equal to my own. May I partly atone for my mistake by assisting you to the dining-room, for that bell says Betty is impatient!"

Gertie's strength came suddenly, as, repulsing Aunt Sophie's proffered arm, she threw off her shawl, and bounded away to her place at table.

"So much for wearied to death," said Mr. Stewart, laughing. "I hope your vigor will not vanish as suddenly."

"I shall take care that it does not," was the reply, as the trio joined Gertie.

"But this fowl is done to a turn, and our cook always makes remarkably nice dressing," urged Mr. Stewart, as Aunt Sophie declined receiving anything from his side of the table.

"The appetizing smell would convince me of the fact without your words; but I have already tested Betty's skill in preparing moulded rice, and, thanks to my long walk, my stomach pleads for a hearty meal of it just now." As Aunt Sophie noticed Gertie's heavily laden plate, she ventured to remind her that her digestive powers shared her weariness, but her hint was not taken.

The conversation during the meal was very entertaining. Mrs. Laselle was animated by a desire to fix the pleasant sights she had seen in her memory, by conversing of them, and Mr. and Mrs. Stewart were flattered by her interest in their city, and ready, with lively little anecdotes of different localities, to give her all the pleasant associations she could have wished. As Gertie passed her plate for a second piece of the rich mince-pie, her father's attention was attracted to the fact that she was eating much more than usual.

"Truly," said he, "your walk did quicken your appetite. Mother used to say that when we were not too tired to eat our food would rest us. I think you will feel pretty brisk, this afternoon."

Aunt Sophie's face expressed her doubts, but she would not comment upon a mischief she could not hinder.

"Come, auntie," said Gertie, "do have a piece of pie with me; it is delicious. Please try it, for a whole dinner of rice is not to be thought of at our table."

"I beg to be excused. The rice, however, has not been my whole dinner; it has been richly spiced by lively repartees, and sauced by pleasant anecdotes. I am sure I shall find it satisfactory."

"I believe you are the one who should have requested your dinner sent to you," said Mrs. Stewart. "These viands must have been tempting to you, if you are really afraid to eat them. Next time you shall have your rice alone."

"Oh, please, don't threaten me with banishment from the family table; I should certainly get the dyspepsia thus."

"Well, I don't know anybody who would diet more cheerfully for its cure than you, auntie."

"I should not need to grumble, if I might have the satisfaction of snuffing your delicacies in the air, and of seeing you enjoy them; but, I fear me, I should make sad work of eating my appointed food alone. I remember reading the account, in the biography of good Amos Lawrence, of his sitting in his chamber with the meagre bit of the plainest food, which had been weighed out to him to provoke rather than to satisfy his appetite. I did not pity him so much for the small quantity or the poor quality of his food as for the abuse of his social nature he might well have avoided. It was indeed a sad pity that one with his genial, kindly nature should have lost all the pleasures of the table because disease had impaired his relish for the least of them."

"What!" said Mr. Stewart. "You would not say that the pleasures of appetite are the least we enjoy at table?"

"I think I am not principally indebted to my palate, as a general thing, and it is certainly common, if not fair, to judge other people by one's self."

"Why, I thought you enjoyed good eating as well as most of people. In phrenological language, your bump of Alimentiveness is large."

"It certainly is, I am happy to say. I do enjoy eating goodies just as well as Gertie; but my appreciation of them heightens my enjoyment in seeing my friends partake of them, while I have not lived all these years without linking multitudes of pleasant associations with nearly every dish. Thus I find, and I think you will upon consideration, that seeing others gratified and remembering old associations form much the larger portion of our delight, if we leave out of our deliberation the occasional intellectual feasts we may find in our table talk."

"You may be right; I never thought of the subject in this light before."

"Yet you have never been surprised when your wife has taken great pains to provide for you a favorite dish, to see that her pleasure has fully equalled your own, though she might not taste it herself; nor have you thought of her doubting your word, when you have brought to her some luscious fruit, with an assurance that you should enjoy seeing her eat it better than eating it yourself. Do not remembrances of such instances convince you that the palate may become a fruitful source of such enjoyment as the most dyspeptic invalid may share? As for the pleasures of association, I would not wonder if you have owed half the enjoyment you have found from that nicely-done turkey, to fancies of the thanksgiving dinners of childhood. I presume you were not aware of it, for our reasons do not take cognizance of half our feelings; but I am sure this has been the case with me, as I have really owed pleasure to the fowl, though I have not tasted it. My thoughts fly over the many times when I have partaken of roast fowl as food merely, to rest upon those family gatherings, at grandpa's table, which were anticipated with such eagerness, and enjoyed with such zest. Everything upon the table suggests bright recollections to me; and it would take a long time to trace all which enter into the feeling of pleasure I experience. The position of the bread-plate gladdens my fancy with pictures of my own family-table, and the loved circle about it; the giblet sauce reminds me of a dear friend, who is very fond of it; the cranberries are associated with some delicious ones which showed a neighbor's kindly feeling during my last illness. Most of all, this wholesome rice has spoken to me of a sweet young girl who first showed me how beautifully and gracefully one may diet. Cheerful self-denial may be praiseworthy, but it becomes really beautiful when it endeavors to conceal itself, by assuming the mantle of consideration for the happiness of others."

After dinner, Aunt Sophie withdrew to her room to finish a letter. Just as she was folding it, a hasty rap at the door was instantly followed by her sister's entrance. One glance at the face, upon which were written anxiety and perturbation, led Mrs. Laselle to inquire if Gertie were ill.

"O yes, she is terribly sick, and there is no one to go for the doctor or her father. O dear! I never did let both the maids go out at once but that something happened. What can I do? Do you suppose you could find Dr. Porter's office?"

"Perhaps so."

"Well, just follow this street to the second, which turns to the right, then—"

"But," interrupted Aunt Sophie, "must poor Gertie suffer without assistance till I can hunt up Dr. Porter?"

"O no, send the first physician you can find. O dear! do hear her groan. Perhaps she is dying—she thinks she is."

"No, she is not dying," said Mrs. Laselle, with a confidence which did much towards calming her excited companion, "and you and I must relieve her. Do you prepare some kind of an emetic instantly, while I go to her and see if anything else can be done."

Just after the operation of the emetic which Aunt Sophie had administered, a note of invitation was handed in.

"It is too bad," whispered Mrs. Stewart; "Gertie will be very much disappointed. We are all invited to Mrs. Howe to-morrow evening, to meet the celebrated author and traveller Gertie admires so enthusiastically. Mrs. Howe has been expecting him for some time, and has promised Gertie an opportunity to hear him converse. He has just arrived, and now the poor child will lose the long-anticipated treat."

"But why need she?"

"Why? You don't think she will be able to go out again this week, do you?"

"I certainly shall be disappointed if she does not go to-morrow evening. You had better tell her now of the invitation, and see if that does not make her realize that she is something more than a little easier."

"You may tell her if you think best, but it seems to me it would be quite as well to say nothing of it till the time shall be past; that is, unless she should be a great deal better."

"Trust to my judgment this once," said Aunt Sophie, as she took the note from her sister's hand, and stepped into Gertie's room.

"Well, little one, how are you now?" she said, cheerfully, as she smoothed the disordered hair.

"I am somewhat easier," was the languid reply. "Has any one gone for the doctor yet?"

"Why, you don't want to see the doctor, do you?"

"I suppose I shall have to take his medicine to get well, shall I not?"

"No, not this time, for I have something here which will do you more good than any potion he could prepare for you; can you guess what it is?" Aunt Sophie saw, by the light in Gertie's eye, that her interest was awakened, so she bade her read the note. When Mrs. Stewart came in, a few moments later, she was surprised to find them engaged in an animated conversation.

Gertie was magically better; ready, indeed, at her aunt's suggestion, to don her double dress and go into the parlor, where she again reclined upon the sofa, when her father came in. She sprang up hastily, exclaiming—

"Oh, papa, Mr. T—— is at Mrs. Howe's, and we are to go there to-morrow evening. Are you not delighted?"

"Not sufficiently so to go into ecstasies about it," said Mr. Stewart, in an indifferent tone.

"Why, father! how can you be so careless about seeing him? I thought you admired his writings ever so much."

"And so I do, and should be quite as much delighted as you can be, if I were to be assured that I might meet him familiarly, and often, for any long period; but I have seen too many distinguished men made silent by uncongenial companions to anticipate much from one evening's companionship. It is excessively annoying to look for diamonds and find only charcoal; and hardly less so to watch for the scintillations of genius, and see nothing but the froth of stupidity."

"But, father, Mr. T—— can never be stupid!"

"Perhaps not, but it will amount to nearly the same thing to us, if he happen to have a headache, be over-weary, or if he finds no one to whom he cares to make himself agreeable. Will it not, Sophie?"

"I know," replied Mrs. Laselle, "that sensitive souls are very apt to hide themselves in their clay caskets in mixed company; but if Mrs. Howe have no guests save ourselves to-morrow evening, we shall have a rare treat. At all events, Gertie is sure of the pleasures of anticipation; let us not deprive her of those."

"But, if she expects so much, will she not be more likely to be disappointed?"

"Hardly so, I think. If Mr. T—— be sufficiently interested to be interesting, his conversation will borrow a brilliancy from the flashes of his eye and the tones of his voice which shall make it so far exceed anything she has ever read from his pen that her anticipations will be more than realized; if, on the contrary, he shall prove dull and abstracted, these anticipations will be none the less real sources of pleasure to-day. There is a deal of happiness to be found in building air-castles, and no harm done, if they do tumble about one's ears, provided the rubbish is not heavy with selfishness."

Just then Mrs. Stewart entered with a teatray and napkins, thinking to have Gertie take her tea alone. Mr. Stewart was much surprised, having heard nothing of Gertie's illness. His wife gave a graphic representation of her daughter's severe but transient suffering, and concluded by saying—"I am sure that I had no idea of her getting up quicker than she did after eating of that lobster last spring."

"Well, if she really is up after two hours, instead of two weeks of suffering, I should advise her to follow her physician's prescriptions for the present," replied Mr. Stewart. "How is it, Sophie? Shall she eat here or go to the table, and enjoy the fixings you told us about this noon?"

"Just as she chooses about that," replied Mrs. Laselle; "but I would advise her to allow her stomach to rest mostly to-night. Indeed, she had better retire soon after tea, for, after the exercise she has taken and the pain she has borne, her system greatly needs quiet, that it may recover its tone. And you know, Gertie," she continued, addressing her niece, "that you have a powerful motive for trying to get your full strength; you will want all your wits about you to appreciate Mr. T——."

After they had partaken of the cheerful meal, and Gertie was quietly sleeping, Mrs. Laselle and her sister talked over the excitement of the afternoon. Mrs. Stewart had been accustomed to depend wholly upon a physician whenever the health of any of her family had been impaired. When Aunt Sophie realized her lack of physiological knowledge, she was not surprised to hear that Dr. Porter was in very frequent attendance upon some member of the family; she urged upon her sister the necessity of taking an interest in so important a subject, since the happiness and comfort of her family so greatly depended upon her care for their health. She referred her to various sources for the information she needed, and assured her that she would be far better able to successfully second the efforts of the physician when severe diseases should come, if she should acquaint herself with the laws and functions of the different physical organs sufficiently to avoid abusing them and to correct symptoms of slight disarrangement.

Then the conversation turned upon the influence of the mind upon the body. Here, too, Mrs. Laselle showed her sister an ample field for thoughtful care falling peculiarly within the province of woman. As that physician is ever most skilful who is able to look with an intelligent eye upon all the mental and moral influences which affect the state of his patient, so is that nurse his most able coadjutor who knows how to humor or restrain each idiosyncrasy of the invalid, so as to surround him with a cheerful, invigorating mental atmosphere. Mrs. Stewart had been surprised that Aunt Sophie had ventured to apply a mental stimulant to one so very ill as Gertie apparently was in the afternoon; but she was ready to acknowledge that the result had been most favorable. Thus she was very willing to believe that it was quite as essential that a nurse should know how and when to apply a mental stimulant as a blister or plaster. She eagerly asked how Aunt Sophie had learned all these things.

"Mostly by observation," replied Mrs. Laselle, "because I remember best that which I see or feel myself; but my reading furnishes its quota of valuable information, which I am ready to use when there is an opportunity."

"Ah, but your observation has been more extensive than mine; I very rarely see anything worth remembering."

"Perhaps you do not look in the right direction. One's own feelings are, after all, the best teachers, since it is only by realizing those that we learn sympathy with the emotions of other people, and you would scarcely allow that mine are more easily aroused or more intense than yours. Let me tell you of the trifling incident which gave me the lesson I applied to Gertie's case this afternoon, and you will see that we need not look beyond the little events of life to gain much instruction. One day, during my eleventh summer, as mother was preparing to go out, I begged permission to go, as I had frequently done, to tend a neighbor's baby. Leave was readily granted, for Mrs. Joy had assured mother that I really assisted her, and I skipped away to see little Lulu clap her pretty dimpled hands at me. Mrs. Joy was very glad to see me, for baby had been fretty all the morning, and she had company to entertain.

"'Johnnie has made a swing in the barn; perhaps you would like to sit in that and hold sissy,' she said, kindly, as she noticed my timid glance at her visitors. She went out and helped me into the swing, and placed the baby in my arms. I enjoyed the gentle swinging very much, and so did Lulu. I had been there some half an hour, talking and singing to the little one, when Johnnie came in.

"'Oh, Sophie, I will swing you grand high!' he exclaimed, as he came up behind and gave me a push. Before I had time to speak we were up; but the rope broke, and down we came. I was quick enough to clasp my arms about the little one, so as to wholly save her from harm; but she was frightened, and screamed. Mrs. Joy came running out, caught her child from me, without listening to my assurance that she was not hurt, and, with a reproachful glance at me, and very many tender expressions to her 'dear, precious little baby, that ma had left to be abused so,' she left me to carry my bruised self home as best I could. I felt very bitterly towards her then, for I knew I had done the best I could, and I thought I was dreadfully hurt in protecting Lulu. I had not tried to save myself at all, and, falling as I had done, our united weight upon the hard plank floor, had bruised my side and shoulder, and jarred me all over. I lay sobbing for a few moments; I thought I could not get up, but Johnnie's kind voice roused me. He wanted to help me, and I thus found that I could help myself. I limped home, but mother was still away, and Peggy was too busy to mind much about me. She emptied the camphor-bottle over my shoulders and back, completely saturating my clothes; then saying I was dreadfully hurt, but I could only lie still till mother should come, she helped me on to the bed, and left me to think and suffer alone. Oh, how I longed for mother! I was afraid that I should not live till she should come home. As I lay there on my back, I could not, or at least I did not, breathe naturally. I was sure I was dying. I thought of all the corpses I had ever seen, and it seemed so terrible that I must be buried up in the cold ground for the rain to fall on. Then I sobbed as I thought how badly mother would feel, and how much father and the other children would miss me. But I need not dwell on those thoughts; they were terribly real to me then, though I found a bit of satisfaction in knowing that Mrs. Joy would be sorry, when she should see me dead, that she had looked cross at me, when I did not deserve it.

"I had said my prayers till I was a little calmer, but no better or more hopeful, when my little friend Katie Roby came in. Her mother had given her permission to go after thimble-berries that afternoon, if I might go with her. She said she knew a place where there were lots of them. The moment my fancy was filled with pictures of the pleasant berries strung upon long grasses, there was no room for the thoughts of death which had occupied it. When, after Katie had told me the road we were to go, and the flowers we should find by the way, I next thought of my own feelings. I was somewhat astonished to find that I could not only breathe quite well, but could move myself easily. I had concluded that I should be well enough to go after the berries when mother came home.

"After examining my bruises, she said that father would carry us to the place Katie designated, and we could walk home leisurely. We had a very pleasant afternoon, and, though we found no berries, those my imagination pictured have been of far more advantage to me than any which ever grew. Never since have I needed any outward stimulus to rouse me to throw off pain or its effects; for, when I suffer so acutely that I am disposed to think my life in immediate danger, that very association leads memory to whisper, 'Sophie, would you like to go after thimble-berries?' and the train of thought thus induced never encourages any merely nervous pains or imaginary weakness. Gertie has had a similar lesson this afternoon. Her emotions, while she thought herself dying, did not increase her pain, for its cause was really there, and no mental influence could have removed it. When she was relieved, that note was just the thing we needed to hasten her return to her natural cheerfulness. Her good sense will, I think, prevent a recurrence of so ill-judged an abuse of her stomach as to-day's; and I hope you will encourage her to gain such a knowledge of the physical needs of our nature as every true woman strives to attain. When the mothers of our land shall intelligently realize their responsibility in this matter, we shall no longer see so many of our finest natures crippled in their efforts to do good, by the want of that physical power which is as a right hand to the soul."

The visit of our friends at Mrs. Howe's fully equalled Gertie's bright anticipations. Indeed, it was an evening to be long and joyfully remembered by all those to whom she delightedly listened. Each mind seemed to waken and electrify the others, till each was astonished at the mental power which, for the time, blessed him.

It closed its wings in endless night.

CHAPTER VIII.

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS OF THE SICK-ROOM.

Her length of sickness, with what else—
Importeth thee to know this bears.

SHAKESPEARE.

EARLY the next morning Mary peeped into Edith's room, and, seeing her awake, entered, in her night-gown, with her little stockingless feet thrust into slippers which, to use Martha's figurative style of speech, were a mile too large for her.

"Good-morning, Miss Edith. How long have you been awake?"

"Not long, dear," replied Edith. "But you must not stand there, for you will take cold; the mornings are very chilly."

"I'll go back directly, and get into bed again, for none of the white folks are up. I just thought I'd peep in and see if you looked comfortable," replied Mary, beginning to shiver.

"Come into my bed, Mary," said Edith.

"O no, Miss Edith! I might hurt your foot."

"No fear of that, my dear, if you are careful. Come." And the slight, trembling form was nestled close beside her.

"Matty is sound asleep; and won't she be surprised when she wakes up and finds me gone, for she always gets up first?" said Mary, in a confidential whisper. And then, after a moment of deliberation, she put her lips to Edith's, and said: "I love you very much, Miss Edith; and I am so sorry that your foot got hurt, and I hope it will get well right soon."

Edith kissed the blushing cheek of the timid girl, who was shrinking away as though frightened at her own boldness. "I am very glad, dear Mary, that you love me, for you remind me of my sister Gracy, and I like you to put your arms around my neck as she used to do."

"Do you? Do I? I mean, do you like my arms around your neck? Miss Hannah used to say that it was too familiar. And do I look like Gracy?"

"Yes. No," said Edith, smiling at Mary's eagerness and look of delight. "I mean, I love you very much, and it pleases me, when I am so far from my friends, to have you remind me of my sister by your affectionate ways. And no, you do not look like Gracy, for she has light hair and blue eyes, and these curls of yours, dear, are a chestnut-brown. But Martha is awake"—as the sound of yawning proceeded from the next room.

"Yes, I am awake, almost," said Martha, coming into the room, still gaping, and with her eyes half shut. "What are you doing there, puss? Now, out of it, quick! You'll hurt Miss Edith's foot, and then papa'll scold."

"Indeed, Matty, papa never scolds; I'm sure you'll make Miss Edith think he is a real bear. And I don't hurt her foot at all, do I, Miss Edith?"

"You haven't touched it yet," said Edith. And Mary gave her sister a triumphant look.

"Has the inflammation all gone?" asked Martha.

"I think not, Matty; my foot and ankle were very painful all night."

"Didn't you sleep the whole night?" asked Martha, rubbing open her eyes with one doubled up hand, while the other rested on her fat side.

"No, dear. Aunt Cilla bathed my foot several times, and I expect I was a little nervous, for I did not get asleep till near morning."

"And then puss woke you up, didn't she?"—elevating her eyebrows at Mary.

"I had been awake some time when she came in," said Edith. And then, noticing Matty's bare feet, she exclaimed: "Go and dress yourself, Matty; I cannot allow you to stand in the cold with only your night-gown on."

"Here comes Aunt Cilla with some cold water to bathe your foot again; I'll just wait and see how it looks."

"Put a shawl on, right straight, Miss Matty, or you sha'n't see de foot at all," said Aunt Cilla, peremptorily. And, setting down the basin, she brought a shawl herself, and threw it over her young mistress's shoulders.

"O my, how it's swollen!" And, "Put your feet together, Miss Edith, and let us see the difference," exclaimed the girls, as Aunt Cilla removed the bandages.

"Now, ain't dat a purty foot, honey?" said

Aunt Cilla, with an admiring glance towards the right one, as Edith put it outside of the coverlet. "Not much bigger dan your own, honey, and I allers thought dem de tiniest, whitest little uns in de world. Put yourn here, Miss Mary; right down dar, side of dat un."

"Look at mine," said Martha, sitting down in the easy-chair, and putting her own up on the bedside.

"Dem's pincushings, honey." And they all laughed at the contrast between these two short, fat, pink feet of Martha's, and those of Edith and Mary, so slender and almost marble white.

"De born image of your mamma's chile! Poor missus! she allers had such bodder a-git-in' shoes; neber could git none to fit; and den, 'long side de nat'ral bodder, she had de rheumatiz," said Aunt Cilla, replacing the bandages, and heaving a sigh at the recollection of her departed mistress's troubles. "Now, honeys, run and dress yoursels, I hear Ned in yer room; and I'll red up dis room a bit, fur I 'spect young massa 'll come in, right arter Miser War gwines away, to 'xamine de lame foot. Take off dat ar' cap, Miss Eden, fur you don't look so like sick folks when you have yer har combed up and de cap under de piller. Nelly 'll fix your har arter de young ladies am dressed; she's a hand at dat bizness."

"If you will give me my combs and brushes, and that little glass, I will dress it myself," said Edith.

"Notting ob de kind, Miss Eden! 'Tain't in reason dat yer should go for to sile yer hands, when dat Nell hain't got notting to do but to wait on folks."

"But I have always been accustomed to wait on myself, Aunt Cilla, and I prefer to dress my own hair," insisted Edith.

"Massa told me to tend to yer wants while yer stayed with us, but dese ole fingers hab lost der cunning dat dey used to hab when I tended to de wants ob missus' head; and, 'side de har-dressing, I 'll do eberyting else." Opening the door, she asked Martha to "send Nelly to fix Miss Edith's head, when she was done with her;" and Edith thought it best not to raise any more objections at present, resolving, however, to dispense with both Aunt Cilla's and Nelly's services as soon as her foot would allow her to walk about her room and wait on herself.

"Neber saw such har, Miss Eden," said Nelly, as she drew out the comb, and let the long black mass fall over the pillow. "I ain't 'custoned to trim such heads, and don't know as I can git dis loop up tasty, but I'll try." And she twisted and wound it around the comb, trying in vain to make it look "tasty," until Edith told her, if it was smooth, that would be sufficient. At length, her toilet was completed, and, bidding Nelly throw open the blinds, Edith rested her head on the scarlet cushion with which Aunt Cilla had propped her up, and which, it cannot be denied, was exceedingly becoming to her oriental style of beauty.

Immediately after breakfast Martha and Mary entered Edith's room, with their hands behind them and their faces wreathed in smiles.

"Which do you like best, Miss Edith?" they both exclaimed, stopping before they reached the bed.

"That is rather a delicate question," said Edith, smiling.

"We mean, whose hands do you like best? We have something in our hands, and you must choose, and whichever you say, that you shall have first," said Mary, laughing and shaking herself, and thereby revealing some flowers in her own hand.

"I think I'll take Mary's hand."

"Medicine!" "Flowers!" they laughed out, holding up a bouquet of lovely flowers, yet wet with the dew, and a bottle of medicine.

"Mr. Ward picked them himself, and told me to give them to you," said Mary, handing Edith the bouquet; "he said it would be a relief to your eyes to look at something besides the objects in your room."

"And papa sent the arnica: thought it would be a relief to your foot, I reckon," said Martha, placing the bottle on the table.

"I am much obliged for both," said Edith, examining the flowers, of which she was passionately fond. "These are lovely. I am afraid Mr. Ward robbed some of Uncle Sigh's plants."

"Oh, no, indeed! Uncle Sigh always gives him a bunch every time he comes here, and was going to pick some, when Mr. Ward told him that he would pick them himself."

"Your papa must have a medicine chest, Matty; he seems to have everything just when it is wanted. Has he not one?"

"Yes, Miss Edith, but he had no arnica, and sent over to Mr. Dudley's plantation for it last evening."

At that moment, a step sounded in the hall, and Mr. Ellis stood in the doorway.

"Come in, papa!" said Mary; then, laughing, she pointed at Edith and said, "See, she likes the flowers best!"

"I am not surprised at that," said her father, giving a glance at the flowers, and then looking at the beautiful face bending over them. "Good morning, Miss Edith; how did you rest last night?"

"Very well," replied Edith, somewhat confused.

"She never slept one bit until near morning, for she told me so," said Martha, abruptly.

"Was your foot so painful?" asked Mr. Ellis.

"It was very painful during the greater part of the night, but became easier towards morning."

"I think the side of the foot is sprained as well as the ankle," said he, removing the bandages. "I was fearful, when I removed your gaiter, that the ligaments were torn, but they are only badly strained. Ah, yes, the inflammation has subsided somewhat, and by applying this arnica it will be kept down. The bruises will appear in a day or two, and you must not let Aunt Cilla alarm you by mistaking the blackness for mortification," said he, bathing the foot and ankle freely with the arnica.

"I think I should know the difference," returned Edith, with a smile. "Aunt Cilla is a very kind, attentive nurse; but—"

"A very loquacious one," interrupted Mr. Ellis.

"Not so much so as to annoy me," answered Edith. "I think I rather like to hear her talk, for it keeps my mind diverted."

"Now, what do you wish me to send you from the library?" said Mr. Ellis, rising from his chair.

"Miss Edith, won't you let me read to you?" asked Mary, with an eager face, before Edith had time to answer her father's question.

"Certainly, my dear, if you would like to do so."

"What book shall I bring?"

"Any that pleases you; select one of your own favorites," replied Edith.

"Matty," said Mr. Ellis, "do you wish to go into the garden with me?"

"Yes, sir, I'll go; but I wouldn't disturb Miss Edith if I stayed here," said Matty, divining her father's reason for asking her.

"No, Matty, you do not disturb me in the least; on the contrary, I like to have you here," Edith hastened to say, fearing that Matty's feelings had been wounded by the implication that Mary was the most judicious one to leave in the room.

"I'll go with papa to the garden awhile, and then I'll come and sit with you, after Mary has done reading aloud," answered Martha, with a gratified smile.

"You did not ask me to call again," said Mr. Ellis, as he was about to leave the apartment. He spoke in a playful tone, and as he looked back at Edith, his countenance wore that indescribable expression which occasionally illuminated his handsome face, dispelling its gravity, and lending to it such a peculiar charm.

"It was not necessary," she replied, slightly coloring; "a physician is never invited to call upon his patient; he is expected to do so."

"Then you may expect a professional visit from me this afternoon—after dinner;" and bowing, he left the room with the two girls.

In a few moments, Mary returned with a handsomely bound volume of Waverley in her hand.

"I have brought 'Kenilworth,' Miss Edith; have you ever read it?"

"Yes, long ago; but I would like to hear it read, my dear," replied Edith.

"I began it two or three weeks ago, and read a few chapters, but I will begin at the very beginning, so that we can enjoy it together," said Mary, opening the book.

"How far did you read, dear?"

"Let me see!" said Mary, knitting her brows as she turned over the leaves.

"I read to where Amy's father sent for her, and she would not go with Tressilian, and he and Varney almost got into a quarrel. I don't think I am going to like that Varney, somehow or other; I expect he will be the villain in the story. You know, Miss Edith, every story has to have a villain; and then Leicester sent Amy a necklace; that is as far as I read."

"Commence the fifth chapter, Mary. I remember all that is contained in the preceding chapters."

"Wasn't it funny that the reading of 'Cumnor Hall' should have made Scott write this book?"

'The dews of summer night did fall;
The moon, sweet regent of the sky,
Silvered the walls of Cumnor Hall
And many an oak that grew thereby.'

I read about that in the introduction. Now I will begin, Miss Edith." And, sitting back comfortably in the easy-chair, Mary commenced and read for some time, pausing occasionally to make some remark on the character of Varney, whom she obviously considered capable of the most atrocious crimes; to laugh at the surprise and delight of the countess and her maid Janet, when first introduced into the splendid apartments prepared without their knowledge in the mansion which was nothing more nor less than Amy's prison-house; and to look ahead a little to see if Leicester was soon coming to his lonely countess, hoping all the while that he would not turn out bad, after all.

When Martha returned, so absorbed was Mary in the book that she did not look up, but continued reading without noticing her sister's entrance. Edith smiled and motioned to Martha to be seated, and, sitting down by the window, after a few restless moments her attention became fixed, and she listened with as much interest as Mary read.

The reading was not interrupted until Aunt Cilla came into the room for the purpose of bathing the foot; then Mary drew a long breath, and closing the book asked what o'clock it was. "Oh, Aunt Cilla, it can't be so late!" she exclaimed, doubtingly, when told that the clock had struck twelve.

"Yes, indeed, honey, it am, sartin; de horn done blowed fur de servants' dinner."

"I've been reading three hours; but isn't the book interesting, Miss Edith? Don't you like it, Matty?"

"Yes, almost as well as Robinson Crusoe. I want to know what became of Amy, and if the earl took her to court. I'd have taken her there, just out of spite, to let that red-headed old queen see how handsome she was! But wasn't Leicester mean to leave her in that big house alone with Tony Foster and Janet?" said Mary, looking very indignant, her voice considerably raised under the influence of her feelings, and forgetting for the moment that her own hair verged on the "last rays of the May-day sun," as well as Queen Elizabeth's.

"But, Matty," said Mary, who seemed disposed to take the part of the Earl of Leicester, he having evidently made a favorable impression on her mind, "I am sure the earl wanted to have her with him all the time, but you know that he had married her without the queen's permission, and she had such a horrid temper that as like as not she would have imprisoned Amy, and had all her teeth pulled out to spoil her beauty."

Martha still seemed suspicious of the noble earl, notwithstanding her sister's animated if not able speech in his defence, and Mary appealed to Edith to confirm what she had said.

"Just tell us why he left her in Cumnor Hall while he was playing beau to Queen Elizabeth! that's what we want to know, Miss Edith," said Martha.

"I will explain as well as I am able, my dear," said Edith. "In the first place, he had, as Mary observed, married Amy Robsart secretly, without her father's knowledge or the queen's permission, and it was necessary, therefore, to keep her in retirement until a favorable opportunity offered for revealing his marriage; and while his visits were frequent, she was reconciled to the seclusion, and patiently waited till he should present her to the world as his countess. But Leicester was a great favorite of the queen, who, it was thought, wished to make him her husband, and he knew that she would be very angry when she discovered that he had deceived her, and the favors which she had heaped upon him he expected would be withdrawn. Being a very ambitious man, this dread of the queen's displeasure and fear of the consequences caused him to delay the announcement of his marriage, until, finally, he was obliged to confess it in order to save—but I am telling the whole story," she said, laughing. "Do you understand now why the earl left his countess in the manor-house while he was at court?"

"Yes, Miss Edith, I do," answered Martha, not one whit the less indignant; "he liked his place beside the queen better than he loved his wife; so he was mean, after all."

"Pity if he was mean," said Mary, the word mean expressing everything unworthy, "for he was so handsome, and Amy loved him so much;" and she opened the book, and prepared to resume the reading.

"No, Mary," said Edith, checking her, "you have read quite enough for to-day. You have been sitting still quite long enough; you had better run down stairs now, and take some exercise before dinner."

"It's too warm, Miss Edith," said Mary, not wishing to relinquish the book.

"Perhaps Miss Edith will allow you to read after dinner," said Martha, looking rather doubtful, however.

"Positively no more to-day, my dear," said Edith, decidedly, and the two girls went out of the room saying that they would go into the garden and find their father, and ask him what he thought of Kenilworth. The words "Tressilian," "Varney," "Amy," "Mean," "Leicester," &c. reached Edith's ear as they ran down stairs, and she smiled at the interest Martha evinced in the story, and at her acknowledgment that it pleased her almost as well as Robinson Crusoe.

Mr. Ellis's professional visit after dinner was rather longer than the nature of the case demanded. He was talking about his daughters, a subject, of course, of peculiar interest to him, and in discussing their past, present, and future, he lingered rather longer than Aunt Cilla seemed to think altogether proper; but the hints she—taking advantage of the pauses—threw out, such as “I does wonder whar de young missuses is?” and “Reckon Miss Eden wants to gwine to sleep, don’t you, honey?” did not have the desired effect, for Mr. Ellis seemed to be totally oblivious of the fact that the well-meaning housekeeper was probably neglecting her work to remain in the room “while de young marsa was dar, so as nobody shouldn’t scandalize.”

He laughed as he spoke of the discussion between his daughters, at the dinner-table, relative to the merits and demerits of the Earl of Leicester, and said, in answer to a question from Edith, “I do not object to their reading Scott’s works, though, as a general thing, I do not approve of their reading works of fiction at so early an age, when their minds should be given almost wholly to their studies. But when read occasionally, and under the eye of a judicious person, I think that works like the Waverley Novels are beneficial, not only as a recreation to the mind, but on account of the beauty and easy flow of language which distinguish all of Scott’s writings, and which I have an idea that young persons insensibly glide into the use of by becoming familiar with it in reading. I am pleased to have them read aloud,” he continued, “and should have encouraged them in doing so myself, but their mother had an unconquerable aversion to hearing a person read aloud, and even the reading of the lessons in the Episcopal service made her nervous. Mary used sometimes to read to me in the library, but her mother usually occupied the sitting-room, and I found that it annoyed her so much that we at last gave it up, and since her death I have sadly neglected them, allowing Mary to go off by herself and read, while Martha has passed her time since Miss Hannah went away in riding horseback, and amusing herself on the Indian mound, which she called an island, bringing children from the quarter to inhabit it, and getting furious at Uncle Sigh when he has ventured to interfere with her ‘savages.’ She never seemed to have any taste for books, and I am rather surprised at the interest which Kenilworth seems to have awakened; if encouraged, it may engender a taste for history, as most of Scott’s characters are historical.”

Aunt Cilla was standing beside the bed, preparing fresh linen for Edith’s foot; and when Mr. Ellis mentioned the singular dislike of his wife to hearing a person read, she ejaculated, as if offering an excuse for her departed mistress, “So narvous, so terribly narvous!”

The days glided quietly and uneventfully by. Mr. Ellis’s visits became more frequent as Edith was able to sit up, and however dull she might feel, the dulness rapidly vanished when his pleasant face appeared at her door, and he smiled at her blushing welcome. The readings continued to take place every morning, and when they had followed poor Amy Robsart through her sad fortunes they commenced the “Queens of England,” which proved quite as interesting to the girls as the fascinating pages of Kenilworth.

Selim was not brought out quite so often to gallop on the hills with his young mistress; the Indian mound was less frequented, and the little “savages” at the quarter asked in vain for “Miss Crusoe,” as they called Matty when playing on their island. She had become more subdued in her manners, though she had not lost any of her independent ways, and the lofty expression of her countenance was not abated one jot; but her voice had become more gentle, and her speech more refined, and there was a very perceptible change for the better in the style of her toilet. Her hair was carefully plaited and bound with ribbons; the old calico sacques had been discarded, and the capes of her dresses had taken their place, and her shoestrings no longer tripped her up, but were neatly tied around her ankles. Mr. Ellis remarked the change with pleasure, and one day, when Martha entered Edith’s room looking particularly neat, he said, as he drew her towards him, “Matty, I know of nothing that has given me so much real pleasure of late, as the improvement in your personal appearance; and now, my child, if you value the compliment at all, just share it with Miss Edith, for I am sure it is she who has been teaching you that ‘cleanliness is next to godliness.’”

It was two weeks after the accident that the declining sun threw its last rays across a letter which Edith held in her hand as she sat at her window looking out with thoughtful eyes upon the lawn. The letter was from her mother, and this was the third time it had been read and pondered over.

After giving in detail all the little incidents of home-life, every one of which Edith read and re-read, smiled or sighed over in a manner which contradicted the opening statement of the letter, that nothing of interest had occurred at the farm since she left home. Mrs. Stanford added a few items of “town news.” A new star had appeared suddenly on the horizon of B—— society a few days after Edith's departure, dazzling every one with its splendor, and making all those bodies which had been considered as luminaries appear dim and insignificant, and, shooting meteor-like into that part of the firmament where the greatest number of satellites revolved, it had drawn them into its own orbit, thereby creating the greatest consternation and dismay among all other stars both great and small.

In other words, a niece of Mrs. Richards, returning home to New York, after a tour through the Canadas, had stopped at the lovely village of B——, and, pleased with the quiet beauty of the place, she had prevailed on her friends to leave her with her aunt, promising to return, under the escort of her uncle, to her city-home in October. A few evenings after her arrival, she attended a soiree with her aunt, when her loveliness and unequalled musical performance had made her the bright particular star of the evening. Invitations followed in rapid succession, for it was understood that her stay was limited; and, at the time Mrs. Stanford wrote, nightly soirees were being given for this young stranger, whose brilliant beauty was the theme of every tongue.

"You once told me," wrote Mrs. Stanford, "that you did not believe that the principle of constancy in attachments ever existed in Charles Howard's nature; and, since you are so skeptical on that point, you will not be much surprised to learn that he is Miss Acton's constant attendant and—I have been told—her avowed admirer."

Had Mrs. Stanford been present, Edith, no doubt, would have felt strongly tempted to use the old lady's triumphant expression, "I told you so!" or, "I knew it!" She was not surprised at Charles Howard's worshipping at another shrine in less than a fortnight after his separation from the divinity whom he had professed to adore, and before whom, but a short time previous, he had knelt and pleaded so earnestly to be allowed to hope that she would look with favor upon his suit; but she did marvel that it awakened no other feeling in her breast save that of contempt for so fickle a nature, and she doubted if she knew her own heart when she told her mother that she loved him; and she wondered if she had mistaken for love a feeling of gratified vanity at the acknowledged preference of a person so talented, handsome, and wealthy.

"Then why did my heart throb more quickly and my cheek burn at his approach?" she asked herself. "It certainly could not have been love, or I would not feel this utter indifference at the transfer of his affections. Not even a feeling of wounded pride is aroused. I did not love him; I was merely fascinated while in his presence, like the bird under the eye of the charmer, whose influence is gone as soon as his eye is withdrawn. I am thankful that, while under the spell, I gave him no encouragement. But"—and the thought dyed her cheek and brow—"perhaps I am condemning him for what I myself am guilty of; though it is a lady's privilege to change her mind when by so doing she breaks no promise or vow, and I certainly never wilfully encouraged him to believe that I entertained for him any warmer sentiment than that of friendship. I, at least, have not withdrawn my affections to place them on another object." And the lovely lip curled with an expression as nearly approaching that of scorn as it could assume. Ah, Edith! was not that blush called forth by a feeling of wounded pride? Or is it the indignant blood that flushes your face as you think of the green grave in the churchyard so often watered by the widow's tears? Neither. What, then? I see! A noble form that, pacing so slowly up the lawn! and how carelessly the eyes are raised to your window! and with what easy grace the noble head is bent! He has disappeared, but the bright color is still on your face and the soft light in your eye. Did those blushes never give encouragement to another? Was that brightness in your eye never mistaken for the love-light? Acquitted of wilfully giving encouragement to any, but guilty! By all that's fickle in man's nature, I pronounce you, Edith Stanford, guilty of inspiring the heart of Charles Howard with hope and confidence, even as you are now doing that of Mr. Ellis; yes, I repeat, Mr. Ellis, for remember that a fortnight or three weeks of daily companionship with a person of congenial disposition is more prolific of feelings akin to love than a year of occasional, ceremonious visiting.

Repulse the thought as you may, that his attentions are something more than mere acts of civility, or courtesy to his daughters' governess; blush when you consider that one brief year of mourning for his departed wife has not yet expired; that the commencement of his acquaintance with you is dated but three weeks back; and strive to forget the conclusions that you have been forced to draw from his increasing devotion, manifested by constant attention; and blush again at the humiliating thought that those conclusions are unmaidenly, premature. But the thought will steal back upon you, and the conclusions will be drawn, frightening you into a reserve and stiff dignity of manner foreign to the almost childlike simplicity of your character. But with what rapidity will that reserve vanish when, months hence, you watch together beside the sick-bed of the bright spirit of the household! and how you will reproach yourself for what will then seem to you to have been unnecessary coldness when you stand with him beside the yawning grave, and witness his anguish as his child is buried from his sight! And, still farther on, when you hear the sad news that the angel of death has spread his wings over your own home, and you are prostrated under a great grief, how you will then bless him for all those nameless acts of kindness—yea, for that love the incipient light of which is dawning on you now, alarming your maiden modesty, and prompting the resolution to avoid all unnecessary contact with him!

"Nobody but young massa, Miss Eden," said Aunt Cilla, as Edith started suddenly at the sound of footsteps on the stairs.

She was quietly folding up the letter when Mr. Ellis entered the room; and, with a very grave face, she said, without looking up, however, "I am glad to see you, Mr. Ellis, for I wish to ask you a question."

"How can you see me when your eyes are in another direction?" said he, smiling, and standing directly before her.

Her forefathers would not have felt much flattered at the epithets she was mentally bestowing on their blood coursing through her veins, and which seemed to have a decided tendency to her face, as if she were placed here for the purpose of blushing for their misdeeds.

"Is it a question of life or death?" he asked, seating himself in the chair which Aunt Cilla placed for him. "I judge it must be, from the serious expression of your face."

"It is a very important one, at least to me," she replied, shaking her head, and smiling.

"If so, it will require mature deliberation before I can venture to answer it; a week, at least, will be necessary."

"I think you will be able to answer it at once," she answered, more than half suspecting that he knew it already.

"Very well. Now for this important question." And he bent forward with an affectation of fixed attention.

"Can I commence my school work to-morrow?" she asked, abruptly.

"If you desire to do so, certainly."

She looked up in astonishment at his ready acquiescence, for she had expected opposition from the fact that she had not yet been down stairs, and, moreover, he had told her that she must not use her foot for a week, as it was not in a proper state to walk.

After a moment's pause, he asked, "Have you walked to-day?"

"I walked into the next room and through the hall," she replied.

"Why is it so important that you should commence school to-morrow?" he asked.

"I came here for the purpose of teaching, and I do not wish to be idle longer than is absolutely necessary," she replied.

"In other words," said he, rising from his chair, and standing with his hand resting upon the back of it, "you have been thinking of the two years in durance vile, and conclude that the sooner you commence your work the sooner it will be finished. Perhaps you fear that the time spent in idleness, as you are pleased to term it (you forget the readings, which have been so profitable to my daughters), will delay your return to your friends; permit me, Miss Edith, to assure you that I am not a hard master, requiring the uttermost farthing, but your two years in my employ commenced the day you left your home. If I have displayed over solicitude for your health, you must excuse it; but a sprain like that"—pointing towards her foot—"if not well cared for in the recovery, might injure the general health, and it would be unfortunate, certainly, if you were to experience any ill effects from the premature use of your foot; for illness is not very desirable at any time or place, least of all where there is no better nursing than Beech Bluff affords."

He stood before her in expectation of some reply; but she was so surprised to find her words so misconstrued, and so unprepared for the sudden change in his manner, that she could not at first speak.

After waiting a moment, he continued: "I judged that you were going to ask permission to walk in the garden, as you expressed a wish to that effect yesterday; and, knowing that the gravel and inequalities of the walk would be an obstacle to your doing so, I was prepared to utter a refusal—taking the liberty of a physician," said he, with the shadow of a smile on his flushed face.

"I am sorry, Mr. Ellis, that you have so misinterpreted my meaning," she at length said; and her voice, which was at first unsteady, became firmer, as she thought that he had done her an injustice in the motives he had attributed to her wish to commence school. "I am here as your daughters' governess, and it is very natural that I should wish to enter upon my duties as soon as possible, particularly as I discover that the girls are impatient to begin their studies; and since you have prohibited their bringing their books to my room, I feel that I ought to make an effort to attend to them in the school-room."

"It would require an effort, then?" said Mr. Ellis, with a significant smile.

Without noticing the interruption, she continued, "My general health is perfect, and since I can use my foot sufficiently to go about my room, I think I might make the attempt to go down stairs with Aunt Cilla's assistance, and without apprehending any ill effects to result from it either. If I were not satisfied that I could accomplish the journey without difficulty, I would not be so imprudent as to undertake it, for I should be very loth to be brought back to my room to draw more largely upon the attention and sympathy of my kind nurses, of whose unwearied kindness I am fully sensible, and only regret that I cannot express how much I appreciate it. I hope, Mr. Ellis, that you will not think that I look back upon the last two weeks as lost time, for I assure you that I value them for the close companionship that has existed between myself and the girls, and which has given me an insight into their characters that will enable me to adapt myself to their different dispositions, and thus discharge my duty more faithfully."

All embarrassment and timidity had disappeared from her manner, and she looked into his face with her full, dark eyes, and spoke earnestly, as if she wished to convince him that she was not so parsimonious of her time as he had supposed. Gazing into her upturned face for a moment, his stiff, formal manner relaxed gradually into its usual quiet dignity, and he said, in a very mild voice—though his face flushed, and the veins in his forehead became fuller as he spoke—"You must forgive me, Miss Edith: I was hasty, and my words were unkind, ungentlemanly, and I sincerely regret them. The school-room will be ready for you in the morning, since your strong sense of duty will not allow you another week for the better recovery of your foot, and your pupils will without doubt be glad to welcome you."

There was not the least bit of irony in his tone, but he spoke as if wishing to excuse himself for allowing her to undertake what he was convinced she was not able to perform—going up and down the long flight of stairs.

"Will you rest better now that this important question is decided?" he asked, with a return of his pleasant way, and the old, sweet smile.

"Perhaps so," she replied; and, with the accustomed "Well, good-night," he left the room, and no sooner had his footsteps died away than, leaning forward, and resting her head on the vacant chair before her, she burst into tears; and, forgetful of the presence of the old housekeeper, she exclaimed, "It was ungentlemanly and unkind to tell me in almost plain words that I had more solicitude about my salary than my health, that I thought I was losing time and money; and then to think me ungrateful for all the kindness they have bestowed upon me:" and the tears and sobs came thick and fast.

"Now, Miss Eden," said the kind voice of Aunt Cilla, "you'm bery foolish, for young massa didn't mean a ting, just noting at all; it only hurt his pride when he tot dat you wanted to take up school and get it ober as soon as you could, and git hum agin, jis as if dar wa'n't nobody here fit to shoshate wid, and 'sif you didn't like us. Now, honey, don't take on so, for massa's sorry, I knows by de big veins in his forehead, and he won't do it agin. You must git used to dese ways, Miss Eden." After waiting a moment, she discovered the letter in Edith's hand, and exclaimed, "It's dat letter, Miss Eden, I knows; not massa's words, arter all. You'm homesick, honey. Dat's what ale de chile, arter all, and dis bery to-morrow you must go out to ride, and git cheered up; I'll speak to—Miss Mattie about it," said she, checking herself as she was about to say "young massa."

Aunt Cilla was not far from the truth in thinking that Edith was homesick, for the feeling which had possession of her at that moment bordered more closely on homesickness than she was willing to acknowledge even to herself, and when Aunt Cilla mentioned the letter, a fresh burst of tears was her only response. Her thoughts made a pilgrimage to the dear old farm-house, and she fancied the inmates spending a quiet, pleasant evening together, while she, so far distant, was weeping in her chamber, with none to comfort her save the old negro servant; then her thoughts flew back again, and she no longer accused Mr. Ellis of unjustly thinking her ungrateful, but she chided herself for being so, as she remembered how the trio in her present home had by their united efforts made the two weeks of confinement to her room pass so pleasantly and rapidly away. She thought of their loving kindnesses, of the affection that was lavished upon her by the girls, and a smile mingled with the tears as she remembered how often the bright expression, which she liked so much, had been called to Mr. Ellis's face by her own happy, contagious laugh; of his invariable look of surprise—and, she had sometimes fancied, of regret—when warned of the lateness of the hour by the ringing of the bell for prayers, and the entrance of Aunt Cilla with the astral lamp, which always occurred simultaneously; of his pleasant “good-night, Miss Edith,” as he left her room, accompanied by the two girls. Then her thoughts travelled home again, and brought all her friends to Beech Bluff, and they were having an exciting time over sprained ankles, cold water, and arnica, when she was aroused by the voice of Aunt Cilla, exclaiming—

“Wake up, Miss Eden, it's nigh on to 'leven!” and she was surprised, when fully aroused, to find her tears all dried, and herself more inclined to smile than to weep. “Dat's right, honey; I'm glad to see yer own cheerful face agin. Now undress yerself, and get to bed, fur it's late, sartin,” said Aunt Cilla, exercising the authority of a nurse.

“Then I've really been asleep?” said Edith, interrogatively.

“Ob course you hab. You didn't snore, but I knowed by yer reg'lar breathing dat yer was sleepin'; and when yer didn't lif yer head to speak to the young missuses when dey kissed you, fore dey went into der own room, den I know'd it more so.”

While she was preparing for her couch, Edith arranged in her mind the hours for study and music lessons. “I must begin my work in earnest,” said she to herself; “my time belongs to my pupils now, and I must make it as profitable to them as possible. To-morrow I commence my governess life; no longer the idle recipient of favors, but an instructor, a laborer in a vineyard, placed here to train the vines in a manner that will be acceptable to my master;” the long hair is hastily bound up in the becoming little cap, and she turns from the reflection in the glass, and continues her meditations: “I must not allow my thoughts to dwell on any subject in such a manner as will cause me to neglect my duties or forget my pupils' interests. Since they are without a mother to counsel them, they must be my companions out of school hours, and I must watch over them, reproving whatever would be displeasing to a mother's eye, and encouraging in them everything good and noble.” Some pins were stuck into the cushion, and more resolutions were adopted. “They must be disciplined to habits of punctuality and neatness, which, if acquired at home, will spare them many a mortification and unhappy moment at their finishing school. How often I have pitied students at the seminary when sent from the school-room or dinner-table in disgrace for untidiness in dress, or tardiness in attendance, habits which had, without doubt, passed unobserved and unproved at home, but which Mr. Richards never tolerated in his school. Mary seems to have a strong, natural sense of propriety about her dress and deportment, and Martha is fast acquiring it.” A pause. “Aunt Cilla, will you draw off this stocking? How quickly his blood was up when he thought I doubted his generosity, and expected he would require me to remain two weeks over the stipulated two years! What a construction to put on my simple words! Who ever heard of a governess petitioning her employer to allow her to commence her work? And the result—a scene! I wonder if this would come under the head of shabby treatment? Put up the curtain, if you please, Aunt Cilla;” and, as the moonlight streams into the room, and the kind attendant closes the door, we will let the curtain fall, and leave Edith to her dreams.

COMING AND GOING.

BY WILLIE E. PABOR.

Coming and going, day by day,
Like tides upon the ocean;
Surging and flowing, far away,
And evermore in motion;
And more and more
Upon the shore .
The billows beat with sullen roar.

Coming and going, and men are
The bubbles on the current;
Dancing and glowing like a star
Above the swelling torrent;
And evermore
From off the shore
Come echoes of that sullen roar.

Coming and going; week on week
Goes by and leaves its story;
Writing and knowing few will seek
Its mood of grief or glory.
The echoes sleep
Within a deep
Whose Lethæan barrier few can leap.

Coming and going; let us then
Need what its passing teaches;
Saying and showing unto men
The one brief truth it preaches.
How short the span
Of life to man
To frame a blessing or a ban!

BROAD LINE DRAWING LESSONS.

THESE little figure pieces of animals, Figs. 107, 108, and 109, will be found profitable subjects, and will soon become very familiar and easy to the pupil. Fig. 110 is very simple, yet a good study.

WORK AND PLAY.

LET it here be remarked that recreation can be fully enjoyed only by the man who has some earnest occupation. The end of the work is to enjoy leisure; but to enjoy leisure you must have gone through work. Playtime must come after schooltime, otherwise it loses its savor. Play, after all, is a relative thing; it is not a thing which has an absolute existence. There is no such thing as play, except to the worker. It comes out by contrast. Put white upon white, and you can hardly see it; put white upon black, and how plain it is. Light your lamp in the sunshine, and it is nothing; you must have darkness round it to make its presence felt. And besides this, a great part of the enjoyment of recreation consists in the feeling that we have earned it by previous hard work. One goes out for the afternoon walk with a light heart when one has done a good task since breakfast. It is one thing for a dawdling idler to set off on an excursion, just because he is sick of everything around him; and quite another thing when a hard-wrought man, who is of some use in life, sets off, as gay as a lark, with the pleasant feeling that he has brought some worthy work to an end on the self-same tour. And then a busy man finds a relish in simple recreations; while a man who has nothing to do finds all things wearisome, and thinks that life is "used up;" it takes something quite out of the way to tickle that indurated palate; you might as well think to prick the hide of a hippopotamus with a needle as to excite the interest of that blasé being by any amusement which is not highly spiced with the cayenne of vice. And that certainly has a powerful effect. It was a glass of water the wicked old Frenchwoman was drinking when she said, "Oh, that this were a sin, to give it a relish!"

A NURSERY THOUGHT.

Do you ever think how much work a little child does in a day? How, from sunrise to sunset, the little feet patter round to us so aimlessly? Climbing up here, kneeling down there, running to another place, but never still. Twisting and turning, and rolling and reaching, and doubling, as if testing every bone and muscle for their future uses. It is very curious to watch it. One who does so may well understand the deep breathing of the rosy little sleeper, as, with one arm tossed over its curly head, it prepares for the next day's gymnastics. Tireless through the day, till that time comes, as the maternal love which so patiently accommodates itself, hour after hour, to its thousand wants and caprices, real or fancied. A busy creature is a little child. To be looked upon with awe as well as with delight, as its clear eyes look trustingly into faces that to God and man have essayed to wear a mask. As it sits down in its little chair to ponder precociously over the white lie you thought it "funny" to tell it; as, rising and leaning on your knee, it says, thoughtfully, in a tone which should provoke a tear, not a smile, "I don't believe it." A lovely and yet a fearful thing is that little child.

EDUCATION, when properly conducted, is the greatest earthly corrective of selfishness. When it has failed of a beneficial effect, every man must commence a course of discipline for himself. Self-knowledge must precede reformation. It will show us that there is a great moral fault in the constitution of our nature.

Fig. 109.

Fig. 110.

As a motive to correct this, we must consider how incompatible it is with our situation in the universe, and with our duties to God and man.

MR. AND MRS. RASHER.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MISS SLIMMENS."

CHAPTER V.

SEVERAL ACCIDENTS.

YOU'RE got to stay at home to-day, Rasher, and help me pass away the time. I sha'n't be able to stir off this sofa to-day, and perhaps not to-morrow, and here it is right in the midst of the holidays; it's only four days to New Year's. If I shouldn't be able to receive calls on New Year's, I should be awfully put out. O dear! I wish I hadn't gone skating! You told me there were weighty reasons for my not going a-skating? Well, supposing you did? Everybody goes, and what everybody does, we must do, if we want to keep our footing. What's that? If I'd kept my footing, it would all have been well enough? O dear! I wonder if you're going to ridicule and make fun of me all day? If you are, I might as well let you go. I shouldn't care about your staying, if I was in a condition to receive calls of condolence gracefully; but one doesn't like to be consoled with for slipping down on the ice. I was so glad young Flummery was in another part of the pond; he'd have been sure to have made one of his sharp remarks. Spangler is so good-natured; he didn't even laugh, but helped me into my carriage, and he and Fitz came home with me, and, after seeing me safe into the house, they begged the carriage to go back again and finish the day's sport. So I lent it to them, of course, and they kept it out until eight in the evening, and Patrick had to drive the horses round, and round, and round the Park, to keep them from freezing, he told me. Mrs. Cerulean says it's "frozen poetry" to skate by moonlight; but I don't think I shall try it again, by moonlight or any other light. I don't like anything frozen but ice-cream.

O dear! It's dreadful to be laid up, unable to stir without pain, and the dressmaker expecting me, and Mrs. Cornell's party coming off to-night. I can hardly realize there is another such an unfortunate person in the world. Who's that Patrick is speaking up so to in the hall? Do go and see.

Who was it? "He was turning away a poor woman whose child got dreadfully burned yesterday while she was out washing, and whose husband is down with the fever, and no money or food in the house." Did you give her anything? A dollar! Humph! You always would make a fool of yourself in that way, husband, believing every idle story that's told you by these miserable, lazy creatures. If her child is burned so badly, why isn't it sent to the hospital?—ugh! there was such a twinge went through me then, when I tried to stir—it'll be better off there, of course. There's one thing curious about this Irish help that works in good families—it's harder on beggars than we are. No need to tell Patrick to turn 'em off without bothering me. What's that? He shoved this woman out brutally? Well, she needn't have forced herself in, then. I suppose, if she'd been a housebreaker, Rasher, you'd have given her half a dozen silver spoons, and told her how to melt 'em up. It's a weakness of yours, being charitable is, but I s'pose you can't help it, no more than you can your other weaknesses. If you've got a dollar to give to every beggar that asks, you must have a purse full, which makes me free to ask you for something I'm very much in need of—in fact, I can't go to opera again till I have it. I want a set of furs dreadfully; all our set are getting 'em. You thought I had a new and expensive set this very winter? So I did, for street wear, of course—a set of sable; but what I want now is a white set, for evening. They're so sweet for full dress! My Magenta velvet, with diamonds, and a white cape just slipping off my shoulders, will be very becoming at the Academy. What are you fingering that statute so for? You'll discolor it. I do wish you'd be quiet! What are you walking to and fro like a caged animal for? Can't you spend a single morning in the bosom of your family without getting as uneasy as a fish out of water? You'll throw me in a fever, if you ain't more considerate.

Thinking? Is that any reason why you should look as blue as indigo? You ought to try and be cheerful, to have a good effect on me; people should always be cheerful when they're tending the sick. If there really is anything upon your mind, do try and get it off, for my sake. Come and set down side of me, and tell me what you're thinking of. I didn't know as you ever thunk. I can listen to you to-day, for I've nothing better to do. You were wishing I would be a little more prudent? Good gracious, husband! do you mean to insinuate that I've been imprudent—your own Marier? About money, you mean? You are afraid you made the purchase of this house, and so on, in a bad time? Business, especially pork-packing, is almost at a stand-still? Then why don't you go into some other business? It's the wish of my heart that you would. I hate pork-packing, and if it—"isn't as fat a job as it used to be"—there, there! you'll die with a pun in your mouth—has come to a stop, I, for one, am glad of it. Quit it and invest in some other stock—I don't mean live stock, but something they have in Wall Street—bulls and bears, or something, I never just understood what, only I know it's highly respectable. I should feel a great deal more respect for you, Rasher, if you were a banker or a broker. If you should "break," would you be a broker? Well, really, I can't say. You'd better answer that question yourself. But, seriously, if your business is so poor, why don't you sell out and invest in something better, instead of asking your wife to deny herself the necessities of life? How are you to sell out a business that isn't worth anything? Oh, really, I don't pretend to know how you are to do it; that is your look-out. You've always been a good, sensible business man, despite of your other failings; you've made money, and been liberal with it in your family; and now if you're going to fail, or flat out, or get stingy, the little respect I have for you will be lost, that's all I've got to say. It won't be your fault; 'twill be your ailing? Well, I'd rather have a knave than a fool. O dear! my limb! my limb!

I don't care so much for the pain as I do for the inconvenience. I'll have a chance to put my boudoir to some use to-day, lying here, with nothing to do but look at the things in it. I wish you'd go down town, my dear, and buy me those furs, and bring 'em home for me to look at; it will help pass away the time, and take up my mind. Can't think of it? Rasher, you're a brute! a perfect brute, or you could never refuse so trifling a request to a sick wife. Ring the bell, then, for Rosine, and ask her to bring down my diamonds, and my new watch and chatelaine, and that bracelet you give me Christmas; it'll be a comfort to me to have 'em in my lap, and turn 'em over once and awhile. I'm so used to being about, it's hard for me to give up a single day. If Mrs. Cerulean was here, she would say, "Oh, my dear Mrs. Rasher, what a nice chance to spend a quiet day in reading! I quite envy you!" but I shouldn't believe her if she did say so. I don't believe anybody ever was really very fond of reading; I don't see how they can be, it's horribly stupid—all but the stories, and I don't set so much store by them as I did when I was younger.

Why don't Rosine come with them diamonds? I wish you'd ring the bell again, my dear, and when she comes in, please ask her what she was so long coming for? If I ask her, she'll look at me so impertinently she'll make me nervous. I hear her and Thomas giggling in the hall now—they're the torment of my life, them two are, just smart enough and sharp enough to be impudent in such a way we can't notice it. Why don't I give 'em warning? What would I do if I did? I couldn't give dinner parties without Thomas, and it's a proof of our gentility to have him. Everybody knows he's been in the best families. As for Rosine, she's got such good taste, and knows what's proper and becoming, and fixes me up so beautifully for every occasion, I can't dispense with her. Mrs. Cornell is dying to get her; but I don't intend she shall go to her, to make fun of me to her new mistress. It would be more gratifying to Mrs. Cornell than it would be to me. Hush, there she is, now! I desire you to bring me something to amuse me, Rosine; you may fetch me my jewelry, just for me to look at, and—come back, Rosine! hand me that vinegarette, and tell Thomas to tell the cook to be sure and have onions for dinner, for I want some awfully, and as there'll be no company, I suppose I can eat 'em; and I guess you may say corn-beef and cabbage with apple-dumplings and noodle-soup, as there's to be nobody here. And order Patrick to admit no one whatever, except Mrs. Fitz-Simmons, or, maybe, Mr. Spangler, if he calls. He's such a good-natured, nice young man, he won't be ridiculing me to my face like Flummery. Be sure and tell Patrick—nobody else.

*Do sit down, Rasher, my dear; your walking about makes me nervous. You can't stay at home a day without acting as if you did not know what to do with yourself. You couldn't even get through Sunday, if it wasn't for church twice, and you generally get to sleep there. If I didn't keep nudging and nudging you, you'd actually get to snoring. You show you're a business man by your very fidgeting. It ain't at all like the young men who are in the habit of calling here; they drop in so softly, and sit on the sofa or in an easy-chair for half a day, if I'm to home and can let 'em stay, and never move about or fidget a bit. You'd scarcely know they had hands, they use 'em so little, and they're so white and small; they seem made for nothing but to hold the bouquets they bring me, and flirt about their lawn handkerchiefs once and awhile. I admire them young men immensely, and if Cerintha and Felicia get married to any of 'em, I shall be proud of 'em. All they seem to want is to get the soft corner of the sofa, and say pretty things to the ladies who call on me, and witty things about them when they're gone, and have something nice for lunch, with a glass of champagne, and Fitz-Simmons to laugh with them; and have the rooms warm, and everything comfortable, and me in a good humor. They praise my servants, and my chicken salad, and my macaroons and wine, and my dress, and seem to like everything, which is very kind of them; then they're naturally so critical. Oh, now, ain't you asbamed to turn up your nose in that style! If I didn't know you as well as I do, I should think you were envious of these young gentlemen. There's one thing you do envy 'em? What? The fact that they don't have to pay the bills! Always thinking about bills and money, and such vulgar things. I don't suppose they ever think about what things cost; they're so innocent and so genteel. Me that's innocent! Everybody makes a fool of me, even my hired help! No, they don't, neither; there's one person don't, and that's you, Rasher! You never did make a fool of me, and you never will, except when I married you, and it would be hard to tell then which was the biggest fool. Ugh! ugh! I wish I hadn't gone a-skating.*

Here's Rosine with my jewelry. If the dress-maker sends home my dress, bring it in here before you take it up stairs. Too bad, I can't wear it out to-night! Yes, it is, Rosine. It is to be one of the handsomest parties of the season. Be sure and tell the cook about the onions.

What are you slipping out so softly for, Rasher? Thought you'd go down town awhile, now I had my playthings to amuse me? No, no, I want some one to talk to. I feel just like talking. If Fitz should come, I'll let you go. Don't care about staying to be scolded? If I were in your place I wouldn't steal off, because I'm lame, and can't follow you. You might put up with a little crossness, when you know how my limb hurts me. "In sickness and in health," were the very words you breathed at the marriage altar, and now you want to slip out, and go off and enjoy yourself as well as usual, and me a-suffering in the house, unable to stir off this sofa. It's just like a man. The male sex is the very acme of selfishness, as a general thing, and the episode of women. There, there, you needn't go to putting your arm around my neck, you'll get my headdress out of place. How do you like this robe de chambre? I'm glad I had it made ready for an emergency. Rosine says it's very becoming; and if I should feel easier by afternoon, I think I'll see a few of my intimate friends. Better have a bed put up in the front parlor? You never will be fashionable, Rasher, if you live in the best society till the day you die. "Can't make a whis—" Hush! hush! if you want to make me nervous and bring on a fever, and have to have the doctor called, just begin those illusions to the shop.

And now, Rasher, we're alone together, and, in a confidential mood, I wish you to tell me, sacredly and solemnly, whether you've played any trick on me about our coat-of-arms? I've looked and looked in the end of the dictionary, all through the Latin phrases, and other foreign tongues, and I can't find "Salve Lardum," nor the meaning of it. But I've noticed, time and again, people smiling in their sleeves when they examined it, and Plummery is always complimenting me about it. But he's queer, and says what he don't mean. Husband! you needn't deny it; I know by the look of your eye it's one of your outrageous practical jokes, and I'll get Fitz-Simmons to ask Spangler what it really is. The very thought of it is enough to spoil my appetite, and I was going to have a good old-fashioned dinner, such as we both like.

This is one of Mrs. Yellow Dock's reception days. I wish I'd stayed in my chamber and had my lounge wheeled to the window, and I could have seen all the carriages and the dresses of the ladies. It's tiresome looking at diamonds when you can't wear them. She's called twice, and I owe her one now. They're an older family than we, by over three years, but she didn't seem to feel it much. Draw your chair up side of me, and let's have a talk about old times. I was real happy, husband, the first years of our wedded life, when you used to come home of evenings and tell how well you was a-doing, and how trade was looking up, and I might have a silk dress twice a year, when you got a little richer. But I never thought of diamonds then. There! I'm sure I heard somebody at the key-hole then. Them servants will drive me distracted, if I don't—turn 'em away? That's what the men always say—turn 'em away, and get a new set, as if that would better matters, when they're all alike. It's we who spoil them? And how do we spoil them, when we indulge 'em in everything, and they live as well as we do? But, of course, if anything goes wrong, the wives are to blame. Don't, dear, meddle with the tassels of my gown; you'll friz up the silk. There's Patrick letting somebody in; it's Fitz-Simmons, I hear her voice, and Spangler's with her. You can slip out now, if you want to, my love. I don't care about your staying, now that I've other company. It'll be three hours to dinner. By-by.

Rasher! Rasher! wake up, Rasher! I'm sure there's burglars in the house. I've been laying awake with the pain in my leg, and I've heard curious sounds this long while. They've been in the parlors, and dining-room, and all over. I think they're in the dining room now. There! didn't you hear that? Oh, don't get up, don't! they might come in and kill me while you was out. I'd rather they'd take every piece of silver they can lay hands on than to stay here alone a minute. Open the window, and call the watch. Supposing they do "make off with their booty at the first alarm?" I don't want to be murdered. O dear, are you really going? Well, then, I'll just get up and turn the key till you get back. It hurts me so to walk, and I'm all in a tremble with fright. Knock, if you get back safe, my love, and tell me it's you, and I'll let you in.

Is that you, my dear? Wait a moment, till I get the lock turned. I'm so scared I haven't much strength. Did you see the burglars? Come in, come in! Did they run away when they saw you? Have they taken—wasn't burglars? I certainly heard mysterious noises—the servants are having a party? La! did you ever! They've took advantage of my being lame and your going to bed early, I s'pose. Come down and take a peep at 'em? I wish I could. Wait till I slip on this wrapper. Now lend me your arm. There, I guess I can limp along.

(Peeping through the glass door of the dining-room and whispering.) If that don't beat all! There must be as many as thirty of 'em; and Rosine has got on my new dress and every particle of my jewelry! She looks real genteel in them, too. Do see how she has drawn that belt to make it tighter! The cook's dressed up in my black moire-antique and Maltese lace set. They're just serving the refreshments—cold turkey, sandwiches (they must have boiled a ham to-day), biscuits, coffee, canned strawberries, my best brandied peaches, sugar, cream, &c.; and, oh, Rasher, have you counted the wine-bottles?—fifteen already, as sure as you are alive! Aren't they killingly polite, though? The cook's taking me off, to a turn! and Rosine is playing Mrs. Cornell. They say stolen sweets are the nicest, and I do think these folks are having a good time generally. O horror! I hope Rosine won't spill any of that cream on my new silk!

Look at Thomas! he takes you off to a dot, my dear, only he's taller and better looking. That is just the bobbing little kind of a bow which renders you so insignificant, my dear; and his arm behind his back. O my! I shall smother with trying not to laugh, with hearing him blowing his nose—just as you blow yours when you're a little embarrassed, my love, exactly; and that grabbing way of grasping his handkerchief! I knew Rosine was a saucy minx, but I didn't think Thomas had so much of the actor in him. He's been impudent enough, goodness knows, but I didn't believe he was so sly. Sixteen bottles of wine! ten of 'em our best champagne, and the rest our topaz sherry.

What shall we do? Those refreshments alone will cost us thirty or forty dollars, and their impertinence besides. I'm as mad as fire! Living on the fat of the land, and doing nothing but making fun of us. They'd get up a regular shindig, if it wasn't for making too much noise. Wouldn't they scatter, if they knew who was up and looking at 'em! I guess we'd better go back to bed, husband, and let 'em have it out. They've done all the harm they can; I suppose they'll set things to right and be very demure to-morrow. What are you going to do, Rasher? Thrash Thomas? Oh, don't, don't! he's twice as strong as you, and the rest of them great fellows will attack you. You'll have the police in, and a row. O dear! I never saw you so determined. Do wait till I get up stairs, at least.

Well, my dear, what did you say to 'em? Ordered 'em all out of the house, except cook and Rosine? You haven't dismissed Thomas, have you? Kicked him into the street, and gave the girls warning? O dear! dear! I'm so sorry it ever happened. I know they deserved it, richly, but I was relying upon Thomas for New Year's. I can't get along without him. Guess I'll have to? That's just as inconsiderate as you are—and only three days to New Year's, and no time to look up another waiter, such as can take all the responsibility, as Thomas could. There are plenty of my friends who will be glad to snatch him up, if he was caught stealing the wine; and he'll go away angry, and make us ridiculous. Our dearest friends wouldn't be a bit too polite to quiz him. That's the way the world goes in society. What do I try so hard to get into it for? Why, because, I suppose. If we've got the means, why shouldn't we? Rosine will go right off and hire to Mrs. Cornell, and tell her I didn't know the names of my toilet things, and was going to wear my calling-bonnet to church, and that I wear Canton-flannel night-dresses. All of which will be very disgraceful? Of course it will, in our set. It wouldn't hurt me half so much to have a downright flirtation with Mr. Spangler, or you to forge your name to the amount of half a million, as it would for me to wear white gloves when I ought to have worn lilac ones, or for you to have done what you did at dinner to the Peterses, when you toasted the pork business in a glass of their old Madeira, which their grandfather himself brought away from the island in one of his own merchant vessels, forty years ago. But you never can be a gentleman, I'm afraid, Rasher; and now that you've sent off Thomas, there'll be nobody to keep things right, and give 'em an air. I sha'n't sleep a wink to-night for thinking of New Year's and all my troubles. Did you get my jewelry from Rosine, and see to the silver? it's such a care to be mistress of an establishment like this. We must have a housekeeper and a steward, or I shall never get along. You wouldn't be surprised if I should be washing my own dishes before the end of a year? You're saying that for the pleasure of making me nervous and breaking my rest, when I've enough else to break it. It's nothing to you, who are always asleep the minute your head touches the pillow, how long other people lie awake thinking about all kind of unpleasant things. Why is my leg like Victor Emmanuel? Who's he, I'd like to know, and how can I guess when I've no idea? Because it is a-king?

Pshaw, how silly you are! You took great pains in making that pun? Which reminds you to ask why my leg is like the window? Oh, get out! You don't want to? Well, lie still, then. Because it is pane-full? Well, that's true enough, anyhow; and I wish you'd get up and hand me that hops-and-vinegar. Now, Rasher, what are you tittering about? You were wondering if I were not able to go to any more hops, if the hops would come to me? Do hold your tongue, and give my limb a good rubbing. That would be a rub-her of whist? I do believe that kicking Thomas out of doors has had an enlivening effect upon you. You do feel relieved to be rid of the puppy? Master of your own house once more, and intend to remain so? It's remarkable to see you show so much spirit, Rasher; and I think none the less of you for it; though, as to Thomas—did you actually kick him out of doors? It boots not to remember?

Them hops have a powerful soothing effect. I feel quite drowsy, and believe I can go to sleep if everything is quiet about the house. If you should step out into my basin of hops in the morning, would the sun rise in the east? I wish I'd married a man that—never made light of Ceres matters? There, go on, interrupting me in the most intolerable manner; a man that never—pun-ished his wife?—that never—Why am I like a shoemaker? I was not aware that I resembled—Because I always have the last? Very well, let me have it then. He's snoring now, sure. La, if he ain't waking up again! What did you say, husband? Why is our certificate of marriage like the Evening Bulletin? Well, why is it? Because it's a noose-paper? Now, my love, I'll serve you as you served Thomas if you don't quit them exasperating conundrums, and let me get some rest. I'm sprained, and can't kick? Oh, you vulgar monster! you unrefined creature! you're a bear, Rasher, and you know it, or you never could make such a comparison. What? You see mischief a-Bruin, since I've got to calling you a bear? Which reminds you to ask why you and those hops are alike? Hops, again! Both a-brewin'? You had that over once before. I wouldn't repeat myself if I were you. Why are you like my new watch, when you make the same pun twice? Because you're a repeater? Well, I wish you'd be like it in another respect—I wish, for mercy's sake, you'd run down. Now, husband, for goodness gracious' sake, what are you about? Going to send for a nurse to come to care of my first and only? Get back into bed! I only hope that the cook will leave without getting you any breakfast—it would serve you right. I guess, when you get up in the morning, and find no waiter in the dining-room, no cook in the kitchen, and not even a fire in the furnace or range, you'll realize what you've done. If the cook does stay to get breakfast, I'd advise you to be careful what you eat, and notice if your coffee has any strange taste, for she's a high-tempered thing, and she may put some of that vermin destroyer you brought home lately, into your food. You don't believe cook is so old-fashioned as to have pies-on for breakfast?

There, he's really asleep at last! I wish I could drop off as easily. But I must torment myself with wondering if my jewelry is all safe, and what I shall do for a new set of servants. I suppose Rosine will expect me to make her a present of that new silk, now that I've detected her getting the first wear of it. I shall tell Mrs. Cornell of that trick, which will prevent her taking her, I hope; for she's so ex-cruciatingly nice about her clothes, she won't relish the idea of her waiting-maid wearing the best of 'em, every time she's out; and perhaps the odor of an Irish pipe hanging about the waist of it, when she goes to put it on.

I hope Thomas won't tell about my asking him how to seat my company at dinner, and how to dish out the Dariolas with Ratafias and the Bavarian Cream.

What was I saying about Thomas? Nothing, to you. I thought you was fast asleep. O dear! I suppose all the world is coming away from Mrs. Cornell's grand party about this time; and here I am, instead of having been there in my new dress, laid up in bed with a lame limb, and the servants acting like distraction, and everything at sixes and sevens. I hope the new year won't begin as unpropitious as it threatens. If Rasher should really fail! It makes me sick to think of it! It will be a great deal harder to go back to our old way of living than as if we had never left it, and the poor girls! their prospects will be ruined. Rasher can't feel about it as I do, or he wouldn't be so ready to laugh and joke. I declare, if he isn't laughing in his sleep! Rasher! Rasher! what are you dreaming about? "Dreamed I was kicking Thomas down the steps, and when he got up groaning I told him he needn't grunt, for it was all sham-pain; that, because he was too full of cups, he needn't think he could set in and sauce, sir! To clear out, and never let me see his face again; and if he made any complaint of a-salt, I'd have him put in a cell-ah! And so he left, and now it's all right Good-night, Marier!"

A SPRING MEMORY.

BY LIBBIE S. CROWELL.

I HAVE watched the daylight fading,
'Mong the purple clouds which lie
Like broad billows on the bosom
Of those upper deeps, the sky.
Listlessly I've watched the shadows
And the sunshine softly play
On earth's bosom, 'til my spirit
Wearied of this haunted day.
Haunted! yes, by thoughts and fancies,
Which these mist-crowned days e'er bring,
Tempering the heart-lyre's music
All too much for glorious spring—
Tempering each glad pulsation
Of the crimson tide which flows
Joyously to feel that winter
Seeks at last a long repose.
For 'twas when the mists were wreathing
One of spring's first opening days,
Years ago, that two linked spirits
Parted in the gathering haze—
Parted, and while one passed softly
O'er the Jordan's surging tide,
And with glad feet pressed the shining
Banks which lie the other side;
One stood here and saw in fancy,
Through the way by us untrod,
A loved form through pearl-gates enter
The bright city of our God.
Stood and gazed so longingly,
So wistfully through blinding tears,
Then turned back to this world again
And thought of coming years.
Thought how the bright but changing world
As lightly would pass on;
Nor heed that one heart's worshipped star
In darkness had gone down.
And now, e'er with such days as these,
A way-off vision comes to me
Of joyless hours, in whose sad light
A low grass-covered grave I see.

SONG.

Now the purple day is dying,
Soft the zephyrs sweetly sighing,
While the last red rays are staying,
Now with bird and blossom playing,
Oh, tell me why this makes me sad,
When all around is cheerful, glad?

Looking out I try to hearken,
While the folds about me darken,
For a voice that never grieved me,
For a face I may not see,
This is why it makes me sad,
When all around is cheerful, glad

NOVELTIES FOR APRIL.

Figs. 1 and 2.—Caps suitable for breakfast and home wear. The bow in Fig. 1 consists of feather stitch edge, as in Fig. 6; or the cord, as in Fig. 5.

Fig. 7.—Lace cape, of an excellent shape, suitable for evening wear. The thulle foundation is slightly puffed between the transverse rows of lace, which may be of Valenciennes, or any neat point; a double fall of broader lace edges the fichu.

SAVING PURSE.

This purse is for money in reserve, to be kept in some safe place. Cut a strip of card-board as wide as the top of the purse, leave the lid to wrap over, and a diamond point at each end of the bottom. Lay a strip of silk over each end, simply giving them the required folds to form the shape. Then lay a piece of fancy ribbon over the central part, if possible, making the fastening fall in the middle of the pattern, and adding a pretty button with a loop. Place a small silk tassel on each side, at the ends of the silk and strings.

PATTERNS FROM MADAME DEMOREST'S ESTABLISHMENT.

THE following patterns are from the celebrated establishment of Madame Demorest, No. 473 Broadway, New York :—

Minnie Apron.—High neck and long sleeves, adapted for a child from five to seven years—pretty in pink or blue chambré, trimmed with white braid. Requires two and a half to three yards of material, and pearl or thread buttons.

Aquila Apron (back view).—Waist is plain, with a single box plait in front, ornamented with buttons; skirt cut circular, and has a polka joined in at the waist; long sleeves, gathered at the wrist with a plain cuff; high neck and buttons at the back; will admit of considerable trimming.

Lulu Apron (front and back view).—Low neck, with a polka cut in connection with the waist, which has a pretty effect over the circular skirt; shoulders finished with a bow of ribbons. Requires two yards of silk.

Ariadne Sleeve.—A small bishop sleeve, with pointed cap and three waves thrown back from the front; waist lightly gathered into a loose pendent band.

Bretelle.—The “Paysanne” bretelle, made of velvet, edged with narrow guipure lace, and strapped with ribbon, being made in black velvet, and separate from the dress, may be worn with any color.

Cristella Sleeve.—Flowing sleeve, with points turned back from the front, and finished with tassels and braid gimp.

Elgin Sack.—Boy's sack, with jacket front and plain back, especially designed for home wear, and may be trimmed in any style that fancy may dictate. For a child of six years, it requires about four yards of single-width material.

INFANT'S BIB.

To be made of piqué, embroidered with floss thread, and fastened at the back with buttons.

FANCY BELT.

To be made of black or any fancy-colored silk, black velvet and gold braid, with a handsome gold buckle.

PATTERN FOR A LADY'S WRAPPER.

This wrapper pattern possesses peculiar advantages in its simplicity and adaptation to any figure—the back and front being exactly alike, and the only alteration necessary being in the size of the neck. It can be made of any material, perfectly plain, or very richly trimmed. It does not require the aid of the dressmaker, as any lady can make and trim a dress for herself. Cashmere trimmed with velvet, lawn with ruffles, or white material with flouncing, look equally well. Plain chintz, with puffs of the same. The connecting seam is on the shoulder. The waist should have a string run in the hem to make it fit smoothly.

EMBROIDERED OVERLAPPING COLLARS AND CUFFS.

(See engravings, pages 294, 295.)

IN this neat and beautifully designed collar we present our readers with a novelty which we think will meet with general favor. It can be made of linen cambric, muslin, or any other kind of fabric to suit the taste of those who work it. The square figures in the design, near the points of the collar and cuffs, are to be worked in a button-hole, which, when they are overlapped, can be fastened with a stud at the neck or sleeve-buttons at the wrists. The points of the cuff up to the sleeve button-hole can be lined with silk of any color to suit the taste or dress of the wearer.

PATTERN FOR NIGHT-DRESS.

THIS Night-dress, as will be seen by the illustration, is easily made, and is a pattern that wears very well—the neck and shoulder-pieces all being made of double material. Four and a half yards of longcloth, fourteen inches of insertion, two and a half yards of embroidery, with a single row down the front, and three and a quarter yards with a double row, will be required to make one garment. Divide the longcloth into three pieces, all of the same size, and tear one width in half; the two and a half widths are for the body, and the half width for the sleeves, collar, neck-piece, shoulder-pieces, etc.; so, by carefully cutting out, there should be no more calico required, and not a piece should be wasted.

After having sewn the seams and hemmed the bottom, measure the half of the front, and tear it down twelve inches; this is for the opening. Hem this opening on each side, and gather the top of the Night-dress, both back and front; cord the shoulder-pieces, and put these on to a portion of the top of the Night-dress, the remainder belonging to the neck-piece. The garment is now ready for the sleeves. These are gathered three inches from the bottom, and a band felled over large enough for the hand to slip through. The bottom of the sleeve is finished off with embroidery, and the top gathered in to the armhole; a narrow binder, one inch wide, is then felled down on the wrong side. Our illustration clearly shows where the binder should go, and the shape of the armhole.

After making and trimming the collar, fasten it on to the neck-piece, and stitch this (the neck-piece) on to the gathers and shoulder-pieces, the letters C to C showing exactly how far the gathers extend. Line both the shoulder and neck-pieces on the wrong side by felling down some longcloth cut out in the same shape, and finish off the hem down the front with insertion and embroidery, put on with a cording.

This Night-dress may be made much handsomer by letting in extra rows of insertion down the front, on each side of the opening, and by putting a band of insertion on the sleeves, instead of one made of longcloth. A double row of work up the front—that is to say, placed on each side of the insertion—would be an improvement; but these little matters must, of course, be left to the taste and judgment of the worker.

TEAPOT INKSTAND.

TAKE a common glass inkstand, cover it with black velvet, attach a wire handle and spout, covered also with black velvet; cut a circular top in card-board large enough to project beyond the opening of the inkstand; fasten this on to the top of a cork, about three-quarters of an inch thick, by means of an ornamental pin, the head of which forms the lid of the teapot. Cover the whole with beadwork, according to our design, and fasten it down upon the mat.

TURBAN BAG.

TAKE a paper pill box, cut it down one-third, lay over its bottom a small piece of cotton-wool, cover this with a small piece of satin, or gold-spotted crape. Make a small bag to fit the round, sew it round the rim, put on the folds of the turban, add a silk tassel to the top of the crown, and fill the bag with sweetmeats.

BUTTERFLY PEN-WIPER.

This pretty little article may be made very glittering and shining by means of bright-colored velvets or satins and beads. The double edges must be formed by laying different colored pieces of material over each other, and leaving the edge projecting. The two upper wings are cut out in one piece, and the two under wings together in the same manner. The divisions are separated by a row of small gold beads or gold thread. The round spots are black velvet. The patterns on the wings are worked in sewing-silk with slight stitches. The body is formed of black velvet filled with a little cotton-wool, and wound round with a few rows of the gold thread. The eyes are two red beads, and the antennæ two little lengths of the gold thread. The leaves of cloth for the pen-wiper are cut out to fit, and are placed underneath the body of the butterfly, securing them all together.

ZOUAVE JACKET FOR A LITTLE GIRL.

TAPER-STAND.

The taper-stand given in our engraving makes a beautiful and appropriate present to give a gentleman.

The materials are: Transparent glass beads—white; green chenille, three shades; oak brown chenille; green silk; gold beads; and wire covered with silk, the darkest shade of green.

The border is made of rosettes of beads, and an explanation of one will suffice for all.

Take the wire and string upon it one gold bead, then seven of the transparent beads, then cross the wire to form a petal; put on seven more transparent beads, then one gold one, and again cross the wire for the second petal. Make three more petals like the first two, and then join all by passing the wire through the centre of them to form the stalk. Make forty-four of these rosettes or flowers, and join them by twisting the stalks, as you see in the engraving. Make the stalks turn down, and twist them to form a strong wire at the lower edge of the border of rosettes. Cover this neatly with green silk, cut bias.

The body of the stand is made of similar petals of wire covered with chenille of alternate green and brown, the brown solid, and the green of the second shade. Unite to the border, by bars of the lightest green chenille over wire, and form the base by twisting the darkest green chenille and the brown together.

Cover a round card neatly with green silk, and stitch the base finely to it. This makes the bottom of the stand.

DESIGN IN BERLIN WOOL-WORK FOR MATS, SLIPPERS, ETC.

SIMPLE patterns in Berlin wool-work, producing lively and pleasing effects, are amongst those supplies for the work-table which every lady finds most useful for various purposes, enabling her with perfect ease to make many pretty articles, which, if great arrangement were necessary, would never be undertaken. The little design which we have now given is one of these, being perfectly easy of execution, and especially pretty when completed. Wools of three different colors are all that are required, worked in the following manner: The lines which form the sides of the diamonds are in a brilliant green, inclining to a blue; when they appear to cross, the small square becomes a very dark green, approaching to a black, the ground or under diamonds being white. Another pretty arrangement of colors is to take a ruby for the sides of the diamonds, a black for the crossings, and a white for the ground; or a blue may be substituted for the ruby with equally good effect. This little design will be found well suited for cushions, mats, slippers, and many other articles, and it may be worked on either fine or coarse canvas, according to the article for which it may be required.

SOUPS.

VERMICELLI SOUP.—Put into a stewpan one and a half pound of lean veal, a small slice of lean ham, a bunch of sweet herbs, a head of celery, an onion, some whole white pepper, a blade of mace, and a quarter of a pound of butter; set the pan over a clear fire, taking care the articles do not burn; then thicken two quarts of white gravy, and pour it into the pan, adding a few mushroom trimmings. When it boils, set it aside, remove the scum and fat, and strain the soup upon some vermicelli which has been soaked a few minutes in cold water, and stewed in strong broth. This soup is sometimes served with a few blanched chervil leaves in it.

OLD PEAS SOUP.—Put one and a half pound of split peas on in four quarts of water, with roast beef or mutton bones, and a ham bone, two heads of celery, and four onions; let them boil till the peas are sufficiently soft to pulp through a sieve, strain it, put it into the pot with pepper and salt, and boil it nearly one hour. Two or three handfuls of spinach, well washed and cut a little, added when the soup is strained, is a great improvement; and in the summer young green peas in the place of spinach; a teaspoonful of celery seed or essence of celery, if celery is not to be had.

VEGETABLE SOUP.—To a quarter of a pound of fresh butter, boiling hot, add onions chopped very fine. When they are quite soft, throw in spinach, celery, carrots, kidney beans, etc., also chopped fine, with green peas and any other vegetables that you can collect. Stir them well in the onions and butter till they begin to dry. Have ready a teakettle of boiling water, and pour about a pint as a time over your vegetables, till you have as much as you want. Serve up with bread or toast in the bottom of the dish. Pepper and salt to your taste.

OCRA SOUP.—Boil a leg of veal with about four dozen ochras, an hour; then add six tomatoes, six small onions, one green pepper, a bunch of thyme and parsley, and let it boil till dinner-time. Season it with salt and red pepper to your taste, and, if agreeable, add a piece of salt pork which has been previously boiled. The soup should boil seven or eight hours.

GUMBO SOUP.—Cut up a chicken or any fowl as if to fry, and break the bones; lay it in a pot with just enough butter to brown it a little; when browned, pour as much water to it as will make soup for four or five persons; add a thin slice of lean bacon, an onion cut fine, and some parsley. Stew it gently five or six hours; about twenty minutes before it is to be served, make a thickening by mixing a heaping tablespoonful of sassafras leaves, pounded fine, in some of the soup, and adding it to the rest of the soup; a little rice is an improvement. If the chickens are small, two will be required, but one large pullet is sufficient.

OCRA GUMBO.—Heat a large tablespoonful of hogs' lard or butter; stir into it, while hot, half a tablespoonful of flour; add a small bunch of parsley, a large onion, with plenty of ochra, all chopped up very fine. Let it fry till it is quite brown; then add a common-sized fowl cut up in small pieces, and let all fry together until quite cooked. Then pour in about three quarts of hot water, and boil till reduced to one-half.

RICE SOUP.—Take white stock, season it, and either whole rice boiled till very tender or the flour of rice may be used; half a pound will be sufficient for two quarts of broth.

PLAIN ONION SOUP.—Simmer turnips and carrots for two hours in weak mutton broth; strain it, and add six onions, sliced and fried; simmer three hours, skim, and serve.

RICH ONION SOUP.—Put into a stewpan twelve onions, one turnip, and a head of celery, sliced, a quarter of a pound of butter, and a quart of white gravy; stew till tender; add another quart of gravy, pulp the vegetables, and boil with the soup, strained, for half an hour, stirring it constantly; and, just before serving, stir in half a pint of boiling cream, and about eighteen button onions, nicely peeled, and boiled soft in milk and water. Season with salt. Spanish onions only are sometimes used; and the soup may be thickened, if requisite, with rice flour worked with butter.

CARROT SOUP.—Take six or eight full-grown carrots, of the red sort, scrape them clean, and rasp only the outer rind, or soft red part, and, if you have a single ripe tomato, add it, sliced, to the raspings, but use no other vegetable except onions. While this is doing, the broth of any kind of fresh meat which has been got ready should be heated and seasoned with a couple of onions fried in butter, but without pepper, or any other kind of seasoning, except a small quantity of mace and a little salt. When all is ready, put the raspings into two quarts of the skimmed broth, cover the stewpan close, and let it simmer by the side of the fire for two or three hours, by which time the raspings will have become soft enough to be pulped through a fine sieve; after which the soup should be boiled until it is as smooth as jelly, for any curdy appearance will spoil it.

Thus all the roots, and most of such vegetables as can be easily made into purées and combined with any sort of broth, will, in this manner, make excellent soup of different denominations, though all founded upon the same meat-stock. The gravy of beef is always preferred for savory soups, and that of veal or fowls for the more delicate white soups; to which from half a pint to one pint of cream, or, if that cannot be had, the same quantity of milk and the yolks of two raw eggs, should be added for every two quarts of soup; remembering, however, that the latter will not impart the richness of cream.

VENISON SOUP.—Take four pounds of freshly-killed venison, cut off from the bones, and one pound of ham in small slices. Add an onion, minced, and black pepper to your taste. Put only as much water as will cover it, and stew it gently for an hour, keeping the pot closely covered. Skim it well, and pour in a quart of boiling water. Add a head of celery, cut small, and three blades of mace. Boil it gently two hours and a half; then put in a quarter of a pound of butter, cut small and rolled in flour, and half a pint of port or Madeira. Let it boil a quarter of an hour longer, and send it to the table with the meat in it.

CHICKEN MULLAGATAWNY.—Cut up a young chicken, as for a curry; fry two sliced onions with butter until of a light brown color, when add a tablespoonful of curry, and half as much flour; mix these with the onions, and add one quart or three pints of rich gravy, previously made, either from veal, beef, mutton, or poultry. Boil it, skim off the butter, add a pinch of salt, and put into it the chicken cut as above. Simmer the whole until the fowl be tender, when the soup will be ready to serve in a tureen with a dish of boiled rice. A young rabbit may be substituted for the chicken.

MISCELLANEOUS COOKING.

RIBS OF BEEF ROASTED.—Cut out the chine-bones from the thick end of the ribs, and also the strong sinew or leather; fasten the "bark," or outside fat, with a few skewers; spit it through the thick part and the point of the ribs. When one or two ribs are purchased by a small family, it is a good plan to have the bones taken out, and the meat rolled round in the shape of a fillet; a considerable saving is effected by this plan, as, when not so prepared, the thin part at the extremity of the bone is frequently wasted. The bone cut out when the meat is raw will assist in making soup, and is much preferable to a cold beef-bone. They are sometimes cut off short, and salted or stewed, but rolling is the better plan; and in this manner a single rib can be skewered into a handsome fillet; the fat and lean being marbled, and the appearance of the whole improved.

SIRLOIN OF BEEF ROASTED.—Break the upper part of the chine-bones, cut them out, and cut through the strong gristle on the top, and skewer it in its place, which will prevent its drawing up or looking unsightly. Run the spit just under the bark at the thin end, and bring it out between the joints. By spitting it thus you avoid showing where the spit has gone through. Cover the fat with a sheet of buttered paper, and roast gently for three or four hours, according to the size of the joint. The under part is sometimes stuffed with forcemeat, in the following manner: Carefully lift up the fat from the inside of the sirloin with a sharp knife; take out all the meat close to the bone, and mince it small; take half a pound of suet, and chop it fine; mix with it some grated bread-crumbs, a little lemon-peel, thyme, and shallot minced very fine; mix all together with a glass of port wine; put it back again into the same place, and cover it with the skin and fat; skewer it down neatly with small wooden skewers, and cover it with paper. The meat should be spitted before you take out the inside; and when done do not take off the paper until the joint is put into the dish: then serve it up garnished with scraped horseradish.

The method of taking the meat from the bone, and rolling it so as to have the forcemeat in the middle, is easier, but adds its flavor to the whole joint; while this way keeps the upper and the under part separate.

LEG OF MUTTON BOILED.—To prepare a leg of mutton for boiling, trim it as for roasting; soak it for a couple of hours in cold water; then put only water enough to cover it, and let it boil gently for three hours, or according to its weight. Some cooks boil it in a cloth; but if the water be afterwards wanted for soup, that should not be done; some salt and an onion put into the water is far better. When nearly ready, take it from the fire, and, keeping the pot well covered, let it remain in the water for ten or fifteen minutes.

The English taste being in favor of meat in which the gravy has been retained, this joint is esteemed to be in perfection when a little underdone. It is sent to table with caper-sauce and mashed turnips.

TO STUFF A LEG OF MUTTON.—Take a leg of mutton, cut off all the fat, take the bone carefully out and preserve the skin whole; take out the meat and mince it fine; mince with it about one pound of fat bacon and some parsley; season the whole well with pepper and salt, and a small quantity of shallot or chives chopped fine; then put the meat into the skin and sew it up on the under side; put it into a stewpan with a little gravy made from the bones, two or three slices of veal, some sliced carrots and onions, a bunch of parsley, and a few slices of fat bacon; let it stew for three or four hours, and drain the liquor through a fine sieve; when reduced to a glaze, glaze the mutton with it and serve in stewed beans.

LAMB-CHOPS.—Take a loin of lamb, cut chops from it half an inch thick, retaining the kidney in its place; dip them into egg and bread-crumbs, fry and serve with fried parsley.

When chops are made from a breast of lamb, the red bone at the edge of the breast should be cut off, and the breast parboiled in water or broth, with a sliced carrot and two or three onions, before it is divided into cutlets, which is done by cutting between every second or third bone, and preparing them, in every respect, as the last.

SHOULDER OF VEAL.—Cut off the knuckle for a stew or gravy. Roast the other part with a stuffing, which should be inserted both under the flap of the under side, and also just below where the knuckle has been cut off; you may lard it. Serve with melted butter.

The blade-bone, with a good deal of meat left on, eats extremely well, when grilled, with mushroom or oyster sauce, or mushroom ketchup in butter.

CAKES, ETC.

SPONGE CAKE.—A quarter of a pound of lump sugar, three-quarters of a pound of flour, well dressed, the rind of a lemon, grated, seven eggs, leaving two of the whites out; do not beat up the eggs; boil the sugar in a quarter of a pint of water, and pour it boiling hot on to the eggs, whisking them very quickly while the sugar is poured gently on them; continue to whisk it for twenty minutes; stir in the flour, but do not whisk it after; put it into moulds, well buttered, and bake it in a quick oven. Be careful to have the oven ready, or the cakes will be heavy.

RHUBARB TART.—Cut some rhubarb into pieces an inch long, place it in a saucepan without a cover, adding chopped lemon-peel and sufficient sugar to sweeten—in water; let simmer till reduced to a pulp; stand aside till cool. Line a flat dish with paste, put in the rhubarb, and, before putting it into the oven, add a piece of butter the size of a walnut, and a good sprinkling of nutmeg. Serve with custard-cream.

To Make the Cream.—Beat up two eggs with a table-spoonful of cold milk, have ready half a pint of milk boiling hot, to be poured gradually on the eggs, stirring all the time, pour backwards and forwards in the saucepan. If not sufficiently thickened, place on the fire for a moment, but be careful it does not boil, or it will curdle and be spoiled.

ARROWROOT DROPS, OR BISCUITS.—Half a pound of butter beaten up to a cream, seven eggs well whisked. Adding seven ounces of flour, six ounces of arrowroot, and half a pound of loaf sugar. Mix all well together, and drop on a clean tin, size of a shilling; bake in a slow oven.

BLOCK BISCUITS.—Half a pound of butter beaten up to a cream, half a pound of ground rice, three-quarters of a pound of flour, half a pound of loaf sugar, four eggs, and a little sal volatile.

WHIPT SYLLABUBS.—Stir gently one pint of scalded cream the same way until it becomes smooth and thick, but not to let it curdle, then add, while stirring, four ounces of loaf sugar rolled and sifted, the grated rind of one lemon, and the juice of two, two glasses of sherry wine, and, finally, the whites of three eggs beaten to a high froth with a small pine whisk. Fill your glasses, and, having left some syllabub in your bowl to raise the requisite foam for the tops of your filled glasses, begin and whisk it well, taking off every bubble, as it rises, with a teaspoon, placing it on the glass, and continuing to raise a pyramid of bubbles on each till enough to complete the light appearance. Syllabubs should be always made the day before they are to be eaten, and form a very pretty addition to the supper-table.

TO MAKE ROCK CAKES.—Beat well two eggs, and then add one pound of crushed lump sugar, and let it stand for an hour; then add nine ounces of flour, and a few drops of the essence of almonds. Bake in a slow oven.

HOMEMADE WINES.

Now, that the difficulty and expense of making is trifling compared with what the latter used to be, all housewives may add wines to their household stores as easily as they may preserves. In wine countries, the grape, under the influence of climate, contains within itself the chemical properties to produce fermentation, while, in other countries, artificial aid is compelled to be used to accomplish it. The four requisites for fermentation are sugar, vegetable extract, malic acid, and water; and upon the proper regulation of these constituents the success depends.

The fermentation requires great attention, and should neither be suffered to continue too long, nor be checked too early. Its commencement, which will be about a day after the articles have been mixed, will attract attention, by the noise it makes. For a sweet wine, the cask should not be closed until the sound of fermentation has almost ceased. If a dry wine, have ready a barrel which has been subjected to the fumes of sulphur, and draw off your wine into it. Rack off the wine, clearing it with isinglass, and bottle in about ten weeks after it.

APPLE WINE.—Add to a barrel of cider the herb scur-lea, the quintessence of wine, a little nitre, and a pound of syrup of honey. Let it work in the cask till clear and well-settled, then draw it off, and it will be little inferior to Rhenish, either in clearness, color, or flavor.

BALM WINE.—Boil twenty pounds of lump sugar in four gallons and a half of water gently for an hour, and put it into a tub to cool; bruise two pounds of the tops of green balm, and put them into a barrel with a little new yeast, and when the syrup is nearly cold, pour it on the balm; stir it well together, and let it stand four-and-twenty hours, stirring frequently; bring it up, and when it has stood for six weeks, bottle it, put a lump of sugar into each bottle, and cork tight.

BARLEY WINE.—Boil half a pound of French barley in three waters; save about a pint of the last water, and mix it with a quart of white wine, half a pint of borage water, as much clary water, a little red rose water, the juice of five or six lemons, three-quarters of a pound of sugar, the rind of a lemon; strain, and bottle it up.

CHERRY WINE.—To make five pints of this wine, take fifteen pounds of cherries, and two of currants; bruise them together, mix with them two-thirds of the kernels, and put the whole of the cherries, currants, and kernels into a barrel, with a quarter of a pound of sugar to every pint of juice. The barrel must be quite full; cover the barrel with vine leaves, and sand above them, and let it stand until it has done working, which will be in about three weeks; then stop it with a bung, and in two months' time it may be bottled.

CURRENT WINE.—Take sixteen pounds of currants, three gallons of water; break the currants with your hands in the water, strain it off; put to it fourteen pounds of sugar, strain it into a vessel, add a pint of brandy, and a pint of raspberries, stop it down, and let it stand three months.

ELDER WINE.—Pour a gallon of boiling water over every gallon of berries, let it stand twelve hours; then draw it off, and boil it up with three pounds and a half of sugar; when boiling, beat up some whites of eggs, and clarify it; skim it clear, then add half an ounce of pounded ginger to every gallon of the wine; boil it a little longer, before you put it in the tub; when cool, put in a toast rubbed in yeast; let it ferment a day or two, after which put it into a barrel previously rinsed with brandy. All wines should be lukewarm when the yeast is added to it.

GINGER WINE.—To every gallon of water add three pounds of sugar and one pound of ginger, the paring of one lemon, half a pound of raisins, stoned; boil all half an hour, let it stand until it is lukewarm, then put it into the cask with the juice of a lemon; add one spoonful of yeast to every gallon, stir it every day for ten days, then add half a pint of brandy to every two gallons, half an ounce of isinglass to every six gallons; stop it close down, and in about eight weeks it will be fit to bottle.

THE TOILET.

ARRANGEMENT OF THE HAIR.

LADIES who are petite, either in stature or in feature, should avoid anything approaching to exuberance in their headdress.

Flowers form decidedly the most becoming articles for ornamenting the hair, but the greatest care is necessary in suiting them to the complexion of the wearer and the style of the headdress. They must, on the one hand, be neither numerous nor large enough to appear to encumber the head; nor, on the other hand, so few in quantity and insignificant as entirely to lose their individuality of character among the tresses by which they are surrounded. The hair, arranged according to the dictates of taste, is, without dispute, the most attractive of all headdresses, and it should be borne in mind that the addition of all ornament ought to be for the purpose of heightening its effect, not of overshadowing or concealing it.

When worn in wreaths, flowers ought not to be placed so low as to fall down upon and conceal the forehead. An air of stiffness is the certain accompaniment of an ill-arranged wreath, however suitable the materials of which it is composed. It ought not, therefore, to cross the head in a straight line, or be exactly uniform on both sides; but, on the contrary, traverse the head in a slightly slanting direction, with here and there a bud or a blossom peeping through amongst a cluster of ringlets, or nestling amid a group of curls. There are few styles of beauty to which a judiciously assorted wreath of flowers will not lend a charm.

Wreaths ought not to be worn unless when the hair is arranged in what may be called the ornate style; ornate, we mean, in opposition to simple.

We cannot conclude our observations on this branch of our subject better than in the words of a writer who remarks, generally: "Whatever be the reigning mode, and however beautiful a fine head of hair may be generally esteemed, those who are short in stature or small in features should never indulge in a profuse display of their tresses, if they would, in the one case, avoid the appearance of dwarfishness and of an unnaturally large head; and, in the other, of making the face seem less than it actually is, and thus causing what is merely petite to appear insignificant. If the hair be closely dressed by others, those who have round or broad faces should nevertheless continue to wear drooping clusters of curls; and, although it be customary to part the hair in the centre, the division should be made on one side if it grow low on the forehead and beautifully high on the temples; but, if the hair be too distant from the eyebrows, it should be parted only in the middle, where it is generally lower than at the sides, whatever temptation fashion may offer to the contrary. We might multiply instances ad libitum, but the foregoing cases will, we doubt not, satisfactorily elucidate our proposition. It is our object to press on our readers the propriety of complying with the ordinances of fashion when their observance is not forbidden by individual peculiarities, and the necessity of fearlessly setting them at defiance, or offering only a partial obedience, when a compliance with them would be positively detrimental to personal grace."

MISCELLANEOUS.

TO KEEP PRESERVES.—Apply the white of an egg, with a brush, to a single thickness of white tissue paper; with which cover the jars, lapping over an inch or two. It will require no tying, becoming, when dry, inconceivably tight and strong, and impervious to the air.

TO PREVENT CHILDREN'S CLOTHES TAKING FIRE.—So many lamentable accidents, with loss of life, occurring from fire, we remind our readers that, for the preservation of children from that calamity, their clothes, after washing, should be rinsed in water, in which a small quantity of saltpetre (nitre) has been dissolved. This improves the appearance, and renders linen and cotton garments proof against blaze. The same plan should be adopted with window and bed curtains.

PEDESTRIANS, whose feet are apt to blister during long journeys, should rub the feet, at night, with spirits mixed with tallow, dropped from a candle into the palm of the hand; or on the following morning no blister will exist, for the spirit possesses healing power, and the tallow keeps the skin soft and pliant.

MILK AS FOOD.—It is common to regard milk as little else than mere drink. But this is an error. Milk is really an article of solid food, being coagulated soon after reaching the stomach. New milk contains thirteen per cent. of digestible solids, and skimmed milk ten per cent.; that is, the former fully one-half, and the latter above a third, of the nutriment contained in the lean part of beef and mutton.

FOUL AIR IN WELLS AND CESSPOOLS.—A method of purifying wells, &c., from the foul air which so often accumulates in them when long closed, and has not unfrequently been destructive of life. The plan is, simply to throw into the well a quantity of unslaked lime, which, as soon as it comes in contact with the water, throws up a column of vapor, driving before it all the deleterious gases, and rendering it perfectly safe for the workmen to descend immediately.

TO TAKE THE IMPRESSION OF PLANTS.—Take half a sheet of fine wove paper, and cover the surface with sweet oil; after it has stood a minute or two, rub off the superficial oil, and hang the paper in the air; when sufficiently dry, move the paper slowly over the flame of a candle or lamp, until it is perfectly black; lay the plant or leaf thereon, place a piece of clean paper over, and rub it equally with the finger, about half a minute; take up the plant and place it on the paper or scrap-book, where it is desired to have the impression; cover it with a piece of blotting paper, and, on repeating the rubbing, the representation of the plant will appear, about equal to the finest engraving.

TO MAKE TOUGH BEEF TENDER.—To those who have worn down their teeth in masticating poor old tough cow beef, we will say that carbonate of soda will be found a remedy for the evil. Cut the steaks, the day before using, into slices about two inches thick, rub over them a small quantity of soda, wash off next morning, cut it into suitable thickness, and cook to notion. The same process will answer for fowls, legs of mutton, &c. Try it, all who love delicious, tender dishes of meat.

TO DESTROY VERMIN IN HOUSES.—Take up your carpets, down your curtains. In a pailful of water (cold), mix well one pound of chloride of lime (having first diluted it into a thin paste in a bowl of water, for facility of mixture), with a mop wet and saturate well the floor, skirtings, and any other wood-work that will not suffer injury, then shut the doors and windows close. If there should be a suspicion of other tenants in the bedstead, take that down too. In three or four hours all will have disappeared or perished; but to assure perfect immunity from the plague, it might be well to repeat the lustration a second time, i. e. the day or two after.

STAINS OF WINE, FRUIT, &c.—Rub the part on each side with yellow soap. Then lay on a mixture of starch in cold water, very thick; rub it well in, and expose the linen to the sun and air till the stain comes out. If not removed in three or four days, rub that off, and renew the process. When dry, it may be sprinkled with a little water.

RINGWORM.—This is called a disease, although it does not seem to affect the general health of a person infected with it. Children appear to be its subjects, and it is so infectious that it has been known to run through a whole school. It appears in circular patches of little pustules, and destroys the bulbs of the hair when it forms on the head. The proper treatment for it consists in keeping it clean by frequent washing in soap and water. It is more liable to attack weakly than strong children, and although disagreeable in appearance it is not dangerous. An ointment composed of vegetable tar mixed with a little sulphate of zinc, ground to powder, will soon remove it. Mercurial ointment is sometimes used; but it should seldom, if ever be employed. When ringworm appears on the face, an ointment of honey mixed with a little fink of sulphur is said to be an excellent remedy. Black ink is sometimes employed as a lotion in this disease with good effect; but a solution of sulphate of iron, or copperas, as it is generally called, will do equally well.

TO PROTECT GRAIN FROM RATS.—An individual of much practical experience, informs us that green elder deposited in and about the mows of hay and grain will prove an effectual preventive against the depredations of mice and rats. We have long known that the leaves of the common mullein will drive rats from their haunts. There is something in the odor of this plant that is disgusting to the rats; they cannot abide it.

BEAUTY, AND HOW TO GAIN IT.

"What is beauty but an air divine
Through which the mind's all gentle graces shine?
These, like the sun, irradiate all between;
The body charms because the soul is seen."

ALL women desire to be handsome. This longing for the perfectness of Eden beauty is the seal of its divine origin, which sin has indeed marred, but never been able to efface in the heart of woman. We would not have it otherwise. Women should wish for comeliness; they all ought to be handsome; that is, under the ordinary conditions of life in our country, where the sex are not subjected to hard and rough labor, girls should be lovely, and women also, unless broken by peculiar storms of sorrow or lingering sickness.

All women may be handsome, generally speaking, if they will only take the care and pains necessary. It is not perfection of features that constitutes the charm, nor a radiant complexion—these are gifts, good gifts of Heaven, if used for good; but still, if the individuals thus distinguished are not sedulous to acquire gracefulness, practise neatness, and dress with propriety, they will not appear charming. "Love darting eyes and tresses like the morn" give a charming image; but the tresses uncumbered cease to be poetical, and the eyes claim little attention when the gait is awkward and the manners rude. There must be inward loveliness, made up of amiability and intelligence, radiating over the outward form to insure lasting beauty. Then those who neglect the laws of health, who are too indolent to take exercise or engage heartily in some kind of usefulness, can never have enough pure life (the blood is the life) to become beautiful; and those who are too greedy to be discreet in food, and are always munching cakes and confectionery, must renounce the idea of being pretty. Rich pastry and strong coffee are not health-giving articles of diet, and one must be well to be handsome, but the poisonous compounds from the confectioners are far worse; it is the excess in eating these things that causes so many cloudy complexions, heavy eyes, and dull countenances in this our active world.

And now for the way to cure all these ills. We will give the experience of a young lady who made herself handsome. She shall tell her own story at our Table in her own way. We feel sure one such example will be of more advantage than many essays in teaching the true Art of Beauty:—

REVERIES OF A MAIDEN OF SEVENTEEN.

Aunt Eustace says I can change these stooping shoulders for an erect form, make this sallow skin clear and bright, this flat chest full and round, and cause these dull eyes to sparkle with light and life. She says that my heavy, ungraceful motions can become buoyant and elastic, and my weak, thin voice strong and sweet.

If she had told me I could scale the walls of Paradise some time within the next twenty-four hours, and take possession, it would not have surprised me more. All these changes are to be brought about gradually by the use of moral cosmetics, and the study of moral and physical hygiene.

I could endure anything, do everything possible, if it would make me beautiful; I have so longed for beauty! A pilgrimage round the world barefoot, with nothing but bread and water for food, and the earth my bed, I would submit to, if I could thus attain it. But Aunt Eustace says I shall be happier, too, for seeking beauty in the right way, and shall not have to make any sacrifice at all to obtain it; I shall be pursuing my highest good and best improvement, for these lie along the same path.

It will, I am sure, afford pleasant employment to my thoughts to follow the rules she laid down for me, besides the improvement. At any rate, I have nothing to lose in trying this experiment. I'm perfectly miserable one-half my time now, because it doesn't seem to me that I have anything in particular to do in the world. It is only when some excitement carries me out of myself, as it were, that I lose this sense of weariness.

I would like to have the power to be happy within myself. Some people have this art; it must be very valuable. Now, when I retire upon my own capital, I find nothing but emptiness, and the excitement of society does not really satisfy me; it only dendens the sense of moral hunger, as I might call it, for the time. Do other girls feel this, I wonder?

How glad I am that Aunt Eustace came to see us! I hope I shall profit by her counsel. There seems to be a healthy moral atmosphere about her that gives me strength and hope. I think my good angel must have sent her here in consideration of my needs. If she is going to confer beauty on me, or put me in the way to gain it, she will indeed prove a messenger of good. I feel sure I should be more amiable if I were more beautiful. I know I cannot act harmoniously when I look so inharmonious. I believe I was intended to be beautiful, and I feel as if I could never be myself until I am so. Aunt Eustace says that I do possess the germs of beauty, and it may be developed. O what happiness, could I realize this! How earnestly I would set to work to prune and weed my nature, and plant the seeds of good resolves and earnest deeds! A great deal of weeding and lopping off would have to be done; I am quite sure of that.

I have lived in a sort of dreamy, blind manner, as though I believed this was a world of chance, and if there was any good for me anywhere, it would come of itself, without my making any endeavors to obtain it.

I wished for happiness, beauty, and intelligence, but I wanted to have them without the trouble of any effort of mine.

Now I see that I must be up and doing, if I would obtain any real good as my own. I see, too, that I shall be happier for trying than if I remained sluggish. Life is so dull and wearisome! I wonder if others find it so! I believe they do, by the weary, dissatisfied faces I meet; and yet I do not believe it need to be so. I am sure there is material enough for happiness in the world, if we only knew where to find it and how to use it.

Now, I feel my faculties begin to brighten already, just at the distant prospect of becoming beautiful, and good, and happy. I feel happier, too, more peaceful and contented; I declare, I look better (I have just taken a peep in the mirror); merely thinking on the right way has made me more animated and more amiable. That querulous expression which clouded my face is partly melted away in the sunlight of serenity which has begun to dawn in my soul.

* * * * *

I need a good many aids to help me on my course. O dear! When I think of what I have to correct in myself, and what to gain, I feel almost discouraged. Still, Aunt Eustace says I need not to attempt any flying leaps, like a kangaroo; it is only one step at a time.

I must take a kind of inventory of myself before I begin. It will run something in this wise: A bundle of bad habits and a large amount of ignorance of self and duties, bound together by indolence, in a weak, crooked, meagre frame, covered by a sallow skin, and embellished with a pair of large lack-lustre eyes.

Well, now, to recapitulate after the instructions of Aunt Eustace, who is my moral doctor.

Item First To change this sallow skin to the pure freshness of health I must eat wholesome food at reasonable times and in reasonable quantities; I must study a little into the mystery of nourishing the body in order to do it properly.

Second. That I may have pure blood, and, consequently, a clear complexion, I must breathe a sufficient quantity of pure air; this is indispensable, and I must make myself familiar with the way in which air purifies the blood.

I cannot take in a proper quantity of air unless I suffer my lungs to expand fully; to effect this I must remove all outward compression that prevents perfect ease, avoid all crooked positions of body, and sluggish habits; and I must not breathe the air of heated rooms when I can avoid it, for there is not oxygen enough in it, nor in air that has been once breathed; such air has lost its life-giving properties, and has no more exhilarating power than wine that has stood in an open glass for a week.

I must not indulge in envy or ill temper, for these are moral jaundice, injurious to the blood and the complexion. I hope I should want to avoid these evil passions for higher motives, but now I am thinking of complexion.

I must take sufficient exercise, for by means of it the waste matter that would otherwise accumulate in the system is thrown off at the pores of the skin. I must also observe cleanliness strictly, that the pores be not obstructed.

And I must remember, too, that the mind and body mutually influence each other, and that

"Even from the body's purity the mind Receives a secret, sympathetic aid."

As they are so mysteriously connected, one cannot be perfectly healthy unless the other is so; knowing this will stimulate me to regulate my passions and emotions, and keep a watch over my thoughts so that no unwholesome ones enter and defile the inner temple of my soul. I must also try to cultivate my mental powers, so that I can judge between right and wrong, the good and the evil.

All this would add to my happiness, I know, even if I did not look a whit better. I can see that a great many good results would follow from the observance of the simplest of these rules; it is well with us when we are right.

For instance, by holding myself erect and breathing sufficient quantities of pure air I shall be more elastic and graceful in my movements; and if my lungs are fully expanded and strong, my voice will be clearer and sweeter, and my chest more full and rounded. Are not graceful movements, and a musical voice, and a beautiful bust rare attractions? The improvement in my complexion may be taken into the account also; and the greater sprightliness of body and mind, I feel sure, will animate the expression of my eyes and thus increase my beauty. Certainly, if my mind and body were properly active, my features would be more expressive of pleasant feelings and thoughts; intelligence beautifies the face, and peaceful emotion would be sure to give gentleness to my voice.

Oh, there is no calculating the advantages that will flow from one right habit! and, besides, it makes the attainment of all other right habits easier; I learned this long ago, but I never realized it as I do now, since I became in earnest about improving. I don't believe that people in general understand the philosophy of these things, or they would not submit to be ugly, and deformed, and miserable, when they might more easily be good, and happy, and beautiful.

I have my temper also to subdue, so that it shall rise so far and no farther than is right; now it is rather a turbulent member of society. I remember well the lecture of Aunt Eustace on this point; the substance has become incorporated into my reflections. I will—yes, I will govern my temper!

(Conclusion next month.)

WOMAN'S UNION MISSION BANDS, ETC.*

We are receiving good news of the progress of Mrs. Mason and her friends in this noble work of teaching and Christianizing heathen women. The idea seems to awaken a new chord in the hearts of our American ladies. We have now the following programme of the society, which we give in full, thus obviating the necessity of sending out circulars. We request our friends to read this paper carefully and then consider what they can do, each one according to her means and opportunities, to aid in this good mission. It has the recommendation of many leading clergymen among each denomination, and "honorable women, not a few," are working earnestly in the cause.

TO THE FRIENDS OF WOMAN'S ELEVATION IN HEATHEN LANDS.

SAYS a missionary long in India: "The greatest barrier to the spread of Christianity in India is Woman."

So in Burmah, the greatest hindrance to the conversion of the men is the Women. India, with its thousands of grating Zenanas, sends out a thrilling cry for light for its suffering Widows; while 125,000 women in Tounghoo and the Red Karen Land are stretching out their hands to the Christian women of America for help. And says a gentleman thoroughly acquainted with missionary work: "For these poor heathen ever to be reached, WOMEN must come to their rescue."

In view of these earnest calls, a few ladies have resolved to try and help instruct them, so far as they may be able, working with all evangelized denominations.

It is therefore proposed that friends interested give or collect the sum of TWENTY DOLLARS annually for five years, for the purpose of sending out and supporting the Widows and Daughters of Missionaries, and other single ladies, to raise up Native Female Bible Readers and Teachers for their own Countrywomen. These ladies to go out by invitation of responsible persons, and to missions of their own denominations.

One hundred collectors are desired, but at present it is proposed to send only two ladies. One of these is desired for the Tounghoo women and one for the Hindu widows, the first to be connected with Mrs. Mason in Tounghoo, the latter to be connected either with missionaries of the Scotch Free Church or with Episcopalians, in Calcutta.

* If any reader of the Lady's Book would like to have the large circular, including all the recommendations, etc., let her send an envelope stamped to Mrs. Hale.

To avoid the multiplicity of societies, it is proposed to form little Union Mission Bands in associations already existing. Therefore,

Any Maternal Association giving Three Collectorships shall be entitled to a correspondence with a Sister Association in Tounghoo or India, with Quarterly Reports.

Any Committee of Systematic Visitation giving Three Collectors, shall be entitled to a Foreign District, with Quarterly Reports.

Any Magdalen Society giving Three Collectors shall be entitled to a Native Visitor among the lost women of Tounghoo or India, with Quarterly Reports.

Any Sunday School giving Three Collectorships shall be entitled to a Mission School of its own in Tounghoo or India, with Quarterly Reports.

Any Bible or Tract Society giving Three Collectorships shall be entitled to a Native Bible Reader or Tract Distributor, with Quarterly Reports.

Any Library Committee giving sixty dollars' worth of books annually, and any Sewing Circle giving a sixty dollar box of work, stationery, apparatus, bedding, or clothing annually, shall be entitled to Quarterly Correspondence with the ladies or schools to which they are sent.

Smaller bands may be formed of two or three; or friends can send their contributions direct to the Secretary or Treasurer of the Society.

One object of these Bands is to help native chiefs to establish, carry on, and support schools for themselves, both male and female, thereby seeking their evangelization and civilization. To this end it has been found necessary, in some instances, to form little colonies of Highlanders on the plains, and teach them agriculture. Therefore, any agricultural implements will be thankfully received, for the Karens of Tounghoo, in particular, whose only implements are a long knife and spade.

The smallest contributions in money, apparatus, books, stationery, fancy-work for fairs or auctions, bedding, clothing for ladies or children, remnants of cloths for native jackets and pantaloons, handkerchiefs for natives, and anything that can be used in schools, or that will be salable in India, will be thankfully received and faithfully forwarded, according to the request of the donors.

* * * * *

The first Woman's Union Mission Band was formed in Boston, Nov. 16th, 1860; but the first invitation to the ladies of New York to form such small bands was made Dec. 6th, and to the ladies of Brooklyn, Dec. 14th, when this circular was read and approved, and two bands immediately formed in that city. No General Society was organized, however, until Jan. 9th, 1861, when the ladies of New York and Brooklyn met at Mrs. Le Roy's, 132 Fifth Avenue, and organized the

WOMAN'S UNION MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF AMERICA FOR HEATHEN LANDS.

President, Mrs. THOMAS C. DOREMUS.

Secretary, Miss SARAH D. DOREMUS.

Treasurer, RICHARD L. WYCKOFF.

Sub-Treasurer, Mrs. R. L. WYCKOFF
Box 479, New York City.

All communications and parcels for this Society should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss SARAH D. DOREMUS, (Doremus & Nixon,) 21 Park Place, New York City, or to the Treasurer.

OUR SUBSCRIPTIONS FOR WOMAN'S MISSION.—Since last month we have received some money for Mrs. Mason's school at Tounghoo, and many good promises. One young lady has sent us her pledged word as Manager to pay $20 in July; and, if nothing hinders, to pay the same amount yearly for five years. Other ladies have promised donations as soon as the present demands for the wants of the poor are lessened. We shall be glad to register all these names in our Book. At present we have

Mrs. F. M. Taylor, Philadelphia, $2.

Miss J. —, Delaware, $10.

SWISS HUSBANDS.—Miss Bremer, in her new work about the "Old World," makes the following pithy remarks:—

"The Swiss man, it appears to me, does not often regard his wife according to the requirement of the beautiful Swedish term Maka, or, equal; and, not unfrequently, one otherwise good and distinguished man deserves the satire which the little son of one of my acquaintance on one occasion unconsciously expressed, when he said to his little sister, 'Now thou shalt be my wife; go and stand in the corner!'

She. But why must I be thy wife?

He. That I may have somebody to scold."

NEW BOOKS.—Among the English works announced is "The Home-Life of English Ladies in the Seventeenth Century," by the author of "Magdalen Stafford."

The "Athenæum" has the following notice of one of Little, Brown & Co.'s Boston publications:—

"We have collections of English ballads and collections of Scotch ballads of every kind and merit; but a well-edited work, comprising the ancient traditional ballads of both countries, was unknown until the appearance of the American collection, by Mr. F. J. Child, a Professor of Harvard College, and the editor of the Boston edition of the British Poets. A new edition of Mr. Child's 'English and Scotch Ballads,' revised by the editor, is about to be placed at a moderate price, by Messrs. Sampson Low & Son of London, within the reach of the British reading public."

MISS S. J. HALE'S BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES, 1826 RITTENHOUSE SQUARE, PHILADELPHIA.

This school is designed to give a thorough and liberal English education, to furnish the best facilities for acquiring the French language, and the best instruction in music and the other accomplishments. An accomplished French teacher resides in the family, and also an excellent teacher of music, who gives her personal attention to pupils while practising. The moral training and the health and physical development of the scholars are carefully attended to.

TO OUR CORRESPONDENTS.—The following articles are accepted: "Laws and Ordinances"—"The Heart of the Andes"—"Night and Morning"—"To an Absent Wife"—"Lord Ronald"—"Doubt no More"—"How it Came About"—"To a Monthly Rose" (we have not room for both poems)—and "Starlight."

We have not room for the following articles: "My Second Home"—"Love"—"To Miss Viola "—"Woman's Love"—"Oh, then do they Remember me?"—"For whom we should Mourn" (and the other poem; we have no room)—"Going Home" (the writer must try till she succeeds)—"Annotations"—"Julie and I"—"A Keepsake" (quite pretty, and worthy a place if we had room)—"He Loves me in his Heart"—"Song"—"Lines to my Mother"—"Genevieve" (the writer is correct when she says that the "piece is not strictly poetry")—"Mabel Gray"—"Midnight"—"The Mountain Storm"—"Augusta"—"Chestnut Barre"—"I Mourn your Absence" (the poem is worth publishing if we had room)—and "Woman's Rights."

Health Department.

BY JNO. STAINBACK WILSON, M. D.

ULCERATED SORE MOUTH OF CHILDREN.—This affection differs from common thrush or thrash in the formation of ulcers on the gums, inside of the cheeks, etc. The ulcers appear perhaps oftener than otherwise on the gums, and the ulceration sometimes progresses to such an extent as to destroy the gums, leaving the teeth more or less exposed.

The symptoms are—heat of the mouth, an increased flow of saliva or spittle, an offensive breath, swelling of the upper lip, with enlargement and tenderness of the glands beneath the jaws. The gums are swollen, red or violet-colored, readily bleeding to the touch, and covered with a layer of grayish pulpy matter. Ulcerated sore mouth occurs for the most part in weakly children who have been badly nourished and exposed to damp and cold.

The treatment of this disorder should consist in washing the mouth frequently with cold water, and occasionally with a solution of the chlorate of potash. The mouth should be gently cleansed five or six times a day with cold water, and the potash solution should be applied once or twice a day. The latter should also be given internally, as it seems to have specific powers in changing the morbid condition of the general system upon which the ulceration of the mouth depends. The dose of chlorate of potash is five grains dissolved in a little sweetened water.

While these remedies are being used, the general health of the little sufferer should not be neglected. It should be warmly clad, nourished with milk, and wholesome, digestible food, and kept as much as possible in a pure, dry atmosphere. Whenever the weather and other circumstances will admit of it, the patient should have the benefit of the outdoor air and sunshine.

GANGRENOUS OR MORTIFIED SORE MOUTH.—This is a very formidable disease, and its treatment should never be attempted in domestic practice. We only introduce it for the purpose of giving the symptoms, so that it may be recognized, and the timely aid of a physician may be sought. It generally occurs in children between two and five years, who have been prostrated by some wasting disease, or by some kind of bad management. This kind of sore mouth is often attributed to mercury, and if this remedy has been used, the blame is almost sure to be laid on it. But it should be known that sore mouth frequently occurs where no mercury has been used, and it cannot be said that the disease under consideration has ever been positively traced, in a single instance, to the action of mercury. The disease commences most commonly, perhaps, in one cheek; the pain may not be very great, but the breath is highly offensive, and the running at the mouth profuse. The affected part soon becomes hard, red, shining, and tense; and if the mouth is examined, a deep, unhealthy excavated or dug-out ulcer will be found, corresponding in situation with the external hardness. The ulceration spreads rapidly over the whole inside of the mouth, involving the gums, inside of the cheeks, and even the jaw bones themselves.

After what has been said, it is needless to add anything as to the treatment of this frightful disorder. We will say, however, for the encouragement of mothers, that a skillful physician can generally arrest it in its early stages. Therefore, no time should be lost in obtaining the best medical advice.

FRUITS FOR CHILDREN.—The fruit kingdom affords an almost endless supply of delicious and wholesome food. But as articles of this class are generally taken, they may more properly be considered as dangerous luxuries than as healthful food—as a curse rather than a blessing. Dr. Paris says: “Were we to form our opinion of their value (fruits) from their abuse, we should certainly be rather disposed to class them under the head of poisons than of aliments.” The great error in the use of fruits consists in making them a dessert; in crowding the stomach with them when it is already full; and in eating them, at all times, between meals, when there is no natural demand or desire for them. Fruits, when taken along with our food, as food, and in moderation, are highly conducive to health; and, as the writer just quoted appropriately remarks, they “appear to be providentially sent at a season when the body requires that cooling and antiseptic aliment which they are so well calculated to afford.”

These general remarks have peculiar force when applied to children. How common is it for children, in fruit time, to be stuffing with fruits of all kinds from morning until night! And sometimes the work of destruction (destruction to the fruit, and still more destructive to the child) does not even stop at night, but the little fellows are allowed to nibble away on their apples, peaches, nuts, etc., after retiring to bed. But still worse—the fruits thus eaten at such improper times and in such excessive quantities, are often green or only half-ripe, or over-ripe, and in a state of incipient decay. No wonder, then, that the maledictions of mothers and physicians have been vented upon the fruit kingdom! No wonder that cholera, colic, convulsions, worms, wind, and watery gripes, and all the long train of infant maladies have been charged upon the products of the orchard. And with such notions as these, it is not at all strange that many are ready to forego some of the best gifts of God to man, and to exterminate their orchards as an unmitigated evil. But this is all wrong. Fruits eaten at the right time, in a proper condition, and in reasonable quantities, so far from being a cause of disease, are highly conducive to the health of the whole human family, children and all; and they should be cultivated and enjoyed with thankfulness, and not cursed, destroyed, and unjustly charged with evils for which the fruits are in nowise responsible.

What then is the right time? To this, we answer that fruits should form a part of the regular meal, and that, as a general rule, it is best to include them in the first course, instead of reserving them as a second course, or dessert.

As to the condition of the fruits we have this to say: they should be fully ripe, but not over-ripe and partly rotten. Moreover, they should be peeled and cored, if necessary. The seeds and peelings of almost all kinds of fruit are very indigestible, and therefore fruits taken—as children usually take them—skin, seed, pulp, and all, are literally a fruitful source of disease.

As to the quantity of fruit eaten, we will only remark that the plan suggested by us is the very best to prevent these excesses, in which children are so prone to indulge.

But then it may be said, “This is all well enough, but it is impossible to control children, and they will eat from morning until night, if they can have access to the orchard.” This is true; but to avoid this difficulty, children should never be allowed to go into the orchard. Some one should be sent to select the fruit for each meal, and the children should not touch it until it is placed upon the table. One word as to preparing fruits for the table, if they are fully ripe, it will be sufficient to peel them, and to remove the core or seed, if necessary. But if fruits not fully ripe are used, they should be stewed or baked before bringing them to the table. Some green fruits, such as apples, are wholesome when well cooked; and dried fruits, such as apples, peaches, pears, prunes, &c., are cooling, laxative, and highly conducive to health when well stewed. And, by the way, baking or stewing is the best mode of cooking most fruits.

FROM T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

A MESSAGE FROM THE SEA; and THE UNCOMMERCIAL TRAVELLER. By Charles Dickens, author of "Pickwick Papers," "David Copperfield," "Tale of Two Cities," "Christmas Stories," &c. Of this volume we have only read "A Message from the Sea," a story which involves several other stories, evidently not from the pen of Dickens, and having no particular connection with the main one, around which the interests of the reader will gather. A Yankee sea-captain, somewhat broadly drawn, as is usual with our trans-Atlantic friends, figures prominently, pleasingly, and benevolently in the narrative. Price 50 cents.

FROM LEARY, GETZ, & CO., Philadelphia:—

THE OLD LOG SCHOOL-HOUSE. Furnished with Incidents of School Life, Notes of Travel, Poetry, Hints to Teachers and Pupils, and Miscellaneous Sketches. Illustrated. By Alexander Clark, editor of "Clark's School Visitor." A book entitled to a place and a name among American novels, which, though perhaps not equal to the best, will yet not suffer materially by a comparison with our literature of a strictly national type. The prominent story of the volume, "The Log School-House," must command unqualified approval for the construction and development of its plot, and the beautiful and poetical sentiments so often expressed throughout it. Of its literary merits, however, we cannot speak quite so unreservedly. To our mind there is a certain crudeness and want of finish in its style which is more felt than perceived by the reader, that betrays haste or carelessness on the part of the writer, rather than want of skill. The miscellaneous articles of which the balance of the book is composed, are of the excellence of superior newspaper articles, imparting pleasure, or conveying good lessons to the mind, yet leaving no impression of extraordinary merit in them.

FROM HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

ONE OF THEM. By Charles Lever, author of "Charles

O'Malley," "Gerald Fitzgerald," "Maurice Tierney," etc. etc. This is one of the liveliest and most interesting of Lever's later novels, which, by the way, have, in some instances, been rather dry, dull, and prosy, with scarcely a glimmer of that rattling spirit, sparkling wit, vivacious humor, and thrilling rapidity of incident which rendered his earlier productions so deservedly popular. "One of Them," however, as we have intimated, is not unlike Lever's former self, though still in a different vein, and will be found attractive reading. Price 50 cents.

THE CHILDREN'S PICTURE-BOOK OF QUADRUPEDS, and other Mammalia. Illustrated with sixty-one engravings by W. Harvey. This is a companion to "The Children's Picture-Book of Birds," which we have noticed, and equally with it entitled to praise. Price 75 cents.

FROM D. APPLETON & CO., New York, through SAMUEL HAZARD, JR., Philadelphia:—

THE ILLUSTRATED HORSE DOCTOR: Being an Accurate and Detailed Account of the Various Diseases to which the Equine Race are subjected; together with the latest Mode of Treatment, and all the requisite Prescriptions, written in plain English. By Edward Mayhew, M. R. C. V. S., author of "The Horse's Mouth," "Dogs: their Management," editor of "Blair's Veterinary Art," etc. Illustrated with more than 400 pictorial representations. This is one of the fullest and completest works of its class. We would particularly recommend it to the attention of such of our friends, agricultural or otherwise, as may take a pride in horses. To them it will be invaluable, not only as presenting means of relief to the known ailments of the animals in their possession, but also as acquainting them with facts they might not otherwise become cognizant of, which, once understood, ought to excite their humane sympathies in behalf of the dumb companions of their pleasures and labors. Price $2 50.

FROM RUDD & CARLETON, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, and LIPPINCOTT & CO., Philadelphia:—

THE GREAT PREPARATION; or, Redemption Draweth Nigh. By the Rev. John Cumming, D. D., F. R. S. E., Minister of the Scottish National Church, Crown Court, Covent Garden, author of "The Great Tribulation," etc. Second series. The previous works of Dr. Cumming have met with such success in this country, and his name has become so familiar among our Christian population, that we need only announce the appearance of this, the second volume on the subject of "The Great Preparation," to secure it readers. Price $1 00.

PRAYER FOR RULERS; or, Duty of Christian Patriots. A Discourse, preached in the Madison Square Presbyterian Church, New York, on the Day of the National Fast, January 4, 1891. By Rev. William Adams, D. D. Price 25 cents.

FROM ROBERT CARTER & BROTHERS, New York, through MARTIN & BROTHER, Philadelphia:—

ANNALS OF THE RESCUED. By the author of "Haste to the Rescue." With a Preface by the Rev. Charles E. L. Wightman. A remarkable feature in the literature of Benevolence, as we may style the many English works, on the condition of the poor and miserable classes of Great Britain, now crowding from the press, is, that the greater portion are written by women. Among these interesting books, the one before us deserves a high rank. It records the efforts of the wife of Mr. Wightman (pastor of a parish in Shrewsbury, England) to rescue from drunkenness and destruction the men and women of the congregation. She went forth at her husband's earnest request, and worked always with his warm approval and encouragement. That he found her a help indeed he might well record, as he has done in the preface. All women should read this book, and learn what good a woman has done. Pp. 263.

GRAPES OF ESHCOL; or, Gleanings from the Land of Promise. By John R. Macduff, D. D., author of "Morning and Night Watches," "Memories of Bethany," etc. This book will be a real treasure to those who love the gospel. The meditations are short, and can be read by those who have little time at command; the themes are well chosen, and the style is excellent.

HELP HEAVENWARD; or, Words of Strength and Heart-cheer to Zion's Travellers. By Octavius Winslow, D. D. In this series of short sermons, or rather expositions of particular texts of Scripture, without the formality of a discourse prepared for the pulpit, the author has shown eminent fitness to be the adviser of his readers. Few, we think, will lay aside this book from weariness, even when they may not love the truths and duties it so earnestly yet tenderly urges on men. It is a work well suited to the cabinet library of the reader who wishes to reach heaven.

ENGLAND'S YEOMEN: from Life in the Nineteenth Century. By Maria Louisa Charlesworth, author of "Ministering Children," "The Ministry of Life," etc. Those who have read the books of this author need not be told that this one is very interesting; we think it surpasses any she has sent forth. It is the history of an English farmer and of the family to which he belonged. We learn the manner of agricultural life in that old and crowded land, the condition and character of the mass, where hired laborers are never expected to rise above their station of servants; and we learn, too, how noble is the effort of a Christian family to sustain their faith when they have not only no help from the rector of their church, but actually, hindrances. The unfaithful pastor and the faithful member of the Establishment are graphically pictured, and three important lessons are taught, namely, the worth of the Liturgy, the benefit of regular attendance at church, and the importance of the family Bible. We hope this book will be widely circulated. It is excellent and very entertaining.

From M. DOOLADY, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

THE SHADOW IN THE HOUSE: A Novel. By John Saunders. This is a book likely to attract considerable attention in literary circles. It is decidedly dramatic in its character, and overflows with the poetry of description and sentiment. As a novel it is of the narratory order, and rather scanty in incident. Price $1 00.

From JOSEPH HARRIS, Rochester, New York:—

THE RURAL ANNUAL AND HORTICULTURAL DI-RECTORY, for the Year 1861: Containing Treatises on Matters of Interest to the Farmer, the Fruit-grower, and the Horticulturist. Illustrated with eighty engravings. Price 25 cents.

From DINSMORE & Co., New York:—

DINSMORE'S RAILROAD AND STEAM NAVIGATION GUIDE, for the United States, Canada, etc., Janu-ary, 1861: Containing a new Railroad Map, and many valuable Tables of interest and importance to the trav-eller. Price 25 cents.

From CROSBY, NICHOLS, LEE, & Co., Boston:—

MARION GRAHAM; or, "Higher than Happiness." By Meta Lander, author of "Light on the Dark River," "The Broken Bud," etc. This is one of the class of sentimental novels—the term used in its best sense—the reading of which is calculated to arouse aspirations of a pure and noble nature in the heart. The style in which it is written partakes of that delicacy and grace which characterize the writings of a refined, talented, and noble woman. Price $1 25.

From A. MORRIS, Richmond, Va., through S. HAZARD, Jr., Philadelphia:—

FLOWERS OF HOPE AND MEMORY: A Collection of Poems. By Cornelia J. M. Jordan. Our thanks are due the talented authoress for a copy of this work. Without according it extraordinary literary or poetic merit, we assure our readers that it is a volume that will awake the sympathies and touch the heart of every one who has loved a friend or lost a little one. It is emphatically a book for the home circle, inspired with deep religious sentiment and blossoming with the flowers of home feelings and affections.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

GODEY FOR APRIL, 1861.—"The Pet Donkey." A pet plate, and one of unequalled fineness and beauty. Examine it critically; see the lights and shades; examine the faces, even in their minuteness how beautiful. It is a masterpiece of engraving.

Our Fashion-plate. Some doubt was expressed when we commenced these fashions whether we would continue them. Among others, our contemporaries said they were too expensive, except for an occasional plate; but as we do not use any lures to get subscribers, by giving in a January number what we would not give in any other number of the year, "a custom more honored in the breach than in the observance," we still continue these beautiful fashions, and that they will continue to grow more beautiful, let this and future numbers prove. As we have stated before, but as it is a fact that we wish to impress upon our subscribers, we again state, that in no country in Europe, or in this country, are there any such fashions published, and we challenge a contradiction. We have continued and will continue them, notwithstanding the immense additional expense, knowing that the American people will sustain us. The best will always be sought after.

The extension-plate of spring fashions in this number is entirely extra, and does not interfere with the usual variety in our Book. This plate, and the one in the March number is a spring offering to our subscribers.

OUR APRIL FASHIONS.—We are indebted to Mr. Letson, of the celebrated house of Messrs. A. T. Stewart & Co., of New York, for the patterns of Figs. 2 and 3 in the extension-plate of spring fashions; also for other patterns, to Stewart & Co., Messrs. Lord & Taylor, and the Brodie, all of New York, and Messrs. T. W. Evans & Co. of Philadelphia. All of these firms take an interest in the Lady's Book.

IMPOSTOR—That deaf and dumb woman turned up again. Every year we have to advertise this woman. We have done it for three successive years. Here she is again, and, before publishing the letter, we will state that she is not deaf and dumb—even this is an imposture. And we will also add that, in every case of this kind, persons are induced to subscribe on account of the low price at which the Book is offered. In this case it will be seen that two dollars is the amount, when our price is three. This alone ought to open the eyes of people, for what is to pay our agent when he or she offers a work at less than the subscription price? We again repeat that we have no agents soliciting subscriptions.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

HARRISBURG, Jan. 23, 1861.

L. A. GODEY, Esq.: DEAR SIR—Some time last fall I subscribed for your magazine. The subscription was solicited by a young lady representing herself to be deaf and dumb. I paid her $2 00. A number of others in Reading subscribed for various magazines. I have not received the January or February number. Will you oblige me by writing to me at your earliest convenience on the subject? B.

ANOTHER IMPOSTOR—Some fellow is travelling in the West announcing himself as a member of one of the largest distributing periodical agencies in the country. His card reads: "Wholesale agents for 'Godey's Lady's Book,' 'The Atlantic Monthly,' and all standard periodicals. Office, 327 Broadway, New York." The respectable firm that he pretends to represent has no office on Broadway, and they have no travelling agents. He ought to be arrested.

THIS IS TRUE—We are head and shoulders above the circulation of any magazine, and have never offered a bribe in the shape of a premium. The Binghampton Democrat understands that when it says:—

"The immense increase in the circulation of Godey—having doubled itself in the last three years—is a convincing proof of the superiority of the work, if the work itself was not sufficient evidence. And when it is considered that not a bribe in the shape of a premium has ever been offered, it shows that Godey's Lady's Book stands first in the hearts of American ladies, who subscribe for the sake of the Book and not the premium. The literature of the Lady's Book is by the first writers in America, and has always been remarkable for its high literary and moral character. Clergymen recommend the Book, and it can be read aloud in the family circle. The matter is far superior to that of any other magazine, having a healthy and instructive tone."

As superior to every other magazine ever published was pronounced our January number; yet our notices now say that succeeding numbers are even superior to that. We are sure that our March number was, and we invite public opinion as regards this number.

PIKE CO. Miss.

HAVING had occasion during the holidays to use more cakes, etc. than heretofore (and living in the country, had not the assistance of confectioners), we found your most excellent receipts of more value than three times the subscription of the Book. Although I am only a little girl, the Lady's Book is one of my special luxuries. I will send you another club in a few days.

Respectfully yours,

M. E. V.

OUR MUSICAL COLUMN.

Musical Matters in the City.—The activity in opera and concert announced in our last has by no means continued, and the evident close of what is generally termed the musical season will be in striking contrast with the début of its opening. The season is not yet at an end, however, and it is the earnest desire in musical circles that one more passing gleam of opera may be granted to longing eyes ere the Academy shall be locked up or handed over to the carpenters for the summer.

The Classical Sources of Karl Wolfsohn, at the Foyer of the Academy, have been well attended; and, at the Musical Fund Hall, the delightful Rehearsals of the Germania Orchestra (now, and for some time, a prominent Philadelphia institution) have made Saturday afternoons a time of sweet sounds and of fluttering among the ladies. Indeed, so far multiplied have been these elegant reunions that we are beginning to have grave fears of our white cravat. Will it last the season through, we wonder? And so we are consoled even for the loss of little Patti, and clumsy Brignoli, and obese Amedeo.

Baumbeek's Operatic Selections.—This is a collection of about one hundred favorite airs, selected from nearly fifty operas, and arranged in an easy manner for the piano-forte, with the fingers marked for beginners. It is published in the oblong form, at the low price of 75 cents, containing an amount of music which, if purchased in sheet form, would cost ten times the sum. Russell & Tolman, Boston, are the publishers, but we can supply it to any address. The melodies, of course, are without the words.

New Sheet Music.—From Erth, Pond, & Co., New York, whose issues are among the most popular of the day, we have to notice since our last the publication of the following: 'Tis but a Little Faded Flower, ballad, by Thomas, sung by Madame Bishop, 35 cents; Virginia Belle, by Foster, composer of Gentle Annie, 25 cents; As Pants the Hart, a beautiful psalm for four voices, with soprano solo, 30 cents; Bittle-It Polka, double length, by Mason, 50 cents; and three beautiful ballads by R. Storrs Willis, Twilight, Nannerl, and My Baby's Shoe, the last, a mother's song, affecting enough to draw tears from every eye, price of each ballad 25 cents.

The following are published by Russell & Tolman, Boston: Shooting Star, galop brillante, by Kielblock, 30 cents; Udolo Polka, by Hess, 30 cents; Warblings at Eve, Song without Words, by Brinley Richards, 30 cents; The Long, Weary Day, transcribed by Mills, 35 cents; Good News from Home, a beautiful transcription by Wm. Vincent Wallace of this favorite melody, 50 cents; Twelve Songs without Words, by Otto Dresel, a delightful collection of melodies for the advanced performer, $1 00; and Teach me Thy Ways, sacred quartette with soprano solo, a splendid composition for church choirs or parlor singing, 30 cents. We also again refer to the list of music, mostly songs and ballads, from the same publishers, as noticed in our musical column last month.

We can furnish our friends with any of the above, as well as pieces named in the January, February, and March numbers, on receipt of price. We also repeat the offer of a copy of the new and popular song, Poor Ben the Piper, to all who order music to the extent of two dollars from any of our lists. Address J. Starr Holloway, Philadelphia. J. STARR HOLLOWAY.

The postage on the Lady's Book, if paid three months in advance at the office where it is received, is four and a half cents for three monthly numbers.

THE PENNSYLVANIA CENTRAL RAILROAD.

To our friends who are contemplating a summer journey we can recommend no pleasanter one than a trip over this well-conducted line. The cars are protected from dust and cinders, and are provided with every convenience; and the night cars which are attached to the trains have been tried sufficiently long to make their merits known. Notwithstanding the difficulties and dangers in crossing the Alleghanies, it is a road remarkably free from accident, while its time equals that of any other.

After leaving Philadelphia, the direction of the road is through a beautiful and highly cultivated region until it reaches the Susquehanna, when the face of the country assumes a bolder and more picturesque appearance. The landscape of the Juniata, whose course is followed for so many miles by the Pennsylvania Central, is in the highest degree romantic; and so many delightful summer haunts might be found among its valleys that we wonder pleasure-seekers have not before this established themselves there during the warm season.

But the greatest enjoyment and greatest wonder is yet to come. Let every one avoid losing this part of the road by passing over it in the night. We refer to the crossing of the Alleghanies. Here one may behold the triumph of modern engineering. The train ascends, not by imperceptible gradations, but boldly and rapidly, in a zigzag course, by a series of steep grades. The result of this is that the road in advance may often be viewed from the car windows, appearing like a branch road, joining the main nearly at right angles, until the astonished traveller finds himself, by a sudden sweep of the train, passing over this very track. The mountain on whose side the ascent is made rises out of sight on the one hand; while on the other, close beside the track, the valley sinks hundreds of feet below. Farther off towers mountain over mountain for miles away, forming a landscape unsurpassed in this part of the world for grandeur and sublimity.

The ascent accomplished, the train is suddenly immersed in the darkness of the great tunnel, which is nearly a mile in length, and passes through the mountain at an elevation of 2,200 feet above the sea.

A person having once travelled this road has but one thing to regret—that the day is not long enough for him to enjoy all its beauties on one trip.

Having reached Pittsburg, if the traveller be northerly bound, he will proceed on his way by the Cleveland and Pittsburg Railroad, the cars of which he will find commodious and comfortable; while the road itself, after following for a short distance the course of the Ohio River, and affording an occasional view of a steamer ploughing her way up or down that beautiful stream, strikes through a fertile and undulating country, pausing for a moment at pretty villages and thriving towns, until at last it reaches Cleveland.

If the destination be westward, the Pittsburg, Columbus, and Cincinnati Railroad possesses advantages over other routes. Its speed is faster, and the scenery through which it passes is more varied, and it gives also to the traveller an opportunity of visiting Columbus, a quiet little city, whose chief object of interest is the State Capitol, which, next to the Capitol at Washington, is the finest building of its kind in the United States.

Both these last mentioned roads are well conducted, and furnished with every convenience for passengers; and the increasing business which they receive proves that they are becoming more and more appreciated by the travelling public.

EXTRACT from a letter:—

I cannot close, Mr. Godey, without telling you how thankful I feel to you for your efforts in behalf of the ladies. I have been a subscriber to your Lady's Book only one year, but I think will continue to be one as long as I live. I am a young wife, and I feel that you are helping me discharge my duty as a wife, and mistress of a family, more than any one else could. I had as leave think of doing without one meal every day, as my Lady's Book. Yours truly, Mrs. L. S., Arkansas.

As the purpose of the Lady's Book is to give valuable information that may be preserved, we deem it our duty to insert the following:—

"A person apparently dead by drowning, is not always beyond reach of resuscitation. Presence of mind and intelligent direction will, in many times, recall the faculties supposed to be forever lost. Let the rescued body be rubbed dry and enveloped in hot blankets, as a first step, and, if possible, place it near a quick fire. External friction is next indicated, and let it be continued until the skin is a-glow. Hot water at the feet, and bottles of hot water under each armpit, added to the rubbing with flannel, will expedite a return of the circulation; while, if in any way possible, a little spirits should be poured down the throat of the patient. While this is being done, let the head be raised by a pillow of moderate height, and irritate the nose by pungent salts, or snuff to excite action and sensation; and lastly, endeavor to imitate respiration by closing one nostril, blowing into the other with a bellows, and pressing upon the chest as in the natural process of breathing. It must be borne in mind, however, that the back of the neck must be pressed to expel the air thus forced into it, after the manner of natural breathing.

"By the very competent medical practitioner who gives us this information, we are informed that restoration has been effected by this means by constant perseverance, after eight hours' suspension—a matter which should be impressed upon the memory of every one, as life may be restored long after—to all appearances—it has been manifestly extinct."

A NICE POINT.—Some ladies have objected because we address them as "esquires." Now, let us argue this point. A lady writes us a letter, and, assuming a name, she signs it "J. Smith." Now, would it not be presumed that said J. Smith was a masculine biped? That is one point. Now, suppose she signed it "Jane Smith." How are we to know whether Jane has been hooped? that is, with the hoop matrimonial—the ring. And again, suppose a lady signs a letter "Frank E. Smith." Would you not—no, not that—but would you not affirm that said Frank was a decided pan alconic character? Most undoubtedly. This is the way the ladies bother us. We are willing to Mrs. or Miss them—but we should be sorry to do the latter, for they are always welcome to us; but, ladies, dear ladies, why do you not, when you sign your names, put the prefix (Miss) Jane Smith, or Miss Frank E. Smith, or Mrs. John Smith, or whatever your names may be? Please try and remember this.

CAUTION.—When sending money, use a wafer in sealing your letter, in addition to the sealing matter that is on the envelope. The want of this precaution has cost us an immense amount of money.

We ask attention to the advertisement of the Illinois Central Railroad, on the fourth page of our cover. Here is a chance offered to all to obtain farms on reasonable terms. We found the following in an exchange paper:—

"A VERIFIED ESTIMATE.—In the year 1851, Mr. Robert Rantoul, of Massachusetts, at the time Solicitor of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, put forth a pamphlet, in which he boldly asserted that if our prairies could be speedily opened by the construction of railroads, the increase of population in Illinois would be one hundred and ten per cent. in the next ten years. Probably the statement of Mr. Rantoul had a greater influence on the minds of capitalists than those of any other writer at that time, and the result of the late census is a remarkable illustration of the accuracy and ability with which Mr. Rantoul studied the progress of emigration westward, and verifies his prediction that the great volume of this emigration would settle on the prairie soil of Illinois, because of the wonderful ease with which it could be converted into cultivated farms. The amount expended on railroads in this State since 1850 is nearly one hundred millions of dollars. In the same period the population has increased one hundred and two per cent.—from 851,470 in 1850 to 1,739,496 in 1860. On the line of the Illinois Central Railroad the percentage of increase has been very much greater, being one hundred and forty-two per cent. There are forty-nine counties touched by this road, which show a population of 814,891 in 1860 against 335,589 in 1850, a gain of 479,293. In the fifty-three counties not touched by the Illinois Central Railroad the increase is only seventy-six per cent. These counties in 1850 contained a population of 613,875. In 1860 the same counties have 924,605."

SPEAKING OF OUR NEEDLES, here is one among the many favorable notices we receive of our needles, and we select the following for reasons that the letter itself will show. Let it be remembered that Brooklyn is opposite New York, and three minutes and two cents take you from one city to the other.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Feb. 2, 1861.

L. A. GODEY: SIR—Please send a package of your celebrated needles. I cannot find any in the city that will equal them. Also, a package of copying paper.

Mrs. H.

TO THOSE WHO PURCHASE THE LADY'S BOOK OF DEALERS, AND TO THOSE WHO RECEIVE THEIR SUPPLIES FROM THEM.—We wish all such to understand that if they find any advertisement in the Book, placed loosely in there, that they are not from us. We are induced to give this notice, which will also be found on the top of the first page of our Book, because advertisements are placed in the Book obnoxious to us and to others, and we object most strenuously to their being put there; but we cannot control them, as we sell our Book in large quantities to those who sell to others, and who, themselves being publishers of books, put these advertisements in the Lady's Book for the purpose of distributing them.

CITY RAILROADS.—What a revolution city railroads have made! Everybody rides in them. Very few now keep carriages; there is no necessity of them. We frequently ride up in the cars with a lady who is worth in her own right $2,000,000. It is not necessary for the preservation of her dignity that she should keep a carriage, and few do now, except those who feel that necessity.

CAMDEN AND AMBOY RAILROAD COMPANY.—Nothing speaks more loudly in favor of the careful management of this company than the unexampled prosperity which has attended all its business transactions, and all its efforts to subserve the public interests. For a number of years past we have known a number of the directors and managers of the company, as well as a number of the principal employees, and we do not think that a more prudent and public spirited set of men than the former, or a more obliging and accommodating body of agents than the latter, can be found on any railroad in the country. In saying this much, we repeat nothing more than the admissions made by the public sentiment, and by individuals of every class, who have been in the habit of using that railroad for business or pleasure. As an evidence of the prosperity of the road, their last dividend was six per cent. for six months, and a bonus of twenty-five per cent. payable in stock.

FEMALE MANNERS.—Scarcely anything is so offensive in the manners of a lady, who moves in good society, as that of ostentation. By this is meant that kind of manner which savors too much of self-appreciation and display—indicating a disposition to make herself over conspicuous—and which, in short, is the acting out of a spirit of self-confidence and conceit. This appears badly enough when exhibited by one of the opposite sex, but, when seen in a young lady, it is quite intolerable. Liability to embarrassment from every slight change of circumstances, and an awkward bashfulness, are not, of course, at all desirable; but between these and an ostentatious manner, there is a happy medium, consisting of a due combination of confidence and modesty, which renders a lady pleasing to all with whom she associates. If, however, either of these extremes must be followed, it will be found that diffidence will be more readily pardoned than ostentation. And yet, while ostentatiousness of manner is to be avoided, it is necessary to guard against any appearance of studied reserve. Persons are not unfrequently met with whose manners leave upon the minds of those with whom they come in contact, the painful impression of being regarded with distrust or suspicion. Wherever this trait appears, it is almost certain to excite feelings of anger or prejudice. Most persons will bear anything with more patience than to be told, either directly or indirectly, that they are unworthy of confidence. A significant smile, or nod, or look, with a third person, which is not intended to be understood by the individual with whom conversation is being carried on is a marked violation of propriety, and has often caused a deeply wounded sensibility, and sometimes the loss of friendship. While a lady should studiously avoid everything of this kind, her manners should be characterized by a happy frankness, such as will, in whatever circumstances she may be placed, leave no doubt of her sincerity.

SHADOW BUFF.—Shadow Buff is played in the following manner: If the window happen to have a white curtain, it may be fastened at the bottom, so as to make a smooth still surface; in the absence of a white curtain, a tablecloth may be fastened upon the wall. The one chosen to act the part of the Blind Man sits before the curtain with his back to the light and to his companions. When all is arranged, they pass by on the opposite side of the room, so as to cast their shadow on the white surface. They may put on turbans or shawls, or walk lame, or in any other manner disguise themselves; and he must tell who they are, if he can.

A HINT TO DISTRESSED UNCLES.—Our good friend Avunculus was intrusted with the care of a child for a couple of hours. He rode a cock-horse to Banbury Cross; he ran up the hill with Jack and Jill; he expatiated merrily on the agricultural distress of Little Bo-peep, who had lost all her sheep; and ate bread and butter an infinity of times with Master Tom Tucker; he played at coach and horses; he crowed, and grunted, and brayed with a fidelity worthy of Herr Von Joel, and laid bare all his wealth of nursery lore. His young charge was in ecstasies; it laughed, and clapped its hands, and opened its eyes and ears eagerly for more. The success was undoubted; but, alas! what was fun to the young child was fatigue to the elderly uncle; his strength and memory had alike come to an end, and there was still a big hour left for dandling and romping. Should he pause, but for five minutes, he knew only too well the fatality that would infallibly ensue. The child would certainly cry! probably howl! perhaps kick! and then what was he to do? Not a woman within reach, and he unused to the rebellious ways of children! The crisis was alarming. At last, in his despair—for he had been doing a “ba-a-lamb!” with very indifferent ecclat—he hit upon the following bright expedient: “Now, Master Jackey,” he exclaimed, glowingly, “we’ll have a fine game! Let us play at by-by.” So saying, he closed his eyes, and so did the child. Ten minutes afterwards, Avunculus opened half an eyelid to reconnoitre; the trick had answered almost beyond his hopes; the child was fast asleep! He removed the young picture of innocence to the sofa as tenderly as any mother; and “Uncle” continued his newspaper with the greatest comfort until “Mamma” came home to release him from his difficulties. N. B. Remember! the best game to play with a playful child—when there is a great disparity of years between the two playfellows—is “By-by.”

We consider this a very great compliment from a religious paper, and one bearing the high character of the Richmond Christian Intelligencer. We thank the editor:—

“We have received the January number of Godey’s Lady’s Book, and have to say, without exaggeration, that it is beyond comparison, the FIRST periodical of its kind in this country, if not in the world. The reading matter is carefully prepared for the ‘home circle,’ and, without fear of poisoning their minds, parents may safely place the Book in the hands of the young folks. The sting of the serpent lurks not amid the flowers, as in the purely sensation productions of the day.”

TO THOSE WHO WISH TO BEAT DOWN.—It is as well for all to understand that we never allow ourselves to be “beat down” in our price; what we publish we adhere to. Some persons try the experiment, offering us three dollars for two copies of the book. Once for all, our prices are published, and those we abide by.

“THE BEST IS ALWAYS THE CHEAPEST.”—Our motto for this year has been fully realized, as our various letters will show. The public has become assured of the fact that for a few cents more they get quadruple the matter they get in any other magazine, and tenfold more beautiful.

PHOTOGRAPHIC portrait visiting cards are now all the rage.

THE Water-Cure World, of Brattleboro, pays the following compliment to our very able editor of the Health Department, Dr. John S. Wilson, of Columbus, Ga. We find hundreds of them in our exchanges:—

“Godey’s Lady’s Book for February is promptly on hand, as usual. Its fashion-plate, double size, is the attraction with its numerous readers. ‘A High Walk in Life,’ on steel, is very pleasing, and a great many of wood engravings adorn the number. ‘Hoops and Farthingales’ proves that the crinoline fever of modern days is but a revival of an ancient fashion. We are very glad to perceive that, while caring for the fashions, Godey has some thought of health, and presents each month a sensible article upon the subject, from Dr. J. S. Wilson, of Columbus, Ga. We wish such a department could be found in every magazine in the country.”

We can furnish Dr. Wilson’s book for $1 25.

The wedding-dress of the Princess of Polignac, who married the rich banker’s son, M. Mires, in Paris, is described by Le Follet. It was of moire, quite plain in the skirt, but with a long train, high body, buttoned in front with fine pearls; an English lace collar, fastened at the throat by a diamond brooch; the bouquet of orange-blossom, fastened at the waist; the coiffure with a diadem of white lilac and roses; the hair fastened behind under a rich comb of diamonds; an immense veil of English lace thrown over the head and falling nearly to the bottom of the dress, completed this distingue toilet. The second bridesmaid had on a dress of white silk, trimmed round the skirt with three rows of pinked silk ruching, the third row carried up to the waist. The bouquet of orange-flowers placed in the bow of the sash, which was also trimmed with ruches. A diadem wreath of white roses and lilies of the valley, over which was thrown the large, square veil of plain tulle, simply hemmed. The third bridesmaid, who was young and beautiful, wore a dress at once simple and elegant. It was composed of white tulle, very fine and thin, covered with pink flounces of the same. A high, full body, with a ruche round the throat. A wide scarf of white silk, with fringed ends round the waist, fastened in a bow at the side, in which was placed the orange-flower bouquet. A diadem wreath of white moss rose-buds in the hair, over which a large veil, also of tulle, reaching nearly to the feet.

DON’T LEND YOUR LADY’S BOOK.—Don’t lend your Lady’s Book; let those who wish it subscribe. Don’t let any one bribe you by saying, Lend me your magazine, and I will lend you mine. You have everything in the Book, without exchanging with a neighbor.

PATTERNS FOR INFANTS’ DRESSES, OR INFANTS’ WARDROBES.—Our fashion editor has supplied a great many wardrobes for infants lately, and in every case has given great satisfaction. She has facilities for furnishing these articles better and cheaper than any other person. The vast influence that her connection with the Lady’s Book gives her induces importers and others to submit to her their earliest fashions. To those who cannot afford the articles, made-up paper patterns can be sent, which will be fac-similes of the originals. We cannot publish the prices, as the postage varies according to the size of the articles ordered, and that we have to pay in advance. For particulars, address Fashion Editor (not Mrs. Hale), care of L. A. Godey, Philadelphia. All other patterns furnished as usual.

The Chimney (Fig. 4). Cut out the outside form of the figure, and also double the size of pattern; bend over at the dotted lines for the square, gum or paste the remaining end, paste on to the inside of the square, and when dry put it through the hole in the roof, and turn over the ends, and fix them to the inside of the top. Now place the roof on the front, back, and sides, which you have already constructed, and you will have a very pretty little toy-house. But to make the whole more complete, if you wish to take a little more time about it, you can easily form a railing and little gate around your cottage, which you will find will be well worth the extra trouble, as it will make your house more finished and perfect.

paper, the stiffer the better. If you make your house on a large scale; but for the purpose of illustration it will be necessary to keep every part in proportion to the whole. Cut out with your scissors the form of Fig. 2, double the size of diagram. The windows may be cut out with a penknife, and also the three black lines in the door, doubling the dotted line to open it. Fig. 2 forms the front, back, and sides of the house; bending the paper at the dotted lines on the inside for the support of the house; take a little gum or paste and join together by the slip at the end; cut out a piece of paper half as large again, in proportion to the back, front, and sides of your house, for a stand, and fix with gum the end pieces to the foundation.

The Roof (Fig. 3). Cut out a piece of paper the outside form, also double the size of the pattern, and with a penknife cut through the black lines, and bend over the dotted one at each end. Having previously cut out the hole for the chimney, gum or paste the ends on to the inside of

The Railings (Fig. 5). Cut out two slips of paper the length you may require to go round your cottage, and the same distance apart as in the pattern, and then cut out a number of smaller ones, of the shape and size of Fig. 6; take care to keep them all of one size, and then with a little gum or paste fix on near the end of Fig. 5, and at equal distances (Fig. 7). When you have finished, you can fix them to the ground and the rail by small pieces of paper and gum on the inside.

The Gate (Fig. 8.) This is made in the same manner as the rails, and may be done the same size as the figure.

When completed, it may be fixed by gumming two very small pieces of paper to act as hinges; and your house and its inclosure will be complete.

PRINCE KUNG (says a correspondent of the Times at Pekin) appears to be about thirty-one or thirty-two years old; he is rather short, and would be handsome in the face if the mouth and chin did not spoil the other features, as they do all high-born Tartars, by making them look sheepish. On visiting the Earl of Elgin the other day he was dressed in a puce-colored satin robe, with the Imperial dragon coiled in a circle, about a foot in diameter, and embroidered in gold, on his breast, shoulders, and back. He wore a common Chinese cap, without any ornament. He remained over two hours, and during the conversation after lunch said, "that until our visit this year they did not know that India was merely a province of the British empire; they formerly believed Great Britain to be a very small island, the population of which was so large that more than half were obliged to live in ships."

HAIR DYE IN FOUR DIFFERENT COLORS.—The most perfect article of this kind, manufactured by the celebrated Berger, of Paris, is now for sale in this city by Fouladoux, in Chestnut street above Fourth. It will color the hair black, brown, light brown, or of a very light almost flaxen color. There is no deception in this, for we have seen the article tried, and pronounce it, without any exception, the very best hair dye we have ever seen. Those who order will please specify what kind they want—as one case only contains one particular dye. In addition to the above, Mr. Fouladoux manufactures wigs and fronts, and furnishes every article in the hair line.

A GENTLEMAN, in advertising for a wife, says: "It would be well if the lady were possessed of competency sufficient to secure her against excessive grief in case of accident occurring to her companion."

A LETTER ON ITS TRAVELS.—A correspondent mentions an instance of what he considers gross ignorance, but which was most likely simply carelessness on the part of the London post-office officials. In May last, he posted a letter in London for Hungary; he addressed it—name of the town, via France, Hungary, but forgot to add "Austria." The letter never arrived. At the post-office in London they seem to have taken it for granted that "Hungary" is somewhere in India, and that "via France" means it should go by way of Marseilles, and so to Calcutta it went; then to Lucknow, Kurrachee, Bombay, Madras, Galle, and finally to Hong-Kong. Here, at last, a highly-educated post-office phenomenon wrote on it, "Try Hungary, part of Austria, Europe," and sent it back. So at last, after eight months' traveling, it arrived at its destination.

VERY pretty, and worthy our Arm-Chair:—

HOW IT CAME ABOUT.

BY ELEANOR C. DONNELLY.

SHE sat in the shade of the portico,
 Busy with some sweet task;
 The Spanish eyes and the forehead low,
 Hid by the airy masque
 Of the dusky hair that had rippled down
 As he sprang o'er the flower-bed—
 In sooth, she had purposed to frame a frown,
 But she framed a smile instead!

He took her hand in that certain way,
 More eloquent than words—
 No sound fell into the silent day,
 Save the chirp of the orchard birds;
 Her work lay close by her side unscann'd,
 The book on her knee unread—
 In sooth, she had purposed to loose her hand,
 But he caught the other instead!

And when with the wealth of the rosy June,
 The bees to their hives had got,
 He leaned, through the lull of the sleepy noon,
 And whispered a—you know what!
 She swayed from his earnest eyes, and low
 She buried her blushing head—
 In sooth, she had purposed to say "No! no!"
 But she murmured "Yes!" instead!

LITERARY CREATION.—Men are becoming more deeply imbued with a spirit of a common humanity, and know and participate in each other's intellectual condition. There is a remarkable proof of this in the perpetually repeated instances of concurrent mental action between unconnected individuals. Not only does almost every new mechanical contrivance originate with half a dozen different inventors at the same moment, but the same thing is true of literary creation. If you conceive a striking thought, a beautiful image, an apposite illustration, which you know to be original with yourself, and delay for a twelvemonth to vindicate your priority of claim by putting it on record, you will find a dozen scattered authors simultaneously uttering the same thing. There are in the human mind unfathomable depths, out of which gush unbidden the well-springs of poetry and of thought; there are mines unilluminated even by the lamp of consciousness, where the intellect toils in silent, sleepless seclusion, and sends up, by invisible machinery, the ore of hidden veins to be smelted and refined in the light of open day. The press, which has done so much to reveal man to man, thereby to promote the reciprocal action of each upon his fellow, has established new sympathies between even these mysterious abysses of our wonderful and fearful being, and thus contributed to bring about a oneness of character which unmistakably manifests itself in oneness of thought and oneness of speech.

SOME ladies were conversing one day in our presence upon the "receipts" published in the Lady's Book; one of them observed, and we will say truly, "Well, the 'Receipts' of the Lady's Book have given Mr. Godey's family many a good dinner." If we must explain, we must. She meant the receipts of money.

THE best $3 00 and the best $2 00 monthly are offered one year for $3 50. Godey's Lady's Book and Arthur's Home Magazine.

VILLA IN THE BRACKETED STYLE.

Designed expressly for Godry's Lady's Book by SAMUEL SLOAN, Architect, Philadelphia.

PERSPECTIVE VIEW.

FIRST FLOOR.

First floor.—A the drawing-room, 15 by 24 feet; B the sitting-room, 16 by 19 feet; C the dining-room, 15 by 23 feet; D the entrance-hall, 11 by 11 feet, which narrows to 7 feet on the rear and contains the main stairway; E the kitchen, 14 by 18 feet; F the back kitchen, 12 by 12 feet; G G the porches.

The second story contains five chambers of large dimensions; and the attic will have sufficient height to make three comfortable and well lighted rooms.

SECOND STORY.

The cost for erecting this design of brick or stone, near Philadelphia, finished in a plain, substantial manner, would be $6,500.

EXTRACT of a letter from an Indiana editor:—
The Book is worth fifty dollars a year to me and my family.

HAIR ORNAMENTS.—Ladies wishing hair made into bracelets, pins (which are very beautiful), necklaces, or ear-rings, can be accommodated by our Fashion Editor. A very large number of orders have recently been filled, and the articles have given great satisfaction.

We give the prices at which we will send these beautiful articles:—

- Breastpins, from $4 to $12.
- Ear-rings, from $4 50 to $10.
- Bracelets, from $3 to $15.
- Rings, from $1 50 to $3.
- Necklaces, from $6 to $15.
- Fob-chains, from $6 to $12.
- The Charms of Faith, Hope, and Charity, $4 50.
- Hair Studs from $5 50 to $11 the set.
- Sleeve Buttons from $6 50 to $11 the set.

HAIR is at once the most delicate and lasting of our materials, and survives us like love. It is so light, so gentle, so escaping from the idea of death, that, with a lock of hair belonging to a child or friend, we may almost look up to heaven and compare notes with the angelic nature—may almost say: "I have a piece of thee here, not unworthy of thy being now."

A CONSTANTINOPLE letter says: "The Russian General Sebastianoff arrived a few days ago in Pera from Mount Athos, where he has been employed for nearly two years, with a staff of no fewer than thirty assistants, taking photographic copies of the biblical and other ancient MSS. to be found in the various convents of the mountain. He is said to have secured 16,000 negatives, amongst which are copies of an Old and New Testament of the ninth century, and one of the Psalms of the seventh. From the positives of the copies thus made lithographs will be taken in St. Petersburg, at the expense of the government, for presentation to the chief national libraries of Europe."

PHILADELPHIA AGENCY.

No order attended to unless the cash accompanies it.

All persons requiring answers by mail must send a post-office stamp; and for all articles that are to be sent by mail, stamps must be sent to pay return postage.

Be particular, when writing, to mention the town, county, and State you reside in. Nothing can be made out of post-marks.

Mrs. M. L. De L.—Sent comb, ear-rings, &c. January 22d.

Miss L. M. R.—Sent orné ball 22d.

J. H. S.—Sent hair-work 22d.

Mrs. C. D. A.—Sent pattern child's dress 22d.

Chemistry for the Young.

387. THERE does not exist a metal which may not be combined with sulphur by means direct or indirect; and, considering that sulphur is very extensively distributed, it will not be wondered at that so many metals occur in nature as sulphurets. The most usual method of forming a sulphuret consists, as we have seen, in bringing together sulphur and a metal under the influence of heat, but various other methods are known to chemists. Thus, when hydrosulphuric acid is passed through metallic solutions the precipitate which results is a sulphuret; and again, when a sulphate, or combination of sulphuric acid, is heated, in contact with charcoal, in close vessels, the result is again a sulphuret. The reason of this latter effect will be obvious when it is remembered that a sulphate only differs from a sulphuret in this—that it contains oxygen, which the latter does not; hence, if we heat it with a body greedy of oxygen (such as charcoal), a sulphuret should theoretically result. Practice confirms theory in this respect.

388. Put a little sulphuret of iron just developed into a test-tube; add hydrochloric acid, and apply heat; the result will be the evolution of hydrosulphuric acid—easily recognizable by its disgusting smell, or by its quality of blackening a slip of paper dipped in a solution of acetate of lead. Most sulphurets, when treated thus with hydrochloric acid, evolve hydrosulphuric acid gas, and any substance which yields hydrosulphuric acid when thus treated may be considered as a sulphuret. Sulphuret of iron also yields hydrosulphuric acid when mixed with sulphuric acid and water, as we have seen (125), and by this means, indeed, is hydrosulphuric acid usually generated in practice.

389. Sulphur, we mentioned, is very widely distributed through the animal and vegetable kingdom, being necessary to the existence of all animals. Most persons may have remarked the blackening of a silver spoon which has been employed in scooping out an egg. This blackening depends on the combination of silver with sulphur, silver being one of the metals the sulphuret of which (130, 223) is black. For the purpose of showing this effect with precision, boil an egg hard, and thrust in it a silver spoon; let the spoon remain there for ten minutes or a quarter of an hour; then remove it, and observe the blackening. A far more delicate test of sulphur, however, consists of a solution of oxide of lead in liquor potassæ, which we will proceed to make.

390. Take a solution of acetate of lead, and add to it liquor ammoniac until all the oxide has been thrown down; collect the oxide, wash it well, and add liquor potassæ. After boiling for an instant in a Florence flask, filter, and keep the solution in a well-stoppered bottle. It is a combination of oxide of lead with potash, and a most delicate test for minute portions of sulphur.

391. Into a test-tube put a small piece of white flannel, no matter how old or how much washed; add a little of the test solution, and boil. The flannel will immediately blacken, owing to the formation of black sulphuret of lead; the sulphur being contributed by the flannel itself. In like manner may feathers be also demonstrated to contain sulphur.

392. Take a little Glauber's salt, which is a combination of sulphuric acid with soda, and therefore called sulphate of soda, or a little sulphate of lime, and mix either of these intimately with an equal bulk of charcoal. Put the mixture into an iron spoon; and, placing the spoon over a fire, dry the mixture well; when dry, ram the mixture into a tobacco-pipe until the latter is two-thirds filled. Now fit over the surface a disk of paper, and over the paper some slightly moistened powdered clay, so as to exclude the air. Expose the whole to red, or, still better, white heat, remove the tobacco-pipe, allow it gradually to cool, and when cold scoop out the clay until you arrive at the boundary defined by the paper (now carbonized) disk; next scoop out the contents, put them into a test-tube, add hydrochloric acid, and recognize by the smell, and by a slip of paper dipped in acetate of lead (388, 389) or potash lead solution, the hydrosulphuric acid which escapes. Hence the sulphate must have become changed by heating with charcoal to a sulphuret (388), otherwise hydrosulphuric acid would not have been evolved.

Centre-Table Gossip.

LIST OF GARDEN FLOWERS.

THERE are many people who have not time for annuals, and cannot afford regular bedding plants every spring to brighten their borders with at little expenditure of time and trouble. For such we have selected from "The Country Gentleman" a list of hardy perennials, that will be found to remain from year to year with very little care and attention.

Myosotis—Forget-me-not. A well-known, delicate little flower, almost as hardy as grass, growing and spreading rapidly in clusters; light blue with white eyes.

Primrose. Most of them have yellow flowers. Desirable.

Oriental Poppy. A very showy flower, five or six inches in diameter; orange-scarlet in color, with a large black spot at the base of each petal.

Phloxes. These, with the Dicentras and Delphiniums, are among the finest perennials growing. The varieties are numerous, and, without exception, good.

Potentilla. Strawberry-like leaves; red and yellow flowers. Those with blood-red flowers are among the best.

Primula—Primrose. Dwarf plants, flowering early in the spring. P. auricula is a beautiful plant, but difficult of cultivation with us on account of the great extremes of temperature. P. polyanthus is much more hardy, and will flourish well in a somewhat shaded, sheltered location, in good, moist soil. The flowers are of various colors, in trusses on stems six to eight inches high.

Pyrethrum—Feverfew. The double variety is very handsome, having small white, daisy-like flowers. It generally needs a little protection of litter in winter.

Ranunculus—Buttercup. The double varieties are very pretty. R. aconitifolius luteo pleno, with yellow flowers, and R. acon. alba pl., with white flowers, are the best.

We shall finish this list next month, in time for planting.

PARLOR PETS.

FROM an elaborate and clever article upon "dog-life," in a recent publication, we group some interesting items about those which have been more particularly considered "lady's dogs." It will be seen that the poodle ranks very low in the list.

"Of pet spaniels, the King Charles, beloved beauty, unquestionably stands pre-eminent. As everybody knows, he takes his name from the royal patron who introduced him, with other French fashions, into England. He is supposed to have originated in Japan, as a breed exists there similar, though larger. Captain McClooney, of the Perry Expedition, brought one to the United States, which slightly resembled the King Charles and Blenheim stock, but lacked their beauty and symmetry of form. A perfect King Charles possesses seven distinguishing points of canine beauty: round head, short nose, long, curly ears, large, full eyes, black and tan color, without speck of white, perfect symmetry of form, and of weight not exceeding ten pounds. Such an animal, purchased by Mr. Butler for forty-four guineas, in England, is now in his possession. Not long ago, one was sold at public auction, in the old country, for the sum of five hundred and twenty-five guineas, or $2,600! Innumerable dogs, of impure breed and inferior points, are sold as King Charles spaniels in New York, their prices rising from $25 to $200. The genuine are, in rarity, second only to the Italian greyhound.

"The Blenheim spaniel is so named from a village in Oxfordshire, England, where the breed has been kept select. Of the same origin as the King Charles, he is similar in appearance, but generally more delicate and slender. He also varies in color, being orange and white; black, and tan, and white, etc. As usual, the e are few pure bred ones extant, such always commanding high prices, though less than those paid for the King Charles spaniel. In New York Blenheims of average appearance sell for from $20 to $25.

"The Italian greyhound, very similar to the English, but much smaller, and too delicate to be of any service in the field, but the most graceful of parlor pets, sometimes, when full-grown, not exceeding six or eight pounds in weight; and, valued in accordance with his diminutiveness, ranges from $40 and upward. They are more salable than the English greyhounds, the pure breed being, as usual, extremely scarce and valuable. Fine specimens have been sold at $150.

"Of poodles, the dealers of this metropolis supply a great variety—principally to its German and French population. These dogs vary exceedingly in size and appearance, from the effects of breeding, climate, and usage; their weight varying from two to sixty pounds. Apart from their capacity for amusing gymnastic performances, they have little value, selling at from $2 to $6 or $8.

"The pug-dog, like the King Charles of Japanese origin, and, a century ago, a fashionable companion of old maids of the Tabitha Bramble order, is so rare that his price, like himself, has become a thing of the past. In appearance he was not unlike a bull-dog; in disposition the very opposite. With this obsolete pet we may conclude our notices of them."

NOTES AND QUERIES.

1. What they Grow in Japan.—"Among the staples brought over to California are rape-seed oil, peas, pears, tobacco, isinglass, rice, and sweet potatoes. The rape-seed oil is of superior quality. The invoice arrived just as the recommendation had come from Washington for its exclusive use in the light-houses on this coast. The leaf tobacco, the judges tell me, is much of it equal to the best from Havana. The leaf is small and very thin, the veins delicate and flexible. The pears were plump, rusty-coated, heavy, and shaped like an apple; their taste insipid and flashy, but for preserves or for stewing scarcely inferior to quinces. The rice is nearer the size of barley than of ours, but seems more to abound in mucilage. The Chinese will snap up the whole invoice for their own use. The sweet potatoes were inwardly of a yellowish white; on being roasted or stewed they present almost the luscious sweetness of the Carolinas, which, by the way, are the width of a continent ahead of the mammoths that we raise in California. The chestnuts came over packed in dirt, as sound and fresh as if just gathered. They are almost the size of the horse-chestnut, and sweet as our Eastern chestnut, being very tolerable eating, even while uncooked. The seaweed was a finer article than the Irish moss of the drug stores, and without any mustiness of flavor. The isinglass seems like a pure mucilage, without any fishy taste. The peas I have had no opportunity to lay along my palate, and can say nothing of them. Great hopes are entertained that Japan will yet furnish us a cheap and constant supply of some of the articles above enumerated, of a better quality than can be produced at home. At the best, it is thought that our ranches may be made to grow some articles for which these cargoes furnish the seed, with profit and improvement upon our present supply.

2. Good Receipts for Bread and Biscuit.—The following directions are copied from the Transactions of the Chenango County Agricultural Society for 1859. They are the statements of the ladies who received premiums for the best bread exhibited:—

Mrs. John Shattuck's Statement for Making Brown Bread.—One quart rye meal, two quarts Indian meal, two tablespoonfuls of molasses; mix thoroughly with sweet milk. Let it stand one hour, then bake in a slow oven.

Mrs. Eugene Hart's Statement for Making Wheat

Bread.—One spoonful of hop yeast, two potatoes, boiled, one pint of water, and make a sponge, and when light or sufficiently raised, mix hard and let it rise, and when it is light again, I mould it over, and bake when light.

Mrs. O. L. Crowell's Statement for Making Wheat Bread.—Grate one-half dozen potatoes; jam, and add one quart of water, one cup of hop yeast at night, and in the morning, when light, add three teaspoonfuls of sugar, and flour to form a dough. Let rise; when light, put it in tins; let rise again, and bake one-half hour.

For biscuit, take some of the bread dough in the morning, as much as would make a loaf of bread, add one cup of butter, mix well, let rise, then make into biscuit, let rise, then bake. Tea rusks, one-half pint new milk, one cup of hop yeast; set the sponge at night; add flour to the above to make a batter; in the morning add one-half pint of milk, one cup of sugar, one of butter, one egg, one nutmeg, flour to make it sufficiently stiff; let rise, then roll it out and cut it out; let rise, then bake.

Mrs. E. H. Prentice's Statement of Making Molasses Cup Cake.—Two cups of molasses, two cups of butter, three eggs, one-third cup cold water, one tablespoonful soda, and bake.

3. A Word to Housekeeping Gentlemen.—A bachelor housekeeper has no more to say at home than one of his own hens. He may every now and then assume a semblance of power; but the Amazons in his employ, whatever may be the master's seeming advantage before strangers, always close the campaign in reality victorious. The married men, too, as in affection and interest bound, generally give up the one-half of the authority to their wives, well knowing that if they don't they may lose the whole. One thing is obvious, that the seldom the husbands interfere to correct the female department of the kitchen the better. They are apt to do so without any cause existing in the individual case of complaint; and, if there be an appeal made to the mistress, and the master found decidedly in the wrong, then, between the two, he feels very small. Besides, when a master interferes, he is apt to say too much; whereas the mistress has not only more experience in such matters, but more prudence, too.

Fashions.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

HAVING had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editor of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Spring and autumn bonnets, materials for dresses, jewelry, envelops, hair-work, worsteds, children's wardrobes, mantillas, and mantelets, will be chosen with a view to economy, as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godey, Esq.

No order will be attended to unless the money is first received. Neither the Editor nor Publisher will be accountable for losses that may occur in remitting.

Instructions to be as minute as is possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice. Dress goods from Levy's or Evans & Co.'s; cloaks, mantillas, or talmas, from Brodie's, 51 Canal Street, New York; bonnets from T. White & Co.'s; jewelry from Warden's or Caldwell's, Philadelphia.

When goods are ordered, the fashions that prevail here govern the purchase; therefore, no articles will be taken back. When the goods are sent, the transaction must be considered final.

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL FASHION-PLATE FOR APRIL.

Fig. 1.—Child's walking-dress of blue cashmere, with small round pelerine. The dress is braided with very narrow black velvet, and has long ends of the cashmere, braided, fastened to a belt falling at the back.

Fig. 2.—Infant's robe, elegantly embroidered en tablier; trimmed with blue rosettes; wide sash of blue ribbon, and cap trimmed to match.

Fig. 3.—Nurses' dress of brown de laine, with narrow frill at the neck.

Fig. 4.—Dress of lavender-colored silk, with nine graduated flounces bound with lavender silk, relieved with black velvet stripes; sash bound with the same; body plain, trimmed with folds of the material, crossing from right to left in front; angel sleeves, trimmed with a puffing of the silk, and caught together with narrow bands. Straw-colored gloves, with two buttons, and worked with lavender-color. Bonnet of rice straw, trimmed with fuchsia-colored ribbon and Marguerites of the same color.

Fig. 5.—A wine-colored silk, with three flounces bound with black velvet and a puffing at the bottom of the skirt; then three flounces graduated in their width, and a puffing put on in festoons, each festoon being caught up with a large ribbon bow and ends; body trimmed en berthe, with two ruffles and a puffing; sleeves loose, and trimmed to match the skirt. Ribbon sash, with bow and ends. Gloves worked with wine-color, to match the dress. Frill of lace round the neck.

Fig. 6.—Green silk dress, having the front breadth gored, and nine very small ruffles at the bottom of the skirt; a row of buttons down the front of the dress; body plain; sleeves with caps, and trimmed at the bottom with box plaits and ruching. Point lace collar and sleeves. Leghorn bonnet, trimmed with bunches of cherries; the bonnet ribbon has also cherries worked on it. Gloves worked with green.

DESCRIPTION OF SPRING FASHIONS.

(See large extension plate in front.)

Fig. 1.—A gored dress of wine-colored silk, buttoned up in front, with a lapel on the right side of the body formed of velvet, edged with a quilled ribbon; this trimming extends down the skirt on the left side until within about a quarter of a yard of the bottom, when it turns sharply to the right and meets the velvet trimming which is placed about two inches from the bottom of the skirt; the sleeves are full coat sleeves, with cap drawn into a loose gauntlet cuff; small appliqué lace collar and sleeves to match.

Fig. 2. is a cashmere robe de chambre of a light oak color, with a very deep border of rich flowers on a darker oak ground. A small cape is on the body, which is full, and fastened at the throat and waist, but a little open in the middle to show a worked chemisette; sleeves and collar of embroidered muslin.

Fig. 3.—Morning robe of Marie Louise blue; the border is very rich, being of silk and wool; a portion of the front breadth is white, with rich bordering crossing it; body plain; gold-colored silk cord and tassel. Linen collar and sleeves, finished with a narrow ruffle.

These two designs for robes are from the establishment of A. T. Stewart, Broadway, New York, who has a large assortment of very beautiful morning robes.

Fig. 4.—Green silk dress, buttoned over like a coat; lapels to turn over, edged with a ruche; straight waist, with sash; sleeves full, with gauntlet cuff.

Boy's dress of light cloth; jacket, vest, and pants being of the same material, and the first two bound with black velvet.

Girl's dress.—A straw hat with plume; black silk coat trimmed with black velvet.

SPRING BONNETS.

Fig. 1 represents a Paillasson straw of very thick plait, richly trimmed on the outside with roses, corn flowers, grasses, and loops of straw. The inside trimming is a ruche and bouquet of flowers on one side, and over the top and on the other side is simply a roll of green ribbon, to suit the strings and cape of bonnet.

Fig. 2.—A bonnet of rice straw, trimmed with white ribbon and black velvet, with wheat-ears on one side. The inside trimming is field flowers and blonde lace.

HEADDRESSES.

Fig. 1.—Coiffure of pieces of black velvet, trimmed with either black or white lace, and formed into a wreath, caught in front and at the back by pendants of black and gold bugles.

Fig. 2.—Net formed of narrow black velvet, fastened with jet beads, and trimmed with loops of black ribbon worked with jet beads; a velvet bow with jet buckle finishes this wreath of loops in the centre.

CHITCHAT UPON NEW YORK AND PHILADELPHIA FASHIONS, FOR APRIL.

At this season, when every one is wearing straw bonnets and everybody buying them, the expense of Leghorns and the so-called Tuscan, our English or French straws, is often a matter of wonder and questioning. We are sure our readers will be interested in an account of their manufacture, before we go on to chat of their shapes and styles. Leghorns come, as, perhaps our readers know, in the shape of a flat, round mat, and from it are cut and pressed into any prevailing shape.

"It is chiefly in the neighborhood of Florence, Pisa, the district of Sienna, and in the upper part of the Valley of the Arno, that the best mats are made for straw hats. In these countries, whole families, old and young, may be seen occupied at this kind of work; and it is certain that this branch of industry brings in a very large sum annually to the country. The cost of the raw material is inconsiderable; but the value of the work is so great that the women of the Valley of the Arno commit their domestic affairs to people from the mountains, that they may be able to devote all their time to the lucrative manufacture of straw plait. The following is the information which the author of this notice has obtained relative to this kind of industry. The straw used in working these mats is grown in districts mountainous and sterile. It is produced from a kind of wheat, of which the grain is very small. This straw, though slender, has much consistency, and the upper part of the stalk being perfectly hollow, is easily dried. It is pulled out of the earth before the grain begins to form. After being freed from the soil which adheres to the root, it is formed into small sheaves to be winnowed; the part above the last joint of the stem is then plucked off, which is from four to six inches long, the ear remaining attached to it. This being done, it is bleached alternately by the dew and the sunshine. Rain is very injurious to it, and destroys much of its whiteness. When a sudden shower comes on, every one is in motion gathering up the straw. The lower parts of the straw are treated in the same manner, and employed in forming mats of an inferior quality. The upper parts, torn off just to the knot, are sorted according to their degree of fineness. This sampling is made with much care, and usually affords straw of three different prices. A quantity of straw worth three-quarters of a paoli ($4\frac{1}{2}d.$), after having undergone this process, is sold for ten paoli ($4s. 7d.$). The tress is formed of seven or nine straws, which are begun at the lower end, and are consumed, in plaiting, to within an inch and a half of the upper extremity, including the ear. All the ends of the straws that have been consumed are left out, so that the ears shall be on the other side of the tress. As fast as it is worked it is rolled on a cylinder of wood. When it is finished, the projecting ends and ears are cut off; it is then passed with force between the hand and a piece of wood, cut with a sharp edge to press and polish it. The tresses thus prepared, are used so that a complete hat shall be formed of one piece. They are sewed together with raw silk. The diameter of the hat is in general the same, the only difference consists in the degree of fineness, and, consequently, the number of turns which the tress has made in completing the hat. These hats have from twenty to eighty such turns, the number regulating the price, which varies from 20 paoli ($9s. 2d.$) to 100 piastres (upwards of £20). Those of the first quality have no fixed price. A hat which sells for 100 piastres affords a profit of 40 to the merchant; the straw and silk costing 20 piastres, and the labor 40 piastres. The workers gain about three or five paoli ($1s. 4d.$ or $2s. 3d.$) per day. Several mercantile houses at Florence and Leghorn buy these hats on the spots where they are worked. There is one of these houses which annually exports them to the value of 400,000 florins (£3,500). French speculators have tried to cultivate this sort of straw, but they have not been able to obtain so fine a quality as that of Tuscauy."

Many of the Leghorns this season are simply and gracefully trimmed with a plume of feathers on one side, and in the inside is a roll of velvet, with a small feather or bouquet of flowers. Tabs are not so much worn this spring; they are replaced by the roll or bandeau of velvet, and the full inside lining described in the last chat, but this style is not generally so becoming as the soft lace tabs. Clusters of cherries make a pretty trimming, as shown in Fig. 6 of our fashion-plate.

For travelling bonnets we notice at Mrs. Scofield's many of plain-colored silks trimmed with silk, forming a great contrast. The shapes are not so drooping over the face as they have been during the past winter, but stand high from the head, and are of medium size. English split straws and thin lace straws will be much worn, the fronts being bound with a wide ribbon, violet, apple green, havanne, and lilac being the favorite colors.

Hats, now so universally worn by ladies at watering places, and also much liked for travelling, are of great variety this season; they are trimmed with pheasants' and other game birds' feathers; the graceful Coque plume is also much worn. We see a number of the turban-shaped hats for children, handsomely trimmed with plumes.

For walking dresses, plain silks or small stripes are much in vogue; the skirts are much trimmed up the front with fan-shaped ornaments of silk edged with lace, pattés of velvet and lace, etc. etc.; bouillonnés and ruches are much in favor; also, small flounces at the bottom of the skirt; many are sewed on in waves. We notice a very riche dress of wine-colored silk with five small flounces at the bottom of the skirt, then a row of bows placed à volonté, then five more small flounces; the body is plain, with a point; sleeves loose, and trimmed with flounces and bows to match the skirt.

Pierrot buttons and bows up the seams of every breadth, and three rows on the body, and velvet pattés are the principal styles for the Redingote or L'Impératrice dress which still continues to be worn, and which our readers know is the gored dress, body and skirt in one piece, and, for a slight figure this style is exceedingly becoming. The sleeves are round and cut with an elbow, slit up slanting and trimmed with a row of buttons from the elbow to the hand. Corsages à plastron are very becoming to some figures—the plastron is generally of velvet, or else of silk of some color to contrast well with the dress, richly worked with jet beads. Many of the skirts have pockets on the outside shaped and trimmed like the plastron on the body. Green, wine, and violet are the favorite colors for spring silks. Most of the bodies are made round so as to display the elegant gilt belts, buckles, clasps, and the pointed velvet waistbands now so much in vogue, more so than the ceinture or sash, which, however, is always pretty. Favorite patterns for Chambéry printed muslins, barge Anglaise, foulards, etc. etc., are bunches of flowers or fruits, and small figures scattered over them. The foulards are generally of a dark ground, and as they are of a texture not easily rumpled, we particularly recommend them to our lady friends.

We have seen some black silk dresses with bouillonnés of apple green or violet silk, edged with a ruche of black guipure, inserted between every breadth of the skirt, which had a charming effect. Some dresses are made with the skirt perfectly plain in front, the plaits commencing about two inches on either side of the centre.

Shawls of the same material as the dresses, whether of barge, grenadine, or muslin are to be much worn.

The Zouave jacket, with Greek vest, or full embroidered muslin shirt falling about two inches over the skirt still continues a favorite both for ladies and children, and is made of both thick and thin materials.

Steel-colored silk jupes or underskirts quilted and trimmed with black velvet, are among the novelties for street wear this spring.

Brodie's travelling and street wraps are of great variety in style; the loose sack and bournoise with fancy hoods, however, we think the favorites. They are generally made of bright striped materials, such as Magenta and white, Solferino and gray, chine, with several different colored, bright stripes, etc., but we have seen some very pretty plain goods, in different shades of gray, gray and chine, gray and blue, or green. The novelty of the season, however, is the bright tartan-striped materials; these brilliant stripes, sobered down by gray or chine, have a charming effect, and make a very stylish cloak. Of dress mantles and bonnets we will speak in our next month's chat.

BY C. EVEREST.

Andantino.

The first system of the musical score is written for piano. It consists of two staves: a treble staff and a bass staff. The key signature has one flat (B-flat), and the time signature is common time (C). The music is marked with a piano (p) dynamic. The melody is primarily in the treble staff, with the bass staff providing harmonic support. The system ends with a repeat sign.

The second system of the musical score includes vocal parts and piano accompaniment. It begins with a vocal line in treble clef, followed by a piano accompaniment in bass clef. The key signature remains one flat, and the time signature is common time. The tempo is marked Andantino. The lyrics are written below the vocal line. The system includes a repeat sign and a piano (p) dynamic marking.

BUTTERFLY PEN-WIPER.

THE body of the butterfly is of velvet stuffed with cotton, and entirely covered with gold beads. The eyes are red, and the horns stiff gold cord, with a bead on the ends. The wings can be made of cloth or velvet, the latter, however, is much the richest, and two or more colors should be used; they are to be embroidered with silk, fancy beads, and bugles. Pieces of cloth or flannel are cut the same size of the wings and sewed underneath to wipe the pens on. The size of the engraving is the proper size for the pen-wiper.

INSTRUCTIONS IN PERSIAN PAINTING AND PAINTING ON WOOD.

PATTERN OF ORNAMENTAL FIRE-SCREEN.

PERSIAN painting is so purely mechanical that even those altogether unacquainted with drawing and coloring will find no difficulty in it. It differs from painting generally in this important particular, that no attempt is made to copy from nature; it is rather a mosaic work of colors, consisting of quaint scrolls and arabesques, flowers of extraordinary hues and forms, birds of marvellous plumage, and devices which have only their oddity to recommend them. It also differs from other kinds of painting by not requiring those delicate touches and that softening and blending of color and shade which is considered the beauty of flower or landscape drawing generally; its outlines are all abrupt, its colors contrast and not blend with one another, and its brilliancy rather than delicacy is the effect aimed at.

Water colors are the best for it, and of these vermilion, redlead, French blue, emerald green, chrome No. 2, lampblack, and permanent white are those chiefly used, though all the opaque colors may be employed; the carmine powder, rubbed down in varnish, must be substituted for the cake carmine. Gold and silver-leaf, Japanners' gold size, Japan powder, gum-arabic, spirits of turpentine, and some camel-hair pencils of various sizes constitute the other requisites.

Screens, card-cases and boxes, netting boxes, the covers of blotting-books, cigar-cases, baskets, etc., are the articles most ordinarily painted, and these may be obtained at all fancy repositories. They are made of a hard and fine-grained white wood, and turned; for if the surface were not smooth and even, no pleasing effect could be produced. But it is not absolutely necessary that the wood should be white, provided it be hard and close-grained, for the whole surface can always be covered with a body color or grounding, as in this card-case, where a rich mosaic pattern of bright colors outlined with gold is thrown up on a black ground, or might have been thrown upon a white or a silver ground.

ORNAMENTAL CARD-CASE.

The screen, of which a cut is given at the commencement of this article, has no other grounding than the pure white wood. The rich feathery arabesque border which surrounds it is painted brightly in carmine, vermillion, green, blue, and chrome, picked out with gold; and the bird in the centre has a brilliant and variegated plumage, heightened by gold. We will now proceed to give the needful directions:—

Size the article which is to be painted with size made thus: boil down half an ounce of isinglass in a pint of clear water, strain it, and, with a clean full brush, lay a coating of it over every portion of the wood, and then suffer it to dry; repeat this a second and a third time. The size must be in a perfectly fluid state when used. With a fine-pointed lead pencil, H H H, sketch the pattern on to the wood, or transfer it to the wood by means of tracing paper, and then proceed to paint.

Have ready some thin gum-water, and use that for moistening the brush and colors, only using clear water to cleanse the brush when it becomes clogged or when about to take another color. Do not rub the paint down on to the palette, but hold the cake in the left hand, and work from it, as thus a thicker body of color is obtained; and, as we have before said, we do not need lights and shadows, but a full, bright surface of color. Study to contrast and vary the hues in the most effective way, and to give to each separate one a smooth, equal surface, neither patchy or daubed. Having put in the pattern thus, add the grounding, working from the cake and with the gum-water, which should neither be too thin, nor yet too mucilaginous.

When the whole surface, or as much of the surface as it is intended should be painted, is done and dry, put a little of the Japan powder in a soft piece of clear muslin, tie it up, and, with this powder bag, lightly dust the painted surface all over. Then pour some of the gold size into a saucer, and, dipping a fine camel-hair pencil in it, trace the outlines of the pattern neatly and evenly, and throw in any veining or ornamentation which fancy may suggest; and when the size has ceased to be wet, and only remains adhesive, lay a sheet of gold-leaf over as much of the pattern as it will cover. This is best done by either pressing the article down on to the gold-leaf, or raising this latter on its paper, and turning it over and pressing it down on to the article we wish to gild. In either case care and delicacy of handling are requisite.

When the gold has had time to dry thoroughly, take a full soft brush and sweep off all the powder and superfluous portions of gold-leaf, and wipe the article with a soft silk handkerchief. Should any parts not have taken the gold, they must be sized over again, and then regilt. The gilding should now be smoothed with an agate burnisher (that is, a piece of agate polished and shaped like a crook); this must be passed over every outline and vein, but only moved in one direction, not too heavily. The work is now ready for varnishing or polishing. It may be varnished with copal-varnish or white-hard-varnish, and when dry rubbed with flannel; but the polishing had better be done by persons whose trade it is; all fancy repositories, where the articles in wood are purchased, can get it done.

There is another style of painting on wood which is exceedingly pretty, and which is almost identical with ordinary water-colored drawing. It is adapted for flowers, fruit, birds, butterflies, landscapes, etc.; all the ordinary water colors in cakes are used. The wood is sized as we have already directed, the design sketched on or transferred to it, some gum-water made, and then the drawing worked up exactly as it would be if we were painting on card-board, excepting that the tints are rather heightened. This style of wood-painting is seldom grounded, as the wood itself forms a delicate finish to it. It should always be polished.

Very pretty Chinese designs in Indian-ink, lampblack, and gold, on mezzotinto sketches in sepia and gold, may be made on the white wood by following the above directions.

This cut is for the Persian painting; the with copal or glass varnish, and silver leaf laid over this when it has ceased to be moist. The pattern must be filled in after the groundwork is thoroughly silvered and dry; the outlines must not be gold, but black or carmine. The veining and traceries should be all silver. The Japan powder will not be needed. A soft brush, moistened in spirits of wine, but not too wet, and passed lightly over every portion of the pattern is large enough for any ordinary purpose of bordering; it is painted in vermilion, blue, and green, and outlined and veined with gold.

We have said that the grounding may be of silver; whenever it is intended that it should be so, the pattern is sketched, and then all the portions of the ground smoothly varnished silver, prevents it from turning. All brushes which have come in contact with the gold size or varnish must be washed in spirits of turpentine at once, or they spoil.

We feel convinced that our readers will have no cause to consider that time as wasted which they spend in following out the above instructions.

DRIFTING FRAGMENTS.

BY MRS. A. M. BUTTERFIELD.

The mariner sailing over the deep,
When hush'd are the winds and the waters sleep,
As dreamily gazing over the side
Of the ship that moves in her queenly pride,

Sees now and then a plauk or a spar
Borne on the wave from some distance far,
And knoweth not what wreck there may be,
That foundered and sunk in the stormy sea.

Sometimes the fragment beareth the name
Of the fated vessel from which it came,
More oft it passeth and giveth no sign,
As it driteth along through the sparkling brine.

And to us as we sail on life's ocean deep,
When hush'd are the winds and the waters sleep,
For the pause and the lull come floating along,
Strange sweet fragments of mournful song.

And we pause and listen, and never know,
Though our tears are stirr'd by their haunting flow,
Of the heart that was wreck'd on some sunken rock,
Or foundered and sunk in the tempest's shock.

Though sometimes the fragment beareth a name,
And the heart's sad story is known to fame;
But more entomb'd in the past there be,
That sleep unknown 'neath that dark, deep sea.

THE WOODLAND FLOWER.

BY APPLE-BLOSSOM.

IN the midst of a large growth of woodland, where the branches of the trees were so thickly interwoven as almost to exclude the rays of the sun, was situated a little white house, with but a slight clearing in front, surrounded by a fence of lattice-work, while the vines clambered over the door, and served as curtains for the small windows. All day long the smoke ascended lazily from the one chimney and curled around the tops of the trees, taking all sorts of fantastic shapes, while the merry tinkle of the cow-bells afar in the distance mingled with the busy hum of the bees, and the murmuring of the spring close at hand. Mr. and Mrs. Hartwell, with their two children, Marion and May, were the occupants of this cottage, if I might except a huge gray cat who sat all day long curled up in a remote corner, and who seemed to be an especial favorite of the household.

Mr. and Mrs. Hartwell were poor in this world's goods. They had left their native Eastern home and pushed onward to the Western country in the faint hope of bettering their lot. This being their chief desire, they settled in this quiet spot, which, being situated several miles from a town or village, left them by themselves. To some similarly situated, this would have been a trying ordeal; but they were plain, uneducated people, having no desire to see or know more of the world, devotedly attached to each other, finding pleasure enough to satisfy them in attending to the wants of their little ones.

Marion and May Hartwell were twins. They were eight years of age, alike in form, features, and disposition. They were beautiful children, with sylph-like forms, eyes of midnight darkness, and dark, curling hair flying over their bright faces. Nature had done more for them than art could have done, had rounded their forms, and sent the bright glow of health to their cheeks. The sun had poured its rays on their dimpled cheeks a little too roughly perhaps to suit the fastidious taste of a votary of fashion; but to those who loved nature, they were bright pictures of health and happiness.

It was a pleasant day. Full of life, as free to wander through the woods, to climb trees, and enjoy themselves to their hearts' content, the little fairies ran hither and thither, and at last ensconced themselves in a tree, and gazed with children's curiosity at a large travelling carriage which had turned from the road, and, having taken the path through the woodland, was slowly approaching the spot where the children were concealed from view.

The only occupant of this carriage, with the exception of a young lad who acted in the capacity of driver, was a young and beautiful lady. Nineteen summers had scarce passed over her head, yet the traces of sorrow lingered on her fair cheek, and the black draperies encircling her light form said, as plainly as words could have done, that she had lost a near and dear friend. She was lost in a deep reverie. She did not look up as the carriage was passing the tree, until a low and musical voice aroused her—"Look, sister, look!" and raising her eyes in the direction of the sound, she perceived two pair of "elfin eyes" peering at her through the thick branches, and immediately a peal of joyous laughter floated on the air.

The young driver paused a moment, and the lady with a pleasant smile which for an instant dispelled the shade of sorrow from her brow, spoke caressingly to them. "Little children, would you like a ride with me?"

Marion glanced at May, and May at Marion, and, reading their answer in the other's eager face, they scrambled down the tree, and stood, bashfully, before the lady. A low murmur of surprise escaped the lady. "How beautiful!" "Little ones, do you want a ride in this nice carriage? Come, jump in."

They were delighted with the beautiful lady, and, as they rode along, they told her of their parents, and their pleasant home. A new thought seemed to have taken possession of the lady. She passed her hand caressingly over the bright head of May, who sat on her lap.

"What is your name, little one?" she asked.

"May Hartwell," answered the child.

"Would you like to live with me, and call me mamma, and have a nice carriage to ride in, and plenty of pretty playthings like this?" and, as she spoke, she unwound the gold chain around her neck, and clasped it around the little brown neck of May.

"O yes," exclaimed the child, delighted with the glittering bauble; and she clapped her hands gleefully.

"And leave mamma and sister?" said Marion, reproachfully.

"No;" and the child's countenance fell, and she was silent.

"John," said the lady, "Marion will direct you; I wish to take these children home."

Following the many winding paths leading through the woodland, they soon came in sight of the house. A woman was in the yard engaged in some domestic occupation, but, perceiving the carriage, opened the gate with a low courtesy.

"Mother, mother, we've had such a nice ride!" exclaimed both the children at once.

"Laws-a-me, children, where did you come from? You must excuse them, marm, if they are rude," she added, apologetically; "children will be children, the world over. Won't you come in and rest yourself, marm?"

The lady entered the house, holding the children by either hand, and sat down in the chair which the good dame had dusted for her.

"These children are yours, are they not?" she asked, inquiringly—for it seemed hardly possible, so great was the contrast.

"Yes, marm; and they're beautiful children if they are my own flesh and blood; and though they don't look much like me now, they're both the very picture of what I was when I was young."

"Madam," commenced the lady, slowly, as if to give her time to think, "you love these children, and would sacrifice anything for them, even part with one of them, if you thought, by so doing, that they would be happier in the end."

"I don't understand you, marm; but I love them dearly."

"Would you part with one of them? I have taken a fancy to this one," she said, laying her hand on the head of May, who stood by her side. "I am rich, a widow, and childless. Give her to me, and I will love and care for her as though she were my own child, and, moreover, place you above want."

"I cannot," answered Mrs. Hartwell, bursting into tears; "they are all I have to love."

"But consider, Mrs. Hartwell, the advantages of the change. Placed above want, you will never regret your decision."

Mrs. Hartwell felt the force of her reasoning. She wished time to think calmly. She invited the lady to stay and partake of their humble meal, after which, she should be acquainted with their final decision.

The only way in which the lady, whose name was Mrs. Aubine, could distinguish one from the other, was by the gold chain which she had placed around the neck of May, and which the child still retained.

On Mr. Hartwell's arrival his wife broached the subject to him; but he declared excitedly that he would not "listen to such a thing;" indeed, he was very angry; but the lady's soft tones soon lulled those feelings to rest, and he felt the force of her reasoning, when she portrayed in glowing colors the prospects of the child as she was now situated, and as the daughter of Mrs. Aubine. Then he would be placed above daily labor, and the remaining child would be far happier in the future. They listened and reasoned together, and at last determined to make the sacrifice. Perhaps they would never see her again—they must sever every tie binding them to her. But when once having fairly made up our minds to do anything, half the bitterness ends.

"Mrs. Aubine, take her," said Mrs. Hartwell, placing little May in her arms; "love her as we have, and you will do your duty." Sobs choked her utterance—she could say no more.

"Rest assured, Mrs. Hartwell, that I will love her. These are not mere idle words I speak to you; they come from the heart. You shall be provided for—in the mean time, here is something to commence with," and she placed a purse of gold in her hands.

"Good-by, May, darling." And the parents encircled her in their arms and kissed her tenderly. The child was frightened, and clung to them closely.

"May, dear," said the soft voice of Mrs. Aubine, "we must go, now. You shall ride in the carriage as long as you wish." And the child confidently clasped her hand, and with the other took the gold chain from her neck and threw it to Marion; then, bursting into tears, she was lifted into the carriage, which rolled rapidly away.

She did not know that she had left the home of her childhood forever, and that that was the last time she would ever behold all those dear faces again. But Mrs. Aubine clasped her to her heart, and tenderly kissed away her tears, telling her of the beautiful home to which she was going and the many things in store for her in the future. The child was comforted; soon her merry laugh floated on the air. Thus easily are we all weaned from our sorrows by the promise of a few glittering toys as perishable as ourselves.

Just as the glorious sun had taken its place in the heavens Mrs. Aubine arrived at her beautiful mansion in the city of C——, of the State of Illinois. Little May was sleeping quietly; she was carried into the house and placed on her own couch. She lay thus, this little woodland child, the rich drapery falling around her, one little hand resting in the midst of the clustering ringlets which fell in heavy masses on the snowy pillow. Mrs. Aubine bent over her, and imprinted a kiss on her fair cheek. The action startled the sleeper; she opened her eyes, and, gazing into her face, said, "Where am I?"

"At home, darling." She experienced a thrill of joy in knowing that henceforth she had something to live for, something to love. She determined to devote her life to the little one who had so unexpectedly been committed to her care.

Mrs. Aubine was the daughter of wealthy parents, who died before she was old enough to prize the affection lavished on her. Her guardian was a young man just entering the world, and who cared more for its vanities than for the child committed to his care. She was placed at school, and in her seventeenth year returned to her guardian in all the fresh bloom of girlhood. He was unmarried, still fascinating in his manners, of rare conversational powers; what wonder that she consented to be his wife? They were married. Two years of happiness passed, and he was called away. Again she was alone in the world, with not one near or dear friend to soothe her in affliction's hour. What wonder that she loved May?

May was placed at school. It was very hard for Mrs. Aubine to part with her, but she must of necessity be fitted for the sphere she would inevitably occupy as her daughter. A woman cannot be an ornament to society unless fitted by education for that sphere.

Time passed; eight years rolled away. Mrs. Aubine could not longer brook her absence; and, on completing her sixteenth year, she was recalled to the home of her whom she had learned to call mother. May was very impatient herself to be with her once more, for two years had passed since they had seen each other; and she returned to her laden with honors, followed by the good wishes of school-mates and friends. They met; they were clasped in each other's arms. Never had the name "mother" sounded so sweetly to her ear as when uttered in May's joyous tones. They sat down, Mrs. Aubine with her arms around May, and May's eyes looking searchingly into her face. She had left home a child, she had returned a woman.

"Mamma, how beautiful you are!" said May, in her joyous tones. "So young and beautiful! I have seen your beautiful face in my dreams every night for the past two years. You cannot tell how glad I am to be with you once more!"

"May, darling, we shall not be separated again—unless some fair cavalier claims your love," she added, smilingly.

"Mamma, I never shall love any but you!" And she drew her queenly figure up to its full height, and scorn at the very thought flashed from her dark eyes and curled for the moment her beautiful lips.

"May!" said Mrs. Aubine, reproachfully.

May smiled, but said nothing.

Mrs. Aubine and her beautiful daughter were often subjects of the remarks of the many whom they met in the gay circles in which they moved. Mrs. Aubine was very beautiful, her dark hazel eyes beamed with intelligence, and her rosy lips just parted to reveal the pearly teeth. Those only who were her most intimate friends knew that May was but the child of adoption; and to them it was a strange sight, that young mother united to her daughter in the bond of love.

It was the eve of May's seventeenth birthday; all was bright and beautiful; the stars shone brightly, and strains of sweet music were wafted to her ear. Sad thoughts came stealing o'er her memory, vague remembrances of a sweet sister came to mind, while the shadow of a distant cottage appeared in view. What was this picture? She knew it was a picture somewhere in her own life, yet it was shadowy and indistinct. That Mrs. Aubine was not her mother she knew full well, yet how came she with her? Was she a relative? That her own parents were dead she knew full well, for Mrs. Aubine had often told her that they died shortly after her adoption. Overcome with the tumult of emotions to which these thoughts gave rise, she bowed her head and wept.

"What, weeping, May! and on this, your birthday!" said the soft voice of Mrs. Aubine. "What is it? Tell me." And she drew the weeping head to her breast, and tenderly kissed her forehead.

"I know you are not my mother. Who was my mother? Tell me! O tell me!"

"Have I not performed a parent's duty to you? Who, then, has a greater claim on your affections?"

"No one. But I know you are not my mother; that were impossible—you, only twenty-seven years of age, to have a daughter as old as myself; it cannot be."

"Then I am better fitted to be mother, sister, and friend at the same time. Therefore dry your tears, May; it ill befits the daughter of Mrs. Aubine to dim the brightness of her eyes, when they should sparkle more than ever on this occasion."

"Mother, dear mother, how I love you! May your path through life be all beautiful! The child of your adoption would be the last one to sadden your spirits or cause a shade of sorrow to rest on your brow. But will you tell me of the mother with whom I passed my infancy? Promise me this, for I can never love any one as I love you."

"I promise, May. Let us banish all unpleasant thoughts for the present, and wreath our lips with smiles that come from the heart."

Music, soft, entrancing music stole softly on the evening air; merry voices were heard, and the sound of joyous laughter floated through the casement. A gay and brilliant throng were assembled to do honor to one of earth's fair daughters. Mrs. Aubine and May were standing under the dazzling light of the chandelier. It was difficult to determine which was the most beautiful, as they conversed gayly with those around them.

Thus thought a young man, a stranger, who was approaching in company with a friend who was to introduce him to the fair hostess. There was a look of quiet surprise in his dark blue eye as he was presented to "Mrs. Aubine and daughter." Could that young and beautiful lady be the mother of that fair girl? The music still floated on the air at intervals, many footsteps kept time to the heartfelt strains. The young stranger, Harry Alton, conversed gayly with Mrs. Aubine, but ever and anon his gaze wandered to the graceful figure of May, who was whirling in the gay waltz. The lady herself noted that glance, and she smiled her own soft smile as she perceived the blush that mantled the cheek of May as she caught his glance of admiration.

"Really, mamma," whispered May, as she passed by, "he's quite an original piece of impertinence."

Harry Alton was the son of a rich Southern planter, and had resided from childhood on a fine plantation in Georgia. Mingling often in the society of the surrounding country, he met daily numbers of beautiful women, who were celebrated, not only for their personal charms, but those charms which rendered them objects of higher devotion and more assiduous flattery; namely, broad lands. Lying in the shade of some graceful acacia-tree, whose branches waved to and fro in the still breeze, while the perfume of tropical plants was wafted to him on zephyrs' wings, and the bright-plumed birds sang sweetly, pleasant voices were wafted to his ear. He longed for some one to love; his heart was untouched; he thought of the pleasant hours he spent in their society as a traveller through sunny regions would think of a far distant home situated among rocky mountains—he liked their society for a while, but would not be content to remain with them always.

Travelling through the "Western land," where there is so wide a field opened for pleasure and observation, he met with a friend who persuaded him to remain for a short period in the pleasant city of C—, offering as an inducement to introduce him to the fair ladies in its vicinity. With this pleasure in view, what wonder that he consented to remain. The name of woman acts as a charm over a refined gentleman, for education exalts his mind, and, consequently, his respect for woman increases, and there is always blended in his tones, when addressing her, much of respect and admiration.

When he met May he was fascinated; for she seemed the very embodiment of grace and loveliness. He determined to win her, if possible. But to accomplish this, he must storm the citadel of her heart in a manner entirely different from the usual mode. He had seen enough of the world to know that he must advance very cautiously, and not, if possible, to allow her to perceive the state of his feelings, and to accomplish this, he must make some one else the object of his particular attentions. The plan once laid, he determined to act accordingly. His visits to the house of Mrs. Aubine became the subject for many remarks. Addressing his conversation to Mrs. Aubine, scarce noticing May's presence, treating her with cold politeness, what wonder that the world was at fault in attributing his attentions to Mrs. Aubine as something beside mere commonplace civilities.

Had Harry Alton paid such assiduous attention to any young lady, with his penetration he would have thought that with his engaging manners and large fortune that the lady might possibly have fallen in love with him; but in this instance, even had the idea entered his head, it would have seemed so improbable, that he would have banished the suspicion as unworthy of himself, for was she not the mother of May? And yet, he often thought that she looked very youthful; yet that was easily accounted for. Had not American ladies a strange propensity to look youthful long after the fresh bloom of womanhood had passed? Yet she must have drank of the waters of perpetual youth, that no shadow of a wrinkle had as yet crossed her face.

May was astonished and even hurt at his demeanor. Thinking the fault lay with herself, she endeavored to be more sociable—for she knew how much her mother esteemed him as an acquaintance—but all in vain; he relapsed not one whit from his accustomed coldness, or softened the tone of studied politeness in which he usually addressed her. This unbending of the proud dignity which characterized her every movement, he considered as an omen of his sure success; and, having now become an almost daily visitor, he discovered more to love and admire in her. May, unconsciously to herself, was beginning to feel a deep interest in him; for although he devoted himself entirely to her mother, yet it was a consolation to know that he was near her, and to hear the deep tones of his mellow voice.

It was evening. It had been a warm day, but the air had sprung up damp and cold; but May heeded it not, as she stood at the window watching for the return of Mrs. Aubine, who was spending the evening with a friend. A manly form approached, but his heavy footfall became silent on the soft carpet.

"May, Miss Aubine?"

She started suddenly. "Ah, is it you, Mr. Alton? I am glad you have come. I was so lonely watching for mamma."

There was so much cordiality in her tones that his coldness vanished at once.

"May, if I may be permitted to call you so, may I be your friend?"

"Yes, certainly, Mr. Alton," she replied, quickly.

"May, look up, and tell me what you see."

She looked up—she caught the glance of those dark eyes, the look of intense passion imprinted on every feature—and she read as plainly as though 'twere written, the word "love" in every lineament of his fine face. She dropped her eyes, but her face was covered with blushes. He seemed to have received his answer, for he put both arms around her, and whispered, "Did you read aright, May?"

She answered "Yes," quietly; it was so strange and sudden, it would have seemed a dream, had not his strong arm encircled her. "But I thought you loved mamma," she said, after a pause, "you never noticed me in the least."

"I have ever loved you, May;" and she was satisfied.

Mrs. Aubine had retired to rest, but pleasing thoughts dispelled all thoughts of sleep—her thoughts were of the past, the present, and the future. A gentle tap at the door aroused her, and May asked softly, "May I come in, mamma?" She looked like some bright spirit as she paused for an instant in the centre of the apartment. Her heavy black hair was loosed, and fell in wavy ripples adown her pure white robe, while the bright color dyed her cheek in a crimson tide. Mrs. Aubine opened her arms, and May pillowed her head on her breast and murmured, "I am so happy."

"What has caused this sudden gush of happiness? Tell me, May."

"Mamma, he loves me."

"Who, May—who loves you?" she asked, quickly.

"Harry Alton," was the whispered answer.

"May! May! it cannot be!" exclaimed Mrs. Aubine, starting quickly, while her color left her face, and her eyes glared wildly, "you must not trifle, May."

"It is true," answered May, a vague fear taking possession of her; "I myself knew it not until this eve."

A low moan escaped her. She pushed May suddenly away, and clasped her hands together.

"Mamma, mamma, what have I done? Oh! speak, and say that you forgive me."

But Mrs. Aubine did not speak, but remained with clasped hands and eyes fixed and glassy.

May wrung her hands. "What have I done?" she moaned in anguish. She opened the door, and was about to call assistance.

"May," and the voice that pronounced that name was unnatural in its coldness, "come here."

She approached, and was about to throw her arms around her neck, but her mother pushed her silently away and said, "Not now, I cannot bear it."

"What have I done?" moaned May.

"Nothing," was answered in that same unnatural tone that grated so harshly on May's ear; "this is but a sudden attack—it will soon pass away. Leave me now, May." May left her silently and tearfully.

When alone, Mrs. Aubine sprang from her couch, while the veins in her forehead and temples stood out like cords in the agony of the moment, and she paced the room with her hands pressed tightly over her heart, as if to still its beating.

"Great Heavens! and has it come to this?" she murmured. "I cannot bear it. I shall hate her, oh, how bitterly! the child I have loved and nourished in my bosom—for is she not his choice?" Then her conscience reproached her. She remembered May's look of agony, and she murmured, with streaming eyes, "O God, forgive me."

For several days after this there was evidently a constraint in her manner, which caused May's heart to flutter wildly, and the rising sobs choked her utterance; but she managed to stifle all outward appearance of emotion, and appear the same as usual. Gradually this constraint wore away, and soon she regained her own playful manner, although there was still a trace of sadness mingled with her gaiety.

In the mean time, Mr. Alton still continued a daily visitor at their house, and looked forward eagerly to the time when, with a lovely wife, he should return to his fair Southern home, no longer to lead a life of loneliness, or to harbor pleasant thoughts not realized in the round of daily life. Impossible, though, as it seemed to him, the void in his heart was at last filled with the image of a beautiful woman, whose life had been all sunshine, and whose path through life in coming years it would be his duty to strew with the roses of love. What wonder that he wished the bridal to be consummated as speedily as possible.

Mrs. Aubine considered it her duty to acquaint Mr. Alton with the parentage of May; therefore, one day when the three were alone in the library, she commenced the simple recital.

May listened with sparkling eyes and glowing cheeks. "Then I have a twin sister. Is she yet living?"

"Yes, May"—and Mrs. Aubine drew her tenderly to her—"she is living, but your parents, as I have often told you, have long since gone to the spirit-world, and I am now your mother, am I not, May?"

"Yes, O yes!"

Mr. Alton was very much surprised to learn that she was but the child of adoption, for not once had a suspicion crossed his mind that they were otherwise than they seemed to be—mother and daughter.

"Will you take me to her?" asked May, anxiously.

"Certainly, if you wish. Mr. Alton will accompany us, I presume; it is but a day's ride. The place is but little changed, and your sister lives with her aunt in the same little house where I first saw your parents, and from whence I took you, a little child of eight years of age. She is wealthy, for the property I settled on your father, by untiring industry on his part, has accumulated to a large sum."

"How I long to see her, to clasp her in my arms, and call her by the sweet name of sister!"

Mrs. Aubine looked troubled. "May, you and your sister were twins; so closely did you resemble each other that it were almost an impossibility to distinguish one from the other. Years have intervened since then, and had you still remained as you were when I first saw you, there would still have been the same resemblance, the same congeniality of thought and feeling. But you were separated; you from your earliest remembrance have been brought in close communion with those who were educated and refined, while education fitted you for that social sphere. You were possessed of equal talents; yet, while hers have lain dormant, yours have been called into action. There is now a vast difference between you, which you cannot fail to perceive. Having always lived secluded, not mingling with the refined and intelligent, not having been fitted by education to find pleasure in that which is instructive, her manners or conversation cannot partake of that which would please the fastidious taste of a refined and educated person."

"Yet I can overlook all this," replied May, eagerly, "although I must confess I did not think of that, if she has a loving heart, for is she not my sister?" she added, softly.

Mr. Alton smiled at her enthusiasm. "We must see this country sister of yours, May, and if she does not reach the standard of refinement, and promises to be an apt scholar, we will take good care that she has suitable instruction to fit her for our circle."

"That is just the idea," replied May, quickly; "we will go to-morrow, can we not, mother?"

"Certainly, if you wish it, my dear."

Nine years had wrought but few changes in the quiet spot where Mr. and Mrs. Hartwell had resided so many years, and the carriage took the same path where, years before, Mrs. Aubine had first caught sight of May's laughing face. She neared the home of her childhood. Her heart beat wildly as she saw in reality the picture that had so often arisen in her memory. A young girl sat in the doorway, quietly reading. She started as the carriage stopped at the gate, and the glow of momentary embarrassment mantled her cheek; then she came forward quickly with a smile, half bashful. She was the living image of May herself.

One glance at the face of that young girl, and May sprang eagerly forward and clasped her in her arms. "Don't you know me, Marion? I am your own sister." And she wept tears of joy, while Mrs. Aubine looked on silently. When her emotion had somewhat subsided, May introduced Mrs. Aubine and Mr. Alton. "This is she whom I call mamma," said May, sweetly.

"And, Marion, let me be a mother to you," said Mrs. Aubine, gently.

They were touched at her look of resignation and the mourning garments she wore. They soon learned the cause of this; her aunt, the sole remaining relative, was dead. Mrs. Aubine was sensibly attracted towards Marion. Everything she said or did was not altogether graceful, but there was nothing vulgar about her; she was just what she appeared to be—a simple-hearted maiden, with a loving heart; nothing more, nothing less. She told May that her mother, in her dying moments, had told her of a twin sister who had been adopted in childhood by a rich lady whose name was Mrs. Aubine; and she had committed with her last breath a chain into her keeping, at the same time exacting from her a solemn promise that she would not seek to discover her whereabouts, but live on in the hope that she would at last come to her. "And I knew you would come, May," she sobbed in conclusion, "for, night and day, I have prayed our Heavenly Father to restore you to me."

Mr. Alton arose and took her hand in his. "Marion, I am the betrothed of your sister, and shall wish to claim a brother's privilege." He took a hand of Mrs. Aubine and May, put them with Marion's, and, clasping them together, said, solemnly: "Let us be united together in love. Say, Marion, shall it be so? Will you go with us to the home of her whom May has learned to call mother, until I take your sister to her Southern home, then you may accompany us, if you wish?"

Mrs. Aubine warmly urged her to comply with his request, and she could not refuse; while Mr. Alton kissed her brow with all a brother's tenderness, and promised that they would love and cherish her.

When the carriage left that lovely though solitary retreat, a fourth party had been added to their happy circle, and Marion was supremely happy in the love manifested for her.

In the new home to which she had been thus unexpectedly taken Marion was happy, yet everything was new and strange. She was never weary of admiring the beautiful carpets, the rare pieces of statuary, the fine paintings, and even the innumerable books and costly knick-knacks that were scattered about in wild profusion. She paused before the mirror which reflected her whole figure, and thought sadly of the vast difference existing between May and herself. She listened to May's playing and singing with delight; and, having expressed a desire to be instructed, a competent teacher was immediately employed. Mr. Alton marked out for her a course of reading, while May undertook to instruct her in those delicate though essential rules of etiquette. Marion listened with wonder to their conversation; and, idolizing as she did her beautiful and accomplished sister, she became an apt scholar, and, unconsciously, her conversation assumed a different tone and her demeanor changed rapidly. After a time, she appeared in society, and every one was captivated with her sweet air of simplicity and her marked attention to their conversation, yet they could not change her from the simple maiden to the fine lady of fashion. Beautiful and graceful, she was flattered and caressed, yet the influence of Mrs. Aubine exerted over her a powerful charm, and served to make her retain her original character.

May was married. Her adopted mother and darling sister were all unselfish in their wish to have her longer remain single. Mrs. Aubine had become so attached to Marion that May could not urge her, as she had intended, to accompany her to her new home; yet she often sighed in secret at the thought of the separation. Their wedding was strictly private; no fashionable friends were admitted to note all with curious eyes; she was married in the midst of the home circle, and, in the presence of God, promised to love and honor him to whom she gave her hand.

At the moment of parting Harry Alton printed a kiss on the brow of Mrs. Aubine, and said, tenderly, "May I also call you by the endearing name of mother?" A deathly pallor overspread her face. He thought it was at the prospect of parting with one whom she loved so fondly. It caused far different sensations to agitate the breast of May—she thought of her agitation on the evening she told her of her love, and her manner at the present moment. Her heart throbbed wildly. Had she caused her all this suffering? Had she come between her and happiness? But Mrs. Aubine recovered herself quickly, and said, solemnly, "God bless and preserve you in happiness."

"Mother and Marion, do not forget me," said May, sobbing, as she kissed them good-by. Then she put her hand in her husband's, and said, sadly, "I am ready." She was lifted into the carriage, and for a long time remained silent, but his gay manner soon dispelled the sadness that clouded her spirits.

"And is this our home?" exclaimed May, as, having arrived at the end of their journey, Harry pointed out to her a beautiful villa rising in the midst of what was almost a growth of trees. The lovely magnolias scattered their fragrance around, while the acacia-trees drooped their branches as if in welcome. In the background, a broad savannah stretched far away in the distance, while the white cotton-fields were in strange contrast with the dark faces of the busy gatherers.

'Tis no wonder that May clasped her hands and said, softly, "How beautiful!" for they rode up the entrance beneath the shadow of the encircling branches, while the bright sun flashed through the openings in the trees, as if to bid defiance to the attempt to exclude its rays from this quiet spot.

"Ah, there is Uncle Charlie!" as a gentleman came down the steps hastily and advanced to meet them.

"How are you, Harry?" said Uncle Charlie, shaking him heartily by the hand. "This is the new bride, hey!" and he glanced at her sharply; then, as if satisfied with the scrutiny, imprinted a cordial kiss on her blushing cheek, and then assisted her to alight.

Harry looked on smilingly, then threw a dime at the head of the boy who stood ready to care for the horses.

They passed up the steps into the cool, airy hall, then into the drawing-room. Careful hands had arranged the heavy draperies, and everything in the house told the same tale of neatness. Overcome with fatigue and excitement, May sank exhausted on the luxurious sofa, while Harry bathed her flushed face. She thanked him sweetly, but it did not relieve her, and he sent for Aunt Polly, the presiding genius of the household, to show her to her own apartment.

It was a fairy-like retreat that May was ushered into by the assiduous Aunt Polly, who kindly informed her that that was "de private 'partment dat Massa Harry had all fixed for her."

As May gazed around the beautiful chamber prepared for her reception, the thought came into her mind, "Why am I thus blessed?" When she had laid aside her dusty garments, Aunt Polly again ushered her into the drawing-room. She sat down to the beautiful piano which she had not before perceived, her fingers pressed the keys lightly, and there arose a gush of melody, then her voice mingled with the strains, and she sang—

' The dearest spot on earth to me
Is home, sweet home.
The fairyland I've longed to see
Was home, sweet home.
Here how charmed the sense of feeling;
Here's where hearts are so endearing;
All the world is not so cheering,
As home, sweet home."

There were two voices that mingled with hers in the last two lines.

"All the world to me is not so cheering as home, now that I have some one to make me happy here," said Harry.

Uncle Charlie's eyes glistened, and he said, aside, "You have won a treasure, Harry."

Uncle Charlie was but a few years the senior of Harry. He was his father's youngest brother, and had resided with Harry since his father's death. He had been a kind friend to Harry, and Harry, in return, was much attached to him. Why he remained single was merely a matter of surmise with his friends. They did not know that the fair girl whom he hoped to call wife had been stricken down by the hand of disease. He was lively, benevolent, fine-looking, and, withal, wealthy. Everywhere, he was a favorite.

Time passed. May was very happy in her Southern home, and looked forward anxiously to the time when she would see her mother and sister once more. At last her wish was gratified; she received a letter stating that they would be with her soon, and while expectation was as its height they arrived.

Uncle Charlie claimed the privilege of imprinting a kiss on Marion's blushing cheek, declaring enthusiastically that she was a "woodland violet," and in the same breath that Mrs. Aubine was "charming."

May and Harry looked on smilingly.

Mrs. Aubine was even more tender to May than usual, and said to her when alone, "I love Marion very dearly, May, but she cannot fill the void in my heart that your absence left."

Marion was very much improved in appearance; gradually, refinement had overspread her like a veil, and scarce a trace of the former Marion could be discovered. Mrs. Aubine had moulded her after her own fashion, had taught her to be herself at all times.

Uncle Charlie began to pay assiduous attention to Mrs. Aubine, and Marion, who noticed this particularly, declared that there was no one to galkut her. But this was soon contradicted, when a fine young man, a cousin of Harry's by the by, happening to make him a visit, was captivated by her bright eyes, and concluded that he was in no haste to depart.

Overruled by the united persuasions of May, Harry, and, lastly, of Uncle Charlie himself, who, somehow or other, had acquired a great influence over her of late, Mrs. Aubine consented to remain with them. While Edward Alton, Harry's cousin, having been seen to look with admiring eyes at a neighboring plantation, and having been seen in close conversation with Marion, it was conjectured rightly that he would remain also.

Mrs. Aubine had performed her duty. In the happiness of her adopted child she received her reward. She was young, beautiful, and wealthy, and loved by all, with many admirers, yet she had devoted her life to the child of her adoption. It is true she had loved Harry Alton, but this settled into friendship, therefore contradicting the old saying, that "friendship often ends in love, but love in friendship never." This affection revived, and centred itself on Uncle Charlie.

In their beautiful Southern homes let us hope they may live wisely and well, scattering the seeds of that beautiful plant happiness with a lavish hand, loved and respected by all. Surrounded by those they love, let us again hope they may live wisely and well, and that their days may glide as smoothly on as waves of summer sea.

ANGEL LOVE.

BY ANNE L. MUZZEY.

We have lost a love,
We have laid a treasure up in heaven,
We have given
Our hearts' nestling dove
To the angels up above,
To the blessed angels up in heaven.

We have lost a love,
We have lost a prayer,
We have lost our sweetest, only prayer,
In the blue immensity above;
And our hearts are speechless with despair,
For we cannot find a prayer to pray,
Since the angels bore away
Our lost love,
Desolation reigneth everywhere:
There's a dreary sound upon the air,
Like the wail of mourners at a tomb,
And the earth flowers have a sickly bloom.
And the sweet, green hills that use to wear
Vails of sunshine on their foreheads fair,
Stand up bleakly now in frowning gloom;
There's a cloud between us and the sun,
There's a pall upon the summer skies
Since we left our dearest one
Dreaming at the gates of Paradise.

So she died—
So our light went out, and it was night,
So our hearts, through love, were crucified;
So our darling perished from our sight,
So our star of hope and promise set.
God of Heaven, help us to forget!

Oh, our holy love!
Angel love,
It was hard to give her up,
E'en to dwell in golden courts above;
But the fearful cup
Could not pass away,
God had spoken, it was vain to pray.

So we held her in our arms that night—
That long, wretched night,
When Death rained his kisses in with ours,
When he snowed his lilies cold and white
'Mid the fever roses on her cheek,
And our grief broke forth in tempest show'rs,
Though we essayed wearily to speak
Words of hope, when there was hope no more:
When we felt that all indeed was o'er,
Then life wrapped around us like a shroud,
And the sky dropped downward from above,
Closing 'round us like a fearful cloud;
All the world was one wide sepulchre,
For our hearts were buried in with her,
Our lost love.

So there is no beauty on the earth
Since she died,
And we sit beside our rayless hearth
Dreaming, dreaming of the sanctified;
Thrilling with the memory of a tone,
Thinking of the tender light that shone
In the sunny heaven of her eyes;
Kissing, in our fancy, lip and brow,
Wondering if she sees and loves us now,
From her far-off home in Paradise,
In the starry garden of the skies.

We have lost a love—
Lost on earth, but found again in heaven,
Like a star that blossoms but in even;
Our sweet love,
Singing with the angels up above,
Singing with God's angels up in heaven!

SPRING.

BY LILLIAN.

A GENTLER spirit mounts the year's high throne,
And waves a gracious sceptre o'er the land,
Bird songs almost to heavenly sweetness grown,
Welcome the joyous treasures of her hand.

The warm south winds full-fed on morning sweets,
With busy fingers dally with her locks,
And lo, a shining host of blossoms greets
The yearning heart in fields and garden walks!

An emerald wreath her youthful forehead crowns;
Her cheeks reflect the ruddy glow of health;
Till waking nature loses all her frowns,
And to the world displays her growing wealth!

Thus comes the tuning voices long since mute,
Brimful of glee she weaves Earth's bridal charms;
Gives blooming promises of autumn fruit,
And full-robed waits the summer's circling arms!

OUR FAMILY HORSE.

BY DOROTHEA.

It had long been decided in the family, that to maintain a position in the world, one must have a horse of one's own. So frequent had been the discussions of the subject, that ordering out the family hack had become the El Dorado of our childish dreams. How to possess ourselves of the animal was a problem of difficult solution. Little Will thought it might be accomplished by penny deposits in his tin savings bank, and at once devoted himself to a rigid self-denial of candies and toys; as none of our schemes were on a much more gigantic scale, we were little disposed to laugh at Will. Our desire for the horse increased with the difficulty of procuring him; even our eldest, who seldom gave reins to her fancy, became so engrossed, that her nightly show of shadows on the wall, for the benefit of the children, consisted wholly of horses. Hitherto there had been no appointed consultation, though we generally fell to talking of the matter when together, but in an abstract manner, as one talks of the prospect of aerial navigation; at length father brought the crisis one dull, drizzly evening, by crying out to mother, as he threw off his overcoat, after a long walk, to attend a vexatious patient—"Mother, let's decide about the horse to-night." With the word, the horse seemed lost to us; the possibility of buying him, always so small, shrank to nothing; speculation had kept him in prospect, but decision—our little hearts went down with a pang, and Tom, who had many times clambered upon his back in fancy, felt doomed to everlasting pedestrianism.

Now that the subject was fairly in hand, dear mother brought forth the usual remonstrances in her usual meek voice, to which father opposed the ever-ready and indisputable plea, that a rising professional man ought to risk as much as a business man. When mother remembered all the finery she owed to this argument, the last year's velvet cloak and furs, the day before yesterday's fantastical what-not for the bare corner of our miniature parlor, to all which, her love of the beautiful had so easily reconciled her, she desisted. Thereupon, we racked our brains to prove the necessity of the purchase. The usual "benefit to health," and consequent saving in doctor's bill was denied us, for father was the physician who kept sickness from his own doors. Save that Tom suffered largely from chilblains, no one of us had needed so much as a plaster since running the infantile gauntlet of measles and whooping-cough. As to exercise, we already pursued that to a fault; either of us girls could walk ten miles at a stretch, and though I measured but five feet from the tip of my toes to the top of my head, and my arms were not o'er-stout, I could row a boat up stream with adverse winds. We were reduced to father's real comfort, the great pleasure of the whole family, and the effect upon the multitude; the first decided mother, while we girls, with natural vanity, were influenced by the latter. When the decision was announced, Margaret threw an alarming caricature of a horse upon the wall, while Tom cheered lustily, for which he was reprimanded by father, who, for once, let excitement overcome his good-humor.

Well, the horse was to be had, but how, was still unanswered, and with renewed energies we consulted how we might curtail necessities for this one luxury, how we might be uncomfortable and economical in-doors, that we might be comfortable and extravagant out of doors. First it was proposed to dispense with the little maid of all work, general overseer of pots and kettles, and scrubbing-brushes, she, to whom soapsuds seemed an essential; she, who was always ready to take up baby where he was put down, always in trim for the front door; the very enumeration of her capabilities dismayed us, Margaret especially, whose one little weakness was her hand, hands fair and white, but persisting in spreading at the joints at the least contact with hard labor. Margaret could not conceive of a lady with bony hands. It was in vain that I laughed at her. I could not understand it, for, as she said, were not my hands like mother's, brown and plump; in winter hopelessly brown, but plump and white in summer as any heart could desire, and whose joints no amount of hard labor could reach? So the little maid could not be spared, but we comforted ourselves with the thought that the little she cost us wouldn't have kept the horse in oats; to be sure, as mother said, "It was shameful to have a young thing working so for a pittance;" but then, everybody did it, and we were no worse than our neighbors. Tom, who was just then in a mania for missionary heroines, suggested that as economy seemed impossible, we should get up an independent fund, by selling bones and rags, after the manner of the latest of his models, which brought down a mild lecture from sister Margaret, during which, father declared for an indefinite course of self-denial and economy, to be practised on every possible occasion, without any fixed, premeditated plan, to which we all pledged ourselves, and in accordance with which Tom and I, in hasty zeal, deposited a dollar (the fruit of three months' hoarding for a magic-lantern) for the future victualling of the horse, that was to be, and turned our faces bedward, our little breasts swelling with the spirit of self-sacrifice.

Despite a little hoard of worldly maxims with which father usually prefaced his transactions, he was one of the most unworldly of men, and his intended purchase was no sooner rumored than every unserviceable nag in town was fitted up for his inspection. He was the more easily imposed upon, as at the country races he had attended, he had frequently noticed that the winning horses were the shabbiest. Dear mother herself was a better judge of horseflesh, for, in the days of her maidenhood, she had been the finest rider in all the country round. We children had the exact pattern of the horse we anticipated in the print of an English barnyard, sent to me by a little, ardent lover, in token of his sympathy in our present desires. When we represented to father that only such a horse was worth purchasing, he shook his head in a manner which showed plainly that our model was not an animal after his own heart. It was less than a week after the consultation, that father went out with an important business look in his face, after duly impressing upon us the truth that appearances are not sure guides to worth, and that, especially in the matter of horses, a sorry-looking beast might be capable of great speed, great endurance, and of being made quite attractive enough to the eye, for such a sober family as ourselves. That the horse was coming home there was no doubt, and in accordance with father's remarks, we moderated our anticipations till we believed ourselves ready for anything that went on four legs, and was larger than a dog.

But our most vivid imagination fell short of the dilapidated animal that made his appearance with father. Tom named him Barebones at once, and Margaret, who was a trifle literary, declared he had as many "points" as Rozi-nante. Ever since the horse had been mentioned, I had been secretly planning for a side-saddle and riding-habit, wherewith I was to ride through town in queenly style, to the excessive envy of my most dangerous rival for the attentions of a certain captivating youth, who made much palpitation among the virgin hearts of Staunton. At this downfall to my cherished hopes I could scarce restrain the tears. But Tom, who was on the nil desperando order, declared that, despite the fistula on his neck, and that he was continually jerking his head in harness, and had an ugly way of going on three legs and holding up the fourth as if in reserve for a catastrophe, a good supply of oats might make him a very decent creature. As he was led away to the stable, to profit by Tom's hint of the oats, we could not help noting the remarkable metamorphosis of which he was capable. Seen from in front, as he jerked his head in the air, he was quite like an ostrich; but from the side, on account of an immense projection of the hip-bones, he seemed the caricature of a camel. Altogether, we were quite ready to believe, as father, in his discomfiture, ventured to remark, that he must have been kept on barrel hoops and shavings. Once in the stable, it was further developed that he was incapable of managing his food until it had been nearly pulverized, which, without a look at his teeth, at once decided the question of age. Still, with characteristic hopefulness, we bore up against these symptoms till the animal was fairly in harness; there, neither moral or physical force could tempt him to budge when he was predisposed for a rest; blows seemed rather to infuse an acceptable warmth through his chilly veins, for, we fancied, comfortable satisfaction settled over his features at each stroke of the whip. Like the boy with the elephant, our one question was what to do with him? Use him we could not, for, even were he disposed to travel, what one of us would endure the mortification of riding behind him? The stable seemed like a tomb. How many little vanities, how many anticipated triumphs were buried there! Every day mother sighed over the dollars—the "sinking fund," as Tom called it—swept from our scanty store; every day passers-by seemed casting derisive grins at the stable; every day we wished the horse might die, and every day he clung to life with renewed tenacity. He was literally a skeleton at the door, for, though he "lived upon nothing but victuals and drink," his bones refused to be covered.

At length, there chanced into the house a Yankee peddler, a lithe, wiry, keen-eyed man, to whom father, as a desperate extremity, offerred the horse in exchange for some culinary utensils. The stranger at once closed with the bargain, which so elated father that he confided to him the whole story of the swindle. As he concluded, the stranger, emboldened by the unusual familiarity, gave him a patronizing slap on the shoulder, with a twinkle of his gray eye which said more emphatically than words, "You're a green un."

If a pestilence had passed from us, we could not have been more relieved than by the removal of the horse. Just after his departure, we found father chipping away at a smooth stone, with a sort of humorous, self-deprecating smile, and, peering over his shoulder, saw the following:—

IN MEMORY OF BAREBONES.

Who departed this stable Nov. 16, 1847.

"The fool is known by his folly."

This was the peace-offering he presented mother, and she, dear woman, did what any loving wife could under the circumstances—laid her hand caressingly on his shoulders, and, with her best smile, said, "You're a dear man!" Whether this purchase had anything to do with Tom's subsequent bias towards races, or with Margaret's expending the first tithe of a fortune which fell to her in after days for a span of fine horses, I leave my readers to judge; for myself, I resolved from that moment never to marry a man who could not choose a horse against "odds."

CHILDREN'S JOYS AND SORROWS.

We can endure a melancholy man, but not a melancholy child; the former, in whatever slough he may sink, can raise his eyes either to the kingdom of reason or of hope; but the little child is entirely absorbed and weighed down by one black poison-drop of the present.

Think of a child led to the scaffold; think of Cupid in a Dutch coffin; or watch a butterfly, after its four wings have been torn off, creeping like a worm, and you will feel what I mean. But wherefore? The first has been already given; the child, like the beast, only knows purest, though shortest sorrow; one which has no past and no future; one such as the sick man receives from without, the dreamer from himself into his asthenic brain; finally, one with the consciousness not of guilt, but of innocence. Certainly, all the sorrows of children are but shortest nights, as their joys are but hottest days; and, indeed, both so much so, that in the latter, often clouded and starless time of life, the matured man only longingly remembers his old childhood's pleasures, while he seems altogether to have forgotten his childhood's grief. This weak remembrance is strangely contrasted with the opposing one in dreams and fevers in this respect, that in the two last it is always the cruel sorrows of childhood which return; the dream this mock-sun of childhood—and the fever, its distorting glass—both draw forth from dark corners the fears of defenceless childhood, which press and cut with iron fangs into the prostrate soul. The fair scenes of dreams mostly play on an after-stage, whereas the frightful ones choose for theirs the cradle and the nursery. Moreover, in fever, the ice-hands of the fear of ghosts, the striking one of the teachers and parents, and every claw with which fate has pressed the young heart, stretch themselves out to catch the wandering man. Parents, consider then that every childhood's Rupert—the name given in Germany to the fictitious being employed to frighten children into obedience—even though it has lain chained for tens of years, yet breaks loose and gains mastery over the man so soon as it finds him on a sick bed. The first fright is more dangerous the sooner it happens; as the man grows older, he is less and less easily frightened; the little cradle or bed canopy of the child is more easily quite darkened than the starry heaven of the man.

OCEAN.—Almighty, yet gentle power! Thou rushest in anger against the earth, and devour'st it, and thy vast Briareus arms encircle its whole circumference. Yet, dost thou silence the foaming stream, and subdue it into gentle waves, gently dost thou play round thy smiling children, the little islands, and dost lick the careless hand that toys with thy surface from the passing skiff.

MY FORTE.

Being Extracts from a Young Lady's Journal. Stolen and Selected.

BY S. ANNIE FROST.

July 13th, 18—.

This is my birthday, my eighteenth birthday, and this is the sixth journal I have commenced, for I buy a bran-new volume every year. I looked over the old books this morning, and I am very much dissatisfied with the result. I am eighteen! Well, what else am I? Nothing. I am not pretty. Sister Jessie, our eldest, is a beauty. Such black eyes, such heavy brown curls, such a lovely complexion, and such a stately, graceful figure are not met with every day. The rest of the girls, Hattie, Louisa, Mary, and Jennie, have each some special accomplishment or talent, all except me. Every one of them, even Jennie, who is younger than I am, can talk of a forte. Hattie plays most splendidly on the piano; that's her forte. I can't; I should go raving distracted with nervousness, if I spent seven hours a day, as she does, running up and down, scrambling over the key-board like a kitten after a ball, or banging chords till every drop on the chandelier quivers. No! I can play dancing music, at which Hattie turns up her nose, but music, as an art, is certainly not my forte!

Lou, bless her blue eyes! does the most wonderful pieces of fancy-work. Such shawls as she knits! such mats as she embroiders! such slippers, smoking-caps, table-covers, and pincushions as she works! Why can't I? Lou ain't half as big as I am, though she is older, and her tiny little white hands are lost in mine; but she manages needles in a manner wonderful to behold. To see her wield a knitting-needle as big as the kitchen poker is a sight worth seeing. How she can have the patience to spend whole weeks over one shawl or one table-cover is a mystery to me.

Heigh-ho! What is my forte? George, that's our grown-up brother, takes my head between his hands, and kisses me on the lips, and says my specialty is to be the dearest sister in the world; but that don't comfort me much.

Mary paints. To be sure, you can't tell her rows from her horses unless you look for their horns; and I offended her mortally by taking her head portraying "Revenge" for her idea of "Hunger." I didn't mean any harm; but the man had his mouth and eyes so wide open, and he was so thin and peaked looking that I was certain he was starving. His nose was all to one side, and one eye was bigger than the other; but still Mary says art is her forte, and I suppose she knows.

Even Jennie, who is crazy on the subject of languages, talks of her forte being a talent for acquiring foreign tongues.

It is horrible not to have any specialty in a family where everybody has one. They all treat me in the most off-hand manner. Ma says: "Here, Fan, just mend these stockings, won't you? Hattie is practising." Or, "Fan, you run down the street for me, won't you? Mary is at work on her Judas. You haven't anything to do in particular." George brings me all his gloves to mend and his shopping commissions to attend to, on the supposition that I haven't anything to do. I am errand girl, seamstress, and able to make myself "generally useful in a family," as they say when they give a girl a character; but I wish, I do wish I knew what was my special forte.

July 20th.

I have found it! Eureka! I know my forte! It is a very humble one, but still it is a specialty.

This is how it came about: Last week, Hattie and Mary went into the country to spend the summer; Jessie and Jennie went with Aunt Margaret to Saratoga. Nobody was left at home but father, ma, George, Lou, and I. Yesterday Susan, that's our cook, had an attack of a disease she calls muleralgia in her head, and left at an hour's notice, and Jane, the chamber-maid, said she couldn't do all the work of this large family, and she left in the afternoon. This led to the discovery of my forte. I am domestic; that's it, DOMESTIC! Pa says that my mutton-chops to-day were not to be beat (he said beat, so I don't care if beaten is better grammar), and George says that he never thought fried potatoes could be brought to such perfection.

Don't we have fun! This morning I was up before the sun. Ma took the up stairs department, Lou undertook the parlors, and I was left to reign over the pots and kettles. I got breakfast, dinner, and tea, and I only went to ma twice about the meat, once about the cabbage, three times about the pudding, and four times about the gravy.

July 21st.

Ma and Lou went away yesterday. As there were only three of us left, I persuaded her not to get any new girls till she came back, and she is to be gone three weeks. Three whole weeks! Somehow it ain't so jolly without ma and Lou to laugh over the work with me.

Pa and George went off early this morning; I am horribly afraid they breakfasted down town. It was too bad! I had sliced my potatoes to fry, and had cut the mutton-chops all ready to broil; the coffee was made, the bread cut, and I had my potatoes on, when the bell rang. It was the milk-man! I haven't the least idea how much milk ma takes, but he said four quarts; so I took it. It looks a dreadfully big lot for three people, to put in their coffee. When I came in, my potatoes were all burnt black.

George was standing at the top of the stairs, whistling "Come, Come Away," so I knew he was in a hurry, and pa cried, "Fan, any breakfast to-day?" I tried to laugh it off. I made pa carry up the coffee-pot, and George the plate of bread, while I took the chops.

"Fan, what ails the coffee?" This was the first salute; I had forgotten to clear it.

"I am afraid these chops are burnt." That was the second.

At last they went off. Then "came the tug of war."

How can people make a bed alone? I've made them often; ma or Lou stands on one side and takes hold with me, and we get along beautifully. But to-day! I tried my best; but as fast as I got one side nice I was sure to pull all the clothes off fixing the other side. They looked awfully—like great snow-banks covered with quilts. I can't help it. How can I get on both sides of the bed at once?

Then there were the pitchers to fill, and the rooms to sweep and dust, and the parlors to put in order, and the dining-room to sweep, and all the breakfast things to clear away, and I am sure, positive, the bell rang a thousand times to-day. There were boys with sand, boys with fruit, boys with brooms, boys with potatoes, boys with every vegetable, animal, and mineral production. There were women with berries, women to beg, women who wanted sewing, women of every description. Every time I was safely landed in the third story, that bell rang.

Why can't a woman swear! I am sure I should not have slammed the door so hard in the face of the last boy with sand, when I opened it for the nine hundred and ninety-ninth time, if I could have said some real bad word in the entry when I went down. I am afraid I did say "Confound that bell!" once. We are all weak! I was just going up stairs to perform the operation that Susan calls "cleaning" herself: I was not lovely to look upon at that moment—my hair, naturally of a mud color, was covered with an old silk handkerchief, my sleeves were rolled up, the skirt of my dress was pinned up, for I had performed Herculean feats with the broom and dust-pan. On the stairs I stopped. My fire! until that moment I had forgotten it. I went into the kitchen; heart-rending sight for an amateur cook—my fire was out! Down I went on my knees, poker in hand, and began to poke. Didn't I poke! Nothing short of iron could have stood my vigorous handling. The dust flew in all directions. My nose itched; I scratched it with my smutty fingers; then, then, of all times, the bell rang.

Down went the poker. "Confound the bell!" I cried, and darted into the entry. I opened the door. Horror of horrors!

"Is Miss Mason at home?" That's definite when there are six of us.

I knew well enough who he was, though. He was Jessie's friend, Mr. Lorraine. There he stood, in a full suit of white linen (how I wanted to touch it with my smutty fingers) looking down upon me with his most benign expression.

"Miss Jessie is at Saratoga," I replied.

"Ah! I am sorry to miss seeing her. Will you give her my card? Are any of the young ladies at home?"

Whew! didn't I want to box his ears. Think of the impudence of the puppy, pretending he did not know me.

"All the young ladies are out of town," I said, "excepting Miss Frances, and she is particularly engaged."

"Miss Fannie! Ah, yes, the musical one—"

"No, sir."

"The artist?"

"No, sir."

"Not the lovely blonde?"

"No, sir, that is Louisa."

"Oh, the little girl!"

"No, sir"—my blood was up by this time—"your humble servant;" and I dropped him a courtesy.

He burst into a clear, ringing laugh.

"Pardon me," he said; "I was rude, I fear, but I thought you were in disguise for a joke. Will you allow me to walk in?"

What could I do?

"Certainly," I replied.

We went into the parlor. I was determined not to let him stay, so I explained that our girls had left us, and that the ladies were all away.

He began to give me the funniest description of his trouble when his mother left him once, and the girl deserted him the next day. I forgot my dress, my bare arms, dusty hair, old silk headdress, and dirty face, and laughed with him.

Didn't we chat? He had just finished reading Miss Proctor's lovely, darling book of poems, and we agreed in our enthusiasm over it. He quoted some of my pet passages, till I almost cried with the mixture of pleasure and pain they gave me. Then the flowers on the table attracted him. There was the subject for another chat, and we discussed exotics, home flowers, and wild flowers with as much interest and animation as if it were not after twelve o'clock, and the dinner still in the market basket on the table in the kitchen. I forgot my forte, I did, indeed. I forgot my hungry brother and father who would come in at two o'clock, and I chatted away like—like nothing but an excited, interested woman. My morning's exercise had sent the blood to my cheeks, and it danced through my veins with unwonted rapidity. Books, flowers, music, the weather, all came up for conversation, and the time flew.

One! The striking of the clock first recalled me to my duties. I looked at my disordered dress, and then at my elegant companion, and, for the first time, the blood crimsoned my brow with embarrassment. I had been annoyed, piqued, interested; now I was embarrassed. He perceived this, and with graceful, gentlemanly ease, took his leave, asking permission to call again soon to spend an evening.

I don't think I shall say "Confound the bell!" when he does come.

I bowed him out, and then flew to the kitchen. The empty grate of the range yawned at me, and I fancied was laughing at my distress. I opened the market basket. A piece of beef for roasting, green peas, asparagus, potatoes, and young beets met my dismayed vision.

Beef to roast, peas to shell—all to be ready at two o'clock, and at one I stood alone in the kitchen, without a ray of fire!

How was I to make that fire?

I lit paper enough to fill a bushel basket, and turned the coal on it. That wouldn't burn. Then I tried the coal first and the paper on top. That was no better. Then I put the coal in the paper, rolling up a few pieces in little pieces of paper—oh, dear, that wouldn't burn either! I was getting desperate!

Chips! What good angel suggested chips I don't know, but I flew down to the cellar, and collected a basketful. I threw them in, added more paper, put on more coal, and then lit the whole. Didn't it burn? Fast and furious roared the blaze, and I turned to the sink, washed my hands, and went to work on the peas. I shelled like mad. An ominous silence made me turn. The last spark of my promising fire was just dying out.

"Dinner ready, Fan?"

George's voice, George's step, and next, George's six feet of manhood in my kitchen.

"Oh, George!" and there I broke down, and a great choking sob finished the sentence.

"Why, pet, what's the matter?"

I haven't arrived at the dignity of any special talent yet, and the family call me pet, little woman, blossom, old lady, or any other soubriquet that comes handiest.

George looked at the fire, then at the basket, and took all in that one glance.

"Don't cry, Fan, I'll make the fire."

"But the dinner?"

"Travel down cellar with that. Give us some coffee, and scrambled eggs, and bread and butter. What's in those two big pitchers?"

My milk! I had forgotten to put it on the ice, and there it stood. Wasn't it sour, that hot, hot day?

I took the market basket and the peas shelled and unshelled down to the safe. George, the darling, was as good as his word. When I returned, he had taken off his coat, and was at work at my fire.

I shall know how to make it if it goes out again. Didn't I watch him?

I got out the coffee-mill, and ground with a will.

"Dinner ready, Fan?"

Enter father with a basket of raspberries.

My fire was burning splendidly, and promising George a kiss after I had washed my face, I drove them both up stairs.

My coffee was delicious, my eggs perfect, the butter was fresh, ditto the bread, but where—where was the milk to come from. Again George volunteered, and went with a butter-kettle to buy a quart. Five quarts in one day for a family of three! Economy nowhere!

We dined at three o'clock, and didn't I eat?

I was almost starved, and we all laughed together over the mishaps of the morning.

Oh, how tired I was when I had cleared away the dinner dishes and started up to my room for the long postponed dressing.

Tea was easily got, and the dishes washed up. We have had company all the evening, and I hear the clock striking eleven as I write this line. Heigh-ho! I am very stiff, very tired, my hands are blistered with sweeping, and I begin to have serious misgivings about my domestic talents.

July 22d.

Well, yesterday was bad enough, but to-day—"Angels and ministers of grace defend us!" Where shall I begin? At the beginning? The beginning of the day is generally after one is up in the morning, but my day began before that. I was roused by the most tremendous rapping at the gate. I listened. Then I sprang out of bed and threw open my window.

"Who's there?"

"Catherine. I've come to wash."

Sure enough! I now remembered that ma had postponed the washing until to-day, because I was to put the clothes to soak yesterday afternoon, and I had, as Susan used to say, "clane forgot it."

"Wait a minute; I'll come down to you!" I cried to Catherine.

I hurried on my clothes, and started to go down. On the stairs an ominous sound fell upon my ears. One, two, three, four, five, six, seven! Seven o'clock! Our breakfast hour was seven, and I was just up. Fortunately, pa and George gave no signs of being awake as I passed their doors.

I admitted Catherine, who always comes to help in the washing, and to-day was to do it all, and then I started to bring the soiled linen from all parts of the house. I piled a large quantity in a large basket, and away I went. Down one flight safely, down another, and I stood at the head of the last flight—the long flight into the hall. A tiny tear in the carpet caught my foot; I caught at the banisters; missed them, and down I rolled. First I was on top, then the basket. Shirts, skirts, stockings marked our rapid passage. Bump I went, scratch came the basket, I screamed. Pa's door opened, then George's. It seemed a week before I landed at the foot of the stairs. Where? Right in the basket. I am a big girl, but in I went, head first, buried in the clothes.

"Where's Fan?" asked George.

"What's the matter?" said pa.

"Arrah, where is Miss Fannie?" said Catherine, running out of the kitchen. "Save us, if she ain't in the basket! Here's her blessed boots a-stickin' out!" And I was hauled out of the basket by the blessed boots.

I couldn't be sentimental; I felt sore and bruised. Pa was pale when he came down, at the thought of what might have been. But my gravity was too severely tasked; I laughed till I was tired, and then I cried, then I looked at the ruins, the clothes scattered over the stairs, and I laughed again.

Catherine gravely collected the white fragments, and marched off into the kitchen. Thanks to George's care, a fine fire burned there. But Catherine's brew was black as thunder; no boiler on, no tubs up from the cellar, no water hot, "no nothing ready," as she informed me.

Breakfast was late, of course. That cleared away, I made another attack on the beds. Oh, if they could be made with only one side! George's, being single, ain't so bad; but mine, which I share with Lou, and pa's are awful!

I hurried all the work, for I determined to give them a good dinner to-day. A good dinner washing-day. Deluded Fannie. The beef was not so bad, but the difficulties under which I labored with regard to vegetables were fearful. I am sure Napoleon's battles were nothing compared to my rows (I know that's not a ladylike word) with Catherine. The skirmishings between the boiler and my army of pots were studies for a general. First Catherine conquered, and the boiler stood, bold and majestic in front; then, while she was hanging out the clothes, along came a young lady, and with an effort painful to behold, pushed the boiler back to bring the smaller fry (no, the smaller boil) forward. My water bubbled, my peas grew tender, my asparagus ditto, the potatoes softened. Whew! in came Catherine, away went my pots, right and left; one pull of her vigorous arms drew my big enemy forward. Splash! in went the clothes. Dash! out went Catherine, and I had to commence again.

Yet, spite of all this, my dinner was a success. I had prepared every dish according to Mrs. Hale's directions, and my little family warmly applauded my efforts.

After dinner I descended to the kitchen. Such a scene! Here a pile of clothes ready to sprinkle; there a pile of greasy pans and pots; to the right, a tub of rinsing water; to the left, a bucket of pea-pods and potato parings; on one table a bowl of starch; on the other, the dinner dishes. I stood dismayed.

Catherine's face reminded me that she had had no dinner. Hastening to supply this omission, I stumbled over the tub of rinsing water, and in I went. I didn't say "Hang the clothes!" but I wanted to. Wasn't it bad enough to nearly break my neck ~~over~~ them in the morning, without being half-drowned in the tub in the afternoon. I went slowly up stairs to change my wet clothes. The climax was to come. I was on my way down again, dry and tidy, when the unusual exertion, the heat, and the sudden chill produced a sort of vertigo, and I fell in the entry. Pa had not gone out, and he came at the noise of my fall.

He has forbidden me to go into the kitchen again, engaged Catherine to stay until we can fill Susan's place and Jane's, and I am scribbling here to pass away the evening.

Can anybody tell me what is my forte?

The next extract is a year later.

July 13th.

Another new journal, that I must sign Fannie Lorraine. My husband said to me yesterday, "Fannie, I fell in love with you on the day you opened the door for me. The young lady who was not ashamed to be seen engaged in domestic pursuits, and who could converse with graceful ease in such a costume, without any awkward attempt to hide her disarray, was the wife for me."

I have not yet found my forte!

THE RECORD OF A MOMENT.

BY WILLIE E. PABOR.

THE door might have opened and closed again, but no sound met my ear; a stranger stood by my side, but no footfall broke the intense silence in which I love to sit, and sitting muse. Who was he? Where came he from? What would he? Whither was he tending? Shall I ask him to be seated? Shall I bid him speak?

Such were the thoughts that flashed across my mind in the brief interval between my discovery of his presence and the motion I made towards a seat with my unemployed hand. But my visitor would not be seated, and I arose and confronted him.

His brow was massively intellectual, and ridges denoting deep thought were plainly discernible upon its surface; his eyes were of a deep raven, and his cheeks pale; his lips were thin and compressed; his chin finely moulded, and the physique of lips and chin denoted firmness of resolve and resoluteness of action; his black hair fell in massy clusters almost to his shoulders; his arms were of a medium length, and his hands small and delicate; his stature was nobly high, his bearing proud, his demeanor open. Yet he spoke not.

I was getting impatient. I am naturally of a nervous temperament, and the intrusion was no way in harmony with my seclusive ideas at this moment.

Moving restlessly in my chair, pen resting listlessly in my hand, the sheet before me but half written over, and his eyes fixed firmly upon me, I knew not what to do. But, at last, recollecting that desperate measures required correspondingly desperate resolves, I fixed my gaze upon the intruder and said: "I am not accustomed to intrusions, especially of this kind."

Pausing to watch the effect of my words, I saw my visitor acknowledge the remark by a slight inclination of his head, but did not respond. I sank deeper and deeper in the unexpected quandary I found myself in. Shall I order him from my presence? No, this would not be gentlemanly. Shall I call the servants? No, this would be cowardly. Shall I command him to declare his mission? No, this would be too abrupt. Shall I resume my pen? I remembered that the article I was engaged on was to be ready at a certain hour, and the minute hand was rapidly travelling toward the end of my article probation; but my conduct would be uncivil, to say the least. So I again addressed myself to the task.

"As I said before, I am not accustomed to intrusions, and am at a loss to account for the way in which you managed to gain admittance to my sanctum sanctorum. I hope, however, as you are here, you will make yourself conversable."

Still no answer!

I viewed the extraordinary apparition from head to foot. "He is not the Wandering Jew," I thought. Can he be the—that for which I have searched so often and labored so long? Is he the impersonification of silence? Is his speechlessness a silent admission of his mission? Is it an automaton I am addressing, placed here by some mischievous friend while my thoughts were fixed on other than the ap-purtenances about me? Was the inclination I noticed merely a phantasm of my own, or was it the result of obedience to some spring touched by a skilful worker, through the medium of a wire?

In good truth, I knew not what to think, or do! Speech seemed lost on him, so I attempted to rise and calm myself by walking; when, strange to say, I could not stir; I seemed fixed to the spot—my pen was as if glued to my fingers and my hand to the paper over which it was running so rapidly ere the vision presented itself, and I could not move the arm from its position.

"Speak," I gasped, as the spell deepened upon me, depriving me of my faculties one by one, and fearing that speech also would be taken and I be left utterly at the mercy of my visitor, as the bird is at the mercy of the cat whose glittering organs of sight charm, charm, until the victim is in its grasp, and fearing a similar fate.

"Speak—speak—speak!"

I might as well address the man in the moon, or my fellow at the antipodes. In my endeavors to reach the heights of converse, I imagined the feelings of Sisyphus, ever rolling, rolling, rolling the stone he may never fix on the mount's summit. The tortures of mind I underwent, recalled all the horrors presented to Prometheus, chained to the rock. The suspense of the scene exceeded that of Xerxes', in that brief interval between the onslaught and the flight of his legions. I chafed more, perhaps, than did Napoleon on the island of Saint Helena. The "horrors on horrors head accumulating" spoken of by the poet, were as nothing to my condition.

I can just remember my eyes becoming fixed on the vision; my head leaning backward, my tongue lolling out of my mouth, when—I awoke, and the mystery was a mystery no more. I had fallen into a doze as an intimate friend entered my room, and though he had stood before me but a moment, the moment had lengthened out into hours to my distorted fancy. I recollected that in dreams, years even were compressed into an hour. Taking a draught of cold water, I was soon restored to all my faculties. But the memory of that terrible vision can never be effaced. The appalling tones in which I bade him "speak, speak, speak," still linger in my ears.

THE PLOUGH-BOY.

BY WM. F. WOOD.

WHEN morning steals along the sky,
Where night's fair jewels sweetly lie,
And scents the breeze and tints the blue
And gems the budding flowers with dew,
The plough-boy from his humble bed,
As stout of heart and clear of head,
And free from every shade of care,
As nature's children always are,
Goes forth to feast his honest eyes
With rapture on the earth and skies;
And as the feathered songsters roll
The accents rich around his soul,
His heart expands with nature's joy
And bliss untainted with alloy;
He sees the purple skies unfold
Their gorgeous hues of blue and gold,
He hears the streamlet's silvery sound,
In accents sweet the hills around,
He sees the lovely flowers expand,
Fair emblems of the better land;
And with a heart as free from guile
As morning's heaven-awakened smile,
Envies not those who wile away
On silken couch the dawning day,
Nor hears, nor heeds ambition's call,
Nor reck's if thrones and empires fall,
But, cheerfully resigned to fate
Leaves glory to the vulgar great.

THE EMIGRANT'S FAREWELL.

BY ANNIE M. BEACH.

My native land, farewell to thee forever:

Thy distant hills are fading from my view;

'Mid thy green paths I never more shall wander,
Or gaze again upon thy rivers blue.

Dear native land, with all thy fond endearments,
I leave thee, to return, ah, never more!

But oft will fancy love to backward wander,
And linger o'er the sunny scenes of yore.

Farewell, my home! I ne'er again shall enter

At close of day thy vine encircled door,

Nor sit beside thy cheerful hearth in winter,

While through the hills the night winds wildly roar.

Adieu, my friends! your kind, familiar faces,

Will ne'er from memory's tablet fade away;

But gleam, like stars, to lighten up the darkness

That gathers round me wheresoe'er I stray.

Shall I be missed when the rich grapes ye gather,

And shout the merry, merry harvest home?

And will ye sigh that I am gone forever

From the loved spot where once I used to roam?

Each wave that rolls but makes the distance greater,

'Twixt thee and me, home of my early years,

And brings me nearer to that unknown country

Fraught with wild fancy's doubts, and hopes, and fears,

Now the last hill-top fadeth in the distance,

And evening shadows wrap the misty shore:

My lonely heart grows sad, and sick, and weary—

Farewell, my native land, for evermore!

"A GREAT BARGAIN."

BY MARY W. JANVRIN, AUTHOR OF "MRS. WARD'S VISIT TO THE PRINCE," "JACASSA'S JOURNAL," ETC. ETC.

"WHEN will your carpet sale be, sir?"

"At half past ten precisely, this forenoon, ma'am."

"And you say this is nearly new?" asked the little lady in a plain travelling-dress, water-proof cape, and neat "rough and ready" straw hat with blue trimmings—a far more quiet, genteel figure than her companion, attired in a heavy black watered poplin and gay chenille shawl, or the crowds of expensively dressed ladies she had met on the pave before entering the large auction and commission rooms of Hammerton & Co. on Tremont Street, where, weekly under the auctioneer's baton, were sold the discarded household gods of families who had either sent such hither in order to refurnish more elegantly, or broken up to board, or mayhaps, whom a too lavish style of expenditure had reduced to this alternative to raise means to meet debts incurred.

"Have been worn less than a year, ma'am, and in the elegant mansion of one of our wealthiest men, Mr. Moneybags, of Beacon Street. He is now refurnishing with pattern carpets woven for him in France," was the reply of the obsequious salesman.

"If I thought this would prove good? it ought to, only been used a few months," said the little lady, hesitating, and again taking hold of the corner of the rich, and apparently scarce soiled Brussels carpet, hanging in the centre of the large salesroom into which were crowded all kinds of housekeeping gear "too numerous to mention," as the advertisements set forth—parlor furniture, chairs, tête-à-têtes, lounges, chamber sets, mattresses, sideboards, baby wagons, book-cases, etc. etc.—Each and all in different stages of preservation. "What do you think, Mrs. Bruce?" turning to her companion with the dress trailing the dusty floor and the heavy shawl, "you know best about buying carpets at auction-rooms."

"Oh, this looks nice, and I'm sure it must be rich if the Moneybags had it, Mrs. Morrison! Real Brussels, of course; such people never have cheap things. It couldn't have been less than two dollars when new!" whispered the tall, showily dressed woman whose attire bespoke a style widely differing from the neat little figure looking over the carpet. "And only down so little time! Why, it can't be soiled scarcely! Will look the same as a new one on your parlor; nobody'll know but you had it right from the web. I'm glad I urged you to come in here; I'most always see a bargain at these rooms. Why, I know a lady, Mrs. Hinckley, who got a suite of parlor carpets at auction for a mere song; and you never could have told them from Mrs. Richie's, our next door neighbor's new ones, that she paid four times as much for! If I were you, I'd come in and bid on it; you'll stand a chance to get a great bargain, I think, and if it goes up too high, you needn't bid, you know!"

"How many yards are there, sir?"

"Forty-five, ma'am," answered the salesman.

"And your parlor only takes thirty, you say, Mrs. Morrison!" again said Mrs. Bruce. "You will get out enough for your stairs and upper hall all alike; how nice!"

"Mr. Moneybags is having each flight carpeted alike; that's the style now," interpolated the voluble vender.

"Well, I think I'll come in at the sale," said little Mrs. Morrison, turning away, and threading her way among the scattered articles of furniture to the door. "Mrs. Bruce," she continued, as they again stepped on the pavement, "it's now about nine, and we shall have an hour and a half before the sale, if I should conclude to attend. But, really, I don't know what to do about buying an auction carpet! Edward gave me forty dollars, and will expect a good one for that, and I'd almost made up my mind to get a nice three-ply we looked at yesterday. It was a dollar and a quarter, and is almost like Cousin Ellen's, who was married in the spring before we were. I do like a three-ply better than a common tapestry, after all; they are so much neater, and then they can be turned."

"But this is a Brussels, you know; and is almost the same as new, Mrs. Morrison, and if you can get it at a bargain!" urged Mrs. Bruce, who belonged to that class of shoppers who invariably purchase whatever they are getting at "a great sacrifice."

"I know it, but if it shouldn't turn out well; though there don't seem much risk, it has been worn so little! But yet Edward says that cheap things don't always come cheapest in the end."

"Well, I don't know about that doctrine," replied Mrs. Bruce. "Somehow, I always manage to get great bargains, and have more to show for my money than a good many of my acquaintances. Now this moire antique (looking down to the so christened watered poplin), nobody'd know, a few yards off, but 'twas silk back; it looks as well across a room as Mrs. Richie's, and hers cost her forty dollars, while mine didn't the half of that, and I got three more common dresses for the same money!" (Mrs. Bruce quite forgot that not one of the multiplicity of cheap dresses which filled her wardrobe—each "a great bargain," and the sum total of whose cost far exceeded the fewer, but really nice ones of the lady quoted—would not be presentable another season, but must be thrown aside for new, while Mrs. Richie's would bear the test of at least two or three years' wear!) "But oh, here's Puffems! he advertises kid gloves for fifty cents a pair, a good article. I'll get two or three pairs if they are good bargains!" and she led the way into a much advertised store on Tremont Row.

Three pairs of gloves of various shades being selected, also a half dozen cheap handkerchiefs, bought "because they looked like real grass cloth linen, and were such bargains!" And, with their little packages safely bestowed in their shopping-bags, the two ladies now bent their steps toward Hanover Street.

"You said you wanted domestics," said Mrs. Bruce. "Let's go down to Blowhard's; you can get everything at almost your own price there. And don't be afraid to beat them down—I always do; they'll fall." And, while little Mrs. Morrison, in the neat travelling-dress and "water-proof," is following the trailing moire antique and the gay chenille shawl into the bazaar of "great bargains," we will furnish a few words explanatory of her antecedents to the reader.

The little lady was no other than the wife of a year of the "Edward" referred to, who, a valued clerk in a thriving hardware store on Milk Street, had dared to marry on a salary of eight hundred a year, and transfer his Carrie from her pleasant, comfortable, but by no means elegant home in a quiet country town to a nice though far from a "first-class" boarding-house in the city. But Carrie Morrison had been educated with thrifty notions, and knew how to adapt herself to her husband's salary, and "live within their means." Thus, avoiding that Scylla and Charybdis upon which so many young married couples setting out in city life are wrecked—viz., a suite of elegantly furnished rooms far beyond their income—and by her own handiwork fashioning all her own wardrobe and doing her husband's plain sewing, Carrie bade fair to be a frugal treasure of a wife, and Edward managed to lay up two hundred dollars of his first year's salary. But, the second year, an increase of two hundred on his salary warranted Mr. Morrison in taking a neat little house in the suburbs, for both had begun to weary of boarding-house life, and to long for a cosy little home of their own. And so the house had been taken and was already furnished, with the exception of the parlor, which had been left latest, and in the selection of whose carpet Carrie's next door neighbor, Mrs. Bruce, a pleasant, chatty body, who, upon the coming of the young stranger into the neighborhood, had "run in" with offers of assistance, was to assist her with her maturer advice. So that morning, after the earliest of breakfasts, the two ladies had taken the first omnibus into town, the embryo housekeeper gladly assenting to the chaperonage of her kind neighbor, to whom the streets of the city were as familiar as the passages of her own house, and the various attractions of the stores and the "great bargains" as the contents of her own wardrobe and bureau drawers at home.

"Here's Blowhard's," said Mrs. Bruce, entering a large store, whose door was decorated with brilliant streamers of parti-colored dry-goods, and emblazoned with the showiest of signs, while the windows were crowded with "attractions." "Now, after you do your shopping"—pausing at the linen counter—"I'm going to look at some of those silks he advertises so cheap, and, if I can come across a bargain, I don't know but I shall get something for fall wear; I don't mean to get an expensive dress, though."

In about half an hour, after a deal of valuable assistance from her companion in the way of "beating down," Mrs. Morrison's purchases were complete, and then the two ladies turned to the silk counter.

"Please show us some of those new silks you advertise," said Mrs. Bruce to Mr. Blowhard, who presided in propria persona over this branch of his establishment, and who greeted Mrs. Bruce with great suavity, as an old customer. "What is it you offer for ten dollars a dress pattern, Mr. Blowhard?"

"Well, ladies, I am sorry to say that I just sold the last pattern this morning. Wish you had come in earlier. A very pretty silk it was, too. Just gone, not ten minutes ago" (when was not the article advertised as "cheap"

"just gone" when inquired for in a store of the Blowhard genus?). "Am truly sorry, Mrs. Bruce; I know you would have taken one of 'em" (Mr. Blowhard did not think proper to state that the silk "only ten dollars a dress pattern" was the thinnest, "slaziest" description of an old style article). "But I think I can show you something this morning that will suit you better; a little higher in price, but far richer quality." And he turned with wonderful agility to the shelves. "There, ladies"—disposing the folds of a silk over his hands with a rapidity of movement reminding one of the agile pantomimic performances of the Rarvels—"there's a beauty! the loveliest thing in Boston for the price. Only a dollar and a half a yard, and they'd ask you two dollars, at least, at Hovey's or Chandler's for it."

"It seems to be a pretty shade," said little Mrs. Morrison, lifting closer the fabric, for, spite of the strong morning light out of doors, the store of Messrs. Blowhard & Co. was always kept judiciously darkened.

"Elegant! the real Marie Louise, French blue," responded the voluble salesman. "Let me cut you off a pattern this morning, madam. In admirable keeping with your style! becoming to your complexion."

This little flattery was not without its effect. Carrie was fair, and blue was "her color;" Edward had always said it became her. She bestowed a more earnest attention upon the silk.

"I would get it, if I were you," whispered Mrs. Bruce; "but don't pay more than a dollar and a quarter for it. It is just the thing for you. I can't wear blue; am too dark."

But Carrie hesitated, for a thought had struck her. The contents of her porte-monnaie must remain intact until the carpet was purchased. "It is pretty, but I cannot afford it this morning," she said, letting the silk fall.

"Now, madam, if you like the silk, the price shall not part us," said Mr. Blowhard, determined to "trade." "As Mrs. Bruce's friend (we always make a distinction in favor of our regular customers)"—with a suave bow to the getter of great bargains—"I will offer you the silk cheaper than I would to any other lady this morning. I will let it go for a dollar and a quarter a yard; and if you can find another house in town that'll sell you a rich silk as cheap as that, why, you may have it for nothing."

Mrs. Morrison looked embarrassed. She could not purchase that morning, and had entered the store without the faintest thought of a silk dress.

"He'll come down to a dollar and ninepence yet," whispered Mrs. Bruce, in the interim of Mr. Blowhard's slight diversion to answer a lady who had priced a silk a little lower down the counter.

"I should like it, but I really don't feel that I can purchase it to-day, Mrs. Bruce," answered Mrs. Morrison. "Some other time, perhaps, when I come prepared. Edward would like it, I know; though, come to think of it, it is something the shade of my wedding silk, though that's a down stripe, and this is a run round."

"Oh, it's ever so many shades darker'n that! if you mean the one you had on Sunday," said Mrs. Bruce.

"Well, madam, shall I cut off the silk?" asked Mr. Blowhard, blandly, returning to the charge, and taking up the fabric.

Little Mrs. Morrison resolutely gathered up her shopping bag, and prepared to turn away. The silk was tempting, but the carpet was pre-eminent in her mind's eye.

"You ought to say a dollar and ninepence, Mr. Blowhard," ventured Mrs. Bruce. "I'd take it myself, at that price, if it was any other color but blue; that I can't wear."

"O yes! I venture to say 'twouldn't be unbecoming," flatteringly responded Mr. Blowhard. "A dollar and ninepence! Why, dear ladies, if you'll show me the silk like this that can be bought in this city or in New York for what I've offered it—but then"—after a pause, in which Mrs. Morrison had taken a step or two from the counter—"I'll tell you what I will do, madam; as Mrs. Bruce's friend, I'll make you an offer; I'll cut you off fourteen yards of this silk for sixteen dollars, and that's almost the same as giving it away." And he held the goods across the yardstick.

"It's a great bargain!" whispered Mrs. Bruce.

Little Mrs. Morrison wavered for a moment; then again the carpet rose before her. She dropped her veil and took an additional step from the counter.

"Will you give me fifteen dollars for a pattern?" asked Mr. Blowhard, in a sharp voice, grown desperate, for the Yankee propensity to "drive a bargain" was fully aroused in that gentleman's nature.

"The best bargain I ever saw! I wish it was a green!" whispered Mrs. Bruce.

"I cannot purchase now, for I am not prepared," said Mrs. Morrison, resolutely. "But I may come in again," she added, looking back for a moment upon the glistening fabric which was disposed in tempting folds over the counter.

"You will probably lose a great bargain, madam!" said Mr. Blowhard, with a little asperity, tossing down the silk upon the counter as the ladies walked down the store.

"I suppose it was cheap, Mrs. Bruce—and I know it was what I want," said Mrs. Morrison, as they walked along the pavement, for the economical little lady had not indulged in a new silk since the pretty "appearing" out one that graced her trousseau. "But I might as well not think of it now; for, now we are spending so much in going to housekeeping I should be ashamed to ask Edward for it yet awhile. There are so many other things I should get before that."

"Cheap?" I guess it was!" emphatically responded her companion. "Why, if anything, it is handsomer than one Mrs. Richie paid two dollars for—not quite so heavy, of course, but would look as well on the street. You must tease your husband into getting it for you—so cheap!—I tell you what, Mrs. Morrison, I tease Bruce into anything! He says I'm such a bargainer that, whenever he gives me enough to buy one dress with, I generally come home with three. I always cheapen and beat 'em down. I know Blowhard too well to give him anywhere near his first price, and you saw how he fell on the silk this morning. I knew he would!"

Mrs. Bruce did not comprehend that Mr. Blowhard knew her, too, and, like other shopmen of his kind, always adapted his style of treatment to his customer; and whenever Mrs. Bruce, and those of her ilk, whose cheapening proclivities had been tested at his establishment, appeared, he invariably named an exorbitant first price in order to fall to somewhere in the neighborhood (and usually above) the true value of the article, and yet allow the shopper to depart with the impression that she had "got a great bargain."

"Yes, you must tease that nice little husband of yours into getting that lovely silk for you!" reiterated Mrs. Bruce, trailing her "moire antique" toward the head of Hanover Street.

"Oh, I never have to tease Edward!" said honest little Mrs. Morrison. "If I wanted it, he'd tell me to go right and get it, but I felt as though, if it was a bargain, I could hardly afford it to-day. But now about the carpet! Wouldn't you go down to the New England carpet warehouse? it was there I saw the three ply"—and she paused on the sidewalk to retrograde her steps—"or would you go up to the auction rooms again? It is about time for the sale—quarter past ten," pulling her little watch that had been Edward's gift from her belt.

"It wouldn't do any harm to go and see that Brussels sold, even if you don't buy, and then we shall have time to go down to the warehouse afterward. You needn't bid unless you want to, you know—but I should like to see it go off—somebody may get it a bargain!" replied Mrs. Bruce; and so the two ladies again crossed into Tremont Row, and shortly stood in the rooms of Hammerton & Co., where already the auctioneer's glib tongue was busy, and a crowd of buyers were congregated. Threading their way down a lane of furniture, they arrived at that portion of the hall where the carpets were about being sold. These were soon put up; but the bids were low, and one or two well-worn ones went off at a mere nominal price. But the auctioneer was soon directed by the proprietor, who had caught a glimpse of the two ladies, to put up the Brussels; which was started at forty cents by a gentleman near the stand. One or two bids from the crowd followed, until it rested with the gentleman at sixty cents.

"Gentlemen—ladies, too—will you allow this elegant Brussels carpet to go at this price? Cost two dollars a yard, and going for sixty cents! elegant! been in use only a few months in the choicely kept mansion of one of our first families!" cried the auctioneer.

"Oh, I wish I wanted it, I'd say sixty-five!" excitedly whispered Mrs. Bruce, "he's going to get a splendid bargain!"

"Sixty-five cents!"

"Sixty-five?" did I hear sixty-five? Thank you, madam!"—nodding in the crowd—"seventy!—you said 'seventy,' sir?"—again nodding toward the gentleman—"give me seventy-five, ma'am!—'eighty,' sir? ah, I'm glad to see you're waking up to the merits of this beautiful carpet!—'eighty-three,' ma'am?—'eighty-five,' sir?—give me eighty-eight, ma'am!" nodding toward the little lady whose cheeks were flushed crimson at her novel and unexpected débat on the stage of public life as an auction bidder.

But now Mrs. Morrison paused. She was fearful of going too far, and looked appealingly toward Mrs. Bruce. "Say eighty-eight!" prompted that lady under her breath, her own cheeks brilliant with the excitement of the animated bidding. "If you get it for that, it's a great bargain—and you'll save almost enough on your carpets for the silk!"

That sufficed: "Eighty-eight!" cried a feminine voice, which, because of intense excitement, was pitched on a much higher key than its possessor naturally indulged in—but then, I venture to affirm, the auctioneer and all parties present excused her in consideration of the "great bargain" she had striven so hard to secure!

"Will you give me ninety? shall I have ninety, sir?" continued the man of the hammer, appealing again to the gentleman bidder. "Ah, too gallant to bid further against the lady?" as he considerably stepped back and disappeared in the crowd (not, however, before might have been seen on his lips, had a disciple of Lavater been there to study their expression, a very peculiar, shrewd smile, indicative of much satisfaction); "then the carpet is going, going, gone—forty-five yards at eighty-eight cents"—lowering his hammer—"gone, to the lady—what name, ma'am? gone, to the lady—Mrs. 'Morrison'!"

After the sale of the remaining carpets, china, glass, and plated ware were put up; and Mrs. Morrison bid off a cake-basket, "such a bargain!" Mrs. Bruce assured her, "and solid silver, of course, or the Moneybags never would have had it!"—followed by one or two minor purchases, for the spirit of bidding was strong upon her; then, paying for her articles, receiving the bills of sale, and giving directions for their delivery that afternoon, she again stood on the sidewalk, flushed and excited with her achievements.

"Forty-five yards at eighty-eight cents—let's see, that's thirty-nine dollars and sixty cents," she said, relaxing her pretty brows which she had knitted in her efforts at computation. "Well, Edward thought I would have to give about forty for a three-ply, and the stair carpet and matting would have brought it up to fifty; and now I've got enough for all, and saved ten dollars clear gain. The cake basket I meant to have got at Jones, Shreve, & Brown's, but I've got it cheaper here—and solid silver, too! Did he say solid silver, Mrs. Bruce? Somebody did!" for, just then it occurred to the little lady, that she could not quite remember who had volunteered that information—the auctioneer, or her companion.

"I believe so; of course it is silver; such families as the Moneybags never use anything but silver. But, at any rate, even if it's only treble plated, it won't have cost you so much as one up Washington Street, and this looked nice as new; it's a beauty. But that carpet! I do think, Mrs. Morrison, you are the luckiest woman to get such bargains! I wanted to bid on it myself, for I never can keep my tongue still at auctions when I see things going off so cheap. I mean to attend these sales, and watch the carpets, and tease Bruce to let me sell off our chamber ones and buy new; for these are just the same as new, you know. Now you'll go down to Blowhard's, and have that silk, of course."

"Let me see," was the reply, as Mrs. Morrison paused before a store window, ostensibly to look at the fabrics displayed therein, but in reality to peep into her porte-monnaie and take an inventory of its remaining contents. "Ten dollars saved, for I was going to get my stair carpet and matting this morning; and six, which I meant to pay for one of those new mantles at Hovey's. Well, I guess I will make my old furs do this winter, and give up the mantle for the silk; it is such a bargain. But perhaps it's gone before this time, Mrs. Bruce."

"No, I guess not; that's the way Blowhard always talks. Tell him you've concluded to take it for fifteen dollars, and you'll get it fast enough." And here Mrs. Bruce unwittingly gave evidence to the fact that "great bargains" do not always "go off" in haste.

And so, in a short time, the two ladies again turned their steps from Blowhard & Co.'s great bazaar with the blue silk in exchange for fifteen dollars; and a solitary gold dollar shrunk from the vicinage of a few dimes in Mrs. Morrison's porte-monnaie; said gold dollar to be shortly exchanged for a "lovely imitation collar, that looked as well as Mrs. Richie's real Honiton, and nobody could tell the difference across the room" (so said Mrs. Bruce); and said dimes just sufficient to buy a cup of tea at Vinton's, and then an omnibus ticket to take the weary shoppers home.

Mr. Morrison did not return till late that evening in consequence of business detention; and, as Carrie was very tired with her day's trip, she did not broach the subject of her purchases until the next morning's breakfast was nearly finished. Then, as Edward was swallowing his last cup of coffee, she said: "Such bargains as I got yesterday, Ned! I saved ten dollars on my carpets; got an elegant Brussels for eighty-eight cents a yard, and enough for the stairs and upper hall, all alike."

"What benevolent trader sold you a real Brussels carpet for that price, I should like to know, Carrie?" asked Mr. Morrison, replacing his spoon in his cup. "You must have got cheated."

"Oh, of course it wasn't at first cost. I got it at Hammerton's auction sale. Mrs. Bruce was with me, and she said it was the best bargain she ever knew. I got the whole forty-five yards for less than what the three-ply would have cost; and, after all, that like Cousin Ellen's looks cheap beside a Brussels; so it's the same as getting the stair carpet for nothing. It hasn't been down quite a year in the house of Mr. Moneybags, on Beacon Street. Come and see it, Ned." And she led the way up to the empty parlor, where the large roll had been deposited.

"That don't make it any the better, Carrie, because old Moneybags had it," quietly remarked Mr. Morrison, as he followed her up stairs. "I thought you had decided on that three-ply we liked so well. I don't like second-hand carpets, or furniture, or anything of the sort."

"And so I had; but you'll say this is a great deal richer, and is just the same as new. Mrs. Bruce said it looked as if it had just been made."

"I hope so," said Edward, drily, as he proceeded to open the roll and spread it out on the bare floor.

"It's so wide there will be at least two breadths to come off, and they'll do for the stairs and hall. There, Edward, spread it across the floor."

"Yes, it looks well, certainly, though I do think a new though a commoner carpet is preferable to a faded richer one, for, Carrie, this is faded somewhat, as you'll see by contrasting those middle breadths with the edges here. But let's open the blinds and have a strong light on it. Ah, what's that? A wide stain! and right in the centre of it, too! Why, Carrie, you couldn't have seen that, and the great grease spot spreading into two breadths! It's my belief that this came off some dining-room where careless servants had upset a gravy-boat or broke a wine-bottle, and that's why Mr. Moneybags sent it off to the auction-rooms."

"Why, Edward, so it is, all stained and greasy!" exclaimed Carrie, with crimson cheeks. And she stood wofully eyeing the spot, which, like the sanguinary one on Macbeth's hand, would not "out," but showed startlingly clear in the strong morning light. "It's shameful! Nobody could have seen it there! Mrs. Bruce and I both examined it. There was a gentleman who bid on it up to eighty-five cents, and I wish it had been struck off to him, I do!" And tears of real vexation stood in Carrie's eyes.

"A by-bidder, of course, Carrie! I should have thought you might have known," said

Edward, a little impatiently. "But there, don't feel so badly about it. I forgot that it was your 'first appearance' in one of those dark auction-rooms, where, of course, you would be likely to overlook spots large as this and many an imperfection besides. These two breadths can be taken out and will do to spread down on one of the small back chambers; and I'll send home a new stair carpet, and a man to-day to fit them all down. Don't worry, but make the best of a bad bargain"—for Mr. Morrison sincerely pitied his mortified young wife.

"It don't look half so bright, either, as it did there yesterday," ruefully continued Carrie. "I declare, it's real faded! And I thought I was getting such a bargain, and now it's nothing but a second-hand carpet, and we've got to get a new one for the stairs, after all. It's too bad! I never shall want to look at the hateful thing again! It'll look more faded, too, when I put up those beautiful moreen curtains I've been making, and in contrast with the lounge and the Cashmere covered chair! Oh, Edward, what could I have been thinking of?" And the tears gathered volume and started on a little journey down her cheeks.

"There, don't feel so badly, Carrie, dear," said the young husband, who could not look unmoved upon his little wife's disappointment, though he inwardly hoped it might be a lesson for her future remembrance. "It will look much better than we think for, I dare say, when it is down; and your heavy curtains will shade it and make it look darker. Indeed, on the whole, I think it will make a pretty carpet, though I can't think it will prove so cheap in the end as a good three-ply. But don't worry, love; when I get admitted into the firm, I will make you a present of a new parlor carpet, and this shall be sent back to Hammerton's, where it came from. Perhaps your friend, the gentleman who run it up so, will be there to secure it then," he added, with a smile of mischief.

"More likely to run it down," replied Carrie, a laugh breaking up through her tears, as she stood eyeing the luckless carpet.

"But come, show me what else you bought, for I must be going down town," said Mr. Morrison. "Any other great bargains, eh?" And he followed his wife down stairs into the pleasant apartment where the breakfast-table stood.

With trembling fingers, Carrie unfastened the wrappings from the silver (?) cake-basket. If she had found that turned to dullest pewter, I doubt if she could have felt much surprise after her carpet experience. But that did not turn out quite so badly, though there was a slight sinking of her heart at Ned's words:—

"Ah, well, that is pretty, Carrie. You gave how much for it? Ten dollars?—no, twelve?"—noticing the falling of her face at his first estimate.

"Just twelve, Edward." Mrs. Morrison did not here express the opinion of Mrs. Bruce, that it was "a great bargain."

"Well, that isn't very bad, Carrie. It's probably extra plated, and it's quite massive." Mr. Morrison did not tell his wife that the basket was out of style, and that he could buy a much prettier and more graceful pattern for the same money on Washington Street. "What next, Carrie? Did you get the scarf?"

"No, Edward; I decided to make my furs answer, and got me a very pretty blue silk instead," replied Carrie, quite modestly, for all desire for going into raptures over her dress was quite taken away when she produced the package from her work-table and unfolded it, for that, too, in the strong morning light, looked several shades lighter than it had yesterday in the judiciously darkened store of Blowhard & Co. "How do you like it, Edward? Blue is your favorite color, you know," she added.

"Why, Carrie, it's just like your wedding silk, isn't it?"

"No, Edward; that was a down stripe, and this is a run-round," replied Carrie, though the explanation caused a swelling in her throat, for she could but see that the two were so similar that no one would know she had a new silk "across the room." "It's very different," she added, more decidedly.

"Is it? I never should have known it, if you hadn't told me," said Edward, honestly. "But what is it, my dear? Crying?"—for Carrie had fairly broken down, and great tears dropped on the paper as she refolded the dress. "And because I said it was just like your wedding-dress? Why, I wouldn't blame you if you bought every silk dress you'll have in all your future life just like that—I wish you would, one after another, as fast as you want a new one, for it was the prettiest and most becoming thing I ever saw you wear, Carrie, dear"—and the husband of a year bent down and kissed his young wife adding—"It'll always keep our wedding-day before us. Now, dry your eyes and kiss me, dear, for I've got to go into town."

Without enlarging further, suffice it to record that the auction carpet was that day fitted, and looked well, though it fell far short of Mrs. Morrison's anticipations of what the "elegant Brussels which had graced a Beacon Street mansion" should have been; that the blue silk was looked upon with additional disappointment when Mrs. Morrison discovered by a perusal of the Lady's Book, which Edward brought home that evening, that "bayadere stripes were to be succeeded by brocade figures;" and that her grass cloth linen handkerchief resolved into commonest cotton after passing through the ordeal of "the wash;" while the imitation Honiton collar, even though it might pass with the uninitiated, looked shockingly cheap and paltry when she took it forth for the wearing.

From that day, Mrs. Morrison set her face against "cheap" purchases, always quoting her experience when she bought soiled auction carpets and a silk which was almost the second edition of one she had worn but a year, and had still in a state of excellent preservation.

"Who would have thought it?" said Mrs. Bruce, one day when she had "run in," and the two ladies sat conversing. "Everything we bought that day went wrong. My purchases proved poor enough—those handkerchiefs, I gave them to Bridget, and every pair of those kid gloves I got at Puff'ems burst at the first wearing. And I thought I had got such a great bargain!"

TO YOUNG MEN.—How, after the duties of the day are over, do you employ your evenings? This is a question of importance. If you have no regular employment, no fixed pursuits to engross your attention and operate as a stimulus to the mind when unemployed, you must, of necessity, have many leisure and unoccupied hours—intervals when time will hang heavily on your hands, and suggest the necessity of some means to relieve it of its weight. The very time which is dissipated in idleness would, if devoted to study, enable many a young man to obtain eminence and distinction in some useful art.

TRUE POLITENESS.—He who has a heart glowing with kindness and good will towards his fellow-men, and who is guided in the exercise of those feelings by good common sense, is the truly polite man. Politeness does not consist in wearing a white silk glove, and gracefully lifting your hat as you meet an acquaintance; it does not consist in artificial smiles and flattering speech, but in silence and honest desires to promote the happiness of those around you; in the readiness to sacrifice your own ease and comfort to add to the enjoyment of others.

IMAGINATION AND FANCY AMONG THE ARABS.

BY JAMES DE MILLE.

It is an interesting sight, when nations, exchanging the sword for the pen, abandon a warlike career to devote themselves to letters. They enter upon unknown and untrodden fields, rendering themselves illustrious by new and bloodless conquests: advancing step by step, in the freshness of youth toward maturity, and adding to the treasures of the world a glorious literature. This pleasing picture is presented in the history of the Arabians. But the interest awakened by the fact of such progress, is enhanced by the peculiar character of their earliest literary efforts. While other nations have made their first attempts in the regions of epic or dramatic poetry, the Arabians first put forth their intellectual powers in the humbler department of fictitious prose. The genius displayed in the construction of the Arabian Tales, the endless variety of scenes and characters which they present, and the numberless beauties with which they are adorned, have rendered them immortal.

In perusing the pages of Arabian fiction the mind is impressed by their wonderful display of imaginative power. A new world is placed before us. Things with which we are familiar, the customary events of our daily life and circumstances of ordinary occurrence, are all forgotten. Strange scenes occur, and unknown characters live, in new and unthought-of lands. We are transported to countries where everything is under the control of enchantment; we live in cities whose splendor and magnificence would dazzle and overpower even an Oriental eye. Magicians stand before us, clothed in their mystic robes, working their potent spells, and exercising their wondrous power. At their command, hosts of obedient spirits arise, ready to do their bidding. The air is thronged with fairies and with demons, with good and with malignant spirits. Superior to them all, of vague and uncertain origin, possessed of undefined yet dreadful power, comes forth the sublime and shadowy Genie. The conception is thoroughly Arabian, and springs from the imagination of the child of the desert. Those clouds which often arise in the sterile and sandy solitude, and whirled into such fantastic shapes, sweep along with overwhelming power, seem to have suggested to him the thought. Like the sand cloud the Genie comes forth, we know not whence, and now subdued beneath the enchanter's rod, now rising superior to all human control, fulfils his fearful mission. At one time groaning in caverns, he vainly struggles to escape, at another, bursting his bonds, he stands erect, vast, powerful, and terrible to helpless mortals. In some of these shadowy forms dwells a love of beauty and splendor, and they bend their mighty energies to the erection of superb edifices, or the promotion of human pleasures. Others possessed by a spirit of malignancy, hinder and defeat the plans of mortals; and persecute and injure even their benefactors and deliverers.

The imaginative power displayed in the construction of such characters appears no less strikingly in the adventures through which the heroes of Arabian fiction are made to pass. The perils and trials which they endure are not those of the chivalrous romances of northern lands. The daring adventurer is arrested and imprisoned by cruel magicians or malignant Genii as he passes through many lands engaged in the peaceful occupations of the merchant or the traveller; he is exposed to the greatest dangers; he makes the most narrow escapes; he is engulfed in the whirlpools made by sunken islands; he is carried away in the tremendous talons of mighty rocs and eagles; he is buried alive; he falls into the hands of cannibals; he becomes a prey to the furious beasts of Eastern forests and deserts. Death continually hovers over him, but he escapes, and, fortified and improved by suffering, finally attains the summit of his earthly hopes.

But it is not always with marvellous scenes that these stories are filled; oftentimes they tell us of the daily events of Oriental life; they reveal to us joys and sorrows similar to our own; they give us pictures of domestic happiness; they portray the workings of the universal passions of love, hatred, and revenge; we dwell among the poor and witness their struggles for existence; we mingle with the good and bad, and sympathize with them as men; we stray along the banks of the Tigris to gaze at the ships of the merchant; we enter the working quarters of the artisan to see him at his cheerful daily toil; we stop at the bazaar, to traffic with the tradesman, and admire the richness of his wares ; we see by our side the disguised Caliph Haroun al Raschid, and follow him as he mingles with his subjects to learn their virtues and their vices ; we may accompany him to the splendors of the palace of the Commander of the Faithful, or pass the day in the humbler though sumptuous abode of Sinbad the Sailor.

The most pleasing feature in these delightful stories is the general purity of thought and loftiness of spirit which they evince. Courtesy and gentleness, bravery and heroism are held up to our admiration, while the baser qualities are drawn forth and exhibited to our hatred and our scorn. Gentle, beauteous, and chaste are the ladies whom the narrator would have us admire ; constant and chivalrous are those lovers who are found worthy to possess them. And here it is that we may behold the first dawning of those lofty and elevated sentiments, that reverential love and almost worship of woman, which were the boast and glory of the subsequent age. Here, too, are presented in the lowly Arab, the qualities of honesty and true worth. Virtue is rewarded and vice is punished ; falsehood and iniquity grow dark beside the splendor of truth and uprightness ; and in their high moral tone, the Arabian Tales take the precedence of the fiction of almost all other lands.

Years do not weaken our peculiar love for these wondrous fictions ; they are the delight of the young and the old ; pleasant are they to all who love the creations of fancy. In the days of our childhood, we have stolen away from noisy sport to listen to the charming tales of Scheherazade. And in later years we leave the bustle of life and lay aside its weary burden of busy care, to dwell for a while in the magical palace of Aladdin, or to sit beneath the curtains of the fairy tent of Paribanon. Translated into every modern language of Europe, these fictions exist in a new dress, as captivating as when arrayed in their native garb. They still supply thoughts to the imaginative writer, and furnish those gorgeous and glowing colors with which the essayist and poet adorn and beautify their pictures.

SUNSHINE AND SHADE; OR, THE GOVERNESS.

CHAPTER IX.

CHANGE OF SCENE.

"There was pride in the head she carried so high.
Pride in her lip, and pride in her eye,
And a world of pride in the very sigh
That her stately bosom was fretting."

Two months and a half have elapsed since Edith commenced the daily routine of school work, and on the morning before Christmas we find her and her two pupils dressed for a short journey ; they are going to Augusta to spend the holidays, and as they stand before the sitting-room grate, drawing on their gloves, Martha and Mary bewail the inopportune illness of the overseer, which prevents their father from accompanying them in this their annual visit to their aunt.

Since the interview recorded in the last chapter between Edith and Mr. Ellis, they have seldom met save at meals and family worship, for Mr. Ellis's time has been wholly occupied with plantation affairs, the whole charge of which has devolved upon him ; but he promises to follow them as soon as possible, and, as he places his daughters in the carriage, he smilingly bids them not to allow Cousin Fred to run off with Miss Edith ; and then, pressing a small gloved hand a moment in his own, he bids them all good-by, and stands watching the carriage as it rolls down the avenue. Something very like a sigh escapes him as he enters the house, and the words, "pride, Morgan, unavoidable, Frederick," etc., are muttered as he slowly paces up and down the library with folded arms and anxious face.

It was one o'clock when the carriage stopped before an elegant mansion, the door of which was thrown open by a stout, pompous-looking colored man, who ushered our young friends into a small reception-room, and then, opening the door of an adjoining apartment, he called out, "Mister Jacob's family hab arrived ;" and a large, majestic-looking lady arose from her seat before the fire, and, advancing a few steps, said, "Come into the parlor, my dears." She embraced her nieces, and then, turning to Edith, said, with a haughty inclination of her head, "The governess, I presume. Matty, my dear, the name, if you please."

"Miss Edith, Aunt Martha."

"Miss Edith, I hope you will make yourself comfortable, and feel at home with your charges here. Mary, when will your father arrive?"

"I don't know, Aunt Martha; next week, perhaps."

"Ah, I am extremely sorry that Snyder is ill; I was in hopes that this visit would have cheered your father somewhat; but if he only remains a day or two, we cannot effect much in that short time." While she spoke, she was scanning Edith closely, with a cold, proud look, but with a somewhat astonished expression of countenance, produced by "the governess's" beauty and youthful, lady-like appearance. Reseating herself, she said, "You will find your cousin up stairs, girls. You had better go up and dress for dinner; to your old room, Martha, and—Christopher" (calling to the porter in the hall), "show Miss Edith—this lady—to the green-room."

"Oh, Aunt Martha, please let Miss Edith have the room next to ours," said Matty and Mary, in the same breath.

"No, my dears; the room next to the one you always occupy is reserved for Emily Owen."

"When is she coming," asked Matty, with a look which was indicative of anything but pleasure at the prospect of such an acquisition to their Christmas circle.

"We expect her to-morrow," replied her aunt.

"Well, Aunt Martha, please let Miss Edith sleep in that room to-night," said Matty, in a coaxing tone.

"I have had the green-room prepared for your governess, and"—with another haughty bow to Edith—"I presume she will have no objections to taking immediate possession of it."

"Certainly not," said Edith. And, without more words, they followed the stout waiter out of the room.

"I'll come over as soon as ever I get dressed," said Matty, running after Edith; and then she disappeared with her sister through an arched doorway, and as Edith walked in another direction, she heard their voices and feet as they ran up stairs.

The green-room was a small apartment, having one window draped with green chintz, under which was a green Venetian blind, which rendered the room quite dark. Drawing back the curtains, Edith let in the sunlight, which danced on the green wall, and revealed an ingrain carpet and chairs of the same verdant hue.

"What was this room ever intended for?" asked Edith of herself, as she slowly untied her bonnet strings, and looked up at the dark ceiling. "Weak eyes, probably," herself answered; and, apparently satisfied with this solution, she walked to the window and looked out. "Nothing to be seen but two or three cabins and some brick walls beyond; not an evergreen in sight without doors," she said, again addressing herself. "The girls' room is probably in front; this is certainly in the rear, and those were back stairs that I came up. I see plainly that governesses are, as George would say, below par in this quarter—obviously below the state of equality in Mrs. Morgan's estimation." She looked around the room again, and walked to the small Franklin stove which stood in the fireplace, looking as cold and uninviting as did the mistress of the house herself. "Well, I must keep down my pride for two weeks, and submit to their being proud with me"—and she poked the dying embers vigorously. "This is a cool reception in every sense of the word. I wonder if there is any coal or wood up here." Not finding any, she pulled the green bell-cord, and a pert-looking mulatto girl obeyed the summons.

"Will you bring up some wood? my fire is almost out."

Without answering, the girl wheeled around, and almost ran against Martha, who was coming through the narrow entry.

"Dat you, Miss Matty?"

"Yes, Tink. How do you do?"

"Right smart, Miss Matty. Jis gwine down stairs arter some wood for de gobness's fire."

"Look here, Tink"—catching hold of the negro girl's arm as she was about to shuffle down stairs—"the lady in the green-room is Miss Edith, and if you say governess again, I'll forbid Nelly speaking to you while she is here."

"Miss Edom, is it? I didn't know afore; I heard missus call her gobness, and I tot dat it was some gobner's lady."

"Now, Tink, you know that's a fib. But go about your business, and be smart with the wood."

"Isn't this horrid, Miss Edith? Green, greener, greenest!"—pointing to the curtains, wall, and carpet. "I'm glad that horrid green bedstead is gone!"

"Why was this room furnished thus, Matty?"

"Just Aunt Martha's fancy, I reckon," said Martha, taking the poker and writing in the ashes. "How do you like Aunt Martha?" she asked, without looking up.

"I am not able to judge yet, dear," replied Edith.

"Well"—suddenly throwing down the poker—"I like her less than I ever did. Mary and I were always pleased to come here, because Christmas times Uncle Morgan always has so much fun going on. But we were never fond of Aunt Martha; she is so stiff; and I positively dislike her now."

"No, Matty, you do not dislike your aunt; you are only a little offended because our rooms are not adjoining," said Edith, quietly.

"Yes, I know that I am offended at that; but 'I do hate a proud man, as I hate the engendering of toads.' I read that in Shakspeare one day when papa left the book open on the table, and I thought of it to-day when"—she hesitated, and her manner became embarrassed.

"When what?" asked Edith, understanding what was in Matty's mind, but wishing to bring her to the point at once.

Martha looked up, and her face flushed; then she stooped and picked up the poker, and said, as she made a plunge at the ashes, "Why, when she spoke to you, Miss Edith."

"Matty," said Edith, sitting down and drawing Martha to her side, "I am glad, dear, that you have spoken frankly, and I will take this opportunity to tell you that I hope you will not allow your aunt's manner towards me to influence your conduct towards her in the least, for it would give me great pain to witness any disrespect or resentment on your part, and besides it would render my position here only the more awkward." Edith knew that this was the best argument that she could use, and she was glad to see that it had the desired effect.

"Well, Miss Edith, I won't do or say anything to make you feel disagreeable; but I would like Aunt Martha and Nora to know that I haven't any of Aunt Martha's scornful pride, if I do look like her. I know," she added, understanding Edith's significant smile, "I know, Miss Edith, that I look proud, but I never feel as Aunt Martha and Leonora act, except to them; I have a proud contempt for such people as they are, and indeed, Miss Edith, I must say it, it gives me pleasure to annoy them sometimes."

Edith looked very grave, and shook her head.

"I understand now," continued Matty, "why papa did not wish us to come to Augusta this Christmas, and why he wrote to Uncle Morgan inviting him to bring his family to the Bluff; but Aunt Martha would not consent to any such arrangement, because Nora was promised a party on New Year's Eve; she will be eighteen then, and she is just precisely like her mother. Cousin Fred—he is twenty-two—is like Uncle Morgan; they are my style! So full of fun!—just the nicest people in the world. I reckon we'll have a nice time, after all." And she looked up with a smile.

"Yes, dear, I dare say the two weeks will pass pleasantly enough. You must not give yourself any uneasiness on my account, for I shall not allow your aunt's coldness to make me unhappy, I assure you. But where's Mary?"

"Getting dressed. Nelly was not ready to plait my hair, and so I ran over here. We are not going down stairs until you are ready."

"I will not be long dressing," said Edith. And she went to the table, which was covered with green chintz, and, taking her combs and brushes from a travelling basket, she commenced to comb and arrange her hair. Tink came in with the wood, and soon had a cheerful fire built in the stove, and, taking the pitcher, shuffled out of the room and returned in about half an hour with water. Mary came in just as Edith's toilet was completed, and kissed her as affectionately as though they had been separated for a day; and as they passed through the narrow, dimly-lighted entry into the more spacious hall leading to the front rooms, she said, as she skipped along before Edith:—

"The front part of the house is so much pleasanter than the back. This is always our room"—throwing open the door of the room assigned to herself and Matty. "I wish there were two beds in here; then you could be with us."

"Yes, Miss Eden," said Nelly, who was plaiting Matty's hair, "it was right mean of Miss Morgan to put you in dat hole ob a closet; no nigger would sleep dar, I know. Dar, Miss Matty, it's did. Now put on your dress, honney."

"How do I look in this gown, Miss Edith? It feels very queer, so high up in the neck."

"You look very well, Matty; much better than in low bodies, and that white frill is very becoming, and looks neat." And indeed she looked much better than Edith had ever seen her look before. The snugly-fitting habit gave more symmetry to her figure, and the fine white cambric frills around the throat and short sleeves of the dress gave it a youthful appearance.

"Miss Nora hab done gwine down, Miss Mary," said Nelly, as Mary was about to rap at her cousin's door.

"They are all in the parlor, I dare say, and Cousin Leonora will look at us, and bite her lips, and toss her head; I always dislike to go into the room when they are all together," said Mary.

"I don't, then, for I can give as many tosses as Cousin Nora," returned Martha, stepping proudly across the hall, adjusting her jet bracelets, and glancing over her shoulder at the skirt of her dress, which quite touched the floor.

As Mary had predicted, the family were assembled in the parlor, and as their visitors walked up the long room to the fireplace, around which they were seated, an elderly gentleman arose, and extending both hands said, as he shook the girls' hands, and kissed them on the cheek in a demonstrative manner, "Glad to see you! Bless me, how you've grown, both of you! And you, Blush-rose, why you're as pink as ever, my little beauty! And my buxom queen here is a woman grown, I declare! Stand off, Matty, and let me look at you! looks eighteen, by George! But where are all your freckles?"

"Gone to sour milk, uncle."

"Sour milk! Ha! ha! So, somebody has struck a vein of vanity? All right, Matty! don't blush, my dear, but bow to every pan of bonny-clabber you come across, for it's done a heap of for your good looks." Then, advancing a step forward, he extended his hand to Edith and said, in a more quiet manner, "And this is?"

"Miss Edith Stanford, Uncle Morgan."

"Ah, Miss Stanford, I am pleased to see you." And he shook her hand warmly, and, turning to his daughter, said, "My daughter, Miss Stanford, my son—and—I believe you have already met with Mrs. Morgan."

His frank, open countenance and cordial manner had the effect of placing Edith quite at her ease, and she returned the lofty bow of Miss Nora with graceful self-possession, and smiled in recognition of Mrs. Morgan, who bowed, and murmured "Miss Edith," as if the fact of their having met an hour before had quite escaped her mind.

"My son," otherwise Mr. Frederick Morgan, was leaning against the mantle, twirling the ends of his heavy black moustache slowly between his fingers, and gazing thoughtfully into the fire. When his cousins entered the room he turned and looked at his sister with a quick, inquiring glance, then, perceiving that she had no intention of going forward to receive them, he made a movement to do so himself, when his father suddenly started up and met them as I have described. Fred gave them a welcome equally as cordial if not quite as boisterous as his father's, and, when introduced to Edith, he bowed with a degree of deference and slight diffidence in his manner, which did not partake of his mother's hauteur or his father's familiarity, but which indicated that he recognized her as their equal; and, when she was seated on the sofa in conversation with his father, he scanned her face as closely as his mother had done, but there was nothing rude or impolite in his gaze, but a degree of respectful admiration, which could not have offended the most fastidious.

Mary sat down beside Edith, and Martha stood before her cousins and entered into an animated conversation with them, while Mr. Morgan asked questions about the Bluff, and talked with Edith as unreservedly as though she were an old acquaintance. Mrs. Morgan held a small screen before her face, and, turning her head, examined her nieces with a critical eye, and then looked at her daughter with an expression of intense satisfaction. Leonora was a tall, dark looking girl, who, without having any claims to the term beautiful, was striking, stylish looking, and had that air of high breeding which, as an outward show, usually distinguishes the members of a family of long established position and wealth, and which never fails to be recognized by the educated and refined, and is generally a passport in good society, even when not backed by wealth. She was elaborately dressed, and with her dark hair and flashing eyes looked very brilliant beside her fair-faced, simply-dressed cousin; but Leonora was eighteen, and Matty scarcely fifteen, and Edith, who had noticed Mrs. Morgan's expression of countenance and divined that she was drawing comparisons unfavorable to Matty, thought, as she looked at the two, that three years would effect a wonderful change in Matty, judging from the rapid development of her mind within the past two months, as well as the improvement in her personal appearance and increasing refinement of manner. Wonderful, indeed! "Man proposes and God disposes."

"Martha," said Mr. Morgan, turning from the sofa and addressing his wife, "do you not think that Mary grows like her father?"

"Grows like him! why, she is his perfect image," responded Mrs. Morgan, and she looked at Mary with a very pleasant smile.

"A very lovely image, certainly," thought Edith, and she smoothed the brown hair caressingly. "But such an one will never create a sensation in society; she is one of those 'gems of purest ray serene,' whose brightest lustre is shed around the domestic hearth, warming the hearts of all who come within its influence. This little one is formed for love, not admiration"—and she pressed the little hand affectionately, which was laid so confidently in her own.

The parlor doors were thrown open suddenly, and "Dinner!" was announced by Christopher in a loud tone.

"Will Christopher never lose his hotel manners?" said Mrs. Morgan, as she arose and preceded the others to the dining-room. "I don't know but we'll have to put him below, awhile, until he is subdued a trifle, for, I declare, I cannot tolerate him."

"Who are you speaking of, mother? Kit?" asked Fred.

"Yes! I advise your father never to get another servant from a hotel to put him in the house, for he gives it the appearance of a boarding-house."

"Come, Fred, exert yourself for once, and escort your sister and cousin into the dining-room," said Mr. Morgan, offering Edith his arm and taking Mary by the hand. "I'll tell you what it is, Matty, you'll have to stir Fred up while he is here, for he is abominably lazy."

"Yes, Matty," said Fred, moving from his place and putting out his elbow, "you must stir us all up, for we are insufferably dull."

Matty and Leonora darted past Fred, who said that Nora knew the way, and he would only take Matty, and, laughing at his look of astonishment, ran out through a side door.

"That's decidedly cool," said he, looking after them. "Mary, you take my arm, for I have it settled for some one, and it's a pity to go alone after taking that trouble." And he walked up to Mary, and, pulling her hand through his arm, walked quickly through the hall, saying that he felt considerably stirred up already.

During dinner, Mrs. Morgan and her daughter made the New Year's party the subject of conversation between themselves. Fred and Matty sat opposite to each other, and carried on a war of words, which ended in a charge of almond shells and raisins levelled across the table. Edith sat beside Mr. Morgan, and was not addressed by any one save him and Martha, who made an occasional appeal to her to defend her against Fred's impudence.

"Just think, Miss Edith, he says that I weigh as much as Christopher. You oughtn't to allow me to be so insulted."

"I think you can defend yourself pretty well, Matty," said Mr. Morgan. "Ask him what his own weight is."

"Witches' weight, I reckon," said Martha; and the laugh was turned against the young gentleman, who, like all thin people, was ambitious of being stout.

"Have you learned to play any, yet," asked Nora of Matty, when she and her mother had determined upon the arrangements for New Year's Eve.

"Yes, very well, indeed," returned Martha, glancing at Edith.

Fred opened his eyes and looked at his opposite with an expression that said, "Is it possible!"

"Indeed I do play real well, Cousin Fred," she said, tossing her head. "Papa thinks that I have learned ex-tra-or-din-a-ri-ly well," nodding her head at every syllable of the long adverb.

"Who is your music teacher?" Fred asked, forgetting, probably, that the governess taught music as well as other branches.

"My music teacher! Why, Cousin Fred, Miss Edith, of course; and that's the reason why I play so well, considering the little tuition I've had." Then, after a pause, she added: "Papa thinks Miss Edith is the best player and sweetest singer he ever heard."

"O Matty!" Edith could not help exclaiming, for she more than half suspected that Matty's zeal in her cause had led her to exaggerate the truth.

"Indeed, it's true, Miss Edith, for I heard papa tell Mr. Ward so last Sunday morning; the very best amateur performer that he ever heard." And she looked at her aunt and cousins with a face that said, "What do you think of that?"

Neither of the ladies spoke, but looked curiously out of the window, though nothing of interest was to be seen in that direction. Mr. Morgan said—

"Ah, indeed! I hope Miss Edith will give us an opportunity to judge after dinner; we are all passionate lovers of music here; Fred, there, is at the head of all the musical soirees in the city; and Nora is no bad performer herself. I am very fond of music, and so is Mrs. Morgan, but neither of us professes to be a judge."

"Mr. Ellis overrates my abilities," replied Edith, though she did not forget that, as the best performer at B—— Seminary, she had carried off the prize from a score of competitors.

The ladies retired as soon as the cloth was removed, but the gentlemen lingered over their wine, and did not join them in the parlor until the chandelier was lighted. Mrs. Morgan had fallen asleep, and her stately head was nodding to the polished andirons when her husband and son entered the room. Martha and Nora were in the reception-room, and Edith and Mary were seated at the centre-table reading.

"Now, Mary, let us hear what you have learned! Play your best piece, and then we'll have Matty at the instrument," said Mr. Morgan, throwing himself on the sofa.

Mary hesitated, and looked at Edith. "Go, my dear," said Edith, and she sat down at the piano, which her cousin Fred opened, and after striking the keys in an undecided manner at first, she felt more assured as Edith arose and stood beside her, and played through the simple piece without making any blunders.

"Capital! Why, Mary, you play like a professor!" said her uncle, patting her cheek. "Now we must have Matty at it." And calling his daughter, who came into the room followed by Martha, he said: "Come, girls, now is your turn! Mary has been entertaining us, and you must let us hear what you can do. Sit down, Matty, and then Nora will play some of her fantasias."

Without any hesitation or embarrassment, Matty seated herself at the piano, and after playing a short prelude, commenced singing a popular song. At the second verse, her uncle joined in, and sang it through with considerable fervor. Martha's voice was sweet and full, and she sang with more expression than many persons after years of study. Mrs. Ellis had taught her daughters all the rudiments of music, and Edith had found them farther advanced than she was led to expect from what their father had said. She put them at once to the learning of easy pieces, and ten weeks of daily practice under her constant supervision had effected much. Contrary to Mr. Ellis's or Edith's expectation, Martha's application quite equalled her talent, and thus her progress had been facilitated.

Mary applied herself equally as well, and indeed often practised an extra hour after the expiration of the time assigned to her; but she might give the greater part of her time to the study of music, and become perfect mistress of the science, but the art she would never acquire in any great degree, or, by any amount of practice, become anything but a mediocre performer; for she lacked both the ease and taste that Martha possessed, and her touch was merely mechanical, like the act of the street performer's hand in turning his hurdy-gurdy.

Mr. Morgan was quite enthusiastic in his applause of Matty's singing, and Fred patted her head in a patronizing manner and called her a "Nightingale," "Fat Swan," etc.

"Now, Nora," said Mr. Morgan. And the young lady sat down on the stool, spread out her dress and arranged her music before her, and with the air of a public singer commenced a cavatina in Italian, which seemed to be interminable, notwithstanding that her voice was good and she sang with considerable taste; but the accompaniment was executed without any mercy on the piano-strings, and whatever merit there was in her singing was more than counterbalanced by the defects in her playing. After the song was finished she pounded out some polkas and waltzes, which were perfectly stunning. Tea was announced, and she arose from her seat and looked as if she expected Edith to applaud her performance, but seemed satisfied with the look of surprise that was on Edith's face, and which she mistook for astonishment at her skill. Looking on her with rather more complacency, she said, "You will play after tea, will you not, Miss Edith?"—not doubting, however, that she would decline after such a brilliant performance as her own.

"Yes," said Matty, "Miss Edith and Cousin Fred will both play." And she caught hold of her teacher's hand and looked up into her face, her eyes sparkling in anticipation of Nora's discomfiture.

"Did you speak to me, Matty?" asked Fred, starting up and looking around as if slightly bewildered.

"You've been asleep, Cousin Fred, I declare! A pretty compliment to your sister's playing!" said Matty.

"Pon my word, I haven't been asleep; but I was in Europe just then, and you called me home. What did you wish?"

"I wish you to play, after tea, on that instrument. Do you understand?"

"Oh! certainly, certainly. Anything more?"

"Yes. Come to tea." And, taking his arm, they went into the tea-room, which adjoined the parlor.

Christopher brought in some papers, and as soon as the tea things were removed Mr. Morgan and Fred were absorbed in the news. Mrs. Morgan became interested in a book of fashions, and Nora and her cousins returned to the parlor.

"Come, Miss Edith, won't you please play now?" said Martha, turning as she reached the door.

"Permit me to lead you to the piano, Miss Stanford," said Mr. Morgan, laying down his paper and starting from his seat.

Mrs. Morgan looked up with a cold smile, and, taking her book, followed them into the next room. Fred alone remained in the tea-room.

"Perhaps you can play some of my pieces," said Nora. And she drew a large book from the stand, and laid it on the piano.

Edith was looking over some loose music, and, selecting a piece, said, "Do you play this, Miss Nora?"

"Let me see. O no! That's one of Signor Cavelli's pieces; nobody can play that creditably but him."

It chanced to be Edith's chef d'œuvre in performance; and, placing the music before her, she commenced, to Nora's undisguised astonishment, what nobody could play but Signor Cavelli.

"Thank you, Miss Stanford," said Fred, who had entered the parlor very quietly, and was standing directly behind her. "Such music is a treat, after Nora's banging."

"You didn't go to Europe, then!" said Matty, mischievously.

"I only go to get rid of 'such notes as I never indorse;' when Nora begins to play, I'm off."

Mrs. Morgan had been called into the tea-room, and Nora had followed her mother without vouchsafing a word of thanks to Edith. Indeed the significant looks that passed between the mother and daughter indicated, not only that they felt no pleasure in the discovery that a governess excelled the daughter of the wealthy Georgian, but that they considered her superior attainments a personal insult to themselves.

"You positively must sing for us," said Fred, as Edith was about to rise from her seat.

"For me, Miss Edith," said Mr. Morgan. And she complied, though unwillingly, for, with woman's instinct, she had discovered that her music did not give pleasure to the ladies; and, not belonging to that class of females who, in their desire to please the gentlemen, are regardless of the opinion of their own sex, she felt rather mortified at Leonora's abrupt departure from the room, instead of being elated at the involuntary acknowledgment of the excellence of her playing. She did not sing with her usual ability, for she felt the influence of the cold looks of Mrs. Morgan and her daughter, who could not, with any degree of politeness, remain in the tea-room when they were called by Mr. Morgan to come into the parlor and hear the song. The consciousness that she was doing her very worst did not add to her comfort, and when she had finished she left the instrument with a flushed face and embarrassed manner. Mr. Morgan complimented her singing in unqualified terms, and Fred pleaded for another, "just one more song." But she refused in a decided manner, and took a seat at the centre-table. With a look of disappointment, and a slightly indignant glance at Nora, Fred sat down at the piano, and played in a style so different from that of his sister that Edith was amazed that he did not correct her, instead of silently sanctioning her hammering out her music.

She did not know that Frederick Morgan and his sister were seldom together, and so utterly indifferent to each other at all times that they never interfered with each other's pursuits, and Leonora's peculiar style of playing had never met with either praise or censure from her brother. Frederick was the senior by four years, and when quite young had been separated from his sister by being sent to school in a distant State, where he was visited by his parents semi-annually. He was naturally warm-hearted and affectionate in disposition, and when he returned home, at the end of three years, his heart was overflowing with love for his sister; but he found her grown to be a proud, selfish girl, who looked upon her brother as an interloper, and returned his affectionate embraces with coldness, and eyed him with suspicion. She made it a point to dispute with him on every occasion of his receiving more than ordinary attention from his parents, and every favor he asked of them she considered an infringement on her own rights. Thus, by her unsisterly behavior, she turned her brother's affection to disgust, and when he returned to school it was with no pleasing recollections of his sister, but rather with a feeling of relief at their separation. He could have loved a sister—one worthy the endearing name—with all that love, so pure and holy, which usually exists in this relation; he had often felt the need of a sister's sympathy, but had never turned to her, and the few letters that had passed between them while he was at college were cold, brief, and invited no confidence on either side; and when he returned from college, and found Leonora as arrogant, overbearing, and selfish as when he left home, he kept aloof from her as much as possible. It was only on rare occasions that they spent the evening in each other's society, for Frederick had found other friendships, and passed his evenings away from home, with more congenial companions.

Would that every sister's mind could be impressed with the idea that she is her brother's keeper! that on her unwearied kindness and affectionate vigilance depends, in a great measure, his exemption from those vices so common among young men, so degrading in their tendency, and which, "when once they invade, bring with them such a frightful train of followers!"

Fred was still playing, Edith and Mary were looking over some engravings, and the others were in the tea-room unfolding some packages which Christopher had brought in, when the door-bell rang, and Nora entered hastily, saying, "That's Cavelli." In a moment, she was shaking hands with a dark-looking Italian; and Mrs. Morgan entered, and expressed much pleasure at seeing the visitor.

"My cousins, Miss Ellis, and Miss Mary Ellis, Signor Cavelli," said Nora.

He bowed to the young girls, and then his eyes rested on Edith; but, with a shrug of her shoulders and quick elevation of her eyebrows, Leonora turned away, and, wheeling a large chair before the fireplace, sat down and motioned to the gentleman to be seated near her.

Frederick looked at his sister, and his eyes flashed and lip curled with an expression of intense scorn, and, turning to Edith, said, "Signor Cavelli, Miss Stanford."

Edith's face had become crimson at the intentional slight offered her by Leonora, and when Fred introduced the Italian, she looked up, bowed, and dropped her eyes instantly, and continued to look at the pictures before her.

Mr. Morgan came in in a few moments, and the conversation, which Leonora was monopolizing, became general; but Mrs. Morgan and her daughter studiously avoided addressing any remarks to Edith, and when a topic was introduced upon which there seemed to be a diversity of opinion, and Fred appealed to Edith to support him in his views, his sister abruptly changed the subject, and asked Cavelli if he would not play. This was a piece of rudeness that Mrs. Morgan could not countenance; for, though her pride would not allow her to receive a governess in her family as a visitor, to be treated as her daughter's equal, yet she would not encourage any acts of vulgar rudeness on the daughter's part that would forfeit her the title of lady; and when Cavelli declined playing until after a while, she gave Leonora a look full of rebuke, and quietly resumed the conversation which had been interrupted.

Fred, who had been sitting on the sofa, drew a chair to the table and sat down beside Mary. Taking advantage of a pause in the conversation, he said: "Cavelli, I am thinking seriously of a trip to Europe. Wouldn't you like to bear me company?" And he eyed the Italian keenly.

"How soon?" asked Cavelli, without looking up.

"Next month," answered Fred.

"No, I believe not. I shall not return to Italy before spring," he answered, glancing, with a smile, at Leonora. She returned the smile, and looked into the fire.

Fred looked at a picture intently for a few moments, then, with a very grave face, said, "I think I'll put Uncle Ellis into the notion of going; the trip would do him a world of good."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Matty. "And, pray, what would we do?"

"Stay at home," said he, looking into her face with a saucy smile.

"Humph! I reckon papa wouldn't leave us, and I know he wouldn't take us from our studies, when we are learning so fast."

"Pray, what are you learning?"

"Everything!"

"Everything!"

"Yes; I mean everything that is taught in schools."

"Geometry, trigonometry, sour milk, and long dresses," said he, with a provoking smile.

"And what is taught in colleges, I'd like to know? Geometry, trigonometry, smoke cigars, and look at the ladies."

"And dye his moustache!—that's reduced to a science, now," said Mr. Morgan, laughing heartily.

"And what do you do out of school hours, Matty?" asked Fred, after the laugh had subsided.

"I read a good deal," she answered.

"What? Haven't you finished the 'Life and Adventures of Robinson Crusoe'—that remarkable man—yet?" he asked.

"Yes, indeed, some time ago; and I would like to read some of De Foe's other works, but papa hasn't any," she replied, not ashamed to acknowledge that she liked the book.

"What have you been reading instead?" her cousin asked.

"Some of Scott's works and the 'Queens of England.'"

"All in three months, and attended to your studies besides? You've accomplished considerable."

"We have read two of Scott's and one volume of the Queens."

"That's doing pretty well. But who do you mean by we?"

"Miss Edith, and Mary, and myself, and sometimes papa."

"And so you've formed an association for literary improvement. What do you call it? 'Beech Bluff Lyceum'?"

"We don't call it anything, but we think it very pleasant, don't we, Mary?"

"Yes, and very profitable," Mary ventured to say.

"Mew, little puss!" said Fred, mimicking her tone, and putting his arm around her. Then, turning to Edith, he said, addressing her: "What kind of a collection of books has Uncle Ellis, Miss Stanford?"

"A very fine collection," returned Edith.

"Cousin Fred, why don't you call papa 'Uncle Jacob'?" asked Matty.

"He taught me to call him Uncle Ellis when I was a child, and I have always continued to do so," returned Fred.

"That was one of Ellis's whims," said Mr. Morgan, stopping in his walk up and down the room. "He told me once that he never could forgive the injury that was done him by his parents when they named him Jacob. It is the nickname of Jake that is particularly offensive to him, I believe."

"It is not a very euphonious appellation, certainly," said Fred.

"Who would ever think of calling papa Jake?" exclaimed Matty.

They all laughed, for such a slang name was decidedly incompatible with the character and noble person of Mr. Ellis.

"What's in a name?" said Mr. Morgan, continuing his walk.

"A great deal!" said Fred, speaking very emphatically. "A rose by any other name would not smell as sweet—at least to me. A name is expressive of some character, and when misapplied the incongruity strikes us at once. Call a rose, turnip," and flourishing his arm across the table, he said, "Miss Matty, will you not accept and wear this turnip for my sake? Now, doesn't that sound ridiculous?" turning to his father.

"Of course!" replied his father; "because the name is associated in our minds with the vegetable, and the mention of the one suggests the idea of the other. On the other hand, it would be quite as absurd to invite Miss Matty to dine on roses."

"Very poetical," said Fred, laughing immoderately; but decidedly absurd, for, judging from her appearance, Miss Matty would prefer to dine on something more substantial."

Mr. Morgan was standing behind Mary's chair twining her thick curls around his finger; looking over into her face, he said—

"Well, beauty, what names do you like best?"

Looking first at her uncle, then at Edith, she said, very innocently—

"Edith and Ellis."

"Corresponding initials! Do you mean the two names together?" exclaimed Fred.

"Yes—no—any way," said Mary, comprehending from Edith's blushes and Matty's distressed look that she had made a blunder.

Fred's smile gave place to a look of vexation when he discovered Edith's embarrassment, and, rising from his seat, he said, "Come, Cavelli, give us some music!" And the unpleasant occurrence was soon forgotten in listening to Signor Cavelli's delightful playing.

After singing a duet with Leonora, Signor Cavelli took his leave, and a few moments after, Mrs. Morgan gave the signal for retiring.

"Let us go to your room for a few moments, Miss Edith!" said Matty, when they were in the hall.

"No, my dear, it is later than you usually sit up, and you must both go to bed and to sleep as soon as possible," and, kissing them, she proceeded to her own room. Closing the door, she dropped the curtains, and sat down in the small rocking-chair and took another survey of the apartment. By the light of the astral lamp which was burning on the table, the walls, ceiling, and furniture looked positively black, and she felt as if surrounded by the gloom of a subterranean vault. "I wonder if the fortnight will be as long, accordingly, as this day has been!" she thought, looking into the fire. "A fortnight! it seems interminable, but I must submit," she said, aloud, and then, after a pause, during which she gazed steadily into the fire, she drew a long breath, leaned her head on the back of the chair, and said, "Longing already for the congenial atmosphere of Beech-bluff!" Another pause. "One more Christmas-eve, and the next I'll spend at home! Deo volante!"

In the mean time Mrs. Morgan and Fred had remained in the parlor, and as soon as the door was closed upon the others, Fred threw himself on the sofa beside his mother, exclaiming,

"Mother, I am really surprised at your receiving Cavelli here on such intimate terms!"

"His mother was my most intimate friend," rejoined Mrs. Morgan.

"I know, and was killed by his father's neglect. I am inclined to think that he possesses all his father's vices and none of his mother's virtues, for I hear a great deal that is to his disadvantage."

"But, my son, you invited him to accompany you to Europe!"

"I know that I did, and for this very reason; he told me, several weeks ago, that he intended to return to Italy in the spring, and I wished to ascertain if he had really any intention of doing so. He had not, as I suspected, and, furthermore, he has no idea of sailing in the spring as he told me this evening."

"His father has written requesting him to meet him at Rome in May."

"His father! his father is a worthless, broken down Italian count, who supports himself by the dice, and if they are to meet in Rome, it is for no good purpose, I'm confident. Old Cavelli came to this country at his son's age; taught music awhile, and by deceptive arts and flattery inveigled one of his pupils—a young girl—into a private marriage with himself, took her to a foreign country, where, after a few unhappy years, she died, neglected, and in poverty."

"But that was not the son's fault," said Mrs. Morgan, shaking her head gravely.

"Certainly not; but it was the husband's, the father of this young man, who, regardless of the solemn injunction of his dying wife, and forgetful of his own and his child's interests, withheld his son, when a bachelor uncle offered to adopt him; and even when this uncle went to Italy for the express purpose of bringing the child to America, the deep-rooted hatred which old Cavelli felt for his wife's relations, caused by their efforts to effect a separation between his wife and himself, and by their steady refusal to acknowledge him, made him spurn with insult the offer to adopt his child. But, though rancor then made him so relentlessly obstinate, he became mollified by want and disease, and after years of unbroken silence on his part, he sends his son over, at the age of twenty-one, to claim the once offered but rejected support; and here he remains, an idle, worthless fellow, possessing no value of character to recommend him, and no talents save what lies in his finger ends, and—" Fred hesitated.

"And what? I will hear you out, Fred, though your language is rather stronger than I altogether approve," said Mrs. Morgan, with the most serene expression of countenance, as if her son's strong language did not alter her opinion of the subject of their conversation.

Fred arose, and stood directly in front of his mother, and continued, with emphasis: "And, if I mistake not, he is doing credit to his father's tuition by playing the same game, in one point of which his father proved a winner."

"Fred, what do you mean?" Her serenity was all gone, and, for a moment, her maternal fears were aroused.

"I mean, mother, that if I am any judge of lovers' signs and looks, those that pass between young Cavelli and Leonora are indicative of something more than ordinary friendship."

"You must be beside yourself, Frederick!" She spoke quickly, but in a low tone, and her voice and manner betrayed indignation as well as alarm. "What! Leonora marry a poor, penniless Italian? She, the haughty daughter of one of the proudest, wealthiest families in Georgia! No, no, my son!"—an incredulous smile spread over her face as she laid her hand on her son's arm—"Your sister's pride will never bend to any thing; even love will be subordinated to it. I receive Cavelli kindly, out of regard to the love that once existed between his mother and myself, and Nora welcomes him cordially out of respect for me; nothing more, Fred, depend upon it."

"Mother, I am compelled to think that there is something more, and, though I have never interfered with Leonora's affairs, I must do so now, and prevent, if possible, a step that would mar the happiness of her whole life. Father does not approve of Cavelli, and treats him with as much coldness as his courtesy will allow him to treat any one in his own house; but he continues to come here, nevertheless, and—I have been a close observer—when he suspects that he is losing ground with you, he adroitly introduces his mother's name into the conversation, and draws upon your sympathies, which you think are all for the mother, but of which, in reality, you are making the son the immediate object; and Leonora—"

"She would never, never marry Cavelli!" exclaimed Mrs. Morgan, in a louder, more decided tone.

"Your friend was from a family as high in social position and as proud as ours. She was undoubtedly as haughty as Leonora; but she left home, friends, every thing for a poor music master, and learned from sad experience how one false step can make the misery of a lifetime, and your daughter may do the same."

"No, Fred, I cannot believe this ; I know your sister better than you do, and I am convinced that she would never throw herself away on any one," said Mrs. Morgan, rising and approaching the centre-table. "Your solicitude is very natural, very brotherly, but I think your personal dislike to Cavelli has influenced you, and led you to draw conclusions from actions, which in another you would regard as perfectly innocent. As long as he deports himself in a gentlemanly manner in my house, he is welcome to visit here. It is the least I can do for poor Ellen's boy."

"And by so doing you peril your daughter. My belief as to Cavelli's designs is founded on the ground of satisfactory evidence, and that Leonora encourages him, is just as evident. I hope you will reflect upon this matter, and take measures at once to ward off danger."

"Well, Fred, I will not treat your suspicions, or convictions, whichever you please to term them, with indifference ; but I will, to gratify you, be more circumspect in future ; and if I discover any alarming symptoms of love, I will take Nora away until Cavelli has left the country. So good-night."

"One word more, if you please, mother," exclaimed Fred.

"What now? It is late," looking at her watch.

"One word respecting the young lady who is visiting here—Miss Edith," he added, in reply to his mother's severe look of inquiry.

"What of her, pray?"—and Mrs. Morgan seated herself on a chair near the door.

"This much, mother. She is entitled to more courtesy than has been accorded to her to-day."

"What more can she expect? Has she not been treated by me with perfect civility?"

"Civility, and nothing more, but something less by Leonora."

"You probably forgot that Miss Stanford is your cousin's governess, not a distinguished stranger."

"I do not forget, mother, that she is a stranger in our city, and a visitor at our house, and should, therefore, be treated with the utmost courtesy ; by her beauty, her polish of manners, and, judging from her proficiency in music, by her accomplishments also, she is fitted to grace any parlor that I ever entered, and to adorn any circle that I have ever met in these rooms."

"I think it would be expedient for me to be circumspect with you, as well as with Leonora," said Mrs. Morgan, in a tone slightly sarcastic.

Fred did not change countenance, but commenced to drum on the piano with his fingers, and without making any direct reply to his mother's observation, he said : "We boast of our family pride ; it strikes me that there is an inconsistency in receiving Cavelli, a man of no worth, an idle fellow living on his uncle's charity, with every mark of respect, and at the same time refusing to treat Miss Stanford—a perfect lady—with any degree of attention more than ordinary civility requires, simply because she is striving to maintain herself by her own efforts."

"We will drop this subject for the present, Frederick," said Mrs. Morgan, once more rising to leave the room. "You know my views, and understand my feelings respecting governesses ; I hope you will respect them, and not become too devoted to Miss Edith. I question whether she will feel the need of attention from your sister and myself, while you and your father bestow so much upon her. Good-night."

Frederick sprang to the door and opened it, and his mother passed into the hall ; he stood a moment looking thoughtfully at the polished door knob which he was turning with his hand, and then at the entrance of the servant to put out the lights ; he closed the door, and went to his own room repeating, in a half singing tone—

"—Learn for the sake of your soul's repose
That wealth's a bubble that comes and goes !
And that all proud flesh wherever it grows,
Is subject to irritation !"

THE VILLAGE BELL.

BY R —.

Old village bell ! old village bell !
To sorrow sacred, sadly sweet ;
Oh, what a tale your tongue could tell !
If but the half it could repeat,
How hearts grew sad, or how they beat
As you told of ill or well.

For many a year, your solemn tone
Hath called the fold of Christ to prayers,
And often you have seemed to moan,
When hearts were ashes, eyes were tears ;
When calling me beside a bier—
A mother's bier—I heard you groan.

Old village bell ! old village bell !
Thou evermore shalt sacred be ;
I'll muse—where'er thy sad tones swell—
On what has been, and what will be—
You've tolled for many, you'll toll for me—
Sweet village bell ! sweet village bell.

A DAY IN A PASTOR'S LIFE.

BY T. P. W.

"At evening time it shall be light."

An autumn of uncommon mildness and beauty had given place to one of those cold, dreary days, when the ice king gathers around him snow, sleet, and hail, and sends them forth on a wintry wind as precursors of his coming reign. The grates had still their summer fixings; and the pastor, suffering from recent illness, sat, with flushed cheek and hurried breath, shivering over the kitchen fire. There were quick footsteps hurrying to and fro, for warm hearts and willing hands were busily engaged in making the study comfortable for "dear Uncle Ellis." The tall, manly-looking nephew, and black-eyed, rosy-cheeked niece who were helping auntie, were cousins, who had come to brighten the pastor's home by a brief visit. Karl had just returned from a successful business experiment at the West, and was full of life and spirits. Ella, our pet and darling, was a very sunbeam, always loving and hopeful.

"The study is ready, uncle."

How pleasant it looked with its cheerful fire, softened light, and the lounge with pillows and other et ceteras for a temporary bed! And how comfortable the pastor felt, as he lay tucked up after the most approved fashion!

"I hope you have no engagements for to-day," said the anxious wife.

"Engagements!" said Karl and Ella in a breath; "as if Uncle Ellis could go out such a day as this, when he's sick enough to send for the doctor, and have all sorts of nice things made for him in the bargain."

"I have a wedding and funeral to attend, but a carriage will be sent for me, and I can go very comfortably."

Ring, ring—and the door-bell gave forth those quick, sharp sounds that tell of haste and urgency.

"Please, sir, Mr. H. is very sick, and wants to see you real bad."

There was an appealing glance from the wife and looks of determined opposition from Karl and Ella, but the pastor rose very quietly, with trembling hands put on rubbers, cloak, and cap, and went forth in that driving storm to visit the sick.

Mr. H. was one of those poor persons whom our Saviour has left as a legacy to his children, to be always with them: that the chain of love that links us to our fellow travellers may, by active benevolence, be kept bright and glowing. There was a wife and four little children by that sick bed. The pastor's soothing words, his prayers and gifts, were like new life to the sufferer. Was he enabled to offer the prayer of faith that saves the sick? We know not, but from that hour Mr. H. slowly recovered, and is now healthy, energetic, and prosperous.

Again the lounge was drawn near the fire, the room darkened, and Uncle Ellis left to take a nap before dinner.

The warmth and quiet were luxurious. A dreamy feeling stole over the invalid, which would soon have given place to sleep, when there was a second summons to a sick bed.

It was promptly answered, and a feeble invalid, who had for many long years been a sufferer, blessed God for her pastor's words of cheer and comfort.

"I can't stay for my dinner, the carriage is waiting at the door to take me to the wedding."

"Bring some cake, uncle; and do, please, for once tell us about the bride's dress."

Our clerical friend had good taste, and a keen appreciation of the beautiful, but, respecting the minutia of a lady's wardrobe, he was as ignorant as Uncle C., who described a bridal dress as made of "linen full of little holes."

Uncle Ellis brought home plenty of cake, a good fee for auntie, and an exquisitely beautiful bouquet for Ella. "The parlors were filled with choice flowers, the table set in the most approved style of modern elegance, the company select, brilliant, and sparkling."

"But the bride's dress, uncle; you know you promised to try and remember what it was."

There was a puzzled look, and then you should have heard the merry laugh as Uncle Ellis said, "I am not quite sure, Ella, but I think the bride was dressed in black silk!"

No time for comments, for another carriage is waiting to take the pastor to the funeral of Mr. D. The deceased was one of the early pioneers at the West, who had lived to see almost incredible changes in the home of his adoption. He had amassed a handsome fortune. Children and grandchildren were prosperous through his energy and forecast, and his last days were made singularly happy by his grateful descendants.

A very long line of carriages followed his remains to the cemetery, and they were filled by those who truly respected their departed friend.

"How very tired you look, dear uncle; I hope you can rest during the remainder of the day."

Another ring of the bell, faint, scarcely perceptible, as if touched by a timid hand.

One glance at the new comer, and our sympathies were speedily excited. Poverty and sorrow were there.

"Please, sir, our little baby died yesterday. We are strangers here, and didn't know who to go to, but if you will be so kind as to say a prayer over our little Mary—" Sobs and tears finished the sentence.

There was no hesitation now. Ella ran for the rubbers and cloak, to have them thoroughly warmed. "Uncle," said Karl, "you wrap yourself up as closely as possible, and I will drive you to the funeral in the buggy."

"Karl," said Ella, taking her bouquet from its vase, "baby won't have a beautiful white wreath on her coffin as our darling little cousin had; take these flowers and put them in baby's hand."

A few poor neighbors had assembled in the house of mourning. There were no pall-bearers, no carriages. A coffin of rude materials inclosed the precious treasure so lately the pride and joy of these children of poverty.

As if to look at the little one, Karl approached the coffin, and quietly placed the flowers in baby's hand.

Soothing words were uttered by the pastor, a heartfelt prayer offered, and then the mourners went to take a last look of their darling. A quick, bright flush of joy illumined the mother's face as the flowers met her eye. She looked eagerly around as if to pour forth her gratitude for such unexpected kindness. And then, as eagerly, she watched to see if her little baby might take the flowers with her to her lonely home. Yes, the coffin is closed, the flowers are there, and the mother's heart is comforted.

The coffin was placed in the pastor's buggy. The parents and the poor neighbors formed the procession that followed baby's remains.

Doubtless there were unseen attendants, for angels love the little ones whom our Saviour has blest, and who will ere long become jewels in his crown of glory.

Once more in the simply furnished parlor, which seemed rich and luxurious by contrast.

Another very decided pull at the door-bell. "No mistaking that ring," said Karl; "a hotel servant, undoubtedly."

A smart colored waiter was ushered into the parlor, and with a great flourish made known his errand.

"A couple at the Pavilion, Doctor, that want to get married, sir, and I told them that nobody could do up that business equal to the Rev. Dr. Ellis. Carriage at the door, sir."

The couple at the Pavilion were linked, and presently the carriage brought Uncle Ellis back to the cozy parlor, looking very merry.

"Now tell us, please, all about it," said Ella; "was the bride pretty?"

"Yes, a pretty brunette, with bright, sparkling eyes, something like yours, for instance, Ella."

Karl laughed.

"And the bridegroom," said Ella, quickly, "was like Karl, six feet, well proportioned, with a majestic air—never mind for the rest, but how did he look, truly?"

"He truly did look like one of nature's noblemen, fresh from the quarry, uncut and unpolished. The couple stood up directly after I entered the room. As I was about to commence the service, a glance from the bride at the hands of her liege lord, showed that he had forgotten his gloves. He quickly drew from his pocket a pair of long, narrow black kids, and commenced putting them on. Such work as he made, blowing in the fingers, stretching, and pulling, until he bent almost down to the floor, with a red face but very determined air. The bride gave me a quizzical glance, and then, with many blushes, tried to look demure, but her eyes laughed and sparkled as if she were ready to shout with laughter. At length the black kids were on, after a fashion, the bridegroom straightened himself up with a 'Now I'm ready, sir, go ahead;' and so they were married."

We had a merry tea drinking. "Now for some music. Open the piano, Ella, and let Karl get his flute in tune." With Uncle Ellis resting on the sofa, and auntie in the rocking-chair looking quietly happy, the cousins played and sang many favorite airs.

Another ring at the door-bell. "Shall I test the gas-burners, sir?"

"Yes, if you please."

And then, like children, we followed the man all over the house to see the gas lighted for the first time. All the lights burnt brilliantly. Now for the kitchen. Auntie had been advised by several wealthy ladies not to have gas in the kitchen, "servants wasted so." The gas was lighted, and Biddy shouted—

"Isn't it perfectly splendid, and right over my ironing-table, too?"

"Do you know how to turn down the light, Biddy, when you leave the room, so as to economize the gas?"

"Oh, yes 'm," and she gave a quick turn of the screw and left us in total darkness.

When the gas was again lighted, Biddy's look of mingled drollery and dismay was irresistibly ludicrous.

As we passed through the study to the parlor, Ella exclaimed: "Oh, auntie, the moon is shining brilliantly; it is all light—light within and without."

Then, like a ray from heaven, there flashed through the heart of the wife this cheering assurance, "At evening time it shall be light."

What matters it if the dearly loved husband's life is one of self-denying effort, if he is often called to comfort others when keenly suffering himself? Life's day is short, and "at evening time it shall be light." Light in its closing hours, light in the dark valley, light to illumine the grave where Jesus has slept; and beyond the grave, the home of the faithful "hath no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine on it, for the glory of God doth lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof."

THE LITTLE HANDS.

"The Little Hand!" bless it, how confidently it is placed within our own. It trusts in its helplessness and weakness for guidance. Every nerve rests tranquilly, as its tiny fingers are encircled by a firm but loving grasp. Watch the footsteps of the little one as he ranges the lawn, and with his tiny hand gathers the purple violets, and in childish glee strews them around; his blue eyes look roguishly, as he runs laughingly on, saying, "Catch me if you can." The tiny hand of childhood as it entwines its little fingers among your curls, or clasps them at your knee, lisping out an infant's prayer, speaks peace to the troubled heart, as if an angel's voice had whispered it from heaven.

Beautiful childhood, would that it could be always shielded from harshness, from corroding care, and corrupt influences.

Look at little hands stretched out for help from a harsh father or from a drunken mother. There they are, five little ones; the eldest not more than six. The little girl, with her large dark eyes and curling hair, as she stands out in front of a band of little ones, singing, and keeping time with her little hands, appears happy now, for there is none to molest or make her afraid. She is taken away from the dark fate that awaited her in her infant's home; and the beautiful boy that she points out as her brother. The hand of the unnatural, drunken mother had placed a rope around his neck to strangle him, but was discovered and arrested in her dark design in time to save him from a cruel death. There he is, not four years old, with a doll in his little hand, and he looks up, his face radiant with smiles, as he replies to our simple question, "If he was fond of dolls?" He has large dark eyes, and a noble head. We could predict a splendid career for him in the future, if rightly guided.

Little hands are all around us seeking for guidance, relying upon the protecting influence of those older than themselves. Would that we kept ourselves pure, so that we might perform our duties faithfully and well. That nature must be hardened, indeed, that can see a tear-drop fall from the eyes of childhood, or the little hand stretched out in vain.

Who cannot recall to mind little hands that they have caressed and tenderly cared for, and that have now passed on to the "spirit land." They were laid to rest in their narrow house, their little hands crossed, and filled with white rosebuds, the last of summer's offering. Though now all unseen to our mortal gaze, still their angel hands are invisible ministers of love, drawing us to them in their beautiful home.

Cherish then the "little hand," and guide and guard it while you may, for it belongs to an angel in your household, and you know not how soon their wings will unfold, and soar far away into the world of love and light, leaving you in your anguish to mourn and lament over their brief stay.

Blessed memories of the little hands that have clung to you in their simple, childlike faith and trust. Oh, may these memories never be laden with harshness or unkindness, "For of such as these is the kingdom of heaven."

MR. AND MRS. RASHER.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MISS SLIMMENS."

CHAPTER VI.

DOMESTIC.

DARN your stockings, Mr. Rasher? If that don't cap the climax! It would be pretty work to occupy my mornings in my boudoir; or no, I'd better keep 'em for parlor "fancy work" of evenings, when I've only a few calls, and Flummery is drumming at the piano or making himself agreeable to Fitz. I expect he'd want to take lessons in the fashionable and elegant art of darning old socks, he's so critical and fastidious. He always holds my silk for me, when he's here of mornings and I've got any to wind, and I presume he'd be delighted to hold a skein of blue yarn. If you're really not able, Rasher, to buy yourself new stockings when the old ones get holes in 'em, perhaps I'll provide myself with a darning-needle, and stay to home and mend 'em for you. You frequently advise me to be more economical, and here's a fair chance to begin. I do believe a man, be he high or low, rich or poor, is never satisfied with his wife, except when she is darning his socks or making a pudding. If any one should ask me my idea of the male sex, I should describe it as a rapacious pudding-bag with a pair of worn-out socks on the end of it; while the female sex would be represented as everlastingly busy trying to fill the bag with ceaseless pudding, and darning the socks at intervals. Growing poetical? Husband, there's that in the treatment of the masculine race that's calculated to make us indignant, if there's a spark of resentment in our breasts.

"They were such nice lambs'-wool, and you thought, as I'd nothing else to do, they were worth"—Nothing else to do! nothing to do! Hurried, and worried, and flurried to death, with six servants setting me distracted, and company, and going out constantly! Nothing to do but set down and darn socks! Here I am, just home from the matinee, and hungry for my dinner, expecting half a dozen friends in this evening that I asked when I was at the Academy, and engaged for all day to-morrow going calling, and out to the ball in the evening, and I've nothing to do!

You thought it would seem so old-fashioned and pleasant to see me with my work-basket, passing a quiet evening, you talking and reading the paper, and me darning the heels and toes of your socks? Once for all, my dear, I don't consider anything pleasant that's old-fashioned, and as for my having been in the habit, in former days, of economizing, I wish you wouldn't refer to it; it makes me nervous. You're as sentimental as Cerintha, this minute, and I'm sure a person, to look at you, wouldn't think there was a particle of sentiment in you, which I heartily wish there wasn't, as it's always making you ridiculous. I've got so many other balls to keep a rolling I can't condescend to a ball of yarn? Now add something about "spinning street-yarn," and then you'll have run through the usual lists of a man's witticisms.

What's that sticking out of your vest pocket? Dear me! I'm delighted! Why didn't you tell me when you first came in?

ARTISTS' RECEPTIONS.

ADMIT Mr. Rasher.
Dodworth's Hall.

THURSDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 21, 1861.

GEO. A. BAKER,
WM. OLIVER STONE, } Executive
LAUNT THOMPSON, } Committee.

COMPLIMENTS OF Lake Brown.

La! and another one for me.

Admit one Lady.

Mrs. Cornell wanted to go awfully last month, but she couldn't find a gentleman who had an invitation to spare. You may thank me, husband, for these tickets. If I hadn't proved myself a patteron of the fine arts, by getting all these pictures when the house was furnished, we shouldn't have been asked. I shouldn't care much for going, since there's no supper nor dancing, and nothing but to look at pictures which I don't care a snap about, if it wasn't a compliment to our taste, and nice to have been there.

You guess it was you who procured the tickets, this time? Indeed! And how? You've been ordering two or three pieces to be painted by some of our first artists? You were introduced to some of them, and they were such good fellows you couldn't help it. Well, I expect it's all right. For my part, I admire the frames more than I do the paintings; but other people of our set seem to have got up a mania about such things, and we must follow the lead.

I've a mind to give an Artists' Reception myself, after theirs is over. Flummery says that it's the duty of wealthy people without genius to encourage authors and artists; to scatter, as he said, golden showers upon the dusty pathway trod by the aspiring foot of genius. He said that even money earned by the wholesale pork business might be hallowed and exalted by being liberally given out for a charming picture or a glowing book. Of course I saw through it all, but it's true as preaching, nevertheless. If I've an ambition for anything, it's for being considered a patteron of the fine arts. My own particular taste runs to worsted work, and those cunning little dogs and things in Berlin wool, and next to that I admire monochromatics, but we must do as our set does.

Speaking of one thing reminds me of another. I wonder where that Signor Fingerani is that used to give the girls music lessons before they went away to boarding-school. Am I thinking of taking lessons myself, at this late day? I am not, Mr. Rasher; though why you should consider me too old to learn, if I was a mind to, I don't see; I am only forty-two, come April. The fact is, I had hard work to coax Rosine to stay, after that time you gave her warning; I had to raise her wages, and make her a present of one of my best second-best silk dresses, and now she's taken a fancy that she's a natural talent for music. She thinks she'd like teaching music better than waiting on ladies, or at least it would help her to pass away her spare time pleasantly, if she knew how to play the piano, and I've thought some of gratifying her, for the sake of keeping her.

Now, Rasher, that's just the way you always do when you're out of patience about nothing, as you always are—flying about the room like a mad hen, making yourself ridiculous. I'm sure you needn't interfere with my management of my own servants—above all, my own lady's maid. There! there! there! you needn't speak; if you do, you'll be sure to stutter; control your temper, my dearest, for when a man stutters he's sure to get the worst of it. You see you can't talk half as fast as I, nor half as well, and you might better not begin. Pig-headed? Look out, my love, and don't provoke me, or you'll get your ears boxed soundly. Me pig-headed! me, indeed! And who but a person with a natural liking for pigs would be engaged in the pork business? If I had a married as I might have married, and as I've often since regretted I didn't, I might have had my choice of a doctor or a lawyer, and been more congenially united than I have been, instead of being tormented all my days with the smell of bacon, and feeling myself bound by chains of steel to the destiny of a pork merchant. But it's too late to mourn over early indiscretion. I might have been—What's that, Rasher? You haven't forgotten the tailor you cut out? Served him the same trick he served your clothes? There's the bell for dinner. Put on your cravat, my dear, and hurry. Preferred pig to goose, after all? Come, come, the soup'll be cold, and it's your favorite kind. You flatter yourself you saved me from cabbage, if not from pork? Oh, quit your nonsense! Shear nonsense? Well, if you want cold soup, I don't, and I'm going. What's that he's hollering through the keyhole about my first suit-her? "He'd have been a fitting companion." Quit your silliness, for I'm down stairs, and I can't hear you. "Did he press his suit?" Oh, get out! Here you come, down three stairs at a time; and now you've got rid of half a dozen miserable puns, I s'pose you'll be good-natured, and want to hug me, right in the dining-room. Why were your puns so miserable? Because they generally are, I guess. Because they were only sew-sew? Do please be quiet before we get in where the waiter is; and, dear, do try and remember not to put your knife in your mouth.

I tell you what it is, if we do have an artist's and author's reception, as I'm bound to. I mean to have the girls to home. It will be a fine opportunity for them to display their accomplishments, and take a step upward in the social ladder, as Fitz calls it. You say times are a little easier; and I'm going to do what I like. I believe you've been trying to frighten me about your business, when there wasn't the least necessity for it, just for the sake of seeing me going without the comforts of life. I haven't got them white furs yet, and it's coming time to get a camel's-hair shawl for the spring. La, Rasher! I never thought of your ordering pictures painted. Did you choose your own subjects? Tell me what you ordered, for I want to speak of it, this evening, to Flummery and Mrs. Cornell. "You saw some excellent portraits of hogs, by Oestel, and ordered two companion-pieces, to hang in my boudoir!"—"also a sweet little landscape, that reminded you of the old homestead, where you was brought up—which you took, only you ordered a group of pigs, in place of the cattle, in the field." Now, my dear, if there's money to be wasted on pictures, I prefer picking 'em out myself, and shall insist upon doing so. As for having your pigs in the house, I sha'n't do it, no matter how well they're painted. "Connisurs pronounce 'em wonderful." Well, the more they are like hogs, the less I'll like 'em. If you'd had 'em so they could have passed for sheep, I wouldn't have minded, but as it is, if they hang anywhere, they'll hang in the smoking-room. What? "smoked bacon"—yes, make smoked bacon of 'em, for all I care.

CHAPTER VII.

IN HER ELEMENT.

I'M always in my element, Mr. Flummery, when I'm surrounded by congenial spirits, as on this occasion. You and my dear friend Fitz Simmons have been extremely kind in inducing all these celebrated artists, and so many talented people to honor me with their company this evening. I hope the supper will give satisfaction and pay them for their trouble in coming, if nothing else does. But, of course, I don't expect that people of such gifts care for such things as suppers and liquors; I have spared no expense to feast their minds as well as bodies. You observe I have added twelve new pictures to my collection, which I bought on purpose to add brilliancy to this soiree. Aren't they splendid? the coziest and most superb I could find, that would go in a private house; and, to whisper the truth to you, I got them surprisingly low. Purchased all at one place, and they made a reduction in consequence of the size of the order. Those four magnificent companion-pieces, "Cole's Voyage of Life," the real originals, I got for three hundred dollars, and the frames are worth sixty apiece. Seems to me the company is in unusual good spirits—don't you think so, Mr. Flummery? I knew you'd agree with me. The artists are such a pleasant, sociable kind of people; they ain't as particular about their dress, some of 'em, as they might be, but it gives 'em an air. It makes me quite happy to see how delighted they are with the pictures. Don't you think the girls are looking well? O dear, you flatter them, Mr. Flummery. It's strange you seem to admire Felicia most. She is a good girl, amiable and sensible—but she hasn't the genius of Cerintha. Cerintha's real sentimental, if I am her mother that says it. She writes the sweetest compositions, and sees an exiled prince in every Italian organ-grinder. Am not I afraid she'll run away with some ragged hero, some day? O no! not she! she's prudent as well as practical. She'll never marry less'n half a million. If anybody makes a love match, it'll be Felicia, quiet as she looks. By-the-by, who's that she's so much interested in, now? that dark-eyed, handsome young man that's talking to her about that little drawing on the table. A very promising young artist? Rich? I thought not by the looks of his coat. It's decidedly rusty, and six months out of date. Will be a lion some day? I shall allow Felicia to cultivate him, then; but I must warn her against any tender interest. He's handsome enough to turn a young lady's head, that isn't hardly through with school yet. How admirably he looks at her; and she's actually blushing. I thought Madame Finishche taught her young ladies not to blush, it's so childish! I must correct Felicia for that fault, to-morrow. Don't? and why not, Mr. Flummery? But if you say so, it's all right; you've the credit of knowing everything. Do you know, Cerintha writes poetry; and as you are a poet, you ought to be kindred spirits. I wish you'd celebrate my soiree in some verses, won't you, now, that's a dear, good man? Fitz! Fitz, darling! com here! I'm trying to persuade our friend, Mr. Flummery, to immortalize this evening in some of the poetry which he prints in the magazines. They say you're so sarcastic, Mr. Flummery, and say such sharp things, even in your poetry, but I know you won't make fun of us. It would be so nice.

Do you think they are enjoying themselves, Fitz? They seem in excellent spirits; and I'm sure I've taken trouble enough to please 'em. Why didn't I consult you before I purchased so many pictures? Well, I was down to Stewart's, and coming back, I saw a shop full of handsome ones, and the idea struck me it would impress my new guests favorably to find lots of pictures, and I stepped in and bought what you see. You've told me that size wasn't the main point in buying paintings. I guess I know that! But everybody knows "Cole's Voyage of Life" is a fine thing, and all the rest are choice copies of the old masters, whoever they are.

Everything seems to me to be going off splendidly; even Rasher's behaving himself remarkably. He hasn't said a vulgar thing this evening, in my hearing. There he goes, off to the smoking-room, with half-a-dozen gentlemen, to show 'em his pigs. He paid a hundred dollars for a little thing no bigger than my two hands.

(Sotto voce.) I wish Felicia would leave that fellow for awhile. He's quite too agreeable; and she's looking so pretty, now, with her eyes full of smiles and her cheeks glowing, he'll fall in love with her. Artists are all very well to patronize, but when it comes to son-in-laws, it's another thing. Bless me, Mr. Flummery, I did not know you were so near! Law? "That young gentleman, talking to my daughter, owns millions of acres of the loveliest and richest lands of the earth, owns diamonds and pearls, and the uncounted gold of a thousand sunsets." Pshaw! does he really, or are you speaking in a metaphysical sense? You know they don't take the gold of the sunset at Stewart's or Tiffany's—and I prefer that kind that has the stamp of the mint on it, that's always current. "Like old mother Bumsby's wine!" Rasher, remember; make no puns but good ones to-night. What's that, Mr. Flummery? A bad pun is often better than a good one, if it's only bad enough! Well, that's queer! don't forget you've got to write me some verses, Mr. Flummery. I'll have a little game supper and invite Fitz, and some others, when it's ready to be ready. Do you promise?

I hope you're enjoying yourself, Mr. Easelby. But you always do admire my pictures. I feel proud to be surrounded by so distinguished a gathering, and you are one of the brightest stars in my axletree of guests. How do you like this one? The vendor assured me that it was an old Italian copy of the original Raffel. I didn't know they had raffles in old times to sell off paintings. That's what we ladies do now, when we get a lot of pincushions and fancy articles left over from our fairs. It's a very good plan. I've no doubt the old masters got rid of a good many in that way, for I often hear it mentioned. I was very much charmed with your reception, the other evening, Mr. Easelby. You artists are really getting to have very good society about you. I saw a good many of our wealthiest people present. We didn't use to think much of your class; but we're getting over our prejudices. There's Mr. Moneybags, talking to that young fellow with the seedy look, as if they were equals. We appreciate talent, Mr. Easelby; it is one of our privileges. Dear me! where's the man gone? I do believe he's going off before supper, and I haven't said anything in the world to offend him. I've treated the whole set as well as if they could return the compliment; the costliest music, game for supper, our best wines, and all them pictures on purpose to consult their tastes; and of course, they'll never treat us to music and supper. But I'll have it to talk about. I've got the start of Mrs. Cornell for once, and I can see she is dying of envy. I've got the author of "Poems of the Century;" and that man that's celebrated for writing something, I don't know what, but he goes to the Liverpools constantly; and Professor Donderland, who's been kind enough to ruin the piano with playing, and everybody that anybody wants to have, and I call it a perfect success.

There's Felicia and that young artist getting together again, after I've warned her not to pay too much attention to our guest.

I asked Flummery what made the crowd so cheerful, and he says it's the new pictures; so they're successes, of course. He says it would be a good idea for us to have a gallery to display them to better advantage—wants to know if there isn't room in the garret to construct one.

Rasher! Larkins says supper is ready; go and get Mrs. Moneybags, and I'll take Mr. Lake Brown's arm. "La! La! La!" what are you all laughing at? Mr. Rasher? he's so funny! What has he said now? "He wants to know why we are all like a parcel of pigs;" "because we all want to be first at the trough!" (Sotto voce.) Horror! I shall sink through the floor! that wretched man is enough to distract a woman. It's dreadful! his vulgarity always shows itself at the most conspicuous moment. If I didn't have hold of Mr. Brown's arm, I should sink right through, and likely as not light in the bowl of chicken salad.

What did you say, Mr. Flummery? "Why is Mr. Rasher like a tame bear?" I'm sure I don't know unless it's because he's so horrid rough. "Because he has given us a great faux pas." He! He! you're so witty, Mr. Flummery, I don't exactly know what you mean, but I'm sure it's funny, if you said it.

Allow me to help you to some of the celery, Mr. Brown; I'm sure you must be fond of it, I saw such beautiful greens in that picture of yours at Dodworth's. (Sotto voce—There's Rasher at his puns again. He'll make me miserable all through supper. "Don't be sherry of the wine; there's plenty of it.") I should think a person who could draw cows as natural as you would always be drawing them. ("Decaret's No. 1.") I'm so fond of cows in landscapes! I think every landscape ought to have cows in it. ("Why is this bottle like my amiable wife? Give it up? Because it's my-deary!") Especially those dreary deserts that Mr. Gamboe is so fond of painting; a cow or two would give life to them. ("Why is there no such thing as a headache in the morning after taking a little too much the night before? Give it up? Because it's all sham-pain.") "But that's as old as the hills." "All the better for being old.") I've thought a good deal, Mr. Brown, of sending my Cerintha to take lessons of some artist; I'm certain she has a talent for it; dear girl! she has a talent for most everything. You ought to see her specimens that she's brought home from school; and she's embroidered a whole scene in worsted work—Rachel and Joseph at the Well. It's sweet, especially the well, which is done to perfection—the curb, and the bucket and pole, just as they had them in old times. ("Why are gardeners stingy to their help? Because they order their salary cut down." Salary, good gracious!) Don't you think it would be advisable to have my daughter take lessons of some of our first artists? I should like to have an artist in the family; it would be something to be proud—(Good gracious! There it comes at last! "Why am I like the basement of my own warehouse? Because we're both pork-sellers." If I don't pay Rasher for that after the company's gone, then I don't know what revenge is—the brute!) O yes! The Masquerade Ball was the most delightful part of the opera. I went on the stage myself—charming! (Larkins, tell the band to strike up a perfect crash. I'm bound to choke Rasher off, if I have to drown the whole company in the noise.)

O no, Mynheer Donderland, my daughters wouldn't think of playing and singing after you; that would be asking too much of them. But dear me, Mr. Rhymer, I've got a secret to tell you. Cerintha admires you immensely since she's found out you're the author of "Poems of the Century." But that isn't the secret, which is, that Cerintha is something of a poet, too—that is, I hope she is, though I'm not a competent judge of verses. I found some lines lying in a copy of your poems this morning. I knew her handwriting, and I secured them, without her knowledge. Would you like to look at them? She's in the conservatory now, and won't shriek out and snatch 'em away, as she'd be sure to do if she were here. They seem to me to be very nice. Here, Mr. Flummery, you read 'em, low, so she won't find out what's going on. You and Mr. Rhymer are judges. [Flummery reads and comments:—]

"I would that I were dead!

'Tis hard to bear with life when hope is o'er,
And I can know it's vernal bloom no more!
Within my breast it nevermore shall spring,
Nor o'er my soul it's golden radiance fling!

I would that I were dead!

"Youth, beauty, fortune, new dresses, flirtations, plenty to eat and drink—how's this, Rasher? Been treating Miss Cerintha with any superhuman cruelty? Just hear how she runs on—

'My sorrow has no name, and if it had,
I would not speak it (good); 'tis too wildly sad
For human utterance. Icy griefs are felt
Which never into softer words can melt—

("Excellent for purposes of ice cream in warm weather.")

I would that I were dead!

'Life has no pleasure for my lonely heart!
Within my eyes the burning tear-drops start!
My soul is dark (borrowed); nor music, flowers, nor mirth

Can ever light again this midnight earth!

I would that I were—wed!

"That's it exactly. I would that I were wed. That sounds more reasonable in a good-looking young lady. But as to the 'midnight earth!' just look at Miss Cerintha now. Looks like a hopeless case, doesn't she, laughing with Mr. Dorsay and brilliant with flirtation, fairly beaming with it? Didn't read it right, Mrs. Rasher? 'Tisn't 'I would that I were wed?' Well, let's read the last verse—

"'Tis sad in youth to feel the heart grow old!
In summer's heat to feel the winter's cold!
This is my fate! So be it! I will bear
With my wild sorrow! I will wed Despair!

("Oh, don't! She meant Dorsay. A slight mistake, but all right now.")

I would that I were wed!

"It's my solemn conviction, Mrs. Rasher, that this poetry was indited after Miss Cerintha had eaten too hearty a dinner, when she hadn't a care, or a trouble, or a want in the world, and was as happy as a young lady can be with a slightly overloaded stomach. People who are miserable never express themselves so sublimely; then, again, miserable people are often very funny. I suppose, if I should tread on one of your corns, Rasher, you'd say something very amusing about it, wouldn't you? You warn me not to try it? Well, Mrs. Rasher, this is very good poetry, very good, indeed! I used to write in the same line when I was about her age; but if I should serve up your soiree now on a golden salver of rhyme, I'd do it in a lighter style."

Come here, my darling. Mr. Flummery has been reading your verses to the company. There, I knew you'd shriek! Be calm, my love; it was I who gave them to him. He thinks them sweet, but a little too pensive. Yes, I know, sweetest, you're naturally melancholy, while Felicia's just like her pa—fat and merry. What's that, husband? She eats full as much pudding and pie as Felicia? Pshaw! she had always a delicate appetite. When she was a child only—my goodness! if Rasher himself ain't making poetry!

(My wife has lately grown ambitious,
I tell you she's a smasher!
She resolved to give a learned soiree,
Than which nothing could be Rasher!)

Making a fool of himself, as usual. I wish I could get near him!

(She went and bought a bran-new house,
And furnished it so quaint, sirs!
She got the curtains and carpets first,
And then called in the painters!)

He'll make 'em all as mad as fire! No! they're giggling and poking each other slyly in the ribs; some are crying, "Go it, Rasher!"

(She bought a lot of worthless daubs,
Got bitten by the biters,
And after everything was wrong,
She then called in the writers.)

If I could only get near enough to twitch his coat-tail! I do believe he's taken too much wine. Everybody in the house has stopped to listen to him, of course.

(She's cut a fashionable splurge—
Also each poor relation—
She thinks she's brimming o'er with sense,
But I know it's sense-ation!)

Don't, Fitz, hold on to my dress so! I'm going to him.

(To-morrow you will joke and laugh,
As you paint, and write, and quarry,
At Mrs. Rasher's latest splurge,
Her grand literary, musical, artistic,
And Hall-Columbia soiree.)

Well, if that don't beat the Dutch! I don't wonder you all laugh, gentlemen, but I do believe my husband's drunk.

There! they're gone at last, and I'm glad of it! Rasher! I'll never forgive you for the fool you've made of yourself. Dear me! it's tiresome work, anyhow, trying to be literary. I felt as uneasy as a fish out of water. The only comfort I've had to-night was when I was resting on the sofa beside Mrs. Moneybags, talking over our new dresses—there!

GRANDMOTHER'S GARDEN.

BY CELESTE.

My grandmother's old-fashioned garden!

Ah! never again shall I see
A spot of such exquisite beauty
And wondrous enchantment to me!
For there, in my earliest childhood,
I whiled away long summer hours,
And gazed on its treasures with rapture,
Or filled my young hands with the flowers.

The trees in the orchard—long branches
Reached o'er the mossy stone wall,
That 'mid the soft border of grasses
Their first golden apples might fall.
Those prim garden beds, to my vision,
Seemed crowned with each loveliest hue,
And passers-by, young and old, lingered
The beautiful garden to view.

The crocus first whispered of beauty
Safe hidden beneath the spring snows;
And hyacinths, fragrant and lovely,
Next 'woke from their winter's repose.
From then till the cold winds of autumn,
So ruthless, chilled summer away
That spot was my fairyland gorgeous,
And each charming flower was a Fay!

The lilac boughs trembled with sweetness,
Those mornings so dewy and bright;
The woodbine flowers bloomed on the lattice,
And humming-birds sought them at night;
The snowballs grew high in the corner,
And lilies so stately and tall,
Near daffodils, tulips, and roses;
And robin's song floated o'er all.

Oh, many the flowers in that garden!
Their names are all dear now to me.
Sweet-Williams I love, for they grew there,
A charm has the gay four-d-lis;
For memories linger around them,
Each one to my heart hath a tone—
O violets, sweetest and dearest,
I loved you, and called you my own!

I sat in the vine-covered arbor
When clusters of purple peeped through,
Near by rushed the musical river,
And verdure-clad hills rose to view.
Ah! then, in my grandmother's garden,
I knew naught of sorrow or tears,
And life was as sweet as the roses
That bloomed in those earlier years.

DESIGN FOR PATCHWORK.

Our page compels us to reduce the size of the pattern; but, by a little attention, sections may easily be cut of any dimensions desired. Take a piece of clean stout white paper, and fold it in all the parallel sloping lines seen in our engraving. These may be at any distance from each other; only regular and equal. It will be seen that a line drawn exactly between every pair of parallels will take in the points. Draw these lines with a pencil, to distinguish them from those caused by the folding, and the proper forms can be readily obtained. Cut them out, and from them others in card-board, if for a large piece of work, and you have all your sections ready, without the possibility of a misfit. The two eight-pointed figures are differently arranged. A may be filled up in eight pieces, while B should be composed of nine—a star of eight points to the centre, and eight diamonds round it. Or, if on a sufficiently large scale, the inner star may be of eight pieces. Two very distinct shades of the same color will look better for A than many different tints. B may have a dark centre and bright points, or vice versa. The intermediate figure, C, should be of such neutral tints or dark shades as may throw up the brilliant hues of which the star should be composed.

We have said that this design may be applied to another purpose. Worked on canvas, in wools, the outlines done in black, it would be both rich looking and easily worked. Elderly people and children can often do a piece where they can count threads, where a painted pattern would puzzle them. No. 14 or 16 canvas, and eight-thread wool should be used. Orange, claret, blue (if good), and brilliant greens look well in such a pattern.

TOILET MAT.

TAKE white crochet cotton, No. 8, tie a small ring, and in it work 18 long crochet stitches.

2d row.—Two long stitches between every stitch.

3d.—Three long stitches in every bunch of two stitches.

4th.—Three long stitches between the first and second stitch of every bunch.

5th.—Four long stitches between the first and second stitch of every bunch, and so on increasing one stitch every row, until you have the mat the size you desire. The one in the engraving is increased to ten stitches in every bunch. The last two rows are done in colors.

KNITTED ARTIFICIAL FLOWERS.

PUCHSIA.

If knitted in good size China silk, it does well to ornament caps or bonnets.

CALYX.—Four calyx are required for each flower; cast on eight stitches with crimson split wool.

1st row.—Knit plain.

2d.—Purl.

3d.—Knit plain.

4th.—Purl.

5th.—Make one, knit two; repeat to the end of row.

6th.—Purl.

7th.—Knit plain.

8th.—Purl.

9th.—Knit plain.

10th.—Purl.

11th.—Knit plain.

12th.—Purl.

13th.—Make one, knit three; repeat to the end of the row.

14th.—Purl.

15th.—Make one, knit four; repeat.

16th.—Purl.

17th.—Make one, knit five to the end of row.

18th.—Knit six stitches, turn back and purl the same (leaving the rest of the stitches on the needle). Continue knitting and purling the six stitches until you have six small rows; then decrease one stitch, knit four; next row, decrease one, purl three, knit a row plain; then decrease one, purl two; lastly slip one, knit two together, turn the slipped stitch over, fasten the wool by putting it through the last stitch. This completes one division of the calyx. Break off the wool, leaving about a yard on the work, in order to carry down the wool to the stitches, which are still on the needle. Then with the same wool, knit six more stitches, which must be done especially as the first, forming the second division, and with the same wool knit the third and fourth, which finishes the calyx.

Sew a bit of fine wire (with the same split wool) round the end of each division, and the ends of the wire must be sown two by two on the inside of the flower before it is sown up.

The corolla is small in the Fuchsia, and less apparent than the calyx. The color of the wool must be either purple or dark puce.

Cast on eight stitches.

1st row.—Knit plain.

2d.—Purl.

3d.—Make one, knit two; repeat throughout the row.

4th.—Purl.

5th.—Knit plain.

6th.—Purl.

7th.—Make one, knit three; throughout the row.

8th.—Purl.

9th.—Knit plain.

10th.—Purl.

11th.—Knit four stitches, turn back, decrease one, purl two, and finish by slipping one, knitting two together, turning the slipped stitch over, and putting the wool through the loop; bring the wool down the edge in the same way as for the calyx, and knit the second, third, and fourth divisions like the first. Sew a bit of wire round the edge, following the sinuosities of the work, and sew the two edges together.

The pistil and stamen can be made like the lily, but very much finer and smaller; but a simpler and easier method is, to stiffen some pale green, or white sewing cotton, with gum, and cut eight pieces of it of about five or six inches long, for the stamen, and one bit rather longer for the pistil; tie them together, and dip the longest in gum, and then in some green powder, or wool cut as fine as powder, and the rest, first in gum, and then immediately in yellow powder, or wool cut as fine, which will answer quite as well for the purpose. Mount your flower, by placing the stamens and pistil inside the corolla, and that to within the calyx, sufficiently low to show the corolla slightly; sew the open side of the calyx, and twist all the stalks together, covering the little stem with green wool.

Buds.—Cast on four stitches, knit one row plain, purl one row.

3d row.—Make one stitch, knit one throughout the row.

4th.—Purl.

5th.—Knit plain.

6th.—Purl.

7th.—Make one, knit two throughout the row.

8th.—Purl.

9th.—Knit plain.

10th.—Purl.

Then gather all the stitches with a rug needle, make a little ball of red wool, put a bit of wire across it, fold over, and twist the wire quite tight, cover the little ball with the piece just knitted, sew the opening neatly, and gather up the stitches at the stem, which must be covered with crimson wool.

LEAF.—Cast on three stitches, knit, and purl alternate rows, increasing one stitch at the beginning of each row until the leaf is of the breadth desired (about seven stitches for the smallest, and fourteen or sixteen stitches for the largest); then knit and purl four rows without increase, and begin to decrease in every row, until you have but three stitches left, which knit as one, and fasten off. Sew a fine wire round the leaves, leaving a small bit at the end as a stalk, and also a fine wire doubled, at the back of the leaf, in the centre, which will keep it in shape.

Several shades and sizes of leaves are required, as also several buds and flowers, to form a handsome branch.

SMALL RETICULE OR PURSE, IN APPLICATION.

Materials.—A piece of cinnamon brown cloth, on which the design is laid in black velvet and blue cloth. Red braid, gold braid, and gold thread, passementerie tassel and slides, and cord to match.

This article consists of four pieces, on all of which the design is repeated; they are sewed together down the sides, and meet in a point. The black velvet is represented as black in the engraving; the lighter pattern is in blue cloth. Both are edged throughout with gold braid, laid on so as to conceal the part where the aplique and ground join. The braided patterns on the velvet and the blue cloth are done in red braid, edged with gold thread.

To make it, have four pieces of washleather, cut the same shape as the sides of the bag, and join them up; join up the bag also, put the lining in, and fasten it lightly down the seams. Turn in the edges at the top; sew them together, finish with a cord and small rings, covered with crochet, through which the strings are run.

Any other combination of colors may be used, care being taken that they harmonize sufficiently well.

THE MISS DINAH PEN-WIPER.

TAKE a black china baby about three inches high, dress it with three black cloth skirts, the third one the longest, and cut with the scissors into scallops, and with a thread drawn into flutes. Over these skirts is a bright scarlet velvet skirt ornamented with braid and beads, over that a short white silk skirt tied at the waist with a cord and tassel. A ribbon sash passes from the left shoulder to the right side of the waist. On the head is a turban gayly ornamented with feathers and flowers. The under cloth skirts are to be used for the pen-wiper.

ECONOMICAL PLANT PROTECTORS.

THE first and best method is to get a common garden frame, made of whatever size you think proper, either with one, two, or three lights; but, instead of having them glazed, as is the usual custom, have some cheap calico stretched upon the frame, quite tight, and afterwards made waterproof by means of a composition, directions for the making of which will be given further on; and for the plan see Fig. 1.

The next consists of six stakes, being driven into the ground in a circle, at equal distances from each other, and two hoops, whose size and diametrical proportions must depend entirely upon the extent of the plant or tree you desire to surround; one to be nailed within an inch of the top of the supports, the other about half way down, and afterwards covered with waterproof calico, as Fig. 2.

Fig. 1.

Fig. 2.

The third and last, though by no means the least important, is not a new idea, but equally useful in its way for square beds of plants. It consists of a sufficient number of arches, which may be formed with hoops from an old tub, which have opened, pointed at each end, and thrust into the ground at the extreme edges of the bed, at about eighteen inches apart all the way down. Then place a straight stick or lath on the top, and one on each side, about twelve inches from the ground; tie each arch securely to these sticks, and you will have a frame strong enough to hold the waterproof calico, taking care, however, that in both cases the material used as a covering reaches the ground, where it will have to be secured, as, without it is, the plants would be as well and better off without any covering at all; for you could but lose them, and you would be sure to do that if you neglected the above caution, and have the mortification of knowing you had taken the trouble to make a frame, which, for the want of a little forethought, failed to produce the effect desired, namely, the protection of your favorites.

To give them air and light you must contrive to have some portion of the coverings movable, for which purpose the top is preferable. Open these doors or windows, as I may term them, whenever the weather will permit, but close them at night, or, in fact, as often as you think there is any danger of their taking harm.

Here is a receipt for waterproof dressing which I have frequently used, and found efficacious: Get some thin cheap calico, and after having stretched in on your frames (or, if required, in a piece, on the ground) quite tight, then cover it, by means of a brush, with a composition made of two pints of pale old linseed oil, one ounce of sugar of lead, and four ounces of white resin. The sugar of lead is to be ground with a little of the oil, after which add the remainder and the resin, and mix these ingredients well together while warm.

In conclusion, permit me to hope these instructions will not only meet the requirements of many, but verify the old saying, "A penny saved is a penny earned."

CROCHET TIDY.

TO BE WORKED IN SQUARE CROCHET.

COUNT the number of squares in the extreme width and multiply by three, with the addition of one for the length of chain ; and then select a cotton which will bring the tidy to the size you require. In an oval tidy, you do not commence on a chain of the full length, but on one that will make the number of squares at the side. In this tidy, as there are twelve squares, thirty-seven chain must be made. Break off. In the next row, as there are six squares extra on each side, make a chain of eighteen, then work on the chain for the twelve close squares ; then finish with eighteen chain. Go on increasing in this way till the extreme width is obtained. To decrease, if by one square only, miss the first stitch of the last row, slip the next, single crochet the next, and double crochet the third. Reverse this to decrease at the end of the row. If two or more squares are to be decreased at each end, begin with the slip stitch over the second, third, or any other. Always work in the ends if possible. This tidy will be greatly strengthened and improved by a line of double crochet being worked entirely round it. A fringe trimming is the prettiest for round or oval tidies.

EMBROIDERY.

FANCY BASKETS.

VERY PRETTY ARTICLES FOR PRESENTS, OR FOR FANCY FAIRS.

Have a frame made of brass wire, and pass fancy ribbons in and out of the wire, as shown in the cut. The handle and sides of the basket can be ornamented by bows or rosettes of ribbon, as taste may dictate.

This basket is of willow; the double oval leaves which decorate the inside and bottom of the basket are pieces of red cloth cut out, ornamented with embroidery and chain-stitch in bright blue silk and sewed on. In the centre of these double leaves, and in the spaces which separate these pieces, are placed stars of white cloth, cut out and ornamented.

Receipts, &c.

TO MAKE MUFFINS AND CRUMPETS.

You must first provide yourself with an iron plate. This should be about eighteen inches square and three-quarters of an inch thick. The surface should be perfectly level and very smooth, though not polished. Muffin and crumpet makers generally have the plate (larger than that I have named, and circular) firmly imbedded in brickwork, with a furnace under it, such as is placed under a copper. You, however, need not go to this expense, as you can place your plate over the fire in your range, resting it on the hobs, taking care to have a fire clear at the top, that your articles may not be smoked. The fire should be made up with coke or cinders, and so regulated that the heat may not be too great. The exact degree of heat required you will soon be able to ascertain by experiments. You will ruin your muffins and crumpets, if you suffer them to be burnt. When the raw material is laid on the plate, it must be carefully watched and duly turned. This turning must be performed with dexterity by means of a knife somewhat resembling a painter's palette knife, only broader and longer, sufficiently thin to bend easily, and about sixteen inches in length.

Crumpets.—Make a batter thus: To two quarts of water, just lukewarm, add a quarter of a pint of good yeast, free from bitterness, and mix them intimately. Put to this as much flour as will make a thinnish batter, and put it in a warm situation for about six hours. Stir it well up with a broad, flat wooden spoon, and let it remain in the warmth three or four hours longer. Have ready some tin hoops of the size you wish your crumpets, and about half an inch deep. Next ascertain whether the iron plate is sufficiently hot, which it will be if, when you throw a pinch of dry flour upon it, it becomes brown. Lay as many of your hoops upon the hot plate as there is room for, say four, and with a small ladle pour a sufficient quantity of batter into each hoop. When the top is covered with little air bladders turn each crumpet dexterously over, tin and all, with your long knife, and bake for about five minutes longer. Observe carefully all that takes place during the baking of the first batch, and you will have no difficulty afterwards.

Crumpets may either be served up hot at the time they are made, or they may be made some time beforehand, and toasted when required for use. If you toast them, let both sides be made a pale brown, lay them on warm plates, and spread some soft butter lightly on each side. They should be toasted quickly, and it is best not to lay them upon one another, as that causes them to taste rather dourly.

Muffins.—Ordinary brewers' yeast may answer the purpose, if it be first strained through some bran to free it from its bitter taste. Put it in a quart of warm water, and mix in it as much flour as will make it a stiff batter. Place it in a warm situation for four hours, then stir it well down. Take up a portion of the batter, say a quarter of a pound, in a broad wooden spoon, in your left hand; and with your right hand, with a small wooden spoon, or with your hand, form it into a round, ball-like shape. Spread some flour, about half an inch deep, upon a pasteboard, and make a little round hollow for each of these balls. Cover them up with flannel, and let them remain two hours to prove. When your iron plate is sufficiently hot, as for crumpets, set the muffins upon it. When they have risen properly turn them over, and bake till they are sufficiently set.

Muffins are rarely used without toasting. Run the point of a sharp knife about a quarter of an inch deep along the outer edge of each, exactly in the middle. Then toast them, by holding them at such a distance from a clear-fronted fire that they may get hot through without burning. When toasted on both sides pull them open and place a thin layer of butter on each side; close them again, and cut each muffin separately with a sharp knife across the middle. File them lightly upon each other on a warm plate.

MISCELLANEOUS COOKING.

A NICE DINNER OR SUPPER.—Cold meat, especially if rather underdone, may be readily made into a savory dish, as follows: Cut the meat into slices, spread them out on a dish, and sprinkle them with pepper, salt, and flour. Chop an onion, and sprinkle that over also. Put the pieces into a deep dish, and add water in the proportion of a small teacupful to a pound of meat. Add, to make it more savory, a tablespoonful of vinegar or ketchup, or any gravy that may be in the house. Cover the whole with mashed potatoes, and put the dish in a side oven, if the family have one, or, if not, in a Dutch oven before the fire, about half an hour before meal-time. This will make a good dinner occasionally; or, for a working-man, who has to go out to work and does not get his dinner regularly, his wife will, no doubt, get smiles and commendations if she thus prepare a supper for him.

CHEAP RICE PUDDING.—Boil a pound of rice in three pints of water, till it is thoroughly soft. Stir in a small teaspoonful of powdered allspice, if agreeable, or a blade or two of cinnamon. It may then be served out in plates, and a little treacle poured over each, or, after the rice is soft, two tablespoonfuls of flour may be stirred into a pint of milk, and put into the rice and stirred up. Let it boil for a few minutes, and sweeten to taste with brown sugar.

POTATO SOUP MAIGRE.—Take some large, mealy potatoes; peel, and cut them into small slices, with an onion; boil them in three pints of water till tender, and then pulp them through a colander: add a small piece of butter, a little Cayenne pepper, and salt, and, just before the soup is served, two spoonfuls of good cream. The soup must not be allowed to boil after the cream has been put into it.

This will be found a most excellent soup, and, being easily and quickly made, is useful upon an emergency, when such an addition is suddenly required to the dinner.

MOCK TURTLE SOUP.—Scald and clean thoroughly a calf's head with the skin on; boil it gently an hour in four quarts of water, skimming it well. Take out the head, and when almost cold cut the meat off, and divide it into bits about an inch square.

Slice and fry of a light brown in butter two pounds of the leg of beef, and two pounds of veal, and five onions cut small, and two ounces of green sage. Add these to the liquor in which the head was boiled, also the bones of the head and trimmings, two whole onions, a handful of parsley, one teaspoonful of ground allspice, and two teaspoonfuls of black pepper, salt to your taste, and the rind of a lemon; let it simmer and stew gently for five hours; then strain it, and when cold take off the fat. Put the liquor into a clean stewpan, add the meat cut from the head, and for a gallon of soup add half a pint of Madeira wine, or claret, or the juice of a lemon made thick with pounded loaf-sugar; mix a spoonful of flour and a cup of butter with a little of the broth, and stir it in. Let it stir very gently till the meat is tender, which will be about an hour.

About twenty minutes before it is to be served, add a small teaspoonful of Cayenne, the yolks of eight or ten hard-boiled eggs, and a dozen forcemeat balls; some add the juice of a lemon. When the meat is tender the soup is done.

To make the meat balls, boil the brains for ten minutes, then put them in cold water; when cool, chop, and mix them with five spoonfuls of grated bread, a little grated nutmeg, pepper, salt, and thyme, and two eggs; roll the balls as large as the yolk of an egg, and fry them of a light brown in butter or good dripping.

Very good soup, in imitation of turtle, is also made from calves' feet; four of these boiled in two quarts of water till very tender, the meat taken from the bones, the liquor strained; a pint of good beef gravy and two glasses of wine added; seasoned as the calves' head soup, with hard eggs, balls, etc.

To CRISP PARSLEY.—Pick some bunches of young parsley, wash them, and swing them in a cloth to dry; put them on a sheet of paper in a toaster before the fire, and keep them frequently turned till they are quite crisp, which will be in about six or eight minutes.

To FRY PARSLEY.—When the parsley has been washed and thoroughly dried, throw it into lard or butter which is on the point to boil; take it up with a slice the instant it is crisp, and lay it on paper on a sieve before the fire.

FRIED BREAD FOR GARNISHING.—Take slices of stale bread about a third of an inch thick, cut them into shapes with a paste-cutter, fry them in fresh butter a light brown, lay them upon a cloth to dry, and place them round the dish. They may be made to adhere by brushing the under part with a little flour mixed with white of egg.

CHEESE STIRABOUT.—One pound of oatmeal, three ounces of salt, half a pound of cheese cut up, two table-spoonfuls of mustard, two gallons of water; add your oatmeal with the hand; stir it all the time.

HOMEMADE WINES.

To SWEETEN WINES.—To fifteen gallons of wine put half a pound of dry ground mustard-seed, and a small handful of clary flowers; put it in a linen bag, and sink it to the bottom of the cask.

GOOSEBERRY WINE.—Bruise the gooseberries with the hands in a tub; to every six pounds of fruit add a quart of cold spring water, stirring it thoroughly; let it stand twenty hours, then strain them; dissolve two pounds of sugar to every quart of water employed, let it remain another day, remove the scum very clearly, and pour it into the utensil or cask in which it is to remain previous to being bottled. The scum removed must be kept in flannel and the drainings caught in a vessel; they must be added to the other liquor. Let it work about sixty hours, not more, and then cover down close. In four months it will be ready for bottling.

GRAPE WINE.—To one gallon of grapes put one gallon of water; bruise the grapes, let them stand a week without stirring, then draw off, and fine. Put to a gallon of wine three pounds of sugar, put it in a vessel; but it must not be stopped till it has done hissing.

MULBERRY WINE.—Take mulberries that are quite ripe; gather them when the weather is fine, spread them on a cloth on the floor or table for twenty-four hours, and boil up a gallon of water to a gallon of juice; skim the water well, and add a little cinnamon, bruised. Add to every gallon six ounces of white sugar-candy, finely beaten, skim and strain the water when it is taken off and settled, and put to it the juice of the mulberries, and to every gallon of the mixture put a pint of white or Rhenish wine; let them stand six days in a cask to settle, then draw off the wine, and keep it cool. This is a very rich wine.

ORANGE WINE.—A dozen of oranges to a gallon of water and three pounds of loaf-sugar; pare the oranges thin, and take off all the white skin; squeeze them well, and then put out all the juice, oranges, and the water together, and let stand for four-and-twenty hours; then strain it off, and put it into a barrel with sugar, half the peels, and a quart of the best brandy; bung it down when it has done hissing; it must stand twelve months before it is bottled. The water must be cold, not boiled.

PARSNIP WINE.—Clean and quarter four pounds of parsnips, to which put one gallon of water; boil them till tender, drain them through a sieve, but do not bruise them; pour the liquor into a tub, and to each gallon add three pounds of lump sugar and half an ounce of crude tartar; when cool, put in the yeast, and let it stand four days in a warm room, then turn it. The mixture should be fermented in a temperature of sixty degrees. When fermentation has subsided, bung down the cask, and let it stand twelve months before bottling it. March and September are the best months for making it. It only requires to be kept a few years to make it superior to all other made wines.

RAISIN WINE.—One hundred of Smyrnas to twenty gallons of water (wine measure); boil half a pound of hops in the water for an hour, let it stand till cold, then pour it over the fruit; let it remain three weeks, stirring it every day; press it off, and put it into the cask; do not bung it down till the fermentation has ceased; when it has stood about a year, draw it off clear, put it in the barrel again, and let it stand to settle before it is bottled; before it is bunged down close put a quart of brandy to a hogshead of wine; what is thick should be run through a flannel bag. The time of steeping depends on the warmth of the weather. When the fruit is swelled ready to break, it is fit to press.

RASPBERRY WINE.—Take three pounds of raisins, wash, clean, and stone them thoroughly; boil two gallons of spring water for half an hour; as soon as it is taken off the fire pour it into a deep stone jar, and put in the raisins, with six quarts of raspberries and two pounds of loaf-sugar; stir it well together, and cover down closely, and set it in a cool place; stir it twice a day; then pass it through a sieve; put the liquor into a close vessel, adding one pound more loaf-sugar; let it stand for a day and a night to settle, after which bottle it, adding a little more sugar.

WALNUT WINE.—To one gallon of water put two pounds of brown sugar and a pound of honey, and boil them for half an hour; be careful to skim it clean; put into a tub a handful of walnut leaves to every gallon, and pour the liquor upon them; let it stand all night, then take out the leaves, and put in half a pint of yeast. Let it work fourteen days; beat it five times a day to take off its sweetness, and stop up the cask. It should stand six months before it is used.

BEDS AND BEDROOMS.

IN our present highly civilized state, we spend so large a portion of our time in bed (about one-third), even when in health, that it is of great importance for us to understand what is the best form, and material, and condition, of this place of repose. For healthy persons, it is undesirable to burn a fire or gaslight during the night: the former, while it burns briskly, promotes ventilation, by causing a current up the chimney; but very commonly, towards morning, it sinks low, and has not sufficient power to cause a draught, and is only a consumer of oxygen and a liberator of carbonic acid; such also is the gas-burner, unless there be a tube over it running into the chimney, and carrying off the noxious fumes. Most persons experience a sense of insecurity when they retire to rest with the bedroom door open, yet this is the safest condition in which to sleep as far as the health is concerned; the air is then constantly undergoing a change, and does not become vitiated, as in a confined space, where one or more persons, by breathing, are abstracting its vital principle. A light chain-bolt will answer the purpose of security, and enable the door to be kept ajar; or if this is objected to, the upper panels may have perforated zinc plates let into them or some other contrivance, by which open spaces can be left; this is sometimes done with bedroom windows, and it may be so managed, that the openings can be closed at pleasure. For the rest, have as few obstructions to the free passage of air as may be. Bedrooms are far too much encumbered by bed and window curtains, and other drapery; if people knew the inestimable value of a pure and frequently changed atmosphere, they would not wrap and inclose themselves as they do, shutting out their best friend, oxygen, and in their deadliest enemy, carbonic acid. Always let beds be stripped directly they are vacated, and the clothes thrown right off; unhealthy excretions are given off by all animal bodies in a heated state, and these must be dissipated as soon as possible, therefore open the window, and let the fresh breeze sweep through the room. Remove slops and dirty linen the first opportunity, and sweep out frequently, scattering tea-leaves to keep the dust from flying; do not wet the floor in damp weather, but when it is fine and dry, this should occasionally be done, early in the morning, that it may be perfectly dry by night.

THE TOILET.

THE EYES.

THE eye, when in health, requires very simple attention, bathing with cold or tepid water being all that is needful. It is, however, so delicate an organ that external causes easily affect it and impair its beauty. Too strong a light fatigues the eyes, and exposure to currents of air, long-continued application, or night watchings are equally injurious to them. In evening occupation, extreme care should be taken in the management of the light, which should be considerably above the eyes, so that the glare may not shine into them. Inflammation of the eyelid, accompanied by irritation, may be speedily reduced by holding it over the steam of boiling water. It sometimes happens that the glands of the eye secrete too abundantly, and become glued together during the night; in which case the following preparation will be found useful: Chamomile tea, moderately strong, with a little brandy, in the proportion of a tablespoonful of the latter to a small cup of the tea; the eye should be bathed frequently with this mixture, and at night, before retiring to rest, a little ointment, composed of sweet oil and white wax, should be carefully applied to the edges of the eyelids with a fine camel-hair pencil. When reading or other exercise of the eyes has been too long continued, an aching sensation is felt just above them; a piece of linen doubled several times and steeped in equal parts of vinegar and rose-water will give relief. Persons who suffer from weak eyes will derive great benefit by dropping into them two or three drops of cold spring water several times in the twenty-four hours. A small lump of sugar saturated with eau de cologne, and slowly dissolved in the mouth, will give temporary brilliancy to the eyes.

The eyelashes contribute greatly to the beauty of the eye; in early youth they are generally thick and long, but, owing to neglect, they soon break and wear off. As they not only impart a soft and pleasing expression to the eye, but protect and preserve it, their growth should be encouraged, and for this purpose they should be clipped every four or five weeks; by this means they will acquire strength, and will soon become long and luxuriant. One or more eyelashes sometimes grow inwards and irritate the eye; it may be possible to train them in a proper direction with a camel-hair pencil dipped in gum-water, otherwise they should be cautiously extracted by a surgeon. The eyebrows have a great influence on the character of the face; Le Brun regarded them as the most certain interpreter of the sentiments. Their shape may be improved by judicious management, but artificial applications always give an unnatural and disagreeable effect; they may be rendered soft and compact by the use of a little pomade and smoothing them closely together with the fingers. A well-formed eye should neither be too open nor too closed; the almond shape is the most beautiful. The Chinese have a method of elongating the oval of the eye by drawing out or extending the eyelid at the external angle, and by constant repetitions of this slight operation they obtain the almond shape, which they esteem essential to beauty.

Opinion, fortunately, differs as regards the color of the eyes; some prefer blue, with its various shades of violet and gray; others black, brown, or hazel. One person will admire black eyes, as possessing more fire and brilliancy, while another will exclaim—

"Je n'aime pas les yeux noirs
Qui ferment disent, I will make war,
Mais j'aime les doux yeux bleux
Qui doucement disent, I do love you."

Black eyes announce an impassioned and ardent temperament. Physiognomists also attribute to them a greater degree of sincerity than to any other color. In blue eyes we recognize a tender, mild, and timid organization, but in some of their lighter shades they are not always to be trusted. Byron used to say, "Never put faith in a gray eye." Every eye which is healthy and without positive blemish or defect is capable of beauty, although in shape and color it may be far from perfect.

The eyes are the interpreters of our affections and our thoughts; theirs is a language universally understood, persuasive and emphatic, penetrating to the inmost recesses of the soul. They express and communicate with unequalled rapidity emotions the most tumultuous, sentiments the most delicate; they obey every moral impression, betray every shade of feeling. There is the timid glance of modesty, the bold stare of insolence, the warm glow of passion, the glassy look of indifference, the light of intellect and genius, the leaden gaze of stupidity, the calm serenity of innocence, the open frankness of candor, the furtive look of hypocrisy. Courage, benevolence, despair, joy, pity, fear, love—these are but a few of the passions and sentiments which they are capable of portraying. Those eyes are the most beautiful which express the finest feelings, which yield testimony to a noble and loving nature.

MISCELLANEOUS.

PROPERTIES OF CHARCOAL.—Among the properties of charcoal may be mentioned its power of destroying smell, taste, and color; and as a proof of its possessing the first quality, if it be but rubbed over putrid meat, the bad smell will be destroyed. If a piece of charcoal be thrown into putrid water, the putrid flavor is destroyed, and the water is rendered comparatively fresh. The sailors are aware of this fact, and when the water at sea is bad, are in the habit of throwing pieces of burnt biscuit in it to rectify it. Again, color is materially influenced by charcoal, and, in numbers of instances, in a very singular way. There are numerous applications of this property of charcoal to useful purposes in the arts; if you take a dirty black syrup, such as molasses, and filter it through burnt charcoal, the color will be removed. There are some properties in charcoal which appear to be mechanical rather than anything else; but for the purpose just mentioned, the charcoal of animal matter appears to be the best. You may learn the influence of charcoal in destroying color, by filtering a bottle of port wine through it; it will lose a great portion of its color in the first filtration, and become tawny; and after repeating the process two or three times, you may destroy its color altogether. It is a very hygroscopic substance, and therefore absorbs air and moisture in considerable quantity: it therefore increases in weight, on exposure to air after burning.

FACTS ABOUT MILK.—Cream cannot rise through a great depth of milk. If milk is therefore desired to retain its cream for a time, it should be put into a deep narrow dish; and if it be desired to free it most completely of cream, it should be poured into a broad, flat dish, not much exceeding one inch in depth. The evolution of cream is facilitated by a rise, and retarded by a depression of temperature. In wet and cold weather the milk is less rich than in dry and warm; and on that account more cheese is obtained in cold than in warm, though not in thunder weather. The season has its effects—the milk in the spring is supposed to be best for calves, in summer it is best suited for cheese, and in autumn the butter keeping better than that of summer. Cows less frequently milked than others give rich milk, and consequently much better. The morning's milk is richer than the evening's. The last drawn milk of each milking, at all times and seasons, is richer than the first drawn, which is the poorest.

METHOD OF ASCERTAINING THE STATE OF THE LUNGS.—Persons desirous of ascertaining the true state of their lungs are directed to draw in as much breath as they conveniently can; they are then to count as far as they are able, in a slow and audible voice, without drawing in more breath. The number of seconds they can continue counting must be carefully observed. In a consumption, the time does not exceed ten, and is frequently less than six seconds; in pleurisy and pneumonia it ranges from nine to four seconds. When the lungs are in a sound condition, the time will range as high as from twenty to thirty-five seconds.

FURNISHING.—It is a great mistake to crowd a room, and it is also an extravagance which brings no good return. In Paris apartments appear to much more advantage at much less cost. Looking-glasses are usually fixtures in the salons of rooms, thus preventing dilapidations of the walls on removal. If in beginning life the money often so disadvantageously spent in articles that encumber, rather than improve a dwelling, were deposited for accumulation, with such after-additions as were found practicable, the foundations of future independence would often be laid.

WASHING LACE.—The following method of washing lace, lace collars, or crochet collars, not only makes them look well, but saves much of the wear and tear of other washing: Cover a glass bottle with calico or linen, and then tack the lace or collar smoothly upon it; rub it with soap, and cover it with calico. Boil it for twenty minutes in soft water; let it all dry together, and the lace will be found ready for use. A long piece of lace must be wound round and round the bottle, the edge of each round a little above the last, and a few stitches to keep it firm at the beginning and end will be found sufficient, but a collar will require more tacking to keep it in its place.

THE USE OF SILK.—Silk is an agreeable and healthy material. Used in dress, it retains the electricity of our bodies; in the drapery rooms and furniture covers, it reflects the sunbeams, giving them a quicker brilliancy, and it heightens colors with a charming light. It possesses a cheerfulness of which the dull surfaces of wool and linen are destitute. It promotes cleanliness, and will not readily imbibe dirt. Its continually growing use by men, accordingly, is beneficial in many ways.

CHAPPED HANDS.—Borax, two scruples; glycerine, half an ounce; mix in three-quarters of a pint of boiling water, and use morning and evening.

TO KILL FLIES.—Two drachms of extract of quassia, dissolve in half a pint of boiling water. Sweeten with a little brown sugar, and pour on plates.

CASTOR OIL POMADE.—Castor oil, eight ounces; best lard, four ounces; white wax, four drachms; bergamot, four drachms; oil of lavender, forty drops. Melt the lard down in a pipkin, and on cooling add the castor oil, stirring the whole well; then add the bergamot and oil of lavender. You can increase or decrease the above in equal proportions at pleasure.

VARNISH FOR MAPS AND PICTURES.—Put equal parts of Canada balsam and turpentine into a bottle, which place in a warm situation, and shake frequently for about a week, the varnish will be then fit for use. The picture or map must first have a coat or two of thin isinglass or gum arabic, which should be perfectly dry before the varnish is applied.

TO CEMENT BROKEN CHINA.—Beat lime into the most impalpable powder; sift it through fine muslin; then tie some into a thin muslin, put on the edges of the broken china some white of egg, then dust sometime quickly on the same, and unite them exactly.

SWEET BUTTERMILK.—Take the milk from the cow in a large wide-mouthed bottle. In ten minutes begin shaking it till flakes of butter swim about and the milk looks thin and blue; strain it through a sieve, and drink as often as the stomach will bear. This must form the whole of the patient's diet, eating with it roasted apples and ripe fruit. Keep in a cool place, and it must not taste in the least sour when taken.

BEAUTY, AND HOW TO GAIN IT.

PART SECOND.

"What is good-looking but looking good?"

THE action of the emotions upon the lines of the face is constant; the consequent impression indelible. Ill-humor, unkindness, egotism as regularly and certainly deform the faces of those who harbor them as the most industrious and pains-taking artist can, with repeated strokes of his pencil, portray the hideous image. Indeed, the operations of nature being more steady and certain than those of man, the effects of evil passions produce countenances more forbidding than human art can possibly delineate.

No matter how bright the eye, if unkindness and envy frown through it; no matter how perfect the mouth when discontent and scorn have moulded its expression! The fine tints of the skin, most fleeting of feminine charms, how speedily these take their flight when gusts of passion disturb the animal economy, or eager appetite overloads the stomach.

On the other hand, whether the eyes be black, blue, or gray, large or small, when softened by amiable feelings and brightened by good-humor, they never fail to charm. The face speaking sense and gentleness is pleasing, even pretty, whatever may be its outline.

When Louis the Fourteenth was young, he one day said to the Duc de Morthemar, a man of remarkable conversational powers, "Of what use is reading?"

"It does for my mind, sire, what good dinners do for my complexion."

This duke had a very bright color in his cheeks. His remark was as true as it was witty; and it may be added that those brilliant, well-nurtured minds give a beauty to the feminine face that is particularly valuable because it is lasting. When the poet spoke of "The mind, the music breathing from her face,"

he indicated a charm that is not fleeting with the spring of life, but which accompanies its owner into the autumn of years, ay, even to the winter of old age.

And now we will let our young friend go on with her story:—

REVERIES OF A MAIDEN OF NINETEEN.

How fastidious Cousin Eustace is! He desires beauty and perfection in everything. How plain I must appear in his eyes, and how imperfect in every way! I feel this when he looks at me. How I wish I could emerge from this chrysalis existence, and put on wings of beauty and brightness!

Everard is handsome; to my eyes he is a perfect specimen of manly beauty. And then he is so good, so frank and intelligent, too! How happy he will make the woman he loves, if she is capable of appreciating him! But how high above all others must the woman be who calls forth his deepest, truest love! I do not believe such a girl would be easy to find. How superior he seems to every one! But then, if there were not so much imperfection in the world, perfection would not look so beautiful. I am sure I have never seen any one that I thought united so many good, and noble, and attractive qualities as Everard. Ah! well, he is too far above me or anything I can ever hope to reach for me to think of him. Yet how happy it would make me to know that I could render myself worthy of being loved by him!

There is nothing makes one so attractive as amiability—true and genuine, not a simpering, affected softness; that is more displeasing than downright open ill-nature, for it implies hypocrisy. If we indulge unamiable, envious, revengeful feelings, they will grow continually stronger, till they overcome our better natures, as weeds choke and wither the flowers.

Ill-temper is a great disfigurer of beauty—almost as bad as the smallpox. A shrew wears an expression stamped in that will betray her, although she "may smile and smile." The voice, too, partakes of the sharp qualities of her temper, and even her very motions, for that matter; they are all of a piece. She is angular every way, and when she endeavors to put on an appearance of amiability, how easily we can see through it!

Shams will never do, if we wish to please; it is much more troublesome to support them than it is to attain reality. Besides, it is irksome to be always on guard lest the real quality of the mind and temper should peep out somewhere. Aunt Eustace says it is more trouble to hide our faults than it would be to overcome them, if we would only try it. Then hiding faults don't answer the purpose, either, for if people don't see, they will feel them.

But I was reckoning up the beautifiers. Love is a beautifier—not only love for our friends, but love for all good and beautiful things in nature and morals. There is another kind of love that beautifies more than all. The consciousness of being loved will heighten beauty sometimes, even if the admiration does not come from those we love. I suppose it is not very disagreeable to any one to be admired; to be sure I do not know much about it from experience, but I must plead guilty to being a little curious to know the sensation that this admiration produces. Perhaps I shall come to the knowledge some day, else why this strong desire to be beautiful and beloved?

Uncle Eustace thinks that Everard admires Jane Austen; he has imagination enough, uncle says, to invest her with the high qualities he would desire her to possess. And she would not be likely to dispel the illusion, as I should, by some inharmonious action, supposing it were possible for him to get up a fancy in regard to me.

Somehow I can never fancy him loving Jane Austen. Yet love has strange freaks sometimes; even such a piece of still life as she may serve for a high-souled man to wrap his affections about. I must set these thoughts aside. The matter of self-improvement ought to occupy my mind now; and, as the first step towards it, I will banish vain imaginations.

I must put together systematically all the knowledge I have gained that will help me to attain the excellence I am seeking, and then deduce from it a set of rules for the regulation of my habits, mental, moral, and physical; and then I must, I WILL endeavor to live up to them, regularly, earnestly, that I may obtain beauty, goodness, and happiness, for these all lie along the same path.

I mean to be thorough in this matter, and to collect all the aid I can from books, from observing others, and noting the operations of my own mind, also the effects of various physical habits.

Who knows but I may collect such a mass of valuable facts as to be able to write a book, and give my experience to help others'—at least, I may write for the Lady's Book. But I am afraid it would not be of much account; people have more knowledge now than they put to good use. Perhaps this happens because they do not see the whole, and the various relations between cause and effect do not strike them as important. I must make my teachings very plain.

And first I must try to remedy the defects in my own habits and character; doing right by fits and starts will never effect much change. I think I have some natural advantages, as they are called, but these are constantly growing less, instead of increasing. Here I have lived nineteen years, and my life has been almost a blank. I wonder if the next nineteen years will not be better filled. We are blind gropers in our own darkness, sure enough.

But a little light has dawned. I have gained self-knowledge and strength of purpose during the two last years. I have read books for instruction, and found interest in them, positively more engrossing than my former books of light literature—very light, indeed—ever gave me. I never found living at random pleasant, at all, and I am convinced that we never do enjoy real happiness till we live in the way that is right, and endeavor to do right.

Aunt Eunice says I have improved. I wish I knew what Everard thinks.

(Conclusion next month.)

TO H. VETHAKE TOTTEN.

How shall I weave my sorrow into verse?

Too fast and free the bitter teardrops swell,

Too poor and feeble will the sad strain seem,

For I have loved thee all too long and well.

Yet, O thou loved and lost! by all the hours

That we have passed in sweet commune together,

I fain would bind a tribute wreath for thee,

Although the pallid buds at once should wither.

I never dreamed that thou wert early doomed,

For thou wert born for deeds of high renown;

How often I, with all a sister's pride,

Have claimed for thee the future's laurel crown!

I knew how pure and noble was thy heart,

I knew the intellect thy white brow shined,

And scarce could tell which most my love had won,

Thy gentle goodness or thy noble mind.

Yet not for thee we sorrow, O beloved!

For not in darkness sunk thy sun at noon;

Ah, God knew best for thee, thou pure of heart!

And crowned thy bright youth with no earthly boon.

Forget me not, if heaven's stainless ones

May e'er by earthly memories be moved;

Remember her who, as a sister weeps,

Proud to have known thee, prouder to have loved.

And in my heart there dwells a vacant shrine,

Gone is its idol—it can know no other;

No form of earth thy vacant place can fill,

Who could replace thee, O beloved brother!

LUCY H. HOOPER.

WOMEN WHOSE NAMES WILL LIVE.

Two deaths have recently occurred, one in England, one in America, that deserve a record in our Book.

MRS. CATHERINE GRACE FRANCES GORE, wife of Captain Gore, of the British Life Guards, died on the last day of January, 1861. Mrs. Gore, well known throughout our reading land, by her fascinating novels, was born 1799. Her first work, "Theresa Marchmont," was published 1821. Since that time she has written between sixty and seventy different works—novels, poems, and plays, making, in all, over 200 volumes; and, the London Times says, that "in all these volumes there is scarcely to be found one dull page."

The same journal, after many testimonies to her wonderful readiness of composition, and mental power, and judgment, says: "Mrs. Gore's wit was inexhaustible. For the most part it took the form of simile; but her comparisons were so subtle, and her allusions so swift, that she kept the reader's attention at a high level of activity. And then for the matter—it was interesting while it was new, and it will be interesting again when it is old. Some future Macaulay will turn to her pages for a perfect picture of life as we find it now in the upper crust of society." She was truly a lady of society as well as of learning, "one of the most brilliant women of her time, whose talk overflowed with epigram and jest, and whose commonplace remarks were more witty than the best wit of others." She was a woman of Genius.

MISS MARY P. TOWNSEND, of Boston, Massachusetts, died about the first of January, 1861. She was sister of Miss Eliza Townsend, author of some remarkable poetry, among which was the noble lyric entitled "The Incomprehensibility of God;" a poem pronounced by eminent critics equal to the best poems of Wordsworth, Coleridge, or Bryant. These two sisters, with their only brother, Alexander Townsend, Esq., lived together in opulent singlehood all their lives, devoted to each other, to literature, and works of benevolence.

Mary P. Townsend was the last of the family, and her last Will has lately been published, showing the character of her mind, and proving her thoughtful care to do all the good in her power. Her name has never appeared on the title-pages of books, but it will, henceforth, be deeply graven in many thankful hearts.

The first bequest in her will was to the "Home for the relief of single, indigent women in Boston." She says, in her testament, that "she belongs to the sisterhood, and is in duty bound, as far as she has the means, to procure them a shelter from the 'world's dread laugh,' and a quiet home." The recipients are to be such as are reduced by poverty, not crime; to be Americans and born of American parents.

For the benefit of these single women Miss Townsend devised $20,000 to enlarge the "Home," and $60,000 to be applied for the support of the charity. Then she divided about $30,000 among various religious and benevolent societies; and left $20,000 to Harvard College for the benefit of indigent scholars. Her brother was educated at that college, and had always been a benefactor to struggling genius. Thus we see that to promote learning and piety among all, and contribute to the particular comfort and happiness of those of her own sex who find life a lonely and stony pilgrimage, were the good works she planned and strove to accomplish. She was a woman of Benevolence.

EXAMPLE: WHAT IT TEACHES.—The sketches we have given of these two eminent ladies do not imply they are to be patterns for their sex in those particulars which distinguished themselves.

Mrs. Gore was gifted with extraordinary genius; Miss Townsend inherited great wealth. These were talents committed to them, which not many women possess in like degree. But what they did with their ten talents all other women may do with their five, or two, or even one talent: improve what they have.

Industry is the good fairy that gives the great reward; Idleness is the wicked elf that robs us of time, disturbs our plans of improvement, and destroys our high-built hopes of doing good or great things.

Industry it was that gave Mrs. Gore her world-wide fame. Had she folded her fair hands in listless indolence she would never have written 200 volumes. If she had not studied and worked hard, notwithstanding her wit and genius, she would never have been heard of beyond her own circle.

Miss Townsend practised, through a very long life, care for the happiness of others, which her dying testament embalmed. She had thought, prayed, and worked to do good. Work, then, is the lesson these ladies have left as their legacy to all women.

WORK! WHAT WORK SHALL WE DO?—This is the question often propounded to us by young ladies, and even older ones, who have the means of living provided for them, and have more time on their hands than is needed for home duties and their own individual improvement and enjoyment. There are thousands of such women found, especially in our large cities. "What shall we do?" is their earnest question.

We tell them of Associated Charities (and shall have more to say on these domestic missions); of providing Homes and culture for the poor and destitute little ones, and Hospitals for Sick Children; of patriotic efforts, like the purchase of Mount Vernon; of Missions for the instruction and salvation of women in heathen lands. Many an earnest-hearted Florence Nightingale might be found in our wide land, longing for an opportunity of active work in the noble cause of humanity. To these we say, work in the best way that offers; do not wait for special opportunities or a great occasion. Do what your hands find to do with faithfulness and perseverance, and you will be in the path that leads to happiness for a woman, whether you have or have not the talents to achieve eminence.

"MISSION CRUMBS.* First number. For the Women's Union Mission Society of America to Heathen Lands." New York. January, 1861. This interesting little work will be devoted to Mrs. Mason's Mission and the School for Girls at Tungshoo, Burmah. We hope our friends will obtain this quarterly pamphlet (price three cents per copy), which will give them more information than we have room to insert. The plan of collecting money for the Mission is succeeding well. Many "Mission Bands" are formed, each pledging twenty dollars a year for five years, when it is expected the School and Mission will become self-supporting.

One dollar a year makes a member.

Twenty dollars, collected or given, a manager.

* To be had of Miss Doremus, Secretary of the W. U. Missionary Society, care of Doremus & Nixon, 21 Park Place, New York. Or send two three-cent stamps to Mrs. Hale, Lady's Book, Philadelphia, and the pamphlet, with a circular, will be forwarded.

Fifty dollars, collected or given, makes a patron.

We have the following names and gifts to record for this month:—

Ladies of Philadelphia (by the hand of Mrs. Stevens), $20. Contributed by Mrs. J. E. Gould, Mrs. George Junkin, Miss Sessions, Mrs. G. S. Benson, Mrs. Morris Patterson, Mrs. John McArthur, Jr., Mrs. M. Bullach, Miss A. Bullach, Mrs. H. West, Mrs. Field, Miss S. Field, Mrs. H. Collier, Mrs. E. C. Grant, Mrs. Henry M. Fuller, Mrs. H. D. Sherrerd, Mrs. S. A. Mercer, Mrs. Anna R. Howell, Mrs. C. O. Abbey, Mrs. Martha Manderson, Mrs. J. E. P. Stevens (collector), one dollar each, pledged by these ladies for five years, making their Pastor's wife, Mrs. William P. Breed, Philadelphia, Honorary Manager.

Mrs. E. Ravenscroft, Suspension, Ala., $1.

Mrs. L. S. Goodwin, Boston, Mass., $2.

Mrs. A. H. Worthen, Lynn, Mass., $1.

GOOD LISTENERS.—Coleridge, who was a man of genius and knowledge, was glad of opportunities of display. Being a good talker, he liked to find a good listener; he admitted it, and told an anecdote of a very talkative Frenchman, who was introduced to a dumb lady. The Frenchman went on talking and the lady seemed to listen very attentively, never, of course, offering to put in a word. When the Frenchman afterwards met the friend who had introduced him, he expressed his obligations for bringing him acquainted with such an agreeable and intelligent woman. He was much astonished and mortified when told that she was dumb. An agreeable listener is the pleasantest companion for an egotist.

MISS S. J. HALE'S BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES, 1826 RITTENHOUSE SQUARE, PHILADELPHIA.

This school is designed to give a thorough and liberal English education, to furnish the best facilities for acquiring the French language, and the best instruction in music and the other accomplishments. The moral training and the health and physical development of the scholars are carefully attended to.

JNO. STAINBACK WILSON, M. D.

FEMALE PHYSICIANS.—We learn from our medical exchanges that there is a considerable stir in the profession just at this time about the medical education of women, and their admission to the rights, privileges, and honors of physicians. The Pennsylvania State Medical Society, and Philadelphia County Society have passed resolutions refusing their members consultation with female physicians.

The Montgomery County Medical Society of the same State objects to the course taken in reference to "medical sisters," by those societies. Dr. B. Dowler, of the New Orleans Medical and Surgical Journal, in an article of some length, advocates the woman side of the question dividing the profession in Pennsylvania. He says: "As there is no sex in science, so there is no ethical code by which competent women as physicians must be excluded from the pale of the profession solely on account of their gender."

The Atlanta (Ga.) Med. and Surg. Journ., from which the above extract is taken, gives its opinion thus: "We think this matter comes before society in general. If public opinion tolerates the practice of medicine by a woman, and decides that all the duties of a physician will comport with the proper grace, modesty, and gentle bearing of ladies, it is all that is necessary to give them a place in the profession. As a member of social society, we say that when women seek the position of physicians they leave the sphere of greatness nature designed them to move in, and in which society desires them to remain. As a medical man, we look to the capability, honesty, and uprightness of those who ask admission into the profession. We say let woman doctors alone, and they will soon learn the error of their way, if an error it be, and return to their domestic and literary greatness."

Now as a member of society, and as a "medical man," we claim the privilege of having our say in this matter. We boldly and unhesitatingly declare ourself on the side of the "medical sisters." Seven years since, and before this thing was agitated to any extent in the medical profession, we wrote an article for the Southern Med. and Surg. Journ. of Augusta Ga. (see Southern Med. and Surg. Journ. for 1854) advocating the education of women for the practice of certain branches of medicine. In that article we contend that the mental capacity of woman is fully equal to the acquisition of all necessary medical knowledge, while her tact, promptitude, intuitive quickness of perception, and delicacy of touch give her great advantage, and render her peculiarly fitted for the practice of midwifery; the Bible name of the profession proving it to belong to woman.

"The moral or psychologic adaptation of woman (quoting from the article) needs no proof; all who have been so fortunate as to receive the kind ministrations of a mother, sister, or wife, in sickness and distress, will respond with a warm heart to the simple self-evident declaration that woman is peculiarly qualified by nature for the relief of the afflicted of her own sex, by touching the tender chords of sympathy in a sister heart which vibrates responsive to her own."

Besides the mental capacity, the manual dexterity, and moral fitness of woman, we contend that she has a great advantage over man in diagnosing disease, or determining its nature, because she has a feeling know- ledge. If we mistake not, there is an old saw which runs thus: "Seeing is believing, but feeling is knowing." Who will pretend to say that a woman is not more competent than the opposite sex to comprehend the diagnostic value of certain symptoms and sensations originating in the feminine constitution when she has felt those sensations which are peculiar to her as a woman, and which render her such an enigma to those who have only an intellectual or theoretical knowledge of her peculiarities in health and disease?

Woman, then, being mentally, morally, and physically suited for the practice of medicine, it follows that she has a natural right, by virtue of her natural qualifications. The only question for us to consider, then, is whether it is necessary and proper that she should exercise this right, and to what extent.

First, as to the extent, we will only say that woman being naturally incapacitated for the general practice of medicine, while she is eminently fitted to minister to her own sex and to children, she will, from the very nature of things, be confined to a class of diseases in which her services are most needed, and which will not conflict in the smallest degree with that "grace, modesty, and gentle bearing" about which our Atlanta editor appears to be so solicitous. As to the propriety and necessity of having feminine physicians for women and children there cannot be a moment's doubt; the safety, the happiness, the very salvation of the most refined and lovely women imperatively demand that they should have one of their own sex who is properly educated and competent to treat their peculiar diseases. The education of women for the treatment of women is the only remedy for concealment and irremediable disease on the one hand, and the malpractice of uneducated women on the other. And while the necessity for female physicians for children is not so pressing as in the case of women themselves, the advantages of educated women to treat the ailments of children must be manifest to every one.

Now the question is: Shall the medical profession, through the influence of selfishness, professional pride, an under estimate of the capacity of woman, false notions as to her social position and duties, or any other motive, oppose her enjoyment of those honors and privileges which are universally conceded to all honorable educated physicians?

It cannot be denied that women physicians would divide the practice, and thus render it less lucrative than it is now for men. But, admitting that the profits would be diminished, there would be a corresponding diminution of labor, which would give the male practitioner more time for study and reflection, and thus enable him to cultivate more successfully the vast field of general practice committed to his special care and guardianship. But granting that no personal or professional advantage could arise that would afford an adequate compensation for the pecuniary loss, we would still contend that the claims of suffering humanity and the good of our race ought to be sufficient to banish all mercenary influences from the ranks of the noble and philanthropic profession to which we belong. And we would add that the profession, by taking the initiative in the medical education of women, regardless of all selfish considerations, would re-establish its ancient renown, and win for itself benedictions more grateful to every pure and generous heart than all the gold of Ophir.

At some future time we will have something to say on professional pride and some other points connected with this great and most interesting subject—the medical education of woman. At present we can only add that Dr. Dowler, the Montgomery County Medical Society, and the friends of this movement are right: those who oppose are wrong, and their opposition will prove futile, for the native modesty of woman, and the advanced civilization and refinement of the nineteenth century imperatively require that woman should be properly qualified for giving medical attention to her own sex, and the requisition will be met in spite of all opposition.

Prudence and honor, then, as well as the dictates of philanthropy and humanity, should so far prevail with physicians as to induce them to cease, forever cease their fruitless attempts to stifle the voice of Nature as she pleads in melting tones through woman—"Give me one of my own sex to minister at my bedside in sickness and in my time of trouble!"

BOOKS BY MAIL.—Now that the postage on printed matter is so low, we offer our services to procure for our subscribers or others any of the books that we notice. Information touching books will be cheerfully given by inclosing a stamp to pay return postage.

When ordering a book, please mention the name of the publisher.

From T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

A MESSAGE FROM THE SEA; and THE UNCOMMERCIAL TRAVELLER. By Charles Dickens (Boz). Complete in one volume. The general business depression which has been felt throughout the country, occasioned by recent political events, has not failed to extend to the publishing business as well as to others. Hence we have not to chronicle the issue of the usual number of new books. The Messrs. Peterson, however, seem not to have suspended in any noticeable degree their usual activity. Nor is there any reason why they should do so. The publications issued from their house are always of a class that must find a sale. These publications are usually the works of standard or well known authors, which are published in editions of every style and binding, and which, though not perhaps of the sensational school, are yet such as always are and always will be in demand. Belonging to this class is the book whose title we have given above. Dickens is one of the most popular, and, at the same time, one of the best of English novelists. His stories are so widely read that his very name is "familiar as household words." The volume of which we speak is uniform with Peterson's Library Edition of his works, and contains his two latest tales for Christmas and the New Year. We have already given them a notice as they appeared in another form of binding. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1 25.

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

HISTORY OF THE UNITED NETHERLANDS: From the Death of William the Silent to the Synod of Dort. With a Full View of the English-Dutch Struggle against Spain, and of the Origin and Destruction of the Spanish Armada. By John Lothrop Motley, LL. D., D. C. L., Corresponding Member of the Institute of France, author of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic." In two volumes. This is a work following the History of the Rise of the Dutch Republic, by the same author; taking up the course of events at the period when that work closes, and pursuing them for the space of several years. These events are recorded in their most minute particulars, the character and appearance of persons participating in them are closely drawn, and every fact of sufficient importance to claim a place in history is detailed and dwelt upon in all its bearings. Although narrating the occurrences of very few years, so full and comprehensive is this work that it includes two large octavo volumes. Price, cloth, $4 00; sheep, $4 50; half calf, $6 00.

THE WITS AND BEAUX OF SOCIETY. By Grace and Philip Wharton, authors of "The Queens of Society." With illustrations from Drawings by H. K. Browne and James Godwin. Engraved by the Brothers Dalziel. This is a companion book to "The Queens of Society," which has preceded it. There are within its pages graphic sketches of noted individuals of the past and present centuries, witty anecdotes and humorous descriptions. The first character with which the reader is entertained is George Villiers, second Duke of Buckingham; and afterward follow among others, Sheridan, Beau Brummell, Theodore Hook, and Sydney Smith, any one of which forming the only subject of a volume would be a sufficient guarantee of its readableness. Price $1 50.

THE CHILDREN'S BIBLE PICTURE-BOOK. Illustrated with eighty engravings. This elegantly illustrated volume concludes the series of four, of which the preceding three, "The Picture-Book of Quadrupeds," "The Picture-Book of Birds," "The Picture Fable Book," have been already noticed. This, as well as the others, is well suited to entertain and instruct those for whom it is designed.

From ROBERT M. DE WITT, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

HARRY HARSON: or, The Benevolent Bachelor. By John T. Irving (nephew of Washington Irving). The story is well told, with occasional little ebullitions of wit and originality, which atone in part for its defects. The interest never flags, from beginning to end; and one finishes the perusal of it with the thought that, though the "nephew of Washington Irving" has not yet added fresh laurels to the bright name he bears, there is still a possibility that he may do so.

From RUDD & CARLETON, New York, through PETERSON & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

PAMPINEA, and other Poems. By Thomas Bailey Aldrich. We have received this little volume of poems which is from the pen of one of our younger American poets, who not only gives great promise for the future, but has in the past and present produced something worthy of praise. Two previous volumes of poems have been given to the world by him; one, "The Ballad of Babie Bell, and other poems;" the other, "The Course of True Love never did Run Smooth;" while the third and present one possesses all the characteristics of simplicity and poetic beauty of its predecessors. His works are stamped with the true mark of genius, and he is destined to take his place among the first poets of our country. Price 75 cents.

From FISHER & BROTHER, Philadelphia:—

POETRY OF THE BIBLE AND PARABLES OF JESUS. In Rhyme. By Silas Sexton Steele. With eight illustrations. Though we cannot commend very highly the poetical merits of this little book, it is nevertheless attractive in appearance, and will find many admirers among the little folks. Price 12 cents.

THE EVERGREEN MINIATURE LIBRARY: Contains twelve volumes, done up in handsome style, gilt edged, ornamented covers, and many illustrations, making a "love of a library" for children, which grown people may read with profit. Each little book is a gem of devotional, historical, or poetical literature. We wish this "Evergreen" could be set in every family.

From the Author, New York, through J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia:—

A VOICE FROM THE NEWSBOYS. Here we have a novelty at least: the story of John Morrow, a young boy but sixteen years old, written by himself. He "has been on his own hook for the last six years as a newsboy, match peddler, bookseller, and dealer in stationery, dry-goods, hardware, etc.," and has now written an account of his life, the truth of which is vouched for by many well known and responsible persons in New York city who are acquainted with him personally, for the purpose of raising funds for his own education. An eminent professor, speaking of the book, says: "Its statements may be relied upon as entirely truthful. The benevolent, to whom it may be offered, may feel sure that they do a kind deed in buying it." Orders may be sent to Johnny Morrow, care of A. S. Barnes & Burr, Nos. 51 and 53 John Street, New York.

From CASSELL, POTTER, & GALPIN, New York:—

CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY BIBLE. Parts 23, 24, 25 and 26. These books include a portion of the book of Nehemiah, the books of Esther and Job, and also a portion of the Psalms. Published semi-monthly at 15 cents per part.

CASSELL'S POPULAR NATURAL HISTORY. Part 22, descriptive of the different varieties of sheep and goats. Published monthly at 15 cents per part.

From ROBERT CARTER & BROTHERS, New York:—

EVENINGS WITH JOHN BUNYAN: or, The Dream Interpreted. By James Large. We have an interesting picture, in this work, of the influence which that wonderful work, "The Pilgrim's Progress," has now throughout Christendom. This record of the family reading and talking over the—almost divine allegory, will add a pleasure to the home-circle of readers in many families.

KITTY'S VICTORY, and other Stories. By the author of "Cosmo's Visit to his Grandfather." This is a charming book for little girls—and boys, too, as the family group is incomplete without the happiness of all the children, which these stories are calculated to enhance.

THE BLACK SHIP, with other Allegories and Parables. By the author of "The Voice of Christian Life in Song," etc. This, also, is designed for the young, and is of a graver tone and requires more reflection. It is well written, and will interest readers of mature years.

THE CITIES OF REFUGE: A Sunday Book for the Young. By the Rev. John R. Macduff, D. D., author of "Morning Watches," etc. We have noticed several works from the pen of this powerful writer—all are good—and this one is excellent.

From A. D. F. RANDOLPH, New York:—

PLEASANT PATHS FOR LITTLE FEET. By Krana. This is a very pretty gift for children, containing ten stories, each one interesting and instructive, such as the young will love to read as well as learn to love what is truly good by reading. The writer shows decided talent for this important office of writing for children. The book is handsomely printed.

From C. M. SAXTON, BARKER, & Co., New York:—

"OUR FARM OF FOUR ACRES," ETC. "YALE LECTURES," "ORCHARD HOUSE," "RURAL AFFAIRS," and other publications on Agriculture, Gardening, and Rural Economy, to which these publishers devote much of their attention. We have in former numbers noticed one of these books, "Our Farm of Four Acres," etc., as a work of great interest to ladies, which they should read for the innocent amusement it would give them, if they did not need nor heed its lessons of useful instruction. Now we commend the other publications we have named to the attention of all who take an interest in country life, and want aid in improving their gardens, orchards, and farms, or who desire to learn something true and practical of rural affairs. This is the season to think about Agriculture and Gardening. Ladies who do not take any interest in these subjects lose much of the pure, healthful, and, we may say, devotional enjoyment of heart and mind which the Creator has provided for the best happiness of His rational creatures.

From TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston:—

ELSIE VENER: A Romance of Destiny. By Oliver Wendell Holmes, author of "The Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table," etc. In two volumes. This is a book requiring something more than a cursory examination, in order to bestow upon it fair and just criticism, be it either praise or censure. It is written in Dr. Holmes' own peculiar, clear, forcible and lively style, and might perhaps not inappropriately be termed a disquisition on ethics as viewed from the author's stand-point, arrayed in all the attractiveness of romance. That these views are in some measure peculiar to himself, all the world knows; and we leave to our readers to pass opinion upon the book, according as they may or may not agree with and admire him. Price $1 75.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

GODEY FOR MAY.—Another engraving suitable to the season. We try to study that. "Buttercups and Daisies." A pleasant group indeed, and splendidly engraved, but why dilate. Godey's steel engravings are now well known the world over to be superior to all others.

Our sixth double extension fashion-plate graces this number, and had we only room to publish some of the thousand letters and notices we have received of these beautiful fashions we should be pleased. Our readers will observe that we give a picture as well as a fashion. Look at the background of this plate, its drawing and its coloring; it would be pretty, even without a figure. Look at the lady on horseback—how well engraved! how well colored! As beautiful as this plate is, we can even improve on it.

Drawing Lessons. Never satisfied. We have even made an alteration of this department for the better. This is an imitation of a lithograph, on tinted paper.

The "Dawning of Genius" is an engraving of great merit. A young lad, who has begun to display a "taste for the arts" (we judge he is a musician as well as a painter), is intently occupied sketching the portrait of an ugly mongrel dog, perched upon a table for the purpose, and held there under gentle restraint by the artist's sister, who smiles kindly at his grave and astonished countenance. An elder brother looks on at the progress of the work, and acknowledges the truth of the resemblance with a broad grin of approval.

We are again indebted to Mr. Letson, of the house of Messrs. A. T. Stewart & Co. of New York, for the Cheveron dress which graces this number. The inimitable Brodie, the prince of cloakists, also favors us with one of his beautiful designs.

If we have done nothing in this world but this one thing, we deserve the thanks of the public. We have forced publishers to keep a greater uniformity in their monthly numbers. Our own course has led to this. We give as good and often better numbers during the year than we give in January. They give nearly as good. However, that is something gained for the public. They now begin to find out what we knew long ago, that "honesty is the best policy." In former years, they would publish a splendid January number, containing many engravings, and an extra number of pages. Many would subscribe upon the strength of this number, but they soon found out their mistake, and probably would not take the Book another year. But that mattered not, there were always other dupes; and so it kept on until our course was perceived, and our list increased, and the reason was found out, and now their subscribers have something like justice done them. But there is still great room for improvement.

DREER'S GARDEN CALENDAR FOR 1861. Designed to furnish brief Directions for the Cultivation and Management of the Esculent and Flower-garden. Illustrated with engravings, and containing select lists of seeds, trees, and plants. A most excellent work, and worthy the attention of all amateur gardeners. Price 12 cents.

A VERY pretty notice from the Westminster Sentinel:—"Godey's Lady's Book is chaste in style, beautiful in sentiment, noble in thought, and is well calculated to call out all the ennobling virtues of the human heart. It contains a heavy list of excellent articles, and sixty-five engravings in all. Of Godey, it is true, that

No cottage is furnished, no palace complete;
Unless there the ladies the Lady's Book meet;
No bride of discernment looks placidly on
The home that contains not the sine qui non."

MRS. R. B. L.—The only premium we give is the Book itself. Instead of spending our money outside we spend it in the Book. Depend upon it that a work must want merit, that has to be bolstered up with premiums.

GENTLEMEN will thank you for a seat in an omnibus or car, ladies won't. Why is this? We dislike to find fault with a lady, but a little incident occurred to ourself in a Fifth Avenue omnibus in New York, and with a Fifth Avenue female, we won't call her lady. At some inconvenience, we handed up her money to the driver and procured her change. She took the latter from us as if we were the favored party. We informed her that we were not employed by the proprietors of the line to hand up money. She looked as if she felt the reproof, but said nothing. It would have been an easy matter to have simply nodded her head as a token of thanks. Ladies, we are very sorry to have to make these complaints, but you must try and be a little polite.

MRS. J. B. B.—Did you ever read the fable of the father, son, and donkey? We might just as well try to please all the world as did the two bipeds in the fable; besides, to do what you request would take up too much space; and again, our subscribers would not be "willing to pay a little more." In London, if they add anything to a magazine, they charge for it. Here have we added $10,000 a year to our expenses, in publishing the splendid fashion-plates we are now giving, and we do not even ask "a little more." In fact, we receive now even a little less, for persons send us money at eight or ten per cent. discount, and send us drafts with the same rate of exchange deducted, leaving us about enough to pay for the manufacture of the book, and our profit in these instances is fame.

To "a subscriber from Virginia." We can only quote the fable alluded to above.

THAT TURKEY COCK we received at Christmas, and apologize for not having noticed it before, and our only excuse is that we took it immediately home, where it was much admired by our Christmas party. Well, to proceed, we received a turkey cock by mail, and a splendid specimen he is of that proud-looking bird, and a useful ornament, for there he stands on the dressing-table, full of pins—in fact, it is a pin-cushion, but one of the best got up imitations we ever saw. We return our thanks to the lady who sent it, and wish she had furnished us with her name.

THE following is high praise indeed:—

We can honestly recommend the New School and Cottage Pianos, manufactured by BOARDMAN, GRAY, & Co., as a well made and durable instrument, admirably well adapted not only for school purposes, but for small parlors, sitting-rooms, etc. The public will find it an excellent and useful invention, and all the makers claim for it, as regards thorough workmanship and entire reliability.

We cannot get along without your Book. In fact, we cannot keep house without it.

S. E.

CLUB OF $10. NEW YORK.

As I cannot do without taking the Lady's Book another year, I send you a club. Please accept my thanks for the pleasure you have given me for the past year in receiving your Book. I would not be without it for double its value.

CUTION.—When sending money, use a wafer in sealing your letter, in addition to the sealing matter that is on the envelope. The want of this precaution has cost us an immense amount of money.

FLORA'S INTERPRETER, AND FORTUNA FLORA. By Mrs. S. J. Hale. Third revised edition, enlarged by 160 new interpretations, with new illustrations, etc. This is the original of all these works, and although many imitations have been attempted, the steady demand for this work proves its superiority. It is probably the only work of the kind of which more than one edition has been published, and this has reached its third. It is beautifully printed on tinted paper, and handsomely bound. Price $1 00.

OUR MUSICAL COLUMN.

Father Kemp's Old Folks in Europe.—As many of our readers will like to know how this well-known band of singers and performers has been received in England, we lay before them the opinions of two good critical authorities, both of whom, it will be seen, are quite guarded in their comments, though extending a hearty welcome to the strangers. The first is from a private letter—

"Your 'Old Folks' are a queer institution (that is your New England term, I believe). Out of three performances that I have listened to I have gathered at last a large grain of comfort. The novelty of the representation is beginning to wear away, and I can detect a fine vein of melody and harmony in all that they sing. But the instrumentation quite staggers me, as does also Father Kemp's original method of using his baton. That the whole performance is different from anything I have ever seen you may well believe, and I have only to say that if this is the choral singing of one hundred years ago in New England, it is very different from Old England's singing of the same period."

The second extract is from a Liverpool paper:—

"The hall was full, and the appearance and performance were so 'unique and peculiar' that we can scarcely pronounce an opinion on the success this numerous party are likely to meet with. The voices are, many of them, very good, and they are evidently well drilled and accustomed to sing together; but the music sung is so differently arranged from anything we have heard before that we scarcely recognize our old friends. * * * During a short interval between some of the performances the whole party marched or promenaded round the room, to give all the audience an opportunity of close inspection. It is difficult to imagine how the public will appreciate an exhibition so peculiar and so unlike to our previous importations from the United States. The expense of the undertaking, carrying about so large a body of persons, must be enormous, and it will require large audiences to remunerate the projectors."

Mr. Everest's Compositions.—The taste and feeling displayed in Mr. Everest's adaptation from Franz Abt, in the present number of the Book, should direct the attention of our musical patrons to the series of translations from the great German composers issued in sheet form by our well-known contributor. They are all of real merit, and we give the names of some of them, for the benefit of our friends: Go, my Rose, by Himmel; Hark how Sweetly, Schubert; When the Moon, Weber; In the Lovely Month of May, Kucken; I Saw a Rose, Reichardt; Oh, Tell me now, Franz Abt; Just from the Bud, Kucken; Dear Mountain Home, Krebs; How Charming and Cheering; Thine Eyes are like Gems; O it is Pleasant; Thou Little Star; and The Maid of the Rhine. Price of each 25 cents. We need only refer to Ah, do I Love Thee? in the present number, for a sample of these pieces. On receipt of price, we will forward any of them to any address; or they may be ordered with any music named in our "Column" for January, February, March, or April, or with our own three latest ballads, Poor Ben the Piper, 25 cents; The Grave of Old Grimes, 25 cents; and Oh, Lady, Touch those Chords Again, 25 cents. Communications on musical subjects or orders for music to be addressed to Philadelphia, to

J. STARR HOLLOWAY.

THE more generally persons are pleasing, the less profoundly do they please.

VOL. LXII.—40

WE ask attention to the advertisement of the Illinois Central Railroad, on the fourth page of our cover. Here is a chance offered to all to obtain farms on reasonable terms. We found the following in an exchange paper:—

"A VERIFIED ESTIMATE.—In the year 1851, Mr. Robert Rantoul, of Massachusetts, at the time Solicitor of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, put forth a pamphlet, in which he boldly asserted that if our prairies could be speedily opened by the construction of railroads, the increase of population in Illinois would be one hundred and ten per cent. in the next ten years. Probably the statement of Mr. Rantoul had a greater influence on the minds of capitalists than those of any other writer at that time, and the result of the late census is a remarkable illustration of the accuracy and ability with which Mr. Rantoul studied the progress of emigration westward, and verifies his prediction that the great volume of this emigration would settle on the prairie soil of Illinois, because of the wonderful ease with which it could be converted into cultivated farms. The amount expended on railroads in this State since 1850 is nearly one hundred millions of dollars. In the same period the population has increased one hundred and two per cent.—from 851,470 in 1850 to 1,739,496 in 1860. On the line of the Illinois Central Railroad the percentage of increase has been very much greater, being one hundred and forty-two per cent. There are forty-nine counties touched by this road, which show a population of 814,891 in 1860 against 335,589 in 1850, a gain of 479,293. In the fifty-three counties not touched by the Illinois Central Railroad the increase is only seventy-six per cent. These counties in 1850 contained a population of 515,875. In 1860 the same counties have 924,605."

TO THOSE WHO PURCHASE THE LADY'S BOOK OF DEALERS, AND TO THOSE WHO RECEIVE THEIR SUPPLIES FROM THEM.

—We wish all such to understand that if they find any advertisement in the Book, placed loosely in there, that they are not from us. We are induced to give this notice, because advertisements are placed in the Book obnoxious to us and to others, and we object most strenuously to their being put there; but we cannot control them, as we sell our Book in large quantities to those who sell to others, and who, themselves being publishers of books, put these advertisements in the Lady's Book for the purpose of distributing them.

AMUSEMENTS.—The natural and only safe mode of enjoying amusements is in common. Where one sex enjoy their amusements alone they are sure to run into excess. The division of the human family into man, woman, and child, father, mother, brother, and sister, is the only conservative principle of society; they act and react upon each other like the different seasons of the earth. Each age and each sex has its peculiar characteristics, that serve to modify and check certain mischievous tendencies in the other sex, and in others of different ages. For one sex to attempt to amuse themselves agreeably and innocently alone, is like trying to make music on a one-stringed instrument.

LADIES who sit with their feet under them should avoid the practice. Several serious accidents have occurred from it.

THE best $3 00 and the best $2 00 monthly are offered one year for $3 50. Godey's Lady's Book and Arthur's Home Magazine.

We publish the following from one of the best lady friends we have in the Far West. It is her own experience; and how she has worked for the Lady's Book for years past, we know, and have often thanked her. Her letters are always worth publishing, as they give a history of the West much better than we can find in books or papers. We remember a passage in one of her early letters, when she first went there to reside—"The river is our only road;" all the rest was forest. Yet even under such circumstances she sent us subscribers. She is indeed a true friend.

GETTING UP CLUBS IN THE "FAR WEST."

OR, ONE DAY'S EXPERIENCE IN SEARCH OF SUBSCRIBERS FOR THE LADY'S BOOK.

"I have succeeded in getting up a club with very little exertion, for, so popular is your Book, I have only to mention my intention, and the names are given me at once."

The above is an extract from a subscriber's letter published in the December number of your invaluable magazine. I suggested the idea that some account of my experience might not prove uninteresting.

The time for getting up clubs has arrived. Once a year, at least, I call on all. I wait until the fishermen (who have been "uncommon lucky" this fall) have sold their fish and the farmers have housed their abundant harvest, hoping every one will feel rich. So behold me, armed with the December number of the Lady's Book (a gem a diamond of the first water, just from the office, and looking so fresh and pure it seems like sacrilege to trust it to any but gentle and spotlessly clean hands. It is a bright, still, cold November morning. My heart is light and my hopes are sanguine, so I feel no cold, and heed not difficulties.

The population of our town numbers about five hundred, all told, and these are scattered over an area of fifteen or twenty miles. The inhabitants are English, Irish, Dutch, Norwegians, Swedes, French, and half-breeds, with a very light sprinkling of Yankees.

Call No. 1. A very polite invitation to walk in is answered by an equally polite invitation to subscribe for the Lady's Book, which calls forth the complaint, "Well, I don't know. We are pretty poor, and my man, he must have his weekly paper." This I generally consider enough, but the lady looks as if she really could appreciate Godey. I display the engravings and read the table of contents, with the authors' names. Her eyes brighten, and the expression of her countenance is decidedly encouraging. She finally concluded to "ask my man," and I take my departure with brighter hopes, which a long walk through the woods to the next house does not serve to darken. The woods are so pleasant in a fine day at this season of the year! The fallen leaves make a soft, bright carpet underfoot, and the red berries of the winter-green make the roadside gay. The chatter of the squirrels is overhead,

"And the sound of dropping nuts is heard, Though all the trees are still."

Here and there a tiny blue violet holds up its modest face to catch the sun's farewell kisses. Always beautiful, they are all the more beautiful for being unexpected, and then the mosses look so fresh and green in contrast with the dead leaves and withered grasses. Now and then a glimpse of the river or the far off lake flashes through the openings, and everything seems to be rejoicing in these last hours of sunshine. But I am wandering far from my subject.

At the next house a coarse-looking woman opens the door, and as I enter I see she has been reading an account of the last "horrible murder" in Frank Leslie's Illustrated. New York Weeklies and Mercuries: Boston True Flag and Flag of Our Union, with others of that ilk, strew the table, the lounge, and even the floor. I do not feel particularly encouraged by these signs of the litterary propensity, but I state my business. "Let's see it," she says; and I lay the treasure in her greasy palm. First, of course, she spreads that splendid fashion-plate. "Wall, I declare! that 'ere painted picter is nice!" is her comment. After she has looked it all over, descanted on the patterns, etc., and rolled it up in her hands awhile, she returns it to me, with the remark that she "would really like to have it; it seems a real nice book, but money's scarce, and Sary Ann (her blooming daughter) has got her heart set on one of them gold (?) belts at Jones's store." So I proceeded.

Two, three, four more calls are made, with various results. Some are already subscribers to other magazines, others promise to ask "him" (their husbands), and most all must have their weekly paper; it is as necessary to their happiness as tea is to an old maid's.

What a forbidding aspect this house presents! But never mind (it is against my principles to pass by any house where there is enough of the English language understood so they can get beyond nichts verstand). My timid knock is answered by a gruff "What do you want?" The lady (!) is a new arrival; some one who has come into the neighborhood since my last year's visits were made. To her polite inquiry I reply I would like to have her subscribe for the Lady's Book.

"I don't want it," she answers; "Miss B—— takes it, and I can read hers."

"But, my good madam," I reply, "we who are already subscribers have resolved to lend no more."

"Well, you'll make a deal by that. If Miss B—— don't want to lend hers, she can keep it at home."

"I will tell you," said I, "what we intend to make. We calculate that those of our neighbors who have been borrowers will find they cannot do without it, and next year they will subscribe for themselves." And I pass on.

The next call is also on a new comer; but the clean, cozy room, with its cleanly swept hearth and warm, bright fire, raise my drooping spirits at once. The plain but neat-looking woman stitching away in her low rocking-chair, the books on the shelves, the papers on the table (not trashy ones, but a few such as the Philadelphia Saturday Evening Post and our own county paper), and the nice kerosene, all encourage me to state my errand. "Yes," she will be "very glad to take it;" and the money is forthcoming from a neat little crochet purse (a Lady's Book pattern). She says she "used to take it," when she lived "outside," which means out in the world, within the bounds of civilization. I proceed, with a lightened heart and a heavier purse.

The next lady I call on "would like it, and Lizzy Jane (her rosy daughter) wants it real bad; but she feels as if it would be "real wicked to spend money for such things when there are so many suffering from the loss of the Lady Elgin. That was such a heart-rendering affair," she adds, with a dismal shake of the head. I agree with her, but cannot refrain from asking her if she shall send the money she denies Eliza Jane to the poor sufferers in Milwaukee. She "don't know as she will," but thinks perhaps she may conclude to gratify her daughter, and if so, will send the money over before I send.

It is getting past noon, and I am hungry, not having happened to be anywhere at just the dinner hour, and worse than all the rest, it has clouded up, and is beginning to rain. But I know "the sun shines somewhere," and I know, too, that beyond that long, dark stretch of woodlands there is a bright little cottage where a sewing-machine, with its pleasant, cheering click, occupies one corner of the cozy sitting-room, and a fine open piano glazes another, while Godey's Lady's Book is always on the stand. Here my dear friend Nell T— makes music and sunshine for a husband and two dear children. Around this cottage clusters a little settlement of Yankees from "down East," in whom you are sure to find intelligence, and most always refined and cultivated taste. Nell gives me something to eat, though it is long past the dinner hour in her methodical household, and with another two dollars in my purse I hurry on, for the day is closing dark and rainy. I hasten from house to house, and then with rapid steps take up my homeward march, where I arrive, tired, bedraggled, and cold, after a walk of full eight miles through swamp and forest, for which I have nothing to show but an utterly ruined book and ten dollars! Only five subscribers for one hard day's work! This is only one day's experience. I have another before me, for I have only been down the river, and now I must go up to the mills, out to the farms, and down to the lake shore; but it will only be a repetition of to-day's labors, and I have only related this to show that it is not always easy to get up clubs, even for the Lady's Book.

Truly your friend, and an earnest worker for Godey's Lady's Book.

D—A, November 20, 1860.

To show the difference in more settled and in populous parts of our country, how easy it is to make up clubs, we publish the following:—

OHIO, Dec. 12, 1860.

Here I come again with my club; no trouble to make it up. Your Book is so fascinating that it needs but to be seen and read to gain admirers. The question is asked me, "When are you going to send on for the Lady's Book? Put down my name; can't do without it."

P.

OHIO.

I cannot refrain from mentioning a significant fact—last year I had some difficulty in obtaining the requisite number of names; this year the names were ready before I was.

C.

ILLINOIS, Dec. 22, 1860.

I find your magazine is rapidly increasing in popularity in our Western country, for with a very little exertion I have succeeded in getting up this club.

L.

IOWA, Dec. 17, 1860.

I now find it but little trouble in making up my club.

S.

CALIFORNIA, Jan. 14, 1861.

I find no trouble in making up a club. Every lady to whom I have shown the Book gave me her name without hesitation.

H.

MARYLAND, Jan. 7, 1861.

I have been a reader of your very popular magazine for two years, and am so delighted with it that I resolved to get up a club. I had only to make my intentions known, and the names were given immediately.

J.

DUNTON CO., TEXAS, Jan. 3, 1861.

I made up this club with but very little trouble, so popular is the Book, even in this far off frontier country.

C.

ILLINOIS, Dec. 16, 1860.

Having been a subscriber for your Lady's Book for two years, I to-day thought I would try and make up a club, and in about one hour and a half I had my club of nine all made up, and now send it with my best wishes.

S.

INDIANA, Nov. 13, 1860.

I have succeeded in getting up my club without any trouble or inconvenience. I just mentioned it to some of my friends as I chanced to meet them, and they paid me the amount.

We copy with great pleasure, from the Vandalia Democrat, the following tribute to our coadjutor, Mrs. Hale, and heartily indorse it. Time has indeed dealt gently with her:—

"Mrs. HALE.—It must be that years have dealt gently with her, and though her brow may be marked with the chasms of Time, and her hair turned into silvered purity (we know not that this be true), she is not old. A truly good and noble woman never grows old; excellence of character, like hers, is perpetual youth, never dying, never yielding to the heavy pressure of Time, but radiating from her own heart, it enters countless other hearts, takes up its abode there, and lives—a life akin to that of angels. The first book that ever gladdened our young heart, the treasure-trove of our young life, was written by Mrs. Hale. We kept it long and well, and oft, as we looked upon its soiled covering and torn leaves in its declining days, a feeling of half childish, half manly sorrow would come over us, such as we suppose is felt by those having lost their first love. But the little book is gone, like all the baubles and pleasures of childhood, yet every picture, every word is stereotyped in our mind, and will be reviewed with pleasure, even in the closing hours of life.

"What a commentary is the life of Mrs. Hale upon the follies of the strong-minded women of the age! The lady editor of Godey's Lady's Book has won for herself an enviable immortality, an immortality, not of theory, but of living worth and excellence. The little books of her earlier life—pearls of purity and perfection—have gladdened countless thousands of little hearts; and in the strength and maturity of womanhood, in the vigor of life, and—it may be—in her declining years she speaks through the press to the same hearts she gladdened in youth, dispensing to her countrywomen the priceless treasures of her own rich laden mind, exquisite in taste, full in all the acquirements that grace and adorn the character of woman.

"She needs no marble monument to perpetuate her name, for upon millions of hearts is written,

'TO THE MEMORY OF SARAH JOSEPHA HALE.'

THE Lady's book was offered as a premium at the Highland Agricultural Society Fair at Johnstown, Pa. for the best specimens of the following articles, in fancy and plain needle-work:—

Fancy Needle-work.—Ottoman cover. Table cover. Fancy work with needle, for chairs. Cotton embroidery. Silk embroidery. Knit crochet shawl. Knit cap. Pair worked slippers. Specimen crochet work. Knit or crochet quilt. Worked sofa cushion. Silk bonnet (domestic). Display of bonnets. Specimen of taste and skill in fancy work. Chair or sofa tidy. Fancy basket. Fine needle-work.

Plain Needle-work.—Pieced silk quilt. Pieced calico quilt. Transposed quilt. Pieced calico quilt made by a girl under fourteen years of age. Homemade shirt, made by a girl under fourteen years of age. Homemade shirt. Specimen of plain sewing.

Head-dress, diamonds, feathers, and Brussels lace; ornaments diamonds.

THE LA PIERRE HOUSE.—With all the building up of new hotels and the failures of old ones, this celebrated house holds the even tenor of its way successfully, giving great satisfaction to every one who gets under its hospitable roof. The Messrs. Ward have a way with them that, having once made a friend, they never lose him. We have no hesitation in saying that it is the best conducted hotel on this continent. It is quiet and orderly; everything well managed; more like a private than a public house; its situation—the highest in the city—near to all the principal depots; its table such as can only be found in Philadelphia, and the brothers Ward gentlemen in the truest sense of the word.

SEASONABLE HINTS ABOUT PERSONAL COMFORT.—A thin shawl may be made warm by folding a newspaper inside of it. The paper is impervious to the wind and cold air from outside, and prevents the rapid escape of the warm air beneath it. Every one knows that the heat of the body is carried off much more rapidly in a high wind than in a calm. The wind blows away the heat evolved from the body, but in a perfectly still air this heat remains, and constitutes an atmospheric envelope so nearly of the same temperature with the body itself that the latter is not so quickly robbed of the natural heat.

A piece of silk oilcloth stitched in the folds of a shawl, is more flexible than the paper, and will last a whole winter. It has the advantage of securing inward warmth without the additional weight of a thicker garment.

When you set out on a winter journey, if you are liable to suffer from cold toes, which many people do in spite of "rubbers," fold a piece of newspaper over your stockings, which you can readily do, if your boots or shoes are not irrationally tight. This is better than "rubbers," which are, in fact, very cold comforters in extreme, while they make the feet sweat in moderate weather. The main use of India rubber overshoes is to keep out water, and for that they are second only to a stout, water-proof, first-rate calf-skin boot. There is not a more villainously unwholesome article of wear made than the high-topped rubber boot. It makes the foot tender, especially in children, gives an ugly gait, and when left off in any weather, the wearer is liable to "catch cold." Saint Crispin is the best friend of the human feet, when his leather and stitches are honest.

The constitutional vivacity and temper of a person has much to do with his endurance of cold. For this vivacity is a sort of nervous fire that lessens the sensibility to outward impressions. An indifferent, milk-and-water person, without energy and force, is at the mercy of every cold blast that sweeps round the corner. He, and especially she, has no defence but to wear a dozen shawls during the day, and sleep under a bale of blankets at night. One without any mental purpose (unfortunately there are such), though in vigorous health, is much more liable to catch cold than a spirited, delicate body bent on some positive pursuit.—The Century.

THE Lansingburg Gazette says: "It is all and more than its publisher promised it would be, at the beginning of the year. It is the book of books for fashionable Ladies."

A COLUMN OF FACTS.

When did the first steamship cross the Atlantic?

In 1819. She was the American ship Savannah, from Savannah, Georgia.

In a church, which is the hottest situation? and why?

The gallery; because the cold air lies nearest the floor till it has become heated, when it ascends towards the roof of the building.

What is the wind?

The air in motion.

Whether is ice or water lightest?

Ice.

Whether does a piano give a higher tone in a cold or a warm room? and why?

In a cold room, on account of the strings being tighter, or more contracted.

What is the strength of a horse as compared with that of a man?

The strength of one horse is as the strength of five men.

What are sonorous bodies?

Bodies which produce sound.

What solid bodies are among the best conductors of sound?

Iron and glass; these transmit sound at a rate of more than three miles a second; and after them come copper, several kinds of wood, silver, tin, and so on.

What is an echo?

A reflected sound.

Why does a metal spoon, left in a saucepan, retard the boiling process?

Being an excellent conductor, the metal spoon carries off the heat from the water, and consequently prevents it boiling so soon as it otherwise would.

In building a room for public speaking, what should be the limit of the height of its ceiling?

It should not be above thirty or thirty-five feet.

What is the temperature at which water scalds?

One hundred and fifty degrees.

What is the general effect of heat upon substances?

It enlarges their dimensions by expansion.

Why are the quills and bones of birds hollow and without marrow?

That they may not only be light to assist their passage through the air, but that they may be possessed of the greatest strength.

In warfare, what is the distance at which artillery can generally be effectively used?

From a quarter to half a mile. Big cannon balls and shells can be thrown with effect to the distance of from a mile and a half to two miles.

PATTERNS FOR INFANTS' DRESSES, OR INFANTS' WARDROBES.—Our fashion editor has supplied a great many wardrobes for infants lately, and in every case has given great satisfaction. She has facilities for furnishing these articles better and cheaper than any other person. The vast influence that her connection with the Lady's Book gives her induces importers and others to submit to her their earliest fashions. To those who cannot afford the articles, made-up paper patterns can be sent, which will be facsimiles of the originals. We cannot publish the prices, as the postage varies according to the size of the articles ordered, and that we have to pay in advance. For particulars, address Fashion Editor (not Mrs. Hale), care of L. A. Godey, Philadelphia. All other patterns furnished as usual.

THE USE OF PAPER IN JAPAN.—It was wonderful to see the thousand useful as well as ornamental purposes to which paper was applicable in the hands of these industrious and tasteful people; our papier-mache manufacturers as well as the continental ones, should go to Yeddo to learn what can be done with paper. We saw it made into material so closely resembling Russian and Morocco leather, and pig-skin, that it was very difficult to detect the difference. With the aid of lacker varnish and skilful painting, paper made excellent trunks, tobacco bags, cigar cases, saddles, telescope cases, the frames of microscopes, and we even saw and used excellent waterproof coats made of simple paper, which did keep out the rain and were as supple as the best Macintosh. The Japanese use neither silk nor cotton handkerchiefs, towels or dusters, paper in their hands serves as an excellent substitute. It is soft, thin, tough, of a pale yellow color, very plentiful and very cheap. The inner walls of many a Japanese apartment are formed of paper, being nothing more than printed screens; their windows are covered with a fine translucent description of the same material; it enters largely into the manufacture of nearly everything in the Japanese household; and we saw what seemed to be balls of twine, which were nothing but long shreds of tough paper rolled up. If a shop-keeper had a parcel to tie up, he would take a strip of paper, roll it quickly between his hands, and use it for the purpose, and it was quite as strong as the ordinary string used at home. In short, without paper, all Japan would come to a dead lock; and, indeed, lest by the arbitrary exercise of his authority, a tyrannical husband should stop his wife's paper, the sage mothers-in-law invariably stipulate in the marriage settlement, that the bride is to have allowed to her a certain quantity of paper.

REMEDIES.—

For a Fit of Ambition.—Go into the churchyard and read the gravestones; they will tell you the end of ambition. The grave will soon be your bed-chamber, the earth your pillow, corruption your father, and the worm your mother and sister.

For a Fit of Repining.—Look about for the halt and the blind, and visit the bedridden, and afflicted, and deranged; and they will make you ashamed of complaining of your lighter afflictions.

For a Fit of Idleness.—Count the tickings of a clock. Do this for one hour, and you will be glad to pull off your coat the next and work like a negro.

For a Fit of Passion.—Walk out in the open air; you may speak your mind to the winds without hurting any one, or proclaiming yourself to be a simpleton.

For all Fits of Doubt, Perplexity, and Fear.—Whether they respect the body or the mind; whether they are a load to the shoulders, the head, or the heart, the following is a radical cure which may be relied on, for I had it from the Great Physician: "Cast thy burden on the Lord, he will sustain thee."

HOW TO REWRITE.—Procure a draft, if possible; if not, send notes; but let it be a matter known only to yourself; the fewer you let into the secret, the more certainly there is of your money coming to hand. Do not register your letters, as this at once informs everybody that money is in your letter. If you send gold dollars, secure them carefully in the letter; otherwise, they are apt to work out of the envelope. Notes on all solvent banks taken at par. Be careful and pay the postage on your letter, and direct it to L. A. Godey, Philadelphia.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

FATE LADY.

TAKE a piece of pasteboard about twelve inches square; draw a circle upon it, and cut it out. The outside edge should be colored or bound round with gilt-edged paper. The flat surface must then be ruled, all the lines meeting in the centre; in these the mottoes are written, taking care to draw a distinct line in red or black ink between each. Insert a wire exactly in the centre of the circle, and on it fasten a neatly jointed dressed doll, altogether not more than five or six inches high. In one hand fix a small wand, pointing towards the motto beneath her. The wire can be made steady by fastening it in the centre of any common round box, covered and bound to correspond with the other portions. The doll must be just high enough above the pasteboard to turn about freely. When you wish to tell a fortune, turn the doll round rapidly, and when she stops read what her wand is pointing to.

Mottoes similar to the following will do for the stand; they are from "Lines to a Fate Lady," by Mrs. Ann Maria Wells:—

The fairy lady seals your doom,
In that blest spot—your own kind home.

2.
Emma an heiress shall come out,
And shine at ball, and play, and rout.

3.
Ah, lady, you may well look sad!
Lucinda's fate is very bad.

4.
Nay, wise one, never look demure;
You're not too modest, I am sure.

5.
Possess'd of talents, virtues, grace,
Her poorest charm's her pretty face.

6.
Two dunces her first friends shall be,
Herself the dullest of the three.

A GRAIN OF GOLD.—Here is a little allegory taken from one of the agricultural speeches of Edward Everett:—

"Drop a grain of California gold in the ground, and there it will lie unchanged to the end of time. The clouds on which it falls are not more cold and lifeless. Drop a grain of our blessed gold into the ground, and lo! a mystery. In a few days it softens—it swells—it shoots upwards—it is a living thing. It is yellow itself, but it sends up an emerald green through the soil—it expands to a vigorous stalk—revels in the sunshine—itself more glorious than Solomon in its sunshine—itself more glorious than Solomon in its broad, fluttering, leafy robes, whose sound, as the west wind whispers through them, falls as pleasantly on the husbandman's ear as the rustle of his sweetheart's garment; still towers aloft, spins its verdant skeins of vegetable floss, displays its dancing tassels, surcharged with fertilizing dust, and at last ripens into two or three magnificent batons like this (an ear of Indian corn), each of which is studded with hundreds of grains of gold, every one possessing the same wonderful properties as the parent grain, every one instinct with the same productive powers."

"DOUBT NO MORE."

BY HARRY HAREWOOD LEECH.

By your doubting and cruel note
I am taught that devotion is vain.
My love, did you know when you wrote
You'd inflict such exquisite pain?
I am sure your heart is so kind,
Your impulses noble and just;
Then why, with your generous mind,
Will you stab with those lines of distrust?

What words shall my eager lips frame
My constant affection to prove?
In my prayers I whisper thy name;
In my dreams I call thee "my love!"
What proof shall my longing soul give?
What balm on thy chafed spirit pour?
My darling, thy image must live
In my "heart of hearts" evermore.

With each pang a solace is given,
With hope I am girded about;
At least, 'tis a law of wise Heaven,
There must be sweet love, before doubt.
Come back to thy faith and thy rest;
Thy lover is true, as of yore.
Oh, darling one, from thy dear breast
Banish doubts of him evermore!

PINS.—The pin manufacture is one of the most extraordinary branches of national industry. By aid of improved machinery, more than three times the number of pins is made that could have been produced by the same number of workmen a few years since; yet the pins are sold at no more than twopence per pound over the cost of the metal of which they are formed. Upwards of 150 tons weight of copper and spelter are annually worked up into pins by one Birmingham house alone. Were the whole of this metal converted into ribbon pins, half an inch in length, it would produce 100,500,000,000, or about one hundred to each inhabitant of the globe. If placed in a straight line, these pins would be 787,500 miles in length, or sufficient to extend upwards of thirty times round the globe, or more than three times the distance of the moon from the earth. Hence we cannot be surprised at the unanswerable question, "What becomes of all the pins?"

THE publishers of "Art Recreations" (that valuable guide to all the beautiful arts and fancy works ladies delight in) supply all materials for wax work, and, in fact, for all the various arts taught in the book. For information, etc., address Messrs. J. E. Tilton & Co., Publishers, Boston.

"M. R. P."—Sorry we cannot oblige you. The stories you mention are excellent indeed, but we do not like to republish our own stories. Strongly tempted to do so, in the case you mention.

LARGE COUNTRY RESIDENCE IN THE ITALIAN STYLE.

Designed expressly for Godey's Lady's Book by SAMUEL SLOAN, Architect, Philadelphia.

PERSPECTIVE VIEW.

This building is planned with reference to a high style of living, and without an ostentatious exterior, can lay claim to a considerable amount of architectural beauty.

FIRST FLOOR.

Principal Floor—A entrance hall; B drawing-room, 18 by 24 feet; C library, 14 by 18 feet; D conservatory (omitted in the elevation); E reception-room, 12 by 22 feet; F dining-room, 18 by 21 feet; G butler's pantry; H kitchen, 16 by 17 feet; I and J Verandas; K entrance drive.

SECOND STORY.

Second story.—M M M M M chambers, L hall, N bath-room, O bed-room, P passage.

Among the principal novelties of this season are the little photographs, called, from their smallness, "visiting-cards," which may be had very cheap, and which enable an individual to bestow a likeness of himself, at small cost, on his entire circle.

HAIR ORNAMENTS.—Ladies wishing hair made into bracelets, pins (which are very beautiful), necklaces, or ear-rings, can be accommodated by our Fashion Editor. A very large number of orders have recently been filled, and the articles have given great satisfaction.

We give the prices at which we will send these beautiful articles:—

- Breastpins, from $4 to $12.
- Ear-rings, from $4 50 to $10.
- Bracelets, from $3 to $15.
- Rings, from $1 50 to $3.
- Necklaces, from $6 to $15.
- Fob-chains, from $6 to $12.
- The Charms of Faith, Hope, and Charity, $4 50.
- Hair Studs from $5 50 to $11 the set.
- Sleeve Buttons from $6 50 to $11 the set.

HAIR is at once the most delicate and lasting of our materials, and survives us like love. It is so light, so gentle, so escaping from the idea of death, that, with a lock of hair belonging to a child or friend, we may almost look up to heaven and compare notes with the angelic nature—may almost say: "I have a piece of thee here, not unworthy of thy being now."

LADIES should use EDWARDS' PAINT RESTORER, for removing dirt from paint and glass. Price per package, sufficient to clean a whole house, 25 cents. For sale by all grocers, druggists, and fancy goods stores throughout the country.

Samples of this compound sent by mail upon receipt of two three-cent stamps.

Address Fisher, Day, & Co., successors to J. E. Tilton, dealers in artists' goods, engravings, materials for Grecian painting, etc., 188 Essex Street, Salem, Mass.

RE-UNION IN HEAVEN.—I am fully persuaded that I shall love my friends in heaven, and therefore know them; and this principle binds me to them on earth. If I thought I should never know them more, nor, therefore, love them after death, I should love them comparatively little now, as I do all other transitory things.

THE WISDOM OF SORROW.—Sorrow seems sent for our instruction, just as we darken the cages of birds when we teach them to sing.

CHAOS.—A woman putting your room to rights—just after you have been arranging everything to your satisfaction, and elaborately assorting your papers with such methodical care that you could put your finger upon each separate one in the dark—that is what I call chaos! Men are not more awkward in handling women's babies than women are in fingering men's papers. The mischief, and damage, and endless annoyance of spirit, and thorough disturbance of temper for the rest of the day, that are engendered by the latter practice, surpasses all belief.

WOMAN'S HOME BOOK OF HEALTH.—The New York Journal of Commerce makes the following mention of the above named work by Dr. John S. Wilson, of this vicinity:—

"The Woman's Home Book of Health is from the pen of a Georgia physician who writes in a very frank and straight forward manner, and with no attempt at scientific technicality. The book is full of good sense, and points out the errors in living, among American women, with blunt truthfulness."

The postage on the Lady's Book, if paid three months in advance at the office where it is received, is four and a half cents for three monthly numbers.

PHILADELPHIA AGENCY.

No order attended to unless the cash accompanies it. All persons requiring answers by mail must send a post-office stamp; and for all articles that are to be sent by mail, stamps must be sent to pay return postage.

Be particular, when writing, to mention the town, county, and State you reside in. Nothing can be made out of post-marks.

Chemistry for the Young.

393. OUR examination of sulphur having come to a conclusion, it remains for us to devote a slight attention to two of its important points, at least—namely, sulphuric acid (oil of vitriol) and hydrosulphuric acid (sulphuretted hydrogen). The chief qualities of both these will be found to have already come under our investigation; nevertheless they are far too important for being thus cursorily passed over.

394. And first as regards sulphuric acid. This compound is frequently considered as synonymous with oil of vitriol, although the supposition be not precisely true. Sulphuric acid is a snow-white, solid compound, whereas oil of vitriol is a liquid, as we all know. Hence, in future, remember that oil of vitriol is a combination of forty parts by weight of real sulphuric acid with nine parts by weight of water. The first evident characteristic of oil of vitriol is the thick viscous quality which causes it to look and to flow from vessel to vessel something like an oil. Another characteristic is its intensely acid taste, which, provided the oil of vitriol be largely diluted with water, may be recognized with impunity. A third characteristic is its power of reddening blue litmus. But the specific tests for this acid are these:—

395. When mixed with solutions of the earth baryta, or with salts of the same, or with salts of lead, it throws down in either case a dense white powder, the sulphate of baryta or of lead—absolutely insoluble in water, and also in hot nitric acid. Thus soluble salts of baryta and of lead, especially the former, are used not only to indicate but to separate sulphuric acid, whether alone or in combination.

396. To a solution of nitrate of baryta add a solution of oil of vitriol, very weak, in water, and remark the copious white precipitate which falls. Instead of sulphuric acid and water, use a solution of Glauber's salt (sulphate of soda) and water, and remark the similarity of the result. Prove that neither of these precipitates is capable of solution in hot nitric acid; hence they would appear to be identical. Prove their identity of composition by the following investigation:—

397. Mix each of them with charcoal separately, and treat as directed in 392. The results of this treatment having been put into two test-tubes, add hydrochloric acid to the contents of each, and test the resulting gas with paper dipped in acetate of lead. The paper blackens; hence you have been acting on a sulphuret: hence this sulphuret must have come from a sulphate, and the sulphate can only have been generated by the sulphuric acid, free in the one instance, combined with soda in the other.

398. Our old acquaintance, hydrosulphuric acid, need not detain us long. To comment upon its ill odor, and its power of throwing down calcigenous metals, or to mention its solubility in water, is needless. I shall, therefore, limit my experiments on it to those which demonstrate it to contain sulphur, by getting the sulphur out of it.

399. Collect, without agitation (by agitation it is absorbed), two three-ounce wide bottles full of the gas over water in the usual way, close them with glass plates, and set them on the table.

400. Collect one bottle of equal size as to mouth and capacity of chlorine (321), remembering the precautions mentioned at 255, close the mouth of the bottle also with a glass valve, and set it on the table. Now let the bottles be taken up, each by a different person, and let the glass valves be brought face to face in such a manner that when slid away the bottles will lie horizontally mouth to mouth; rapid combination will then ensue, and sulphur will be deposited. This experiment renders evident the manner in which chlorine or bleaching powder (chloride of lime), which gives off chlorine, acts in destroying ill odors. For the most part, this ill odor is dependent on the presence of hydrosulphuric acid gas; and chlorine, as we have already seen, decomposes this gas, and liberates sulphur.

401. Into the remaining bottle, containing hydrosulphuric acid, pour a little fuming nitrous acid (known under that name in the shops), and replace the valve. Sulphur is again deposited.

402. As regards phosphorus. We will not perform any experiments with this substance, because it is extremely dangerous to meddle with. Sulphur we have seen to exist in animals and vegetables, it is true, but to a far greater extent in the mineral kingdom. Phosphorus, on the contrary, is scarcely found in the mineral kingdom; in certain vegetables it occurs more frequently; but animals, especially their bones, yield it in greatest abundance.

403. The chief points of practical interest in analysis relative to sulphur, involve sulphuric acid and hydrosulphuric acid, both of which have been sufficiently treated of; for the purpose, however, of impressing two or three important facts, I wish you to assume the problem of, sulphate of soda being given, how to extract the sulphur which it contains. The various stages of analysis necessary to effect this have already been detailed.

LIST OF GARDEN FLOWERS. No. 2.

We continue the list of hardy perennials, which our readers will find useful, as we have done, any variety mentioned we have either included in our own borders, or see growing within a stone's throw of us.

Rudbeckia—A genus of indigenous plants, large and showy.

Saxifraga—Saxifraga. Dwarf plants with large fleshy leaves, with pink or white flowers, very early. Suitable for rock work.

Sedum—Stone crop. Creeping plants, excellent for rock only.

Spiraea—Meadow Sweet. A very desirable class of plants of the easiest culture. S. filipendula with white flowers, buds shaded with pink. The foliage of this variety is very beautiful. Other desirable varieties are S. Japonica, S. lobata, S. rosea, and S. ulmaria. In some parts of the country the spirea is known as the "King" and "Queen of the Meadow."

Tradescantia—Spiderwort. T. virginica has fine blue flowers produced every morning from July to September. There is a variety with white flowers, and another with double red flowers, which latter variety is rare.

Valeriana—Valerian. The white flowering variety is a tall growing plant, four to six feet in height, with a profusion of small, very fragrant flowers in June.

Veronica—Speedwell. V. spicata is a fine blue variety. The flowers are produced in long succession on tall spikes.

Viola odorata—Sweet Scented Violet. These should be found in every garden for the sake of their delightful perfume. The double blue and white varieties are the most desirable.

Viola tricolor—Pansey. Too well known to require any description.

CLIMBING ANNUALS.—Climbing annuals are of great utility in the decoration of gardens, the rapidity of their growth and profusion of flowers during several of the summer and autumn months, render them very effective. Of this class the Cobea, Lophospermum, Maurandia, Ipomea, &c., are well known, and generally used in the best gardens for covering trellis work, walls, fences, arbors, &c.

We now add to the list for this purpose an annual Passion flower (P. gracilis). It is represented by the French journals as an exceedingly graceful plant, of rapid growth and luxuriant foliage, flowering in two months from the time of sowing the seed. The flowers are small greenish white; fruit an oval berry of an orange yellow color. Its origin does not appear to be known. The seeds should be sown in March, in a frame, on a gentle bottom heat, and the plants will be fit for planting out by the middle of May.

BARGAINS IN "DIAMONDS, PEARL, AND GOLD."

It may be only "trying" to those of our lady friends, who have a fancy for "sales" and an eye to a good "auction bargain," to read of one that included so many articles interesting to the feminine mind; but we judge the taste of our Centre-table Club, by what we have found it in the past, and propose, a full congress being assembled around its genial light, to read aloud, so to speak, an account of the great sale of Government presents, which took place at Calcutta the past season.

On the return of the Viceroy and Governor-General of India from his official tours through the country, it is usual to sell by public auction the presents he has received, and which the forms of Indian State receptions require to be taken and reciprocated by "nuzzers" or presents, quid pro quo, given in exchange. The sale of the valuable presents received during the late tour of his Excellency the Right Honorable the Governor-General and Viceroy of India took place on the premises of Messrs. Hamilton & Co., Calcutta, jewellers, &c., to the Viceroy.

The presents consisted of articles of native jewellery, arms, armor, shawls from the looms of Cashmere, Umritsir, Delhi, and Dacca; massive gold and silver-mounted trappings for horses and elephants; gold and silver cups; and implements for using pawn, uta, &c.; a great variety of native manufactures in cloths of gold and silver; the finest muslins, beautiful carpets, and embroideries, a portion of which were hung about the saleroom, and formed a truly Oriental background to the dark faces of the grotesquely-clad company. The ten days were not wholly occupied by the sale of the Government presents. At the same time was disposed of a number of very magnificent jewels taken at the Baillie Guard, Lucknow, and lately handed over to the ex-King of Oude by the British Government; Messrs. Hamilton and Co. selling the same under the orders of that ex-King for his benefit. Many of these said jewels were of the greatest magnificence and rarity. One of the necklaces, composed of emeralds which were pierced and strung in triple rows, was of the weight of two pounds and a half; one of the three or four large diamonds of great brilliancy weighed over fifty carats. A crown of very brilliant diamonds, another of emeralds, another of cats'eyes, and one of amethysts, have been sold. Some of the emeralds and rubies were of great antiquity, bearing the names of Indian monarchs engraved on their surfaces from the time of Timour Shah. Many curious articles of Indian manufacture in precious stones, pearls, jade, &c., were included in the sale.

The auction was numerously attended throughout by the native nobility and gentry, as also by the native jewellers, who were the principal purchasers, although the most valuable lots were ceded to the former. These consisted of the celebrated Oude diamond, weighing upwards of fifty-six rutties (one ruttee is 1.875 grain), which sold for 33,100 rupees; also two other large diamonds, which were knocked down for 17,500 and 31,700 rupees respectively. The sixth day's sale included a most valuable enamelled gold hookah apparatus, ornamented with about 2500 diamonds of various sizes, and was secured by a wealthy Rajah for 40,250 rupees. The supplementary catalogue comprised a superb diamond crown, purchased for 39,000 rupees. Of the precious stones in this collection the emeralds attracted most attention, from their immense size, one of which was of such dimensions as to allow it to be cut in the shape of an eggcup, and weighed upwards of 1000 rutties. There was also a large collection of "lollries" or "spinel rubies," of which a necklace realized 24,000 rupees, and was greatly enhanced by the fact of one of the stones having the name of the first King and great Persian conqueror of Delhi, "Timour Shaw," engraved on it.

Of the Government presents the Cashmere shawls included some of the finest specimens produced; the prices ranged from 400 to 1000 rupees each. Great competition took place for a set of silver elephant trappings, sold for 13,000 rupees.

The total amount of the sale was calculated at upwards of ten lacs of rupees (£100,000).

NOTES AND QUERIES.

1. Wild Flowers and Woods.—We cannot too strongly urge upon our lady friends the study of botany, which will enhance the pleasure that a natural love of flowers gives, and teaches habits of close observation, which is useful for any department in life. The commonest weed or leaf is invested with interest. There is the Vervain (Verbena officinalis), lifting its graceful stem, crowned with a slender spike of small gray flowers, by waysides and on hedge-banks. This plant is interesting on many accounts. It was sacred to the religious services of the old Greeks and Romans, as well as to those of the ancient Druids, while its medical virtues were widely spread and firmly believed in. A wreath of the plant being worn on the head, was said to cure pains in it; and its root was not long since worn by persons suffering from scrofula, by way of amulet, with a yard of white satin ribbon round the neck.

Musk Mallows (Molva moschata). The prettiest of its sisterhood, with light green five-lobed leaves, cut into numerous segments, that look like fringe; the flowers are large, of a fresh rose-color, and the plant in hot weather is redolent of a faint musky odor. Mallows were eaten by the ancients, not only in salads, but boiled; and the Chinese and Egyptians still make use of one species as an article of diet. The mucilage of the roots is useful for coughs and pulmonary diseases.

Common Wild Flax (Linum catharticum) opens its pretty, light-blue blossoms in chalky fields. The use of the cultivated variety is too well known to be repeated. The oil of the seed is valuable in commerce; and the refuse, after its expression, is used to feed cattle.

Great Bedstraw (Galium aparine). One of the most lovely of our native flora; spreads thickets and hedges with its climbing stems, and trumpet-shaped, solitary, snow-white flowers.

Miss Caroline A. White, whose graceful articles on floral culture have illuminated our pages heretofore, has sought out these pretty summer guests and catalogued an almost incredible number of them.

2. Translations of the Bible.—The Bible has been translated into 143 dialects and languages; of which 121 have appeared subsequent to the formation of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and 25 of them existed only in an oral form without an alphabet. Upwards of 43 millions of these copies of the Bible are circulated now among not less than 600,000,000 of readers. Well may those who "watch for the morning" say, "What hath God wrought!"

Fashions.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

HAVING had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editor of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Spring and autumn bonnets, materials for dresses, jewelry, envelops, hair-work, worsteds, children's wardrobes, mantillas, and mantelets, will be chosen with a view to economy, as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godley, Esq.

No order will be attended to unless the money is first received. Neither the Editor nor Publisher will be accountable for losses that may occur in re-mitting.

Instructions to be as minute as is possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice. Dress goods from Levy's or Evans & Co.'s; cloaks, mantillas, or talmas, from Brodie's, 51 Canal Street, New York; bonnets from T. White & Co.'s; jewelry from Warden's or Caldwell's, Philadelphia.

When goods are ordered, the fashions that prevail here govern the purchase; therefore, no articles will be taken back. When the goods are sent, the transaction must be considered final.

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL FASHION-PLATE FOR MAY.

Fig. 1.—Brown spring silk, gored, the body and skirt being in one piece. The front breadth is cut out in squares, and has the appearance of being buttoned over on either side; it is, however, only cut on one side; the squares are edged with black thread lace; the buttons are silk, with velvet centres. This trimming is also on the side breadths, but only extends half way up the skirt. The sleeves are cut with an elbow, and trimmed to suit the skirt. English split straw hat, with plume and demi veil of black lace.

Fig. 2.—Dress suitable for a watering-place, or evening company. It is of white glaze silk, made infant waist, with a semi loose sleeve, drawn lengthwise into puffs, and trimmed with box plaited blue ribbon. The skirt is trimmed with bonillonnés or puffs, about half a yard in depth, separated by rows of blue ribbon, box plaited. The gloves have two buttons at the wrist and scalloped tops. A large bow, with ends of very wide blue ribbon is placed at the back of the waist.

Fig. 3.—Green cloth habit of the new shade, made with a plaited jockey at the back, and having small pockets in front. A standing linen collar, with black velvet neck-tie. Coat sleeve, with gannet cuff. Leghorn Spanish hat, trimmed with black velvet and white ostrich plumes. The side-saddle has three horns, which is a great protection to the fair equestrienne.

Fig. 4.—Rich purple silk, with plain round waist with velvet belt. The skirt is made three-quarters of a yard longer than usual, and is drawn up at intervals to the proper length, forming puffs, with pointed pieces of purple velvet put on to cover the seams. This is one of the newest trimmings, and is very stylish. The sleeves are done in the same manner. Black straw hat, with peacock plumes.

CHITCHAT UPON NEW YORK AND PHILADELPHIA FASHIONS, FOR MAY.

THE fine May weather has brought out all the spring novelties, and the streets are gay with pretty bonnets, dresses, and mantles. The prevailing colors for bonnets seem to be black and white, violet, light green, and Magenta, though we see some of pink, blue, and mallow. Bunches of fruit and aquatic plants are extensively employed as ornaments, but light feathers are in very good taste, and there is quite a novel arrangement of them: for instance, a bonnet of embroidered white tulle had a border of violet velvet edged with black lace; a thulle crown covered with small very light feathers, white and violet; a thulle curtain bordered with velvet, and as a bandeau point and blonde lace; the strings were one white and the other violet, edged with black lace. Many of the bonnets for young ladies have long illusion veils, either hemmed or edged with blonde caught on top of the bonnet with a large bunch of flowers, and tied under the chin; they are very light and youthful looking. Some of the prettiest bonnets are of white crape trimmed with flowers, lace, or velvet scarfs; one we noticed decorated on the front by a very full blonde ruche in the middle of which was a compact row of red daisies. The bandeau was composed of a row of daisies placed on a velvet band. Another bonnet trimmed outside with a double point of cherry velvet, inside with bunches of black berries and cherry velvet. Black continues to be worn. We saw a pretty bonnet the other day, which, without being very novel, was still rich and quiet. It was composed of fine black hair embroidered with butternuts in silken straw. The ribbon with which it was trimmed was a black ground embroidered also with silken straw; the flowers were entirely black, with jet centres. Chips will be much worn, and as they are so beautiful of themselves they require but little trimming, a spray of flowers on one side being quite sufficient. All kinds of mixed straws will be worn, as well as black, white, and gray. The small, close bonnets called Capelines, sometimes adopted in the country by those who do not like the jaunty little straw hats so much in vogue, are this summer being made of worked muslin lined with colored silk or gauze, and the colors usually selected for this purpose are mallow, pink, blue, lilac, and cerise; they are trimmed with ruches of thulle and ribbon. Other capelines, of a less gay and elegant style, are composed of jaconets, silk, piqué, etc.

From bonnets we next pass to caps; and for ladies who wear caps our fashionable milliners have brought out some very light and pretty ones. A very graceful one formed a net, made of gold thread at the back, and was finished on one side with a bow of black lace and on the other with a delicate pink rose. There are many other styles, and some particularly pretty breakfast caps; we can, however, give them but a passing notice.

Nets for the hair are by no means laid aside; they are still very much worn in morning-dress, and also in evening negligé. Those made of colored chenille or velvet are very becoming; they are usually finished with tassels or rosettes.

Among Brodie's large assortment of silk wraps we noticed some which were extremely stylish; they were mostly of the paletot shape, with thick cords down each seam, and richly ornamented by crochet and bead patés, though there are many mantles and circles with over seams, also corded down each seam. Many were corded with white and trimmed with black and white braid, much resembling stitching, and black and white buttons ornamenting the seams. Some had only pointed collars, others square or pointed capes, corded and richly trimmed with lace, or made entirely of lace. Other wraps were edged with purple and various colors, with pelérine capes, the ends extending down in front to the end of the wrap, with a narrow black lace falling over this colored silk, which had a very pretty effect. Crochet trimmings, lace tassels, and fancy hoods arranged in a hundred different ways almost bewilder one by their style and beauty.

The most fastidious cannot fail to find an elegant and varied style of dress goods to meet their wants and taste at the establishment of Messrs. A. T. Stewart & Co., New York. We saw so many and such beautiful goods that we cannot pretend to do them justice. However, to begin with the less expensive, the chintzes, they are unusually gay and delicate, being generally of white grounds with small figures and bouquets of flowers in the gayest chintz colors thrown over them. The chintz lawns pleased us much; they are rather thicker than a lawn, with a cord through them, and a raised dot of white on a pink, blue, or lilac ground. Most of the muslins were white grounds, with pin dots and single flowers scattered over them. Three new colors have come out this year in the muslins—a new red, purple, and green; and a great recommendation in the eyes of housekeepers is that they are all fast colors. There is a new material, called silk muslin, much resembling grenadine, the exception being that grenadine is all silk, and the other silk and cotton. In this style of goods were five and seven founced robes. The beautiful organdies, so delicate in texture, had, like the muslins, white grounds with pin dots and stripes and bouquets of the most exquisite flowers, or else a mottled gray ground, more delicate than a chintz, with very peculiar figures in gay chintz colors. We saw a few seven and five founced robes, but the novelty of the season is the Chevron dress, of which we give a cut in the front of the Book (page 387). This dress has diagonal stripes of rose de chiné, about an inch and a half in width, meeting in the centre of the breadth, and between these stripes are bouquets of roses with their foliage, which has a charming effect. We have had this design in silk, but this is the first appearance of diagonal stripes on muslin. Very few founced dresses, or rather robe dresses, will be worn, though we saw a few in organdy and barège Anglaise. This latter material can be had in the plain chiné from 12½ to 37½ cents, but the newest styles have embroidered figures over them, which add greatly to their beauty. The summer or Manchester poplins have a cord through them, and are worked with spots in gay-colored silk, of much the same style as many of the silks, and much resembling them in appearance.

Mozambique is another new material; this is thicker than barège Anglaise, and very suitable for travelling-dresses. It can be had in plain chiné, plaids, cheques, stripes, or plain grounds with embroidered figures in gay colors; this last style is exceedingly pretty. The grenadine barège is of the same style as the Mozambiques—a black or delicate gray ground with embroidered spots or figures worked in silk. Pekin cloth, thicker than the last mentioned material, is also very nice for travelling-dresses.

The rich silks are generally of a chiné ground, with large dashed figures, or else a solid ground with very rich embroidered figures or sprays of flowers thrown over them à volanté. These silks are $4.50 a yard, but the same designs are carried out in less expensive goods. The light summer silks are cheques or stripes, with dashed figures; there are also many solid grounds with a thread of white crossing them.

For ladies and children the turban style of hat will be the rage. They can be had of white, black, gray, or mixed straw. Another style is somewhat of the mushroom shape, but has the brim set up about an inch on the crown, and instead of slanting gradually off goes off in a curve, and rolls under at the edge of the brim; these also are to be had of all colors, and will be trimmed with peacocks' and game birds' feathers. FASHION.

CODDEN'S FASHIONS FOR JUNE 1861.

A SUMMER SCENE.

THE VITTORIA.

From the establishment of O. BRODIE, 51 Canal Street, New York Drawn by L. T. VOTER, from actual articles of costume.]

The general characteristics of the style most in vogue this season are preserved in this beautiful garment; the variation which it presents in its particular construction, however, places it in a front rank with its competitors in beauty. The pyramidal creations are bordered with a corded outline of lilac silk—the garment itself being of black taffeta. The upper portion is ornamented with a cape of rich black gu pure lace, falling over the silk and the outer borders of the gores with an effective passementerie, which is continued at their apices by rosettes of zimp.

Fig. 1.—Dress of Mezanbique, gray ground, with Magenta flowers. The dress is gored; body and skirt in one piece; the skirt bound with Magenta silk, and Magenta ribbon bows up the front of the skirt.
 Fig. 2.—Dress of gray summer poplin. Skirt plain; the body has lapels trimmed with blue silk, and a linen collar turns over on this lapel. The sleeves have a blue gauntlet cuff. Each of gray poplin, bound with blue silk. Blue chenille net, trimmed with ribbon.

LATEST FASHIONS.

A lilac spring silk, gored, buttoned from the throat down, and trimmed with a narrow quilled ribbon. Loose sleeve, with puffs laid on.

Child's dress of white muslin. Coat of buff piqué, trimmed with braid, and braided. White straw hat, with white plume.

LA FÉLICES :

MAZOURKA, COMPOSÉE POUR LE PIANO, POUR GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK.

À mon ami, Habib Mollis, New York,

PAR EDWARD AMBUHL.

The musical score is written for piano and consists of two systems of staves. The first system contains four staves, and the second system contains four staves. The music is in 3/4 time and features a key signature of two sharps (F# and C#). The notation includes various musical symbols such as notes, rests, and dynamic markings. The first system begins with a treble clef and a 3/4 time signature. The second system begins with a bass clef and a 3/4 time signature. The score is marked with 'mf' (mezzo-forte) and 'ff' (fortissimo) dynamics. The piece concludes with a double bar line and a repeat sign.

PHILADELPHIA JUNE, 1861.

THE MANUFACTURE OF GUNPOWDER.

We should never advise any one, who is not called by duty, to visit a Powder Factory, for, firstly, you run a risk of being blown to nothing; and, secondly, you increase the danger in which the workmen are placed. So, to save you, reader, from these dangers, and to give you a clear account of the various processes that are gone through to produce this important element of war, we sit down to write. As we enter the gates we observe nothing very particular, and our guide seems to be used to all matters connected with the business, so we go gently on until we reach several large stacks of wood, alder and willow, which are standing there to be dried by the atmosphere, previous to being converted into Charcoal. Each piece of wood is about three feet in length, and the manner of burning is as follows: A series of iron cylinders, each about two feet six inches in diameter and five feet in length, are ranged in a building known as the cylinder house. Each of the cylinders is set in brick-work, so arranged that the hot air from the furnace plays quite round it, causing the heat on the upper and under sides to be uniform. Made to fit these cylinders are others of thinner iron and lighter make, capable of being drawn in or out at pleasure. In this portable cylinder, technically called a slip, the wood is put, and then pushed into the fixed cylinder and shut in by air-tight iron doors, or doors made air-tight by means of sand. As soon as the action of carbonization commences, all the gaseous products of the wood are expelled through a hole at the back of the cylinder, and thence into the flues, where they are burnt. Here is a twofold benefit. The gases are almost sufficient to convert the wood into charcoal, and the great nuisance which would be caused by their escape into the atmosphere is avoided. After remaining in these cylinders at a low red heat for about six hours, the wood is perfectly carbonized. It is then allowed to cool; and when drawn out is charcoal of the purest quality, and is ready for grinding. This process is none other than that of grinding coffee. The charcoal is put into a hopper, from which it falls into the mill, is cut or crushed to pieces, passed through a reel covered with a canvas of the finest mesh, and is then fit to perform its part in the manufacture of gunpowder.

Sulphur is prepared by heating a quantity of crude sulphur in an iron pot, conducting the vapors into cool chambers, where they fall as a very fine powder, called flowers of sulphur. When the chamber becomes warm these flowers of sulphur melt, and run into cylindrical moulds, in which form the sulphur is called roll sulphur, and is quite pure. It is then ground and passed through a very fine sieve, when it also stands ready.

The last and most important ingredient is Nitre, or, as it is more commonly called, saltpetre. This is obtained chiefly from Bengal, and in its crude or "grough" state contains from one to twenty per cent. of impurities; common salt being the chief. In this state then it arrives, and before being used has to be freed from every impurity. This used to be done by repeated boilings and crystallizations; but now it is boiled once and passed (in a fluid state) into large shallow copper pans, called coolers. Now if allowed to cool at rest it forms itself into large crystals, which contain much that is impure; but if you can get the crystals small, there is little impurity to be found. This is obtained by keeping the liquid constantly in motion during the cooling process; so that the nitre crystallizes in very small particles, so small indeed that the saltpetre thus crystallized is called saltpetre flour, and is, if carefully washed with distilled water, absolutely pure, and so fine that no grinding is necessary. Under the old system the saltpetre had to be thrice boiled, thrice set to cool in crystallizing pans, and then melted, run into moulds, cooled, and ground. We are indebted to the French for the new process.

After having then seen our ingredients carefully prepared, we now bring them together in a "house," called the "mixing house." They are here weighed in the following proportions:—

Saltetre	75	per cent.
Sulphur	10	" "
Charcoal	15	" "

These ingredients are then placed in the mixing machine, which is simply a wooden box, through which a shaft passes armed with long copper or gun-metal teeth. The shaft is made to turn on its axis very rapidly, and by means of the teeth the mass is intimately mixed. A bag is placed under the machine, a slide is withdrawn from the bottom, and the powder (for such it is now, but very weak) falls into the bag. The quantity placed in one bag is called a charge, and weighs between forty and fifty pounds. The charge (green charge called generally) is now ready for the incorporating mills, where the several ingredients, which before were only mixed, are now incorporated, or very intimately combined, by means of a heavy grinding pressure. Imagine a large round dish of iron. In the centre of the dish is an upright shaft, made to turn by means of gear-work underneath the floor; on this dish are placed two wheels, called runners, made of iron or stone, each weighing three or four tons. Through the centre of each runner a horizontal spindle passes, which spindle also passes through the upright shaft before mentioned, cutting it at right angles. When the upright shaft is put in motion of course it carries round these runners, which perform about ten revolutions per minute. The weight of the runners causes great pressure upon the powder, which is spread equally over the bottom of the dish, and the small circle in which the runners revolve causes the grinding, by which means, and the aid of water, the intimate mechanical combination of the ingredients, upon which the strength of the powder entirely depends, is obtained. The time necessary to bring the powder to its proper strength varies from one hour to ten, according to the quality required. One manufacturer has patented a process by which he causes the bottom of the dish to be heated, by which means he obtains the required strength in a much shorter time. When taken from these mills it is in broken cakes of a grayish color, and about half an inch in thickness. It is now called mill-cake, and has attained its greatest strength—all after processes decreasing its explosive force, but increasing its durability.

From the incorporating mills it is taken to the press house, where the mill-cake is passed between cylindrical toothed rollers, which in motion turn towards each other, and crush the powder again to dust. On one side of this press house you see a large cubical box placed between four iron columns, which support a huge cross-bar of iron, called a cap; underneath the cap is suspended a cube of wood to fit the box which stands below. The powder, when broken down, is carried to this box, on the bottom of which a layer of it is placed. This layer of powder is covered with a sheet of copper, and on the copper is placed another layer of powder, then another sheet of copper, and so on, alternately a layer of powder and a sheet of copper, until the box is full. A man then turns a small cock, the box begins to rise, and pushes itself against the piece of wood suspended beneath the cap. As this wood fits the box, the box keeps rising, but as it rises the powder is compressed to the requisite hardness. But how is the box made to rise? By hydraulic pressure. The box stands upon the ram, as it is called; this ram fits into an iron cylinder; into the cylinder water is forced, which raises the ram and of course the box placed upon it. The pressure obtained is generally about four tons to the square inch upon the ram. When the pressure is taken off, and the box opened, the powder and copper are compressed into one solid mass; but a few hard blows with a wooden mallet soon cause the cakes to separate. The copper plates are put aside for future use; the cakes of powder, about two feet six inches square and one-eighth of an inch in thickness, are carried to the breaking-down machine, where they are again passed between the toothed rollers and broken into pieces hard and black, of irregular forms, varying from an inch and a half to half an inch in length. The powder is now fit for granulating or corning, as it is called. Before we leave this house we may just get a glimpse at the men here, and yet the men you cannot see, only their intensely black faces and lively eyes. Strong men and true, no doubt, to their employers, but not always conscious that while careful for "the master," they are caring for their own lives.

We take leave of the press house, then, and follow the hard pieces of powder to the granulating house. Here we are in great danger, and not very well able to see it on account of the "dust" flying about. However, we can perceive the "house" is tolerably full of machinery; consisting principally of the toothed cylindrical rolls and "Jacob's Ladders." These "Jacobs" are endless straps passing over wooden wheels, each strap has a number of cups fixed upon it. The powder is "shot" into a hopper on the floor; at the bottom of this hopper one of the wooden wheels rotates, and over it the endless strap passes. In the downward journey the cup is inverted, but no sooner does it get its turn on the bottom wheel that it rights itself, and not only so, but fills itself with powder, which it carefully carries to the housetop, and as it turns on the upper wheel shoots its load headforemost into another hopper, from which it passes between the rollers, and is crushed into the required sized grain. So these "Jacobs" save the trouble and expense of having men to carry up the powder on their backs. The powder here is not only granulated, but a large portion of the dust is taken from it and returned to the incorporating mills.

We have now the powder in grains of various sizes and of a very dull grayish brown color, not much like the powder of commerce. But we shall get it so much like that, that you will recognize it wherever you may meet with it. From the granulating house it is carried to the rubbing house, where the powder is placed in cylindrical vessels of wood or canvas, and rapidly turned upon the vessels' axes. By this motion the grains of powder are hardened, and by the attrition they gain a glossy appearance and look bluish-black. This rubbing of the powder is a great deterioration to the explosive quality of the powder; it makes it less angular, but, as a counterbalance, it is much more durable, being less impervious to moisture than before. Well, having whirled it in the cylinders for ten or twelve hours, and having seen it brought out, and noted its different appearance, we follow it to the drying house. Not long since it used to be dried as follows: The powder was spread upon canvas cases and placed in racks round a room, called the store; into the wall of this building a huge iron pot was built: not standing on its bottom, but so placed that the bottom of the pot should project into the room while the mouth was outside.

In this a fire was kindled, and the bottom of the pot heated to a red heat. Pleasant, certainly, when one entered to see the round red pot glaring in amongst the powder and threatening death and destruction to all. Now the stove is heated by means of steam pipes passing through it, and the temperature usually obtained is about 130. For twenty hours it rests in this warm climate, during which time it parts with all its moisture except about nine per cent. At this stage the powder is somewhat dusty and of different-sized grains; two things then are required, to clean it from the dust, and to separate the grains into the various sizes, for large or small arms. To accomplish these ends, the powder is transported from the stove to the dusting house.

The dusting house, as its name implies, is the place where the powder is dusted, or finally cleansed from any remaining dust. This is an important affair, as the fouling or not fouling of the gun depends greatly upon this matter. It is generally performed by causing the powder to run through a series of reels covered with open canvas, which reels are rapidly whirled round, and while they are in motion all the very fine powder or dust falls through the canvas. When properly dusted, the different-sized grains have to be separated one from another; the "large grain" for artillery; the "fine grain" for rifles; the "double F." and "treble F." for sporting purposes; and so on. When separated it is carefully weighed, put into barrels, headed up, and carried away to magazines, quite finished and ready for use.

These various processes cannot be carried on without much risk to life and property, hence the necessity that exists for the greatest possible care throughout all departments. Every man has clothes to be used only in the houses, so that there can be no chance of the least particle of grit getting on to the clothes, neither is any man permitted to wear metal buttons. All shoes are exchanged for shoes made only of leather, no nails of any kind; and these are worn only in the houses. In the machinery brass and copper are largely employed, because from them it is almost impossible to strike fire; and to prevent any friction under foot should grit get into the houses, the floors are carefully covered with leather. Still, with all these precautions, accidents are not entirely avoided, though greatly diminished.

At the present day, the uneducated Hindoo girl, by the use of her hands simply, could surpass the delicacy and fineness of texture-productions of the most perfect machinery, in the manufacture of cotton and muslin cloths. In England, cotton has been spun so fine, that it would require a thread of 450 miles in length to weigh a pound; but the Hindoo girl had, by her hands, constructed a thread which would require to be extended 1,000 miles to weigh a pound; and the Deccale muslins of her manufacture, when spread on the ground, and covered with dew, are no longer visible.

MAGNETIZED INTO MARRIAGE.

BY METTA VICTORIA VICTOR.

"It's both annoying and ridiculous!"

"Yes, it is, indeed!"

"Just to think, Kennon! Here I am to be married to-night, and it's now four o'clock P. M., and I have 'nothing to wear' but this dusty, dirty, disagreeable travelling suit. Some outrageous rascal stole my carpet-bag, and vamosed, and here I am, minus all the necessities, except the ring; that, I believe, is safe in my vest pocket."

"Oh, that's all! I thought it was something else which you referred to as annoying and ridiculous," said his friend, the groomsman elect, who had come to the depot to receive him.

"What can be more so?" cried the young man, savagely. "Just look at me! And there isn't a ready-made clothing store in this little village, I'll be bound; and if there is, do you suppose I can obtain such cloth, and such a fit! That suit was a miracle in the way of fit and becomingness. It made me even handsomer than usual, so you may judge. If you had a drop of generous blood in your veins, you would pity me."

"I do pity you sincerely, but not for the loss of your wedding-suit."

"What for, then?—my prospective misery?" laughed the expectant lover, with a toss of his head, as he stole a look in the little dusty mirror of the station-house. "O dear! I do look shockingly, Kennon. You'll have to lend me a suit; and you're shorter and broader than I. It will never do for Emily's lace and white satin to brush against these soiled habiliments. I've a mind to have the wedding delayed until I can send back to town."

"There will be no necessity for your delaying it."

"And I couldn't disappoint myself so much, if there was. If Emily is waiting to have me, I cannot be so cruel to her—O no!"

Kennon looked in the bright triumphant face before him, the face of a man elate with happiness, on which the loss of the important carpet-bag had thrown a shade of annoyance, as if truly to set off its light. His own expression was grave. He opened his lips and shut them once or twice before he could force himself to say what had to be said. "The loss of your wedding-suit is really quite à propos"—with an attempt to smile; "when you have lost the bride, you do not need the apparel."

Stewart Cameron looked up quickly at his friend; and, meeting his troubled eye, stammered out, "Is Emily dead?"

"O no, not so bad as that, but she—she—"

"Be quick with your bad news."

"Ran away last night with her cousin Gardiner."

"Indeed! I wish her good luck with him."

The tone of quiet scorn deceived his friend for an instant; but when he raised his eyes again, he saw, by the sunken, haggard look which had fallen upon all that bloom and sparkle, that the blight had been as sharp as it was sudden. He feared that Stewart would fall, and said: "Take my arm, and I will tell you all I know about it as we walk along."

"Where shall we go?" asked Stewart, with the vague air of one who has had a blow, and is struggling back to consciousness.

"To her father's. Yes, they are expecting you. They want to receive you, and testify their sympathy, and their own trouble about it. Mrs. Bell charged me not to return without you. I feel sorry for her—not only the impropriety of the affair, and the gossip attendant, but she liked you as much as she disliked Gardiner. She has spent the day in tears."

"They are married, are they not?"

"Yes; the ceremony was performed in the next village, during the stoppage of the train at the station. Everything was well planned. I presume you passed them to-day on the road. Nobody wonders that Gardiner Bell should do a dishonorable thing; but that Emily should prove so treacherous is astonishing. I see no reason for her having played such a game, since no one compelled an engagement against her wishes."

"Compelled it!" muttered Stewart, between his shut teeth. "I believed that girl loved me, Kennon, as much as I believed there was a heaven above us."

"I have a curious theory," continued his friend, "but I do not expect you nor any of her friends to give faith to it. I believe he has bewitched her; that is, influenced her by other agencies than her own free will to the step she has taken. I believe he has magnetized her, or something—I hardly know what myself; but gained some unholy ascendancy over her will. I believe that she did love you—perhaps still does; but that he has exerted some strange fascination over her which has finally led her away, struggling to the last. I do not think it was in Emily's nature to have allowed these preparations for the wedding to go on, if she had been purposing this catastrophe all the time."

In the mind of the unhappy man beside him floated a vision of her whom he had come to marry, and found a living lie. The face, child-like in its innocence, with the trusting eyes, the trembling, sensitive mouth, the fair forehead; it wore a look which he had never seen upon it—not of careless audacity for the falsehood she had acted, not of shame and contrition, but a frightened, pleading look, in which terror and sorrow lurked, a hesitation, a struggle, as if compelled by some unknown power in a direction she was averse to taking. Involuntarily he stretched out his hand, as if answering her cry to be saved. The next instant he sneered at his own fancy, and walked on more firmly than before.

He would not have obeyed the request of Emily's family to come to them if he had not cherished a feeling of filial affection and reverence for her mother. A fierce rebellion arose in his mind against the sympathy which he felt would be lavished upon him. He was haughty and self-reliant, defying the pity or curiosity of the world; but when he came in sight of the 'familiar mansion,' when he walked up the shadowy avenue, through the broad, old-fashioned hall, into the parlor, and saw, standing to receive him, Emily's mother, pale, with tears on her cheeks, he was unnerved. Going to her quickly, he flung his arms about her, kissing her forehead with quivering lips. As he led her to a seat and bade her rest herself, looking up, he saw standing in the window a young lady who so closely resembled Emily that for an instant he was deceived. His mistake was apparent to him almost before it was made; it was a relative; probably the cousin whom she had written to him was to play the part of bridesmaid. She was looking at him earnestly, but her eyes fell upon meeting his. A strange sensation oppressed him upon encountering her glance, which he threw off with an effort.

"Valencia, my dear," said Mrs. Bell, as soon as she could speak, "this is Mr. Cameron. You know each other, though you have never met before. Stewart, this is Miss Wood, my niece, who was Emily's best-beloved and most intimate cousin."

Miss Wood came forward and shook hands with him. He had often heard that she was just the stature and age of Emily, that there was a very strong resemblance to each other. They were, indeed, almost surprisingly alike; the same wavy brown hair, the same clear blue in the eyes, the same lightness and pliancy of the rounded form; yet there was a difference in expression, more apparent to Stewart than it had ever been to any one else. She looked as Emily ought to have looked, considering the part she had played; a "lurking devil in the eye," so very prudent, so very alert that no one but a person of Stewart's discernment would have detected it at all. Swimming behind that lovely azure, he saw it dart forth and draw itself back again instantly, while one could look down into the unfathomable depths of Emily's eyes and see nothing but calm and purity to the very bottom of the soul; at least, so it had always been, but of course those eyes had been lying ones, too. He, with all his knowledge of men and women, all his unusual quickness of perception and coolness of judgment, had been egregiously deceived, fooled! He almost flung away the soft hand which pressed his with silent sympathy, whereat the young girl opened her eyes a trifle wider, and then smiled. The smile seemed to say, "You are excusable for any degree of rudeness to-day, poor Mr. Cameron!" and irritated him like a finger laid upon the bare flesh.

He felt sorry for his hasty judgment when he perceived the delicacy with which she withdrew until Mrs. Bell could relate to him the particulars of Emily's flight, as far as known, and all the painful conjectures, doubts, and fears which distressed her.

"She had remarked," she observed, in the midst of her narration, "that Emily had not seemed so happy for the last three or four weeks; she had grown pale, was restless at night, ate but little, and would lose herself, in the moments of busiest occupation, in idle reveries; yet when started from these by the playful rallying of her companion, her face would be full of gloom, sometimes of terror, instead of the blushes and smiles most natural to the circumstances. Yet she (the mother) would not and could not believe that these moods were caused by anything more serious than passing regrets at leaving her home, and timid apprehensions of that future state to which she yet looked forward with eagerness; the tumult of joy and fear common to betrothed maidens near the threshold of marriage. She had observed no intimacy between Emily and the cousin with whom she had so strangely eloped. None of the family approved of the young man; he had never visited them frequently, owing to the coldness with which they treated him since an avowal of love for Emily which he had made three years ago, when she was but fifteen years of age. Their reasons for disliking him was their knowledge of the natural want of integrity which he had displayed from a child, and their fears that his habits were not those to make a wife happy. Then, too, although they gave him credit for being as much attached to her as it was in his nature to be to any one, they knew that her fortune was the principal object with him in seeking to marry her. Within the last fortnight," continued Mrs. Bell, "he has called here more frequently than ever before. As Valencia came here about that time, and he appeared to come as a relative, to make himself agreeable to her, and as Emily's wedding was so near at hand, and there was always young company and much gaiety about the house, we treated him with less coldness. But, ah me! who could have anticipated so woful a result?"

Mrs. Bell wept silently as she concluded her story. Stewart Cameron paced the lengths of the parlors distractedly, and Mr. Bell, coming in, almost groaned as he shook him by the hand. Kennon remained in the little tea-room off the parlors, trying to keep up conversation with Valencia, for he was too solicitous about his friend to leave him. When a servant summoned the family to tea, the dainties which were to have furnished "the marriage table" seemed like "funeral baked meats." But little was eaten, and that in silence and constraint. Everywhere was some reminder of the feasting and merriment which were to have filled the now desolate house.

During the evening, Valencia played and sang a little, but the time wore away drearily, until Kennon took leave, and then Mrs. Bell herself offered to show Stewart to his chamber.

"We mourn her as one dead," said she, as she stepped in with him, closing the door and looking about. "Oh, Stewart! this was to have been the bridal-chamber. Look here, upon this bed; she left them all behind; they were prepared in honor of you."

He looked, and saw the exquisite dress of pearl-colored silk, the light over-robe of misty lace, the delicate handkerchief, the prayer-book, gloves, the wreath and veil—all but the lovely form which should have inhabited these bridal garments.

"Mrs. Bell, I have a curious request to make of you. I wish you would give these to me. They shall be to me a reminder of what was to have been. I will give them to my spiritual bride. Henceforth women are nothing to me—that is, no one but you, whose heart I know; but if I wish to please my starved fancy with the picture of a wife such as I hoped for, I will fill this apparel with an imaginary form, which I will dream is mine, and true to me."

She could not laugh at the sad conceit; her own feelings were too miserable. She answered that they were his, to take away with him, if he wished; and, bidding him good night, left him to the solitude created by the broken promise of her who was to have been with him.

It might have been midnight, or later, that Stewart Cameron, alone with his thoughts, felt the heat of the June night intolerable. Either the air was really oppressive, or his own thick-crowding emotions suffocated him. The windows were open, and out of one of these he leaned, breathing the odor of roses from the vines which hung thickly along the trellis-work of the porch beneath him. The roses of the year before had heard him tell the story of his love to blushing cheeks and kindling eyes; and every one knows there is nothing like the ghosts of vanished perfumes to haunt the memory with undying tenacity. The night was dark, except for the few wild stars which peered through the warm clouds which promised rain for to-morrow. Leaning there, breathing that haunting sweetness, and staring out into blank space, Stewart became aware of some one cautiously approaching the house from one of the side avenues. His senses were preternaturally acute that night, and he saw the men, who didn't see him, steal along and enter the porch. The next moment, there was the whisper of voices mingled with the fragrance floating up to him. He might have thought of house-breakers, or of the parlor-maid giving audience to some lover; but the first words were audible to him, driving all inference away, in the desire to hear every syllable.

"Is she here?"

"Who? Emily?"

"Yes, Emily! confound her! You don't mean to say she is not here?"

"Of course she is not. How does it happen she is not with you? What have you come back for?"

"She has run away; actually given me the slip, and now I'm in a pretty kettle of fish. But the knot is tied, tight as the parson can tie it, and no power on earth shall keep her away from me."

"How did it happen that she left you?"

"I don't know much more about it than you do; but the fact is, Valencia, after we got away from you, the spell didn't seem to more than half work. She went to the minister's all right, and was married willingly enough—I can swear him to testify to that; but soon after, she began to look uneasy, to start, and be nervous, and then she got to crying, and finally asked me to take her back home. I told her we were married now, and going home would do no good; that I wanted her to go with me to visit my friends in Chicago, and that we'd go up the lakes and all around before we returned. So she said no more, and seemed reconciled. We were riding all the time in the cars, for I feared pursuit, and wanted to get out of harm's way. We rode all night, till, about nine in the morning, the cars stopped for breakfast at a station. She breakfasted with me, and I left her in the ladies' room a moment, while I bought myself some cigars, and when I went for her she was gone. I rushed into the cars and ran through them, for they were about to start, but I could see her nowhere. Just as I left them to return to the station, they moved off, and at the same time a train from the opposite direction also left the depot. It struck me in an instant that she had secreted herself aboard of that train for the purpose of returning home, and I darted after it, caught the last platform, dragged myself up, and rode all the way back in the same car with that poor fellow that I cut out so nicely. I should have delighted myself with the idea of his disappointment, if I hadn't been so uneasy. But you see, Val, I went carefully through and through the train, and there was no Emily to be seen. So I just stepped off at the station next this village, and waited till dark before I came over. I still thought she would take the next train, and be here by this time. I'm glad she isn't, for I'm bound to find her and keep her. She's mine, and she's got to stay mine.' She'll be a little restive at first, but she'll get accustomed to me in course of time. It was lucky you saw me this evening, when you passed down the garden-walk with that young gentleman. Did you pick up my note?"

"Of course, or how should I have kept the appointment?"

"By the way, how do you like the discarded bridegroom?"

"Oh, very much; more, even, than I expected. He's just the man worth risking one's life for. He'll be difficult to conquer, but that will make my triumph the more splendid."

"Glad you fancy him, Val. Wish you good luck. He was part of the consideration, you know. But just at this crisis I'd like a little of your wit to help me in this new state of affairs. What had I best do about finding Emily? I didn't know she had any purse of her own with her. I don't know but she'll commit suicide, or go insane, or something. I wish your power had extended a little farther, Valencia. You have influenced her will, but you haven't made her love me, after all."

"Did I promise to?"—with a little laugh which made the listener shiver. "No, Gardiner, I've fulfilled my part of the agreement; and if you can't win her love after you've got her for a wife, it will be your own fault. You've too good an opinion of yourself to despair."

"Don't be sarcastic, Val; not with me. What I want of you is—if she should get back here before I know, to renew your influence over her, and make her pliable to my wishes. She's my wife, you know; married me of her own free will."

"Apparently—yes!"

"That person is not going to prolong his stay, is he? I should think delicacy would induce him to get away from here as quickly as possible."

"He shall stay as long as I can induce him, that's certain—or where would my chances be? If Emily should make her appearance here, what can she say or do? No force, no unreasonable or unlawful persuasion has been used. She is your wife, and must submit to it. She'll realize soon enough the necessities of the case. Still, I hope you can keep her away from here for the present, for my sake. But I must go in, Gardiner; it's too damp here for me, and I wish to look my best in the morning."

The interview was ended; the conspirators (if such they were) parted, leaving their listener in a state of excitement unparalleled in his experience. Joy that Emily was free from the presence and attentions of that detestable man, fear that she yet might be found by him and held as his wife, unable to escape him however much she might loathe him, disputed with each other, overwhelming his own loss, his terrible conviction that she was bound to another by ties which denied her to him forever, and blent with all was wonder at the mystery which involved the whole case. Again that face, appealing and terrified, and those eyes which seemed to cry out to him, floated before his mental vision, until he felt as if he must fly—fly where? and to what purpose?

The brief night of that season soon gave place to the harbingers of dawn. By four o'clock it was light; by five he was down upon the porch, unquiet and watchful, waiting to see Mrs. Bell and tell her what he had heard, so that they might immediately decide upon what steps to take. As he walked there, unmindful of the refreshing morning breeze, another person came out to speak with him.

A moss-rose could not be sweeter or more modest than Valencia Wood, as she appeared this morning. She seemed afraid to insult his troubles with her pity, speaking to him so gently, looking at him so timidly.

"You did not rest last night, Mr. Cameron; you are pale, and your hand is hot"—dropping it, with a little sigh. She had taken it as she greeted him, without any advance upon his part.

"I did not rest!" thundered Stewart, with a look which made her recoil. "You did not expect that I would. But I heard and saw what you also did not expect I would. Tell me, girl, what unholy power you have used over Emily! Do not deny. Remember! I heard every word which you and he uttered here, on this spot, last night."

Her eyelids trembled and her color changed, but presently she raised her eyes with a look of surprise and resentment. "What do you mean, Mr. Cameron?"

"Do you dare to affect ignorance, Miss Valencia? I am not a man to be trifled with. You, if you are a woman, and that dishonorable friend of yours shall suffer all the punishment I can heap upon you. You shall be disgraced, at least."

"Either you have dreamed, Mr. Cameron, or your sudden loss has disordered your intellect. You address strange language to me, which I bear with at present as we bear with the sick or insane. He must be laboring under some singular delusion," she added, half aside, and eying him suspiciously.

Stewart was perplexed. Facts which seemed appallingly certain a few moments before began to grow dim and confused. He could not, for the life of him, arrange them systematically in his mind, and bring one to bear upon another. Had he indeed been dreaming? "Absurd! impossible!" So he muttered to himself, and looked into Valencia's eyes steadily, to confirm himself, as one, in trying to grasp a thought which has escaped, will look into the eyes of another.

"Tell me what it was you dreamed," she said, in the manner of a person soliciting the confidence of a child.

"But I did not dream!"

"You must have dreamed, Mr. Cameron."

Her low voice, patient and kind, soothed and disarmed him. Yes! he had had a frightful dream. He could have sworn to it as a verity, which must have been owing to the feverish state of his mind, for now he perceived it to have been a phantom; and he walked to and fro, with the young lady keeping step with him, feeling all his hopes and fears subside, and the dull pain settling down again.

They continued thus until breakfast was announced. Valencia was not forward in conversation, occasionally remarking upon some trifling subject. She did not annoy him with questions, nor with expressions of sympathy. When she spoke, only the under-current of feeling in her tones betrayed her generous pity.

How much she was like Emily! Stewart felt it more with every added glance and word. Twin sisters never more closely resembled each other. Ah, if he could persuade himself that she was what Emily ought to have been, he might fling the past to the winds. The shadow of such a thought just hovered on the borders of his mind for an instant, and vanished the next, as if it had not been. Again it trembled back, as we have seen spots of sunshine flicker across the gloom of some closed room, coming and going through some almost imperceptible interstice.

"Valencia, my love, you and Stewart must not forget breakfast!"—and Mrs. Bell stepped out to bid her guest good-morning. "It is five minutes since Nora summoned us."

They went in together. It was evident that Mrs. Bell reposed great confidence in her niece, and felt a warm affection for her. She treated her with the tenderness of a mother.

"Surely these people know her well. I must have been totally mistaken in my first impressions." And Stewart mentally begged pardon for the injustice he had done her in his thoughts.

With the intention of winning him from himself, Valencia offered, when breakfast was over, to play for him, as she understood he was fond of music. She took pride in her skill as a musician, and put on no false airs deprecating her own ability. She played as if to challenge his criticism, and he praised her sincerely.

The occurrences of the past night receded farther and farther away, only returning to him at intervals with a startling distinctness which for a few moments would overpower him. He would reach for his hat and stride forth, as if called of an imperative voice, only to grow doubtful, to hesitate, to return. All the forenoon, Valencia exerted herself to entertain him, succeeding better as the hours rolled on, until her aunt solicited her assistance about some feminine employment, and he was left alone.

When she was away, Stewart began to doubt himself and her. He realized the plain, unvarnished fact of the night before; he wondered how he could have deluded himself with the idea that it was a dream. "She has bewitched me as she did Emily. I will not see her again. I will leave this house instantly. I will say nothing to any one of my plans, but I will upset this planet but I will find that poor lost child, and set my mind at rest. If she has married of her own choice, I will bid her God speed; if she has been the victim of any infernal plot, I will be her avenger."

Calling a servant who was passing through the hall, he asked for Mrs. Bell—to speak with her alone a moment; and when she came, he told her he wished to bid her farewell for the present, but that she would see him again soon. He would leave the articles she had given him as surety of his swift return. Would she care for them sacredly until he claimed them?

His hostess remonstrated against his abrupt departure.

"I am going to try and find Emily," whispered Stewart. "I have good reason to know that her flight was a forced one; that strange means have been used for her deception. I am bound to know the truth, for my own sake, for yours, for hers. You may trust my discretion, Mrs. Bell. You are her mother, and know that I only seek her good. Let me go. If I ascertain that she has been sacrificed to the wishes and ambitions of others, I will put you in possession of facts immediately. I will not say now whom I suspect. Do not be surprised to see Emily here any moment. She has fled from that man. Do not look at me as if I were wild. I tell you I know it. If she comes, keep watch over her; protect her from all untoward influence, especially Valencia!"

"There is Emily now!" almost shrieked the mother.

Stewart followed her glance, and saw, standing in the window where he had seen Valencia the day before, Emily, looking at them with dreary, haggard eyes, her face pale, her lips quivering as if she were trying to speak, wearing her travelling bonnet and shawl. As they started towards her, she walked away, and when they reached the porch she was nowhere to be seen. They hastened to look around the corner of the house, and encountered Valencia, her bonnet swinging on her arm.

"We have seen Emily; she was at this window an instant ago," gasped Mrs. Bell. "Did you meet her?"

"Meet her? No, my dear aunt, and you did not see her. It was I who stood in the window."

"You!" exclaimed both.

"Certainly"—laughing. "Did I look so much like Emily?"

"But how could you have on her bonnet and shawl?"

"I did not, dear auntie; I had on my own. Here is the bonnet. You sent me to the garden for flowers. It was your thinking so much about poor Emily that gave her dress and expression to me. Do, dear, dear aunt, try and be less troubled."

Mrs. Bell and Stewart looked at each other.

"You both of you act demented," still jested the young lady. "Shall I prove my own identity? Well, then, Mr. Cameron, I stood at the window and overheard you tell my aunt that you were going away; also to 'beware of Valencia!' Now, what did you mean by that? I shall have a great deal to forgive, I'm afraid. Come! relinquish your idea of departing before dinner, and walk with me in the garden. There is a Victoria Regia just opening. Did you ever see one in full bloom? This royal plant floats on the bosom of its silver basin like the very dove of peace. It will calm you just to look at it."

Her fingers rested lightly on his arm, leading him away. Mrs. Bell watched her a moment.

"How much tact Valencia has!" she thought to herself, admiringly. "She is a noble girl! I hope, if Stewart ever recovers from the shock of Emily's treatment, that he will offer himself to Valencia. She is poor, too, and needs just such a husband to gratify her fastidious taste, and support her in the position she is entitled to. O dear! my heart palpitates yet with the fright I got when I mistook her for my poor child." And, with a sigh, she returned to the house, leaving the young couple leaning against the edge of the marble basin, inhaling the heavy odors of the superb flower.

The remainder of that day Stewart Cameron was lost in an intoxicating dream. The rich perfume of the Victoria Regia acted like an opiate upon him, or, rather, like a taste of the vision-bringing haschich, transfusing his senses until the things about were floating in atmospheres of gold, warmed through with flushes of rose. He felt too indolent to any longer pursue his purpose of seeking Emily. A delicious languor enthralled his will; he yielded easily to the guidance of Valencia, who chatted with him, half playfully, half seriously, by the fountain, looking herself like some living lily, except for the soft fire in her blue eyes. Stewart vexed himself to think whether it were her breath or the creamy flower beside them which gave forth such sweet aromas. When the sun beat down his meridian heat upon the garden, they sought refuge in the cool parlors, and still Valencia hovered by his side. When Kennon called, she left for a few moments, to change her morning dress, returning soon, brilliant, and beautifully attired.

"I tell you what it is," said Stewart, following his friend out upon the avenue, at the expiration of his call, "I am not certain that I shall so much regret Emily's conduct. That cousin of hers is a remarkable girl."

"Very remarkable!" spoke up Kennon, quickly, curling his lip. "My friend, are you mad?"

"So I have been told twice or thrice to-day," laughed Cameron.

"Well, I believe it. Take my advice, and get away from her. It is my opinion that she has made all the trouble."

"Impossible! How could Valencia make trouble? Mrs. Bell regards her as a daughter; they all love and respect her," spoke the young man, with haste, oblivious of his own expressions, made a few hours ago.

"I don't know how she has made it. But she can't deceive me, nor influence me. She has tried her game with me; but, fortunately, I am not impressible. She didn't find a bit of imagination to work upon. My nerves are good, and my fancy stolid. Get your hat, Cameron, and take a walk; it will do you good."

He obeyed, with evident reluctance. Valencia would have prevented his going; but Kennon kept by his side, and she was obliged to allow him to depart.

It was sunset when they went out, and almost nine in the evening when Stewart returned. Miss Wood was watching for him on the steps, a light scarf thrown over her head and shoulders, and the full power of the moon shining upon her.

"You have stayed away a great while," she said. "It is too lovely a night to be lost indoors. I have been out all the evening. See how the roses glow in the moonlight."

"It was to have been my honeymoon!" exclaimed he, bitterly.

She did not speak; but her eyes, lustrous and warm, down-wavering beneath his, put the question into his mind—"Why should it not be, still?"

"Valencia! Emily was false, but you will be true! Her bridal garments are in my room, in empty mockery of the bride. Why should you not wear them? To-morrow night, at this hour, will you marry me?"

"So soon? O Stewart! and we were strangers yesterday!"

"Not strangers. Mrs. Bell has told me how much she loved you, and you know what my family and fortune are. You are only a better Emily for me. It will please your aunt, and give the gossips of this detestable village a pretty theme for romancing."

For an hour or more they lingered upon the steps.

"Go, Valencia, and tell your aunt. If the plan meets her approval, there is nothing to prevent its consummation. Kennon shall be my attendant, and you will find some pretty maiden for yours. The feast shall be spread again, the guests rebidden, and the wedding shall be a merry one. Good-night, sweet." He kissed her, and she glided away.

"I must attend to that suit of clothes," thought Stewart, coming back to homely necessities. "It's a pity, after all, that I lost them." And as he went to his room, he admired the beautiful bridal paraphernalia still flung across the foot of the bed, which he had not disturbed during the long hours of the previous night.

Exhausted by excess of mental excitement, he was soon buried in profound slumber, from which he was awakened by a bright ray of moonlight stealing across his eyelids. He must have been asleep some time, for the moon hung low in the western heaven. He saw it, large and nearly full, with that mysterious light which it wears as it approaches morning, and which gives to the most common-place objects an enchantment theirs at no other time. It was not, perhaps, then wonderful that the figure which he at once perceived standing at the foot of the bed should have impressed him so strongly. He saw Emily, still pale, still troubled, with her travelling dress and cloak upon her; but her bonnet was off, and her fine, long hair, all dishevelled, rushed down about her shoulders in a torrent of glistening gold. She had the bridal veil in her hands, and was arranging it upon her head, with wistful smiles, mingled with apprehensive looks, whispering to herself, and glancing about the room as if fearful of being pursued or chided.

"Emily!"

"Hush, dearest! I am almost ready; and if Valencia should know I am here, before the minister arrives, she will call me away with her eyes. I don't want to leave you, Stewart—I cannot—I will not! See! my veil is on! where is my handkerchief?—one moment."

"Tell me all about it, my Emily. Are you afraid of any one?" He spoke very gently, fearing to alarm her.

"There! I am ready, quite ready, Stewart." With beaming face and eyes overflowing with love, she held out her hand to an imaginary Stewart, and glided out of the room with him.

Trembling with conflicting feelings Cameron deserted his couch, dressed himself, went out into the hall, down into the parlors, and all over the lower part of the house, looked out on the portico, but saw and heard no one; the family was lost in slumber; he returned, to distract himself with doubts, until the intense reality of broad daylight persuaded him he had been deceived by a vivid dream. No! not deceived, for the veil and handkerchief were gone.

Going out of his room, as soon as he heard the household stir, he met Valencia in the hall, who advanced to him in the sweetest confusion, blushes on her cheeks, tears in her eyes.

"What will you think of me, Mr. Cameron? Was I in your room last night? Oh, I know I must have been, for here are the treasures which I stole away. But I hope you are unaware of my nocturnal visit. I shall have to confess to you that I am a sleep-walker. Sometimes, though not frequently, and generally when my mind is disturbed, I make these somnambule excursions. I am so sorry. But then"—with a beautiful, shy smile—"is it any wonder that I was agitated when I went to my dreams last night?"

He put back the veil and handkerchief which she extended towards him, caught her hand, and kissed her forehead.

"We will cure you of this dangerous habit, my sweet one. And now, have you consulted your Aunt Bell? Is it to be?"

"She has consented. As for me, Mr. Cameron, it is not for me to refuse so much happiness. All things shall be arranged as you desire."

At eight o'clock of that evening a small company was gathered in the parlors, to witness the marriage of the newly betrothed couple. Only the intimate friends of the family were present, as they felt too much grieved and mortified by Emily's conduct, to wish for a merry-making. Neither Mrs. Bell nor Kennon, (the latter officiated as groomsmen) expressed the surprise which they felt at the hasty arrangements of Cameron, so at variance with his usual manner of conducting the important affairs of life. They looked upon this hasty wedding as the result of pique; but as Valencia seemed to be a proper and lovable person, they hoped for a moderate degree of happiness to follow.

The couple, with their attendants, had entered from a side room, and the minister had stepped forward, when a shriek rang through the house, and Emily, pursued by Gardiner Bell, rushed through the startled assembly, and flung herself in her mother's arms.

"Give her to me! she is my wife," burst forth her pursuer, as the arms of the mother closed involuntarily about her child. "You've had her hid in your house now for two days, and I think it's about time she came to my house."

"We have not hidden her, Gardiner—she has not been here," answered Mrs. Bell, looking in the dark, excited face of the nephew she had always so disliked.

"See! I have been here, dear mother."

Stewart Cameron looked in the face of Valencia—it was white as ashes beneath the bridal veil of her cousin; her eyes were fixed straight upon Emily with a look of threatening.

"Do not let her look at me," almost screamed Emily, hiding her eyes in the bosom of her mother. "If she looks at me thus, I shall never be able to tell you all the truth, which I feel that you ought to be informed of. You know how I have always loved and trusted Valencia; she is a selfish girl, mother, and I wish to undeceive you. She has ruined my happiness forever. You know, do you not, that she is a powerful magnetizer? When she first came, and always on previous visits, I have allowed her to experiment on me; I have placed myself in her power, until finally she gained the ascendancy over my will. She could influence me when I did not know of it, could bend me to her purposes, could prevent and change my best intentions. Oh, it is terrible to think of it! She heard me talk so much of Stewart, and when she found how wealthy he was, I have no reason to doubt she formed a deliberate purpose to get him from me."

"Fool!" sneered Valencia; but Stewart grasped her hand with such a pressure that she relapsed into silence beneath his now superior will.

"Once she said to me that things were unequally distributed—that she and Gardiner were both poor, and Stewart and I were both wealthy; couldn't we make an exchange?"—but I thought it a passing jest. She told me she and Gardiner were engaged, but wished to keep the matter secret for a time, as an excuse for his coming here so much. I cannot explain it by words; it is still a mystery to me; but gradually she obtained such an ascendancy over my will that she could compel me to do her bidding. She willed me to encourage Gardiner, she willed me to flee with him, and so powerful was her influence that it carried me through the marriage ceremony and kept me in a state of bewilderment for hours after. I cannot tell you the despair which seized me, as that influence wore away. I need not tell it, for it cannot remove the misery. I fled from the man I had married. I was wrought up to a state of madness, and had all its cunning and vigilance. I made my way back home, hating, loathing Valencia; but unfortunately, she was the first person I encountered after I reached the grounds, and the moment her eyes were fixed upon me, I felt that I was yielding again. I struggled fearfully. I got as far as the parlor-window, I saw you, heard you speak, but she called me, and I obeyed her. She willed me to remain concealed, and for the life of me, I could not reveal myself. That night she took me to her room. When she was asleep I got away from her, I went to my own room; half-crazed with trouble, and unnerved by her unhealthy influence, I imagined myself the bride I had hoped to be, but she stole after me, and drew me back again. She proposed to give me up, this evening, to Gardiner Bell; she left me in a sound, magnetic sleep when she went to dress herself for this ceremony; but something mercifully awoke me, I arose clear-minded, mistress of my own powers; and when I started to break up this unholy match, and found this man watching for me, heaven itself, I think, gave me power to escape him, to resist all, to betray all."

She stood up, now, unassisted, untrembling, facing her enemies with a will which they could not make to waver.

"You are my wife, and the law shall compel you to obey me," spoke up Gardiner Bell, savagely.

"Never! my lips pronounced words which give you a legal right to me, but they were spoken by another's will, and not by mine. I will die in my mother's arms, but I will never go with you."

Both Mr. and Mrs. Bell threw protecting arms about their daughter.

"She shall stay here with us until this matter is investigated," said the father, and what he said he acted up to. There was that in his eyes that made his nephew's cower.

"Now, I have something to say in confirmation of Emily's story," said Stewart Cameron. He had dropped Valencia's hand, and stood apart from her, leaving her solitary in her shame and confusion. Great as was her effrontery, she knew that he had proof infallible of the truth of every word which her cousin had uttered. "The first night of my stay here, I overheard a conversation between Valencia Wood and Gardiner Bell, in which this plot was discussed freely, and in which he asked if Emily had fled home at her desertion. I saw, in company with Mrs. Bell, Emily at the window at the time she speaks of. She was in my room last night for the veil and handkerchief, which she carried out. And now, to account for my own astonishing foolishness, I can only say that this sorceress so bewitched me that all the facts were turned to her own advantage. I have felt like one in a dream, and I just begin to see that I have been in a dream. Unluckily, however, for this accomplished magnetizer, I have not quite been magnetized into marriage."

Valencia left the room, without a friend to follow her.

When Stewart went to his chamber that night, a second time the wedding garments mocked him, empty of the bride.

Valencia left that very night, on the midnight train, disappointed, and utterly miserable but for the thought that she had left two hopeless hearts behind her.

Retribution, in this case, was awfully speedy for one of the guilty parties. Gardiner Bell accompanied her, and in passing from one car to another, during the darkness, he fell between them, and was killed.

So that, not many months thereafter, the empty bridal garments were filled with life, love, and beauty, and Valencia Wood gnawed her lips with vexation as she read of a long-delayed wedding.

FLOWERS, AND WHAT MAY BE LEARNED FROM THEM.

BY HARLAND COULTAS.

THE rich variety of flowers and forest trees which cover the earth, were undoubtedly created to minister to our well-being, and it is plainly the intention of the Creator that we should study them. Especially ought young people to be encouraged in this study, for it brings pleasure to the mind and health to the body.

The wild flower is the earliest thing of beauty which every child that treads a green field, or wanders along a green lane, takes to itself; it loves the flowers as it were by instinct. And this love of beauty ought to be cultivated, because it is allied to the love of virtue. Wild flowers are the loveliest and most accessible of God's created works, and none can spend a few of "life's hours" in becoming acquainted with them, without being led to sympathize with "whatsoever things are pure and lovely" in the moral world. "Never lose an opportunity of seeing anything beautiful. Beauty is God's handwriting—a wayside sacrament; welcome it in every fair face, every fair sky, and every fair flower, and thank Him for it, the fountain of all loveliness; drink it in, simply, earnestly, with all your eyes; 'tis a charmed draught, a cup of blessing."

"Blessed be God for flowers,
For the bright, gentle, holy thoughts that breathe
From out their odorous beauty like a wreath
Of sunshine on life's hours."

The most impressive lessons are also taught us by the flowers. In them we see exemplified our own brief life-history, the passage from infancy to manhood when human life is in its flower and beauty, and a family gathers around our table, and the transition from manhood to the tomb, for like the flowers we have a limited amount of vital force which is soon expended, we die and disappear, and others take our place.

Assuredly the flowers are under the Divine government, and not only they, but also our own world, and every one of those bright worlds which adorn the landscape of the heavens. A flower is a beautiful world in itself. It is formed from the matter of the earth and atmosphere which is attracted about a seed, and every atom moves to its place in accordance with the operation of irresistible laws. There is no chance work in the building up of a flower. Now it only requires an enlargement of mind to see that the same principle applies to the world. It is the littleness of Atheism, the want of that lofty and true conception of the simplicity and grandeur of Nature which cannot see in a flower or forest tree a microcosm or little world, and from thence be deeply convinced that there is a Divine Providence ruling over the affairs of this world. Oh! how much more cheerful and happy in reference to temporal things, if we had more confidence in Him who has so beautifully clothed the flowers and so bountifully provided for them. It is impossible to imagine an appeal more touching to our hearts, or convincing to our reason, than those words of the great moral Teacher, "And why take ye thought for raiment? Consider the lilies of the field how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin; and yet I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?"

Flowers! when the Saviour's calm benignant eye
Fell on your gentle beauty: when from you
That heavenly lesson for all hearts he drew,
Eternal, universal as the sky;
Then in the bosom of you purity,

A voice he set as in the temple shrine;
That life's quick travellers never might pass you by,
Unwarned of that sweet oracle divine.

And though too oft its low celestial sound
By the harsh notes of workday care is drowned,
And the loud steps of vain, unlistening haste;

Yet the great Omnipath no tone of power
Mightier to reach the soul in thought's hushed hour
Than yours, meek lilies, chosen thus and graced

MRS. HEMANS.

This world is full of beauty little understood or appreciated. There is an overflowing goodness which is ever changing the vegetable covering throughout the year for our instruction and enjoyment, and giving a renewed charm to the ever-varying features of the landscape. Through ignorance we do not see and appreciate the kindness of that Providence which thus surrounds our path through life with blessing.

That succession of wild flowers which adorn our rocks and hills, our woods, fields, valleys, and mountains, from the time when the buds expand and the leaves are green, till the once bright foliage falls brown and withered before the wintry blasts, how few know even by sight, much less by name, amongst those who live in the country during a portion or through the whole of the year, and who have therefore ample leisure and opportunity, and yet there is not one of them which does not yield abundant scope for study, and exhibit a perfection of structure which tells of the Divine Creator.

HUSBANDS AND WIVES.

How often is it said in the present day that men and women are falsely placed with regard to each other? According to one party men are too strong, and women too weak, and they demand that women's prerogative be forthwith greatly increased—they would make men of them at once. Others consider that by a different course of education, which should direct their minds to great objects, women would quietly assume a position equal to that of men, without any more active interference. A third, and large party assert that, so far from men being the stronger, they have always been the victims of the other sex.

There is perhaps some truth in each of these propositions; but when we consider that men have always been the law-makers, there may be a suspicion of their having secured to themselves an undue portion of the powers and privileges of social life. It is so easy to make a law in favor of one's self, that we think there is a chance of the suspicion being well-founded. On the other hand, the small amount of truth which we have supposed to exist in the propositions above stated, is completely swamped by the presence of a load of injustice.

The destiny of man and woman, husband and wife, is the same: each has certain duties to perform which, of themselves, combine for the mutual advantage. If men and women, when brought together by marriage, and who have to live together for the whole of their lives, would make up their minds to be as charitable to each other's failings, as much disposed to mutual forbearance, and consideration towards each other's feelings in private, as they appear to be when in presence of their friends, we should hear much less about injustice, and false position.

To use a common expression, what is fair for one is fair for the other: in the married state there should be the strictest equality. The husband must come down from the position of master, not that his place may be taken by the woman, but that she may be the sharer of his pleasures, hopes, and joys, as she has ever been the partaker of his pains, fears, and sorrows.

There is nothing more beautiful than friendship; and the friendship of husband and wife insures the highest earthly happiness.

Many married men consider themselves fully justified in passing most of their evenings away from home, among their companions. If this be fair for the man, it is equally fair for the woman to go out and visit her friends also. If it be essential that the woman have always a smile ready to greet her husband when he enters, it is equally essential that he should bring good-humor and a pleasant countenance with him. True, he may be troubled and annoyed with business cares; but, is she not troubled and annoyed, often to a greater degree, with family and household cares, with the difference that, while she is always amongst hers, the man by his more active out-door life does, in some measure, modify his. If it be fair for the husband to keep the purse, it is fair that the wife should know how much or how little there may be in it. There must be no secrets on either side; what the man knows the woman ought to know. In cases of difficulty woman's feelings will often suggest a better remedy than man's reason.

The case might be met by the mutual recognition of one common purpose, and object, combined with respect for differing views regarding its attainment. Generally speaking, it may be said that there wants for man, more of sympathy, for woman, more of discretion:—

"The kindest and the happiest pair
Will find occasion to forbear;
And something every day they live
To pity, and perhaps forgive."

THE DEAD DOVE.

O VAINLY we sigh for thee, beautiful dove!

And vainly we pity thy fate;

Naught, naught can restore thee to life and to love,

Not e'en the sad plaint of thy mate.

Thy soft glossy plumage is spotted with gore—

The life tide that ebb'd from thy heart;

Thine eyes dimm'd by death shall be blind nevermore,

And the chill of his touch ne'er depart.

Thy nestlings are chiding thy tedious delay,

And calling in vain for thy care;

Their clamorous cries thou canst never obey;

Alas, thy sad fate they must share!

They will wait for thy coming, till, weary and faint,

They sink with a pitiful cry;

But thou wilt be deaf to their mournful complaint,

And like thee, all alone, they must die.

We'll fold thy bright wings on thy poor wounded breast,

And thine eyes dim in death we will close;

With a tear for thy fate we will lay thee to rest

Where naught shall disturb thy repose.

MY GUARDIAN.

BY MARY W. JANVRIK.

I WAS thirteen when my father died and left me an orphan. My mother had died when I was a mere infant, and I had grown up without a knowledge of a mother's love and tender care.

My father was a man of great business cares, with large property, consisting of landed estates, with many tenants under him. He had but little leisure to devote to me, his only child, though he loved me a great deal. This I knew, for there were times when he would come home at night, and, not finding his little Manette, he would send for me, and, fondly stroking my hair, call me "his darling child," and tell me how much I grew like my dead mother.

I had a governess in those early years, and was an apt pupil—so my governess said—and made light of the hard lessons which were given me. My life was very quiet till my thirteenth year, passed there in the old manor house, with no companions save my instructor and my books; but there came a change.

One stormy evening, late in November, my father, who had been absent on business for upwards of a week, came home, wet and chilled with his ride in the cold storm of rain and sleet which had that day fallen.

"I had just given up your coming to-night, father," I said, as he came in and removed his wet garments.

"I was detained by an accident to the carriage," he replied. "It was fortunate that I was able to procure assistance, or I might have been forced to longer delay in this cold storm. As it is, I feel chilled through and through; I must have taken cold." And he drew his chair up to the glowing grate.

"I will ring for Jane to bring in your tea." And I rang the bell as I spoke.

A half hour after—the tea service removed—he resumed his seat beside the fire.

"Manette, little daughter, come and sit here," he said, pointing to a low stool at his feet; and I obeyed. "How much you grow like your mother, child!" he went on. "You have her eyes and hair, and quiet ways. You are all mother, and I bless you for it!"—and he pressed a kiss upon my forehead. "If your mother could have but lived! But she was called early. It was God's will, but we shall join her some time, my child." And he fell to musing. Presently he looked up, and said, somewhat wearily, looking pale the while: "It is late, Manette; you must retire. I have a dull headache, and must sleep. I have ridden ever since morning, and am very fatigued; a good night's rest will restore me." And, kissing him good-night, I left him.

The next morning, when I descended to the breakfast-room, I was met by the governess, who told me that my father felt ill, and was unable to rise, and had requested a physician to be summoned. I went immediately to his room. The physician from the village was standing by the bedside, with an anxious expression of countenance. My father's face was crimson with violent fever, and his eyes were wild and brilliant. He lay quiet when I entered; but, as he caught a glimpse of me, he cried—

"It is the face of my wife, my dead Manette! I am coming to you soon; but our child, our little Manette, will be fatherless." Then he beckoned me to come to him.

I went up to the bedside, and, forcing back the tears with a strong effort, said, soothingly—"I am your little Manette, father, and you must not leave me; you must get well, and not leave me alone, my father!"

He drew my hand in his, and, closing his eyes, sank back upon the pillow, where he remained quiet for a little time till the fever spell came on again, when his brain again wandered.

For a week my father lay thus, every day the fever raging in his veins, when at length, on the seventh, at midnight, the crisis came. Then, pale and exhausted, he called me to him, and, in a faint voice, said that he realized that he was very sick, and felt he could not recover, bidding me be calm and brave. He kissed me, and, with my hand close clasped in his, fell into that last sleep which knoweth no awakening on earth again.

"Manette, you will come and live with me, and I will be a father to the child of my friend. It was his wish." It was my guardian, Mr. Harrington, who had spoken to me, and on the night after my father's funeral. "Do not grieve so, my child," he continued; "it is God's will, and we must submit. He doeth all things well."

But I could not see it then, and so I wept afresh, crying—"He is dead, gone, and I am fatherless! I shall be all alone now!"

"Manette, my child, I will be a father to you in place of the lost one; it was his wish, and you will come and live with me," replied Mr. Harrington, soothingly.

And so I left the old home of my birth and that life of thirteen years, and went to live with my guardian at Lakeshore, a distance of over a hundred miles from the manor.

My violent grief for my loss gradually lessened as time passed. My guardian, in truth, became to me as a father might to his own child, and I grew calmly happy.

And thus time passed till four years had elapsed, and I had attained seventeen. My governess had not accompanied me to Lakeshore; but I had attended the select school of Madame Derwent, and graduated with the highest honor. My guardian was present at the closing examination, and as I met his eyes resting upon me in pride, I felt more than repaid for my days of hard study by his one look of approbation.

After the close, we rode home slowly together. As we neared the house, half hidden by the grove of noble elms which surrounded it, and drove up the long, shady avenue, he said, looking at me with his deep gray eyes: "Well, Manette, you are emancipated from the school-room now, and, I suppose, like all young ladies, are rejoiced at your freedom. Are you not?" he asked, looking at me earnestly.

"Yes and no," I answered, laughingly. "I am partly glad and partly sorry."

"Why sorry? You are expecting to enjoy much in the future, and young ladies are always anticipating the happy period of their 'coming out' in society."

"But I don't care for society," I answered; "at least, not fashionable society, and I like my books a great deal better. But, now that I have left school, I shall have more leisure to devote to my painting and music, and to the society of those who are my true friends." And I fancied I had uttered a very dignified decision.

A smile lurked about my guardian's lips as he said: "One would think, Manette, to hear you, that you had already found out the hollowness of the world, and tasted its bitterness as well as its sweets, you talk so wisely. But, my child," he continued, and the smile left his face, "that is a lesson I pray you may never learn."

I was prevented a reply, for the carriage had reached home.

I should have written that Madam Harrington, my guardian's mother, a dignified yet affable lady of the old school, presided over the somewhat quiet household of her bachelor son; and she, too, welcomed his ward home to Lakeshore with a kindness which savored of a heart which, though old in years, had not forgotten its own youth time. And so she said, kindly, as we sat at tea:—

"And now I suppose you will be lonely here, Etta. You had better ask some young friends to pass a month with you. The change is great from a busy school to an old house like this, where there are no young faces."

"No, no, dear Mrs. Harrington. Do not invite any one here. I am not at all lonely with you and Mr. Harrington, and I do not wish for other society."

"It shall be as you like, Etta," she replied; and I saw a pleased expression resting on my guardian's face, though he said nothing.

The next morning, at breakfast, Mr. Harrington remarked that he was called on some business matter over to E—, a town some twelve miles distant, and asked me if I would like to accompany him. I had made ready, and we were soon on the road.

It was a beautiful October morning, clear and bright, and we rode through woods clad in the gorgeous drapery of autumn, past the river, which wound like a silver thread through meadows and hills, and along the broad, fair turnpike bordered by stately trees and open fields. I sat quietly drinking in the beauties of the scene, but at length was recalled to myself by my guardian.

"Manette, are you lost in admiration of the beauties of this October morning?"

"Almost," I replied, looking up and meeting the gaze of his deep eyes, "but your voice recalled me back to the reality."

"You are a great admirer of beauty in every form," he said. "You can appreciate a beautiful work of Nature or of Art, Manette. You should have brought your pencil with you."

"I don't know; yes, I trust I can appreciate the beautiful everywhere," I answered, "both in Art and Nature, as you say. Those distant mountains, with the blue shadows upon them, those nearer hills, in the golden light of the sun, and these glistening meadows, with the dew yet upon the grass—these, all these I love; yet these are tame, when compared with a living love, a breathing, pulsating love, that better satisfies the heart, I think."

In my excitable nature I had opened more of my heart than I intended to my guardian; and as I paused, looking down confusedly, not knowing what he would think of me, I was startled by the violent trembling of his hand which held the reins, and, looking up at his face, saw that it was deathly pale. He put his hand which was free on mine for a moment, then hastily removing it, murmured—

"No, no, it cannot be! It is presumption in me to think it. I am surely mad or dreaming!"

I looked at him in astonishment, and then asked: "What is it, my dear guardian? Is it anything I can do for you?"

"It was nothing, Manette. I was dreaming aloud; it is a habit of mine;" and he smiled half sadly; then he added in his old calm manner, with the emotion all gone, "I am afraid that my child will be a little lonely in our dull old house, with no society save my quiet mother and her guardian. Had we not better invite Miss Eames, or some other young lady to Lakeshore for a season?"

"No, no, my dear guardian; do not do it!" I said. "I shall not like this Miss Eames, if you do. I want only the society of our home circle, and shall be very happy there with you and your dear, kind mother, unless you wish more company," I added.

"Well, if you think so, Manette," he answered, smiling down on me with his deep, gray eyes, as I sat beside him. "Then it is settled, and to my liking, too, for I much prefer a quiet home. But here we are, almost at our journey's end!" he added, as we entered the village and drove through its pretty shaded streets to the house of the person with whom he had business.

An hour after, as we rode homeward, my thoughts reverted to the morning's conversation, and I only wondered what grief had thus shaded my guardian's life.

As Mr. Harrington assisted me from the carriage, on our arrival home, a young man came down from the veranda with eager warmth of manner, saying—"Uncle Oscar, do you not recognize me, or have I grown out of your knowledge within the last five years?"

It was a handsome, boyish face, the young man raised to his uncle's; a broad brow, overshadowed by thick masses of curly, brown hair, and eyes of the same rich brown, a handsome, bold face, with a pleasing look in those brown eyes and around the firmly cut mouth.

"You have grown completely out of my knowledge, Edgar," replied Mr. Harrington; "but I begin to see traces of the boy I knew in your face," he added, as he gazed upon him; then, calling to me as I turned to leave them, he said: "Manette, this is my nephew, Edgar Harrington. My ward, Manette Blanchard."

The eyes of the young man rested on my face for an instant, then he extended his hand, saying frankly: "I am most happy in making your acquaintance, Miss Manette, for permit me to call you by that name; and I trust we shall be the best of friends during my stay here at Lakeshore; for I foresee that we shall be thrown much together."

Edgar Harrington remained with us over a month, through golden October, when the leaves fell withered and sere to the cold earth, and through the colder and longer days of November, when the winds wailed and moaned abroad, and the shivering trees stood bare and leafless like giants despoiled of their armor.

From the first, I had liked Edgar Harrington; his bold, handsome face and strong confident manner. We had become great friends; and rode or walked together on pleasant days, or, when stormy, read or sang together in the parlor. He was the only child of my guardian's brother, and had just graduated from college with the highest honors. His home was in Beechwood, some hundred miles distant; and he had come to visit his uncle for a season of rest, before commencing to read law under an eminent barrister in his native town.

My guardian had been absent much, of late, on urgent business, he said, which required his immediate attention, and I saw but little of him. When I did, I noticed often the old look about the mouth and eyes, and it filled my heart with pain. "It is his old sorrow," I would say to myself. "It is what none can help, or gladly would I."

It was the early evening of a day late in November. The day had been unusually warm and pleasant; and Edgar Harrington, who was to leave on the morrow, proposed our taking a last walk together; as I made ready, and we went forth. There was one place whither we had often been, a little vine-clad seat in the edge of the forest upon the summit of a hill; and hither we wended our steps in the soft, bland evening air.

"Manette," said Edgar, as he sat beside me, "Manette, there is something on my heart which I must tell you to-night, before I leave this place to go back to my home. There is a little boon which I wish you to give me, Manette," he said, taking her hand as he spoke. "It is this hand, and your love with it. Am I asking too much?"

It was unexpected to me—this avowal from his lips; and it startled me a little; for, in the time we had been together, I had never thought of this. He had seemed so like a brother, as I thought; but, alas! I never had had a brother, and so knew not the love of one. Did I regard him as a brother? I knew not. I loved him very much; and he had more than a brother's affection for me. So, with his passionate words, and quick, decided manner, the matter was settled; and we were betrothed lovers. I doubt if I was happy then, if, when my head rested on my pillow that night, I felt as one should who was betrothed to the object of their strongest love; but yet I loved him, and said to myself over and over again, "If he should cease to love me, it would be the greatest trial of my life."

The next morning Edgar told his uncle of our relations to each other, and received his congratulations for our happiness. This, he told me before we parted; and then, with a last embrace, he sprang into the carriage which bore him to the nearest station.

We were betrothed, but were to wait until Edgar had won his profession, which would be in three years. And so we parted, he to begin his new career, and I to remain with my guardian till he should come to claim me.

After he had gone, my guardian came to me in the parlor, and there was the old look in his face again. He was suffering. "Oh, what would I not do to relieve him; and yet I am powerless," I said to myself, as he came near me where I stood at the open window; and taking my hand in his, which trembled a little, he said, tenderly—

"Manette, my child, Edgar has told me all; and I desire nothing more than your happiness. I wish you much joy in the new relation you have assumed toward him. I pray you may be happy!"

"I thank you, my dear guardian, my best friend," I answered; "I am happy in this new tie. Edgar is so generous and noble that we must be happy together."

"Yes, yes, you will be!" he answered. "Edgar is a young man of much talent and nobleness of character, and will give you the love for which your nature yearns. Oh, Manette, child, I pray that nothing may come between you and your bliss, that all be fair and bright along your future way!" Then, slowly releasing my hand which he continued to hold, my guardian went out, leaving me alone, and with that same look of sorrow about his mouth ever before me. Why should it disturb me so? I could not banish it, and yet I could not speak to him about it. But it was ever before me; and that night I heard my guardian walking his room, slowly pacing back and forth, till I fell asleep in the gray dawn.

A year went by, and Edgar came once in that time to Lakeshore. It was in the summer days, and again we took long walks and rides, and I was happy. When he left me to return again to his studies, he said, as we parted, "In two short years, my betrothed, I shall have gained my profession, and then I shall come to claim my bride."

In the ensuing winter, a heavy sorrow came to our home, in the death of Mrs. Harrington, my guardian's mother. But it was not as those "who sorrow without hope;" like "a shock of corn fully ripe for the harvest," she was gathered into her rest.

Over six weeks had passed without a letter from Edgar. Always, before this, I had received one every fortnight. What could have happened to him? He must be ill. And my anxious heart conjured up every imaginable accident to my betrothed. At length, one evening, my guardian came home from the village, and with the long expected letter in his hand. He gave it to me, and I opened it eagerly. As I read, my head swam, my hand trembled, and a quick pain shot through my heart. With a faint cry, the letter fell from my hand, and I sank insensible upon the floor.

When I returned to consciousness, my guardian was bending over me. His words reached me like words heard in a dim dream: "O my God!" he cried, "why does Edgar thus cast so ruthlessly away this love that another would give his life to win?" He was bending over me, laying my brow with water, and he stooped down and pressed a warm kiss upon my cold lips. That touch recalled me to life, and I opened my eyes and looked around.

"You were faint, Manette," said my guardian, calmly. Could it be the same voice which I had heard the moment before? "Your letter overcame you. I have read it," he continued, for I thought perhaps Edgar was ill. Excuse me if I was wrong, but your happiness is very dear to me, my child."

"You know all, then, my friend; the faithlessness of my betrothed and my misery," I said, with false composure. "My broken faith and broken heart—but no, it shall not break or bend for a false love!" I added, quickly; "it shall learn to beat calmly, and to despise him. False! false! they are all so!" I added, bitterly.

"Manette, my child, do not judge all men by Edgar. Strive to forget him, for he is not worthy your love," said my guardian, in a low voice.

"Yes, I will!" I said, almost fiercely. "I will tear his false image from my heart, as even now I rend this letter to fragments!" And I took the letter, and tore it into shreds.

But this fierce mood passed away, and when I sought my room it was to throw myself down beside the couch, and weep and wrestle for my blighted hopes. Days, weeks, and even months went by, and I mourned for my lost love. Try as I would, I could not quickly drive his image from my heart. My nature was too intense to forget easily.

Two years passed, and with no change to me. We had little company at Lakeshore, and thus, in my secluded life, I had much time to brood over, and make myself miserable in thinking of the past. My guardian was much from home, and so I was left mostly alone.

One day, I read Edgar Harrington's marriage to the daughter of the eminent barrister with whom he had studied. "Now, at length, I shall be able to drive all memories from my heart," I said. And I did; from that moment all love died out, and Edgar Harrington, my former betrothed, became to me as one dead. If I had met him then, and he had been free, and wished me to wed him, I should have turned from him with indifference.

When my guardian came home that night I laid the paper before him, and pointed to the marriage. He read it, and then his eyes sought my face, but he saw no emotion there save a smile, as I said, calmly—

"You perceive it does not affect me any, my friend. I see now that I was mistaken in myself; that I never cared for him as I should for the one who was to be the nearest and closest friend on earth."

"Oh, Manette, how thankful I am that this is so! I had feared otherwise. You will yet find a love which will be the true love. But, Manette, I am going abroad. I start in the next steamer for Europe, and cannot say when I shall return. I shall expect to hear from you regularly during my absence, and shall write to you by every home-bound packet. And—"

"Oh, do not go!" I cried, interrupting him. "Do not leave me, my guardian, my only friend!"
